Contractual obligations

Last week, my friends and I sat in awe as the Arizona Diamondbacks upset the New York Yankees in Game Seven of the World Series. We rejoiced as Mr. Automatic, Mariano Rivera, gave up two runs in the bottom of the ninth, and we cheered as we saw the stunned looks in the Yankees dugout. But before I was able to fully savor the outcome, someone asked me, "Hey Rob, what do you think of contraction?"

"Contraction?" I thought, "This hardly seems like the time to think about contraction—I mean, come on, the Yankees just lost." But I honored his request and replied, "I think it's good for the game. Something has to be done. Plus, it's something new, something exciting."

COMMENTARY

Rob Schmicker

That night while I was asleep, I had one of those Ebenezer Scrooge episodes, as my Vladimir Guerrero bobble-head came to life and took me on a tour of the future of baseball. What I saw was not for the weak of heart. I can honestly say that while contraction is good for some people, it is horrible for the game.

Contraction is good for me. It's good for my friend Kim, my friend Eric and everyone in the Trax dorm. You see, we like the Mets, Braves, Red Sox and Yankees, respectively. If contraction goes down, these four big spenders will have even more people to choose from. Contraction won't benefit small-market teams like Pittsburgh, Kansas City, or Milwaukee, because they need more than just a single player; they need an even playing field during the free agent signing period.

If a dispersal draft were to occur, Pittsburgh would choose Guerrero with the first pick. But Pittsburgh wouldn't be able to sign him to a long-term deal. So in a few years, they would either lose him in free agency to a team like the Braves, or get around that by trading him to the Yankees for prospects. Either way, Guerrero would remain in Pittsburgh for a short while before being captured by someone else. In a few years, the gap between those at the top and those at the bottom would once again emerge.

Why should I care though? Their loss is our gain. If Minnesota can't resign their players, then I think we should be able to sign them. After all, I totally support a player like Doug Mientkiewicz playing for the Mets. I'm not crying because the Twins and Expos may be dead by the end of the month; I'm celebrating because it may give my team a better chance to win.

Winning isn't everything, though. I love the Mets whether they win or lose. I will continue to be a fan even if they don't have another winning season until I die. I'm sure it's no different for Twins fans. I'm sure they want to be able to see the Twins play, regardless of the situation. If baseball follows through on contraction, thousands of fans will lose their favorite team. It won't be because they are moving to another city, but because they are being disbanded to meet the needs of millionaire owners.

The owner who has the biggest role in this plan is Minnesota Twins Owner Carl Pohlad, who is actually willing to be bought out by major league baseball. When he heard of Selig's plan to eliminate two teams, he figured it would be a great way to get more money. You see, Pohlad only has two billion dollars. This would just be enough to secure his family's future. As a matter of fact, he has so little money, that he never gives any back to the Twins. I got to hand it to him—instead of spending millions of dollars to sign these overpaid free agents, he actually keeps the money he makes so that his family can be better off in the future. I don't know what else to say, but "You Da Man, Carl."

Now, if you think Art Modell is hated in Cleveland for moving the Browns to Baltimore, you haven't seen anything yet. I think a move to Iceland may be a wise decision for the Pohlad family.

I mean, this isn't just any baseball franchise—this is the Minnesota Twins.

The Twins were the first AL team to draw more than three million fans in a season; they were an original member of the American League and they were the home to such adored players as Harmon Killebrew and Kirby Puckett. Most importantly this is a franchise that has a bright future.

Bud Selig, Pohlad and the rest of the owners just don't see this. They see an opportunity to increase their monopoly by getting rid of competition. And they see this as an opportunity to gain leverage in the upcoming labor dispute. Selig denies this charge, but it seems too coincidental to me. "No longer are the owners bitterly divided on the labor front. No longer do they come to the negotiation table empty handed. This time they come carrying 50 jobs—and the promise of more to come," says Sean McAdam of ESPN.com.

I can only hope that the owners are indeed just dumb and that this isn't a bargaining tool. The last thing that baseball needs after one of the greatest seasons of all time is a labor dispute. A lot of fans still haven't come back from the 1994 lockout. And those who have come back won't be able to overlook a second labor dispute. This is definitely not the way to make the game better.

With that in mind, allow me to get off track for a minute and propose a few suggestions on how to improve baseball without contraction. First, make the playing field more even by implementing a revenue sharing deal. Small market teams can't compete because they don't have the resources that teams from Los Angeles and New York have.

Second, quicken the pace of the game. Make it illegal to have so many conferences on the mound, don't let batters step out of the box and call more strikes. But most importantly, do something about the contracts. Nothing turns me off more than the baseball off-season when owners throw money around as if they were playing monopoly.

I think I speak for baseball fans all over the world when I say that we love the game for being pure and simple. If the owners haven't soured the game already, it is sure to come with contraction. I'll admit, contraction is good for some. But it is horrible for the overall state of the game. Baseball made a mistake by expanding too much in the past decade, but this is not a viable answer. I can only hope that someone will step in and stop contraction before it starts. Just think, your favorite team could be next.

Men's soccer wins 2-1 over Army

By Tara Utchel
Staff Writer

The men's soccer team wrapped up the 2001 season on a positive note. They defeated Army 2-1 on the west fields this past Friday. The game, however, was looking grim in the first half. Army jumped out to an early 1-0 lead, and the Black Knights held the Bison offense scoreless for the remainder of the first half.

Army	1

"The Army game was about two different halves. The first half we looked like a team who did not want to be there. Army should have been up three or four goals. Fortunately we were only down 1-0 at the half without even a shot on goal," Head Coach Brendan Nash said.

However, the Bison turned it around in the second half and picked up their play with an increase in intensity. "In the second half, we asked Tom Ryan to come off the bench and pick us up. Tom went into the game and did just that. He brought some intensity to the field and came close to scoring [hitting the crossbar]. It picked up the whole team's energy level. We kept pressing and it was great to have the seniors score both goals in their last game," Nash said.

"I'm so glad that we could finish the season with a win. I will always remember the times I had here on the field."
— Andrew Aurand '02

Seniors Andy Aurand and Ryan Weber scored their last collegiate goals in the second half to win the game for the Bison.

Weber's goal came first, just 20 minutes into the half. He took a pass from Steve Feather '03 and buried the ball into the net for his second goal of the season, to tie the game at one all.

Thirteen minutes later, Aurand cradled a pass from Chip Witte '03 and ripped an amazing shot from 30 yards out for the game-winning goal. Also, sophomore goalie Steve Whitaker was recorded with three saves for the season finale win.

"I'm so glad that we could finish the season with a win. I will always remember the times I had here on the field," Aurand said.

"Andy's goal was a great goal and regardless of our record he knows he scored the game winner in his last soccer game," Nash said.

The win was a great win for the team, especially for the four seniors. Seniors Aurand, Weber, Greg Stunzenas and Nate Hopfinger played their last game wearing the Orange and Blue last Friday.

Despite the unfortunate season, the seniors were able to end their college careers with one last win.

"I was also glad to see all four seniors finish their careers on the field, including Greg Stunzenas who could barely walk at the time. I tell our guys 'you are only as good as your last game,'" Nash said.

Despite the disappointing season, the Bison ended with a win, in hopes that the end is just the beginning.

"For the next eight months we can take a positive out of a disappointing season," Nash said. "The season will motivate us through the winter, and I know the guys want to raise the bar back to where it was."

The Bison have already forgotten the past and are looking forward to working hard in the off-season.

Volleyball loses to Colgate 3-0

By Pat Evans

A couple of late losses in the regular season won't discourage the Bison, who view the games as practice for the upcoming Patriot League tournament.

In the last league game of the season, Colgate swept the Orange and Blue 3-0 (30-24, 30-22, 33-31).

Colgate	3

The night before, the Bison had traveled to Binghamton, where a strong non-league squad also came through with a shut out 3-0 (30-19, 30-28, 30-27). In their final home game of the season, the Herd sent the seniors out of Davis Gym on a good note by taking care of Loyola 3-2 (27-30, 30-17, 27-30, 30-27, 15-12).

"Our biggest focus right now is preparing for the Patriot League tournament," Head Coach Cindy Opalski said. "In some small way, it's about winning these last games, but more importantly, it's about improving our physical skills."

For Colgate and Binghamton, it was their final home games of the season. The two teams fed off the emotion that their seniors and home crowds brought them, but Opalski made the best of the situation by having her team work on some different things that they will try against American in the first round of the Patriot League tournament.

Shannon Walker '02 and Melanie Gray '02 recorded 11 and 10 kills, respectively, in the Colgate match.

"It was a tough weekend for us," Walker said, "but we're just looking at it as preparation."

In the Loyola match, the Bison took Senior Night as an opportunity to come together as a team to pick up the victory. Walker slammed a match-high 24 kills to go along with five blocks.

"We wanted to go out on a good note," she said, "and it was a lot of fun."

For many Bison it was a career night in the last game of the season in Davis Gym. Melanie Ghiz '03 turned in a match and career-high seven blocks to go along with a career-high 18 kills. Ghiz normally plays on the right side of the floor, but Opalski moved her to the middle, where she got more opportunities to use her skills.

"I liked playing that position a lot more," Ghiz said. "It's what I used to play, and I was a lot more comfortable there against Loyola."

Breean Trapasso '04 did an excellent job of setting up the Bison's strong hitters, recording a career-high 30 assists in the match. Brandi Trapasso '04 racked up her tenth "double-double" of the season by tallying 17 kills and 15 digs. Angela Gano '02 played her last home game to her fullest, hustling to 10 digs in the match.

"The contributions that they've made over four years is what should be looked at for our seniors," Opalski said. "You can't just look at the last game. Their ongoing skill and leadership has been a great testament to them."

The Bison hope that they can repeat the kind of effort that they put forth against Loyola when they go down to Washington D.C. to take on the number one seed in the tournament, American. The Eagles are undefeated in League play and have swept the Bison in both of the regular season meetings.

"We believe we've got a good shot at knocking them off," Opalski said. "There are some things we need to do tactically because the execution of our game plan against them earlier in the season wasn't our best."

The Bison know that if they want to defend their Patriot League title, they will have to beat their biggest challenge in years.

"We're all working hard in practice like we've done all year," Walker said. "We're going in optimistic, and hopefully we can pull off the upset."

Opalski has told her team about the advantages of not being the number one seed in the tournament like they were last year.

"All the pressure is on them," Opalski said. "They're at home, and they haven't lost a game. There's a chance for cracks, and when they crack we'll just keep chipping away until the whole thing falls down."

Lauren Schwarz '03

Lauren Schwarz '03 exemplifies true sportsmanship and a hunger for winning. In an overtime win against Navy last Sunday, Schwarz smashed home the winning goal to win the Patriot League tournament and earn the women's soccer team a bid to the 64-team NCAA Championship tournament.

Lauren's goal prompted a number of firsts for Bucknell women's soccer. Among these, its first-ever Patriot League Championship and first appearance in the NCAAs.

Schwarz remembers exactly how it went. "After Tara got pulled down she said 'you have this, put it in the back of the net.' I got into position behind the penalty area, lined up my shot and slammed it upper 90 into the net," she said. "I could see our assistant coach, Megan, and teammates jumping up and down. It was wonderful!"

Schwarz's kick set off a wave that was heard as far as Penn State. The crowd was yelling, screaming and scurrying onto the field.

Schwarz was honored as the Patriot League Championship Most Valuable Player.

"Just like I planned," Schwarz said, "Upper left."

The Navy goalie wasn't aware of Schwarz's almost religious consistency at aiming at that left corner. "Since I can remember I've always shot left," she said.

The Bison will face No. 8 Penn State Friday at 5:30 p.m. at State College for the first round of tournament action. The two teams met earlier this year with the Lions roaring to a 9-2 victory, but this is playoff time and everyone starts out on even ground.

"We are happy to be in this position," Schwarz said. "We have nothing to lose. The girls and I are looking to prove to the Lions and women's college soccer that Bucknell deserves to be here."

When asked who her idol is, Schwarz immediately replied, "My mom." Mrs. Schwarz instilled a love of the sport attitude in her daughter.

"My mom has been coaching me and my siblings for about five years," Schwarz said. "It has never been about winning, just developing as a player and as a person through the sport. She epitomizes what I yearn to be—a teacher/athlete."

Schwarz is an Elementary Education major who hopes to teach when she graduates from Bucknell. In her spare time she participates in the Student Athletic Advisor Committee, volunteers and tutors local area children.

Spotlight Players By Aaron DeRosa

Senior Mark Tallman was voted as a captain, the highest honor on the Bucknell football team, by his teammates. He has never missed a varsity football game at Bucknell. He is the fifth ranked tackler on the team and has recovered four fumbles and one interception. He was named Lewisburg Touchdown Club Defensive Player of the Week twice this season.

Senior men's cross country runner Greg Costello had a strong showing in the regional championships this past weekend, ranking seventh and earning an automatic bid to the NCAA championships. He is a two-year letterwinner and has earned All-Region Squad honors.

Soccer forward Savannah Rennels '04 was selected to the All-Patriot League First Team. She led the team with 23 points and 11 goals, two of which were game-winners. She scored in seven of the 16 games she played in. In addition, she holds the league lead with an average of 0.73 goals per game.

Ryan McCarty '02, co-captain of the Men's Water Polo team, scored a team high seven goals in an 11-9 victory over Johns Hopkins last week, clinching third place honors for the team. McCarty leads the team with 50 goals and 65 points. As a junior, he posted a team and career high of 72 goals and third in points with 86.

Freshman Jamie Flick set her second Bucknell swimming record in three meets thus far with the Bison. After an impressive showing in the 200 breast against Army in late October, she followed up with a fourth place finish in the 100 meter breaststroke

Honda improves futuristic life-sized robot

By Josie Cetta
Science and Technology Editor

The science of robotics moved closer to a fully functional, human-like robot on Monday when Honda debuted, in Tokyo, the newest "Asimo," a robot with the ability to walk down stairs and respond to verbal commands.

Asimo, Japanese for "legs, even," is the product of 15 years of research and development. It is white and silver, has two legs and stands four feet tall, an ideal height for operating in the human living space. It is compact and lightweight, weighing 114.6 lb.

Asimo is an acronym that stands for Advanced Step in Innovative Mobility. Its features include its advanced walking technology, wider arm operating parameters, speaking ability and friendly design.

Asimo is easy to operate. Its size allows the robot to turn light switches and doorknobs, as well as work at tables and workbenches.

The human resemblance of the Asimo provides for easy lines of communication. For instance, Asimo's eyes are the level of an adult's eyes when the adult is sitting in a chair.

In the past, the walking patterns of robots were awkward, requiring a slight pause before being able to turn. Each pattern had a different stride, or time-per-step, that could not be altered, making robots less flexible.

Honda considered the fact that humans shift their center of gravity in order to turn and has applied this knowledge to Asimo's movements. Now, Asimo's new walking technology is able to predict its next movement and shift its center of gravity in anticipation. Asimo moves rapidly and smoothly without having to pause. Because walking patterns are already programmed into the robot, Asimo can change its foot placement and turn angles at will.

The arm range of Asimo has improved as well. Honda raised the robot's shoulder joint by 20 degrees, allowing the elbow to rise up to 105 degrees.

Another impressive feature of Asimo is its speaking ability. It has the ability to recognize and verbally respond to 50 different calls, greetings and questions in Japanese, as well as obey 30 different action commands.

However, there are still problems with the new technology. When asked to turn around at a press briefing, the robot raised its hand and said in a monotone voice, "What do you want?"

Asimo can be controlled from a workstation, or a portable remote control. One can control the robot's walking movements and its arm motions, which include waving both hands, waving goodbye, responding and grasping.

Honda, Japan's third largest carmaker, first introduced Asimo a year ago. Where it once took 40 minutes to start up, the Asimo now takes a mere four minutes. It can reach walking speeds of up to 1.6 km/hr and has a grasping force of 0.5 kg/hand.

Asimo robots have been rented out to theme parks since April. In fact, Honda recently signed on three clients, out of 40 offers, for long-term contracts. IBM Japan is one of them.

USA Today has said that IBM offered an annual contract of 20 million yen, or $166,220, to use Asimo as a receptionist. Amusement companies have lined up to pay a rental fee of two million yen per day in order to use the robot for tours and on-stage chats.

The popularity of Asimo is increasing rapidly and will continue to do so as Honda persists in its efforts to improve the robot.

"In terms of costs and attraction, Asimo would rank among the celebrities called on to host events," said Toshiji Asai, manager of Asimo's business office.

A look at computer viruses and their writers

By George Casper
Staff Writer

As computers have become common in our society, their problems have also become more and more important. Some of the most troubling for University students in the past months have been computer worms and viruses.

Like an actual virus, a computer virus seeks to replicate itself by infecting a host and using that host to spread further. Typically, a virus enters a computer when the user runs a file infected with the virus. When this happens, the virus's program runs and the virus itself is placed into the computer's permanent storage. From there, the virus will write itself into other files, and the process repeats.

Worms, which self-propagate, have become much more common as more people connect to the Internet. Worms are programs that usually, though not always, infect computers through e-mail attachments, and then use the computers to automatically send out copies of themselves. Since worms need only to be run before they begin infecting other computers, they have the potential to spread much more quickly than viruses do.

Of course, simply propagating does not make a virus harmful. Viruses in memory can interfere with, as well as damage, other programs they try to infect, and worms that are overzealous in their attempts to send themselves to others can cause congestion of mail servers. However, these are merely side effects of the code's attempts to reproduce itself. If this were this the extent of the problems that viruses and worms presented, they would be a nuisance, but not particularly troublesome.

Unfortunately, some viruses and worms carry "payloads," programs that cause the host computer to act abnormally in some way, in addition to the code needed to replicate. These payloads range from a graphical fireworks display or a joke message to entire hard disks. Some viruses attempt to cause security holes or breach the user's privacy, even allowing other computers to control the affected computer through the Internet. Some try to send passwords or other personal information like credit card numbers to the virus's designer. Others were not designed with malicious intent, but simply have some programming flaw in them that has unintended consequences. The poorly written code might cause the infected machine to crash, or to send so many emails that it bogs down the mail server.

No matter how sophisticated these programs are, they obviously did not create themselves. Someone had to create the code and release it to the wild.

The majority of virus programmers are people who simply enjoy causing others to suffer. Often, their viruses are poorly written. The blind, destructive nature of the software usually ensures it doesn't "live" in hosts long enough to spread far.

Many of their programs were written with "toolkits," programs that automatically generate a virus with the effects that the user wants. Fortunately, toolkit-generated viruses are very similar to one another and many anti-virus products can recognize entire "families" of code generated by toolkits. Still, the threat of toolkit-generated code should not be underestimated. The semi-famous "Anna Kournikova" worm, discovered in February this year, was the product of such a toolkit. It managed to cause significant havoc, not because the user of the toolkit was particularly clever, but because of the popularity of the tennis star.

Slightly more honorable are people whose zealotry gets in the way of their common sense. These people develop software to "punish" a company like Microsoft or America Online (AOL). This usually takes the form of harming the users of a particular service. While people in this group may indeed be doing some legitimate research, and their attempts to find flaws in the software of Microsoft or AOL are sincere, punishing the users of the software obviously is not the best way to change things. People in this category believe that users of Microsoft, AOL, or whoever their perceived enemy is, deserve what they get.

Others are simply interested in studying software for its own sake, and spend hours searching through software for bugs and flaws because they're genuinely curious about how the software works and what security flaws it contains. Some of the people in this group are responsible, and some are not. Some organizations, such as the Cult of the Dead Cow (http://www.cultdeadcow.com/), have released software like Back Orifice, which takes advantage of numerous holes in Microsoft software. While the software can be used for malicious purposes, the Cult argues that the primary purpose of their software is to demonstrate errors in the Windows operating system, and that it serves as a wake-up call for Microsoft to secure the software that millions of its customers depend on. Like many similar groups, the Cult here views itself as a consumer watchdog, discovering security holes before hackers can use them to their own advantage and making its findings and demonstrations public.

One other notable product of the full disclosure mentality was the Bubbleboy worm. Bubbleboy was a nondestructive, "proof-of-concept" worm that demonstrated that executable attachments could be triggered automatically in Outlook without the user actually running them. As a result, merely sending the virus to someone with Outlook would result in the recipient being infected with no action on his or her part. This worm was never actually released, but the techniques it used formed the basis of later, more destructive viruses.

Unfortunately, sometimes "proof-of-concept" code is needed to adequately demonstrate that a vulnerability exists, and to provide a safe way for system administrators to test their systems for the vulnerability. However, as long as the "proof-of-concept" code exists, someone can study it and make a more malicious version, exploiting the same vulnerability.

For a University student, the best method of dealing with viruses, worms, and other pieces of malicious software is prevention. All students are strongly encouraged to use anti-virus software, and one such program, Norton Antivirus, is provided free of charge to students through ISR. Although new viruses are being developed all the time, for motives noble and base, regularly updated virus software will be able to catch the majority of malicious codes that come to campus.

Profile: Dr. William Kenny

By Alyson Walker
Senior Writer

Every Monday and Wednesday evening from 5 p.m. to 6:15 p.m. the sound of music is heard coming from the Weis Center. No, it's not the von Trapp family singers; it's the University Symphonic Band. Led by Dr. William Kenny, the ensemble meets twice a week to rehearse and create music together.

Kenny is very pleased with the ensemble. "In a musical sense, I feel very excited about the group, and I think the group is capable of making wonderful music together," Kenny said. "It's been a little bit different this semester, in part simply because of the world situation. And often, I've found the band to be almost a refuge from that. Personally, I'm valuing more and more the community of the group."

Along with conducting the symphonic band and wind ensemble, Kenny is the director of the jazz band, oversees the athletic bands and other various small ensembles, which vary from semester to semester.

Kenny is not a new face to the University community - he's a veteran, having been here for 12 years. Prior to coming to the University, he was completing his graduate studies at the University of Illinois.

> "My first impression of Dr. Kenny was 'Wow! This guy really seems to love his job.' It's great to have professors who love what they do and care about their students.
> —Jeff Bloch '05

Kenny can also be found performing in a variety of groups outside of campus. He is the principle French horn player for the Williamsport Symphony Orchestra and the Orchestra of Susquehanna Valley Chorale, and is a member of the Commonwealth Brass Quintet.

"I think performing in other conducted ensembles is one of my best on-going educational experiences for myself," Kenny said.

He truly enjoys working with the seventy students that comprise the band. Rehearsals, although focused and intense, also can have their lighter moments.

"I think it's really important what we do. I really do. And it might not be because we're creating recordings that are going to touch the lives of millions of people, but I think it's important to play this music. It's important to play it well, but it's also important to be able to laugh when things don't go as planned," Kenny said.

"He's really energetic and very positive. He's always encouraging and never demeaning to his students," said Steve Young '05, bass clarinetist for the band. "He adds in humor because sometimes rehearsals can get stressful, and he lightens the situation by telling a joke or making us laugh."

It's apparent that Kenny loves directing the group, and when questioned as to what he enjoys the most, he doesn't hesitate in his response.

"It's a combination of two things - I enjoy the students, and I enjoy the music. You put those together, and it's rewarding to make music with the students, with people you enjoy," Kenny said.

Kenny's love of music and enthusiasm is clearly evident to his students.

"My first impression of Dr. Kenny was 'Wow! This guy really seems to love his job.' It's great to have professors who love what they do and care about their students," said Jeff Bloch, '05, a trumpet player in the band.

Nathan Clark '04, a percussionist in the band agreed, "Watching Dr. Kenny conduct the band is really enjoyable because I can see how he enjoys not only the music, but also hearing his students play it."

The ensemble is open to students of any major or discipline, not just to those concentrating in musical studies.

"The students come from fairly diverse musical backgrounds. There are some music performance majors and there are some who might be engineers or psychology majors. To get a diverse group of people with diverse musical backgrounds to really play as one ensemble is a challenge. When it happens, it's really quite rewarding," Kenny said.

The opportunity to hear his students perform is rapidly approaching. Although most people probably have not planned what they are doing on this Saturday night at 8 o'clock p.m., Kenny, along with his seventy students, know exactly where they will be - on stage at the Weis Center, for the symphonic band winter concert.

Not just made up of diverse people, the ensemble will also be performing a wide array of musical styles during its concert. From classic band pieces of the 50s, when band composition became popular, to more modern pieces like Frank Tichelli's Vesuvius, the band will play an interesting mix of music.

"There's music that is serious; there's music that is just for fun; there's music that is patriotic, and music that is moving," Kenny said.

Not only is the music varied, but so are the ensembles performing. The symphonic band will play seven pieces in a two-part concert. After intermission, the wind ensemble will take the stage to perform Gustav Holst's Second Suite in F.

Kenny enjoys "the challenge of performing at a high level," pushing students to play at their highest level possible, both as individuals and as a group.

The University Symphonic Band and Wind Ensemble Concert will be Saturday, Dec.17 at 8 p.m. in the Weis Center. All are invited to come, and admission is free.

Students reflect on recent NYC trip

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Senior Writer

Although it has been a little over two months since the New York City terrorist attack, the events of Sept. 11 are still fresh in many minds. For many, the holiday season is going to be the first time they will visit New York City since the tragedy occurred.

Last Saturday, Nov. 10, the Humanities Residential College visited New York City. Students were aware before they departed that their first experience in New York after the collapse of the Twin Towers would certainly be different; however no one could be sure of the emotions of the city.

The tragedy has changed the city that, for many Americans, is a symbol of the ideals, attitudes, and progress of our nation. The big question was this: how different would it really be?

Besides the obvious changes in the skyline, there are other noticeable differences in the city. For instance there are signs directing people to the World Trade Center site and more presence of security personnel outside of stores and offices.

At the Metropolitan Museum of Art, guards checked all backpacks, purses and bags. Large bags are prohibited in many parts of the museum; they can be left with the security guards and retrieved when visitors are ready to leave.

Although many of these changes are immediately noticeable to even the infrequent visitor many people do not feel that increased security has taken anything away from the attraction of this large and exciting city.

Students had mixed reactions about being in the city. Michelle Miller '05 was very glad that she had the opportunity to visit New York and did not feel that the terrorism had changed the city a great deal.

"I was more alert and had the thoughts of the attack in my mind while visiting, but I didn't feel any different than I do when I normally visit New York," Miller said.

Rae Purcell '05 is a frequent traveler to New York City. Although her family was directly affected by the tragedy, she still felt removed from the situation, even when visiting.

"When I was in the city, I was not scared. I was not worried about terrorists around every corner, and I felt like the atmosphere had not changed since my last visit ... In all, I believe that although the country has been assaulted, as citizens, we cannot dwell on the past. For the good of the country, we must move on with our lives," Purcell said.

This does not mean that students were not mindful of the great loss the city had suffered. Julia Woodard '05 noticed the changes in other ways.

"It was kind of eerie seeing the skyline for the first time. It just sort of seemed empty," Woodard said.

But the great changes and losses the city has suffered have also has some not so terrible results. The extreme patriotism of the people of New York is visible and was noticed by many students. Matt Baker '05 said that one of the things that he noticed most were the American flags that decorated almost every store window and spanned the side of many office buildings.

Woodard agreed, and was also impressed with the patriotism that was displayed throughout the city.

"I just thought it was really neat looking back at the city as we were driving home Saturday night and seeing the Empire State Building all lit up in red, white and blue. It was really comforting," Woodard said.

S.A.M.S. prepares for dance marathon

By Elizabeth Muller
Staff Writer

Students Against Multiple Sclerosis (S.A.M.S.) is a nation wide organization composed of students on college campuses throughout the United States, who raise money for research in order to find a cure for multiple sclerosis (MS).

Those who were at the University four years ago may remember an event on campus called the S.A.M.S. dance marathon. The S.A.M.S. dance has been a campus event for the past three years, but it used to be a much larger event.

Previous attendees of the S.A.M.S. dance describe it as one of the biggest and most well attended events on campus, a University tradition. Entusiastic supporters of S.A.M.S. packed into the Bison for a full 24 hours to dance the night and day away with friends, win prizes and most importantly raise funds for the National Multiple Sclerosis Society.

This year, S.A.M.S. is determined to bring the impressive student involvement that previously defined this tradition back to the campus.

Multiple sclerosis is a disease affecting the central nervous system causing symptoms ranging from numbness to vision loss to paralysis.

There are currently about 300,000 Americans living with the unpredictable effects of MS, and there is no known cure for multiple sclerosis, emphasizing the need for organizations like S.A.M.S. at the University to support active fundraising efforts for research.

So far this year, the S.A.M.S. committee has been hard at work looking for potential businesses to sponsor the dance. Gathering a group of dedicated sponsors has become one of the most effective ways of preparing for the dance marathon so as to meet our 2002 goal of $5,000, which will then be given to the National MS Society.

This is a substantial goal, but with the support and enthusiasm, it is entirely possible to achieve, if not exceed. Letters are being sent out to businesses on a national and local level, detailing the efforts of S.A.M.S. and, very successfully, encouraging them to help out and take part in worthy cause.

The S.A.M.S committee this year has been organized through a joint effort between Calvin and Hobbes and Alpha Phi Omega. These two organizations on campus have teamed up to provide the University with a 24-hour dance marathon that will never be forgotten.

The Dance will take place this February and is scheduled to run from 5 p.m. on Friday Feb. 22 until 5 p.m. on Saturday, Feb. 23.

Campus organizations will be responsible for sponsoring a themed dance hour with music chosen by the respective groups. Past themes have included Madonna hour, the Jackson hour, a 60s hour, etc. Organizations are encouraged to be creative and innovative in their theme choice, and there will be opportunities for organizations to win prizes for best theme and best attendance.

Dancers will have the opportunity to win prizes through a variety of raffles that will be held throughout the 24 hours. Any organization that is interested in sponsoring an hour, providing marathon dancers and/or coming and dancing for hours on end, should keep this event in mind. As many campus organizations will change leadership in the next month and a half, the campus is encouraged to remember this effort and how each individual can be involved in this important cause.

An abroad perspective: exploring Russia

Girls collecting leaves and flowers at Kolomenskoe, near Moscow.

Contributing Writer

When people ask me, "How was Russia?" I have a hard time answering. It's difficult to describe the greatest four months of your life.

I spent last fall in St. Petersburg, Russia, which was founded by Peter the Great to become the home of the czars and the heart of an empire. I was there with 36 other American students on the Council for International Educational Exchange (CIEE) program. Most of us lived with Russian families in apartments.

I have studied Russian for six years, but I gained more in those four months than I ever did in my first five years. We took classes in Russian grammar, phonetics, conversation, culture and literature. The professors were incredibly patient and had seen a lot in their lives.

We went to classes in the Smolny Institute, which houses a handful of departments of St. Petersburg State University. The Smolny Institute, which consists of a towering cathedral and convent built in the 1700s, served as a school for noble girls during the time of Catherine the Great and was Lenin's headquarters for the Bolshevik Revolution. Just the fact that this was my school was awe-inspiring, even after four months there, I never did get used to getting off the bus every day and walking into one of St. Petersburg's greatest architectural and historical sites.

St. Petersburg is the most beautiful city I've ever seen. On a typical day after class, some friends and I would find ourselves walking down the Nevskii Prospekt (the city's main street and the most famous street in Russia), and someone would say, "Hey, wanna go to the Hermitage?" (a world class museum, it's right up there with the Louvre—and it's located inside the Winter Palace, the exceedingly opulent former home of the czars) or "Hey, do you guys wanna go to the ballet tonight?" (referring to the nightly shows in the legendary Mariinsky Theatre, a.k.a. the Kirov Ballet, home to arguably the world's greatest ballet).

We had free student entrance to the Hermitage, and a ticket at the Mariinsky costs only about $10 for some of the most expensive seats (i.e., in the Czar's Box). It's disconcerting that this was actually cheaper than going to see a movie. I never thought I'd like ballet, but then again, I never thought I'd be seeing a Russian ballet. I was blown away.

I also never thought I'd see bareknuckle boxing, which we tackled in our first week. But what is most amazing is that we were able to do all these things on a whim. We were left to our own devices in a city of five million people, with more history and culture than we could have ever imagined.

While left on our own, we were quick to learn a few lessons. In St. Petersburg, there are things called "gypsy cabs," defined as "any car that happens to be driving by." If you want to go somewhere, you stick your arm out, and usually, the first or second car will stop. These are just normal guys, cruising around, not real cab drivers. You say where you want to go, haggle about the price, get in, and go. You can go pretty much anywhere in the city for less than $3. I never paid more than 80 rubles (about $2.85).

The low cost of living was also a surprise. McDonalds in Russia is four times cheaper (and the meat is better), and pirated CDs are so much the standard that I have absolutely no idea where you can buy a non-pirated CD.

Living in Russia was like being in a dream—we never knew what would happen next. One day I was with a friend coming up the escalator in a metro station, when the two guys in front of us began to make a lot of noise. They were high on something, greeting everybody on the other escalator, and we were trying to look like we were deep in conversation so that they wouldn't talk to us, when I then heard the noise "click-click." I knew what it was, and looked up to see the guy closest to me, about three feet away, with a gun in his hand. They were joking about shooting the people on the other escalator. Fortunately, he put the gun back in the holster and we made sure we walked in the opposite direction when we got to the top.

My point is, life in St. Petersburg is about as unpredictable as it gets. You could be walking down Nevskii one minute and watching a 10-year old gypsy kid run away with your wallet the next. In bars and clubs, we met so many random people, many of whom became our good friends.

One night, we were at Marstall, one of the more popular clubs in St. Petersburg, and we ran into three U.S. Marines from the Consulate. The next thing we knew, we were all cruising around the city in their bulletproof suburban.

Later that night (about 4 a.m.), after our gypsy cab dropped him off near his building, one of my friends was looking for bottled water, and was stopped by militia. He bribed them with twenty bucks to be left alone. Five minutes later, he was just outside his building when a militia car came down the road, and, like an idiot, he ran. The car stopped, three guys jumped out (one with an AK-47), and they chased him down. He was roughed up a little bit and questioned, but it was nothing 500 rubles couldn't take care of. This teaches yet another lesson, in Russia, bribes are the rule, not the exception.

Another good thing about Russia was the cheap vacation packages. In November we had a one week break. A few of my friends went to Lake Baikal in Siberia. The rest of us spread out all over Europe, and while some were freezing up in Siberia, three friends and I were lying on the beach of the Red Sea in Hurghada, Egypt. We went there for a week, for less than half the price it would cost just for a plane ticket from the United States.

Travel inside Russia is easy too. One Wednesday, after class, I was in a train station and noticed that trains went directly to Murmansk (the largest polar city in the world, where the sun doesn't come out all winter). This is a city that wasn't even open to foreigners until 1994 because it houses Russia's fleet of nuclear submarines.

By Friday afternoon, I had gathered six friends together and we were on a train to the Arctic Circle. It took 28 hours to get there, and the train trip was a purely Russian experience. No sleeping compartments were made available, just a bunch of bunks, complete with dogs in the beds, Russians making tea, eating whole chickens, etc. It was like a communal apartment on tracks. We spent only 10 hours in Murmansk, then 28 hours back to St. Petersburg. We got back just in time for class on Monday.

While the city of St. Petersburg consistently amazed me with its architecture, culture, and history, the Russian people are what made my time there so irreplaceable. These people are infinitely complex. They've been the victims of intense and prolonged suffering, but have incalculable strength and passion, producing some of the world's greatest works in art, literature, ballet, music and science.

My host mother, a 62-year old former professor of biochemistry, grew up 300 kilometers south of Moscow. Three of her brothers (the oldest 18) died in World War II. The Germans occupied her town and, at the age of five, a Nazi soldier barged into her house, grabbed her by the neck, and held a pistol to her head, threatening to kill her unless her family gave him some new boots and some food. It's one thing to read about something like this, but to hear it firsthand is quite shocking.

One of my professors, Nina Petrovna (a hilarious old lady with boundless energy) was 15 when the Germans began the two and a half year siege on St. Petersburg in 1941. Over 600,000 people died of cold and starvation, but she survived, even after her hair and fingernails fell out. Yet she speaks of it lightly, as if she's endured much worse.

Stories like these and other encounters with native Russians put things into perspective for me, compelling me to consider paths in life that I had never before imagined.

Russia is a land of extremes. I think St. Petersburg may be the only city in the world where you can suddenly find yourself sitting next to a Mafia guy at Kentucky Fried Chicken and where you can go to classes in the birthplace of Soviet Russia, one of the most infamous regimes in modern history, and talk about things that would have imprisoned your teachers 20 years ago.

Moscow's historic Red Square, with St. Basil's Cathedral appearing in the background.

It is a place where you can play pool in a former Soviet Palace of Culture, complete with Volkswagen-sized chandeliers and a ballet stage, and you can be a student at the same university as the man who invented the Periodic Table of the Elements.

It is a place where your friends can get up on stage and play a jam session at a Russian Rockabilly club, and you can see jet skis roaring down a canal of the city in the middle of December. Or, you can walk out of a nightclub at six in the morning and look up directly at the golden onion domes of one of Russia's most famous, breathtaking cathedrals, while your two friends spout freestyle rap in Russian.

Coming back to America was the hardest thing I've ever had to do. It has been hard adjusting, but I plan on going back to Russia soon. I learned a lot from my time there, and I'm not done learning yet.

Howie Day performs at Uptown

By Chad Flood
Staff Writer

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
Howie Day performed his solo act last week at Uptown with the aid of his acoustic guitar.

I just turned 20. A milestone accomplishment for me, I started to wonder what impact my life has made so far. I realized that I have not really done anything groundbreaking, touched any lives, made any lasting impression on the world at large. I go to class, do work, go out at night sometimes and that's pretty much my daily routine.

Howie Day is also 20, but rather than residing at a college, he performs over 200 nights a year, sells out many venues and happened to put on an outstanding show this past weekend at Uptown.

The Maine native played for just under two hours for about 200 students, performing songs from his new album, Australia, in addition to a collection of covers such as Toto's "Africa" and the Beatles' "Help" and older tunes that a few of the diehard fans in attendance requested. The unique style that Day possesses is in his effects board, which includes a variety of repeat, echo and reverb pedals that enable the audience to hear the show as if a full band is on stage.

This tactic seemed to confuse the audience early on as Day closed his opening song, "Sorry, So Sorry," by overdubbing a clip from David Gray's "Please Forgive Me" using his guitar as a drum, and then repeating that effect with a chorus of vocals and guitar solos that meshed into an amazing one-man performance. He finished the song by stepping back from the microphone, dropping his hands at his sides and smirking mischievously as the tune continued by what seemed to be an invisible man.

The highlight of the evening for many was Day's rendition of U2's classic "One," a song that has seemingly taken on new meaning after the Sept. 11 tragedy. At the U2 concert this song was played past week, this song was played with a list of victims rolling on screens behind the band and in lights on the crowd. While Day did not have such a flashy stage show at his disposal, the singalong that dominated Uptown had more power than any special effect could ever produce.

Directors present "The Deep End" at Campus Theatre

Indie film received honors at Sundance

By Melissa Farrar
Staff Writer

"The Deep End" is a tension-packed thriller starring indie film actress Tilda Swinton and Goran Visnjic ("ER"). Swinton plays a typical soccer mom who attempts to cover up the suspicious death of her gay son's older lover. Critically acclaimed independent filmmakers David Siegel and Scott McGehee presented the film for its premiere at the Campus Theatre on Friday, Nov. 9.

"The Deep End" won the Best Cinematography prize at this year's Sundance Film Festival and has garnered a great deal of attention this past year. The imagery and cinematography are standouts in this freshly entertaining, if not wholly believable film.

The plot centers around Margaret Hall (Swinton) and her desperate attempts to cover up the supposed murder that her 17-year-old son Beau (Jonathan Tucker), is involved in. In addition to all her other worries, Margaret must juggle multiple responsibilities in caring for her three children and father-in law while her husband is away at sea. The film is set in Lake Tahoe, which gives it a beautiful background to serve as an interesting juxtaposition of Margaret's frenzied desperation.

When she finds the dead body of her son's lover on the shore of their boathouse, Margaret frantically assumes that her son is responsible. She decides to take the body in a motorboat, and dumps it in the lake. Soon afterward, a scandalous videotape surfaces with images of her son and his lover. A handsome blackmailer (Visnjic) shows up at her house with the tape and demands $50,000 within 48 hours. If she does not comply, the tape will be turned over to the police to indicate her son's involvement.

The film proceeds to follow Margaret through her hellish ordeal, and explores the somewhat ironic relationship that blossoms between her and the blackmailer, Alek. Emotional chaos runs rampant in the film as Alek begins to realize that Margaret is unable to meet his demands.

Though there are some weak points within the plot, if one suspends disbelief, "The Deep End" ultimately satisfies. Tilton gives a wonderfully intense performance, and the gorgeous shots that Siegel and McGehee put onto film are at times breathtaking. The directors capture a sense of place and time in an astonishingly effective way. Even the image of a drop of water falling from a faucet has significance in the movie.

"The Deep End" is the second feature film by the directing duo of McGehee and Siegel (in 1993, "Suture" was released). They adapted "The Deep End" from the 1940s crime novel "The Blank Wall" by Elizabeth Sanxay Holding. After the Campus Theatre screening, McGehee and Siegel answered some questions from the audience and gave some background information as to how the film was made. They discussed everything from casting to location to symbolism, and the directors made it clear that their aim was to create a film that intertwined classic suspense with contemporary drama. In this attempt, they were more than successful. Without the aid of a huge budget or big name actors, "The Deep End" still achieves a crowd-pleasing finish.

Studio concert jump starts dance season

By Ruth Li
Staff Writer

Students piled into the Tustin gym for the dance studio concert last Thursday, filling all the chairs and even the floor space around the dance floor. The program showcased many different dance styles, including jazz, ballet, hip hop, Indian and modern. Director and Professor of Dance Er-Dong Hu said the concert was an opportunity to introduce students to a variety of dance styles and to encourage them to take classes.

"Dance is about technique and performance skills," Hu said. "We want students to have a passion about dance, and this is a way for them to try something different."

The Studio Concert was completely student-run, providing a chance for the students to learn about how to put a concert together.

The dance program began with four performances by groups from the Jazz I dance class. The first group performed an energetic piece to "Tell Him" and "Dance with Me." The second group performed a sophisticated jazz piece to Athena Cage's "All or Nothing."

The next performance was set to a lively rendition of "Lady Marmalade," from the movie "Moulin Rouge." The Jazz I groups ended with a performance to Janet Jackson's "Rhythm Nation."

Dancing in front of an audience was daunting, but Rachel Ziegler '02 rose to the challenge. "I really appreciated the opportunity and experience of being part of a performance," she said. "It was lots of fun."

Ellen Crayton '04 gracefully performed a delicate ballet performance of Tchaikovsky's "Dance of the Sugar Plum Fairy" choreographed by George Balanchine. Much to the audience's delight and surprise, the performance began with a short comedy sketch with appearances by Ryen Herrmann '02 as an amateur ballerina who tries without success to dance the ballet, and Hu as a dance instructor who gets fed up and orders Herrmann to leave.

The tranquil mood of the ballet performance was shattered by the energy of the hip-hop dance that followed, performed by members of Jelani to "Let's Get Married Remix" by Jagged Edge Feat.

Members of the South Asian Students Association (SASA) performed an energetic yet graceful modern Indian dance to "Jab Dil Mile," ("I'm Feeling") from the Indian movie "Yaadein."

Ann Lee '02 enjoyed contributing to this "splash of culture."

"It was great to be able to add a cultural aspect to the studio concert," she said.

Vanessa Hull '02 and Stephanie Yezek '03, both doubling as choreographers and dancers, performed a modern piece filled with fluid movements to the music of Bach.

The studio concert ended with an energetic, lively jazz piece to The Neville Brothers' "Fever."

Yezek , who organized and performed in the Studio Concert, said it was a success.

"I was so pleased with the performance of all the groups," she said. "And I am proud to have had the first performance of the dance department's 2001-2002 season go so well."

The concert was dedicated to the memory of Stephanie Sayre, one of the Theater and Dance Department's former students who was recently killed in a car accident. Her family set up the Stephanie Sayre Scholarship Fund in her memory.

Opera show links music and world issues

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

Simple set design, minimal costumes and emphasis on sound contributed to the beautiful production of "An Operatic Quilt of the Human Spirit" by the Bucknell Opera Company (BOC).

The show, featuring pieces from "Dead Man Walking," sought to explore the different social problems that affect issues of the soul. Directed by Catherine Payn, associate professor of music and accompanied by Lou Ann Potter, the performance last Saturday evening blended contemporary issues with classic ethical issues ranging from corruption in professional sports to capital punishment.

Melissa Karmondy '05 was impressed by the portion of the production devoted to "Different Fields."

"It portrayed the truth about sports in a new and different way," she said.

Another audience member voiced a different opinion about the piece, saying it perhaps lacked the "seriousness that the other subjects [had], such as family and social isolation, death and the death penalty, [making the sports piece seem] almost frivolous."

In any event, all had to agree on the power of "Dead Man Walking." Mollie Martin '02 was especially affected by her role in "Dead Man Walking," playing Sister Helen Prejean, the spiritual advisor to Joseph De Rocher (played by Kyle McGee '04), an inmate on death row.

"It is a powerful opera that tears you up emotionally, but the result is a keen understanding of how God can use ordinary people in profound ways to touch the lives of those who have no hope," Martin said.

Though the main focus was given to the ethical issues surrounding capital punishment, Martin saw a deeper theme.

"The theme of the opera was not, in my opinion, capital punishment," she said. "It was forgiveness and redemption that can only be imparted by love and by God."

Matthew Easterbrooks '05 said the production gave him new insight.

"I never thought to view capital punishment through the eyes of the person trying to help the convict," he said. "The characters were extremely believable. I felt what they were feeling."

"An Operatic Quilt of the Human Spirit" served as a platform for the voice of contemporary issues affecting the college student. Martin voiced the importance of the production.

"I hope BOC continues to do operas like 'Dead Man Walking' that provide students with a link between music and issues of the world we live in," she said.

Allison Bagby brings energy to stage managing

Senior has called the show for Theater and Dance performances for four years

By Kristi Johnston
A&E Layout Editor

According to the Original Online Resource for Stage Managers, "The stage manager plays one of the most crucial roles in the successful production of any aspect of the performing arts ... it is a job that requires boundless energy, determination, realism and organization in an industry that coined the term 'artistic personality.'"

As a senior who has been involved in stage managing for four years, Allison Bagby demonstrates this ideal in each show in which she assists.

Bagby is a stage manager for the Theater and Dance department and is the official stage manager for the Bucknell Dance Company. She acts as the liaison between the show's directors and the entire production staff. For each performance, she is the one who "calls the show"—she wears a headset and is in charge of cuing the light, scenery and music changes.

Bagby takes special pride in her contributions to the dance company performances.

"It's movement, music and lights that make a dance show happen," she said.

Bagby did not intend to stage manage when she arrived at the University. In fact, she had never done it before she became involved during her freshman year.

"It was a total fluke," she said. "I got pulled into stage managing by a sophomore who knew my RA. I had done some theater in high school. When I started stage managing, it just clicked."

Bagby came to the University as an engineering major, but soon changed it as a result of her involvement with the stage managing process.

"I was a miserable, lost little freshman," she said.

Stage managing changed that.

"Needless to say, I'm not an engineer anymore. I am seeking a B.S. in secondary education and a B.A. in theater," Bagby said.

Bagby is currently working on a senior project creating a document for future stage managers at the University. In doing so, she has the opportunity to reflect on her participation in many of the shows.

"The shows where I was getting my feet under me were the hardest," she said. "I hated them at the time, but I learned the most from them."

Bagby's future plans involve stage managing.

"In an ideal world, I'll stage manage for dance [when I graduate]," she said. "If not, I also have teaching. I see myself teaching in the future, though I'd like to stage manage first."

Bagby enjoys every aspect of her position as stage manger.

"I love it because I get to work with faculty and I also have a great relationship with the actors," she said. "I love what stage managing is."

BSG Exectutive Board prepares for fresh faces and ideas

By Andrew Burr
News Editor

With Bucknell Student Government (BSG) elections less than a week away, prospective Executive Board officers officially declared their candidacy on Wednesday evening.

Positions on the Executive Board include the offices of president, vice president for operations, vice president of administration and vice president of finance. With First-Year Class elections already decided and balloting for upperclass Congress members and class officers occurring in April, Executive Board positions are the only offices changing over in the impending election. Newly elected officials will take office immediately and remain in office until succeeding elections this time next year.

Candidates for the BSG Office of the President this year are Peter Hackeman '04, Amir Sadaghiani '03 and Jason Van Volkenburgh '03. Duties of the president include serving as a liaison between the student body, faculty and administration, calling and presiding over meetings of the Executive Board, Executive Committee and Congress, serving as a delegate to the Board of Trustees, attending all faculty meetings and insuring open communications between the BSG and the University president, vice-presidents and deans of students.

"I hope [the new Executive Board] carries over many initiatives this Board has taken ... but I also hope it starts to find different ideas and paths."
—Jen Collier '03, VP of Operations

Running uncontested for vice president of operations is Omar Zalatimo '03. Duties of the VP of operations include assuming the duties of the president in his/her absence, conducting all general elections of the BSG, acting as chairperson of the Elections Committee and publicizing the events and activities of the BSG to the student body.

Candidates for vice president of administration are Jessica Briski '04, John Roache '03 and Bez Torabi '03. Duties of the VP of administration include keeping and distributing the minutes of all sessions of Congress, serving as a member of the BSG Appropriations Committee and the Coalition of Bucknellians and Lewisburg Residents (C.B.L.R.) and supervising the files of the BSG.

Candidates for vice president of finance are Megan Joseph '03 and Tim Van Houten '04. Duties of the VP of finance include keeping track of all BSG financial transactions, supervising and publishing the budgets of all organizations which receive funds from the BSG, acting as chairperson of the Appropriations Committee and insuring effective management of all student funds.

Current Vice-President of Operations Jen Collier '03 hopes that the new Executive Board continues the unfinished work of the current Board, as well as setting and achieving its own goals.

"I hope [the new Executive Board] carries over many of the initiatives this Board has taken," she said. "The current Board has worked real hard to make strides, especially with the administration and student organizations—but I also hope the new Board starts to find different ideas and paths."

Collier is excited for the prospects of the new Executive Board, although she expressed her disappointment regarding the number of candidates this year.

"Overall, I'm frustrated with the turnout," she said. "I would have liked to see more people come out for president and VP of operations, because those positions are so important to BSG."

Students will be vote online from 12:00 a.m. until 11:59 p.m. next Thursday.

Bergonia prevails in tie-breaker

Focus shifts for Kasdan to attain non-voting student representative on Council

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

Almost three weeks after Election Day, there is finally a winner for the two-year Ward III Borough Council position. Peter Bergonia, utilities supervisor at Physical Plant, won the tie-breaker against Matthew Kasdan '03.

On Monday, the winner of the Ward III seat tie, along with winners for seven other local ties were determined. Officials at the Union County Courthouse pulled names out of eight different hats to find winners.

"I was disappointed, but glad that I got this far. It's the town that's going to lose out," Kasdan said.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro feels that if Kasdan won the seat, he would have benefited the community.

"I think Matthew would have been a good representative. He doesn't get to serve because of the luck of the draw," Ferraro said.

Ferraro also still views the election as a learning experience.

"It's been a great learning experience. The town got to know concerns of Matthew and other students," Ferraro said.

Bergonia was out of town for the week due to the start of hunting season.

Borough Council President Yvonne Morgan believes that Bergonia will serve Ward III well.

"I think Pete will continue to represent the Ward III residents on the Council. He is a generous, caring man who can be a great resource for student residents as well as long term residents," Morgan said.

Kasdan, along with various Council and University members, now hopes to get a non-voting student representative on the Council.

According to Kasdan, a student representative is needed because the relationship between the town and students is degrading.

"A non-voting student representative will open lines of communication and be an intermediary source between students, administration and the community," Kasdan said.

Morgan also feels that a non-voting student representative is integral in helping town-gown relations.

"I believe that a student voice on Council will be beneficial to all of the community. I have always supported a Bucknell student voice on Council. It is imperative to include all residents in our governmental process. I find the Bucknell students to have a unique view," Morgan said.

"I understand that each student only lives here for a few years. However, many of the concerns of living in our small community remain the same. I sincerely believe that a consistent sharing of information between the Lewisburg residents and Bucknell student residents is a good use of energy; students will change, but the concerns will remain the same."

Bergonia echoes Morgan's and Kasdan's expectation that a student representative could improve communication in the current situation.

"I think that would be great. We're always looking to see if we can have better communication with the students, and having a non-voting person would work out. The students are part of the community," Bergonia said in the Nov. 15 Standard Journal.

Ferraro recognizes two advantages in having a non-voting student representative. First, students have busy schedules and this seat will allow the student to focus on student issues like building codes, rather than other issues. Also, with the existing stresses and strains, the student will increase communication between residents and the University.

If this position is created, Kasdan will not necessarily be the representative. However, Ferraro feels that Kasdan is concerned about both students and the town.

"Matthew is concerned about representing the students, but he also concerned about the welfare of the town," Ferraro said.

Judy Wagner, winner of the four-year Ward III Borough Council seat, believes that University students need a voice. However, she does not see the non-voting student representative as the only option.

According to Wagner, University students have a lot of energy and she encourages students to come to Council meetings.

"It's wonderful to see that young people want to be involved," Wagner said.

According to Kasdan, he is currently working with Council members to try and draft a potential proposal for the non-voting seat, which he will deliver to the Council at an upcoming meeting. It has not yet been decided that if this position is created, whether the whole student body or the Bucknell Student Government would choose the individual to fulfill this role.

According to Ferraro, the initiative to get this seat has been the work of the students.

"[Trying to get a non-voting position] has nothing to do with the Dean of Students Office. It has to do with Matthew and other students and their desire to serve," Ferraro said.

Although the non-voting seat has not been created, the election itself has already increased communication.

"It turned out to be a win-win situation. The town knows more about the students and the students know more about the town," Ferraro said.

Kasdan also thinks the fact that the election lasted this long, benefitted town-gown relations.

"From the reaction I have gotten from the community as well as a few Council members, I think by the election being prolonged and lasting three weeks instead of a single day, it strengthened town relations. It showed the town that as a student body, we are a solid political force in the community. The election coming so close to a successful campaign further proves that we are in need of a formal link between the Borough Council and the Bucknell student body," Kasdan said.

Finley takes reins as new Res College Coordinator

By Christopher Styers
Staff Writer

As a student at Indian University of Pennsylvania, Kelly Finley, the new Residential College Program coordinator, knew she wanted to pursue a career in student affairs. As an undergraduate, her determination to obtain a degree in student affairs in higher education was fueled by her memorable experiences as a residential assistant. Her passion in this field was so strong that she continued her education and entered graduate school for her master's degree; while doing so, she also served as a hall director for the Honors Hall.

After achieving her master's, she left her hometown of Greensburg, Pa. and found herself captivated by Bucknell's Residential College Program. She knew the University was her future home when she observed that its program not only provided a community in which students of similar interests lived together, but was intertwined with an academic focus as well.

Upon entrance into the University community, she was excited to get to know and work with a staff that was "a lot of fun and knew how to get things done." The assistance of student junior fellows (JFs), resident fellows (RFs) and the rest of her staff have been invaluable as she becomes acclimated to her new responsibilities.

As the program coordinator, she is responsible for implementing programs, supervising the JFs and RFs, assessing the effectiveness of the program and working with alumni of the various residential colleges in their living arrangements in the following years. Weekly meetings with her staff have already provided a great deal of results this year. She worked both with her staff in the Arts College, helping them plan a trip to view art exhibits in Philadelphia, as well as with members of the Humanities College as they planned to travel to New York.

Finley has established a survey for the program, looking for responses as to what programs are the most effective. She looks forward to the upcoming programs and discovering new ideas with her staff as to how to make the Residential College Program even stronger.

As she concludes her first six months with the University, Kelly has set several goals for the semester and beyond. Her first goal is to try to better understand the University.

"All universities are different with their own nuances," Finley said. Over the next couple of years she hopes to add to that list of nuances as the Residential College program grows.

Finley wants to continue providing first-year students with the unique experience provided by the Residential Colleges, and hopes that in the future her staff will be as helpful and devoted to the program as her current one. She also hopes that she will be able to help grow the alumni program.

From her experience she has seen how vital the alumni of the different colleges can be to incoming students. She looks forward to working with her wonderful staff and is excited by the new endeavors that await them.

"Kelly is a very warm individual. She's easy to talk to and it's clear that she cares about everyone involved with the Res Colleges. Kelly has expressed a real interest in the University community. She has a lot of great ideas for the Res College program and brings lots of enthusiasm and energy to the program.," Humanities JF Alyson Walker '04 said.

Sadaghiani has necessary experience to lead BSG

On Thursday, University students will have the opportunity to vote for a new Bucknell Student Government (BSG) president. As stated by BSG, some of the responsibilities of the president include monitoring all actions of the faculty and administration to insure students rights are preserved, calling and presiding over the meetings of the Executive Board and the Executive Committee and to insure open communication between BSG, the student body and The Bucknellian. The three candidates running are Peter Hackeman '04, Jason Van Volkenburgh '03 and Amir Sadaghiani '03. Hackeman plans to address more specific issues such as cable TV and recycling. Van Volkenburgh's campaign focuses on improving town-gown relations. Sadaghiani hopes to make BSG more accessible to the student body. The Bucknellian fully supports and endorses Sadaghiani for BSG president.

Hackeman, an economics and political science double major, has served on the University Planning and Budget Committee for the past two years. This committee makes decisions regarding long-term issues. During his first year at the University, Hackeman was an alternate for BSG Congress and a Resident Hall Association (RHA) representative. Hackeman wants to assure that the Congress will represent the student body and not just be a "rubber stamp" for the Executive Board. Hackeman would bring knowledge, good ideas and a personable attitude to the position. Despite his specific goals and extreme care for the student body, we believe that Hackeman lacks Executive Board experience. However, he would be an ideal candidate for the future.

Van Volkenburgh, a Spanish and international relations double major, was a member of his high school council. At the University, he served as philanthropy chair of Phi Gamma Delta. If elected president, Van Volkenburgh hopes to improve relations between the town and the University. He believes that by inviting town members to University-sponsored events, both sides will benefit. Other goals include encouraging students to form closer relationships with faculty and improving Greek policies. Although Van Volkenburgh is concerned about town-gown relations, he is not aware of several other significant problems facing the University.

The Bucknellian endorses Sadaghiani because we believe he has the experience needed to lead BSG and improve current operations within BSG and among the student body. Sadaghiani, an economics and political science double major, spent the last year as vice president for finance. Sadaghiani has been a member of BSG since his first year at the University, serving on the Internal Affairs Committee and chairing the Appropriations Committee. Other activities include being a part of RHA during his first year and also being a member of International Spectrum.

Even though we believe that his political background and extensive BSG experience will allow him to be an effective president, Sadaghiani appears to be the least approachable of the candidates. He lacks the charisma and attentiveness that Hackeman expresses and the friendly attitude of Van Volkenburgh. In the future, we encourage Sadaghiani to express a more genuine interest in issues brought to his attention.

If elected, Sadaghiani hopes to improve relations between students and BSG representatives. Sadaghiani believes that students currently do not know their representatives and he plans to solve that problem by having Congress members go to student halls and work with organizations such as RHA, the President's Council and Interfraternity Council. Throughout the semester, Sadaghiani has worked on a new club recognition system, which was recently passed by BSG. He looks to implement this policy next semester and help clubs with their budgets so the transition is smooth.

Sadaghiani also expects to improve town-gown relations. He believes that BSG President Nathan Sorber '02 and Matthew Kasdan '03 have made great strides during the last two months and he hopes to continue their efforts. He supports the idea of a nonvoting student representative on the Council and he thinks the next step is to find out the problems the students have with the town and the problems the town has with the students.

We support Sadaghiani's goals and anticipate that his determination and dedication to BSG will allow him to accomplish numerous tasks. As vice-president of finance, Sadaghiani proved that he can handle the intense workload that is associated with BSG president. The Bucknellian strongly encourages all students to vote for BSG president and the vice president offices on Dec. 6.

Letters to the editor

Peace sit-in shows political involvement

To the Editor:

The sit-in for peace on Friday was, in my opinion, an indication that the political climate of this campus is changing. Whereas few political discussions have ever left a hallway or a classroom in the first two years of my stay here at the University, the sit-in was a sign that the activist atmosphere here is one of increasing strength, diversity and maturity. There, on the lawn of the downhill LC, Bucknellians gathered to present an undeniable, visible statement in protest of a world-event that is usually ignored on account of its invisibility: the current war. Although we may see media images, none of us has actually seen this war, and so it is easy to brush its reality aside in favor of more lighthearted topics. This group of Bucknellians, however, preferred to discuss the war. While I myself support their stance, I am writing neither to merely laud the views I share with them nor to denounce the opposite position; rather, my purpose in this letter is to observe, compliment and encourage the progress of intelligent, open-minded political discussion on campus.

A few minutes into the sit-in, I still feared that some people would become confrontational, perhaps even violent; as time passed, I found that the worst reaction of any passersby was merely a lack of acknowledgment. Some people sat down and joined us; some disagreed but did so without shouting or slurs—which is very welcome to my ears, given that I've been mislabeled numerous times at off-campus protests as an American-hater. In my mind, such reserve and tolerance was very appropriate, and I respect the many students who have disagreed with me in this mature fashion.

Do I hope that more Bucknellians join the movement to protest this war? Of course I do; I believe this war is killing innocent civilians whose lives cannot be written off as "collateral damage." In the sense that I stand for peace, I fit into the "liberal" category instead of its "conservative" correlate. But do I think that the liberal student (as well as faculty) voice on campus should squash the conservative voice? No, I don't. It shouldn't silence other viewpoints, and thank heaven it isn't. Indeed, the sit-in was a sign that the University is becoming a place where students involve themselves in the issues they should not ignore. There is no doubt in my mind that Bucknellians, both those who support the war and those who denounce it, are beginning to argue with all the passion, creativity and open-mindedness we need to ensure a prosperous future for all.

History course offerings constrained

To the Editor:

Last year at about this time I expressed concern in this section about changes to the University's American history curriculum. I don't believe The Bucknellian has covered the issue, while the situation apparently has worsened. Steps are being taken to prevent Professor Martin Sklar from teaching a full range of survey courses and seminars he has offered at the University for more than 17 years, and this, in my opinion, is a terrible mistake.

Across the country, universities and colleges are increasingly relying on part-time faculty and teaching assistants in order to cut costs. But having access to distinguished faculty members is precisely what has made the University such a great place to get an education.

Again, I ask The Bucknellian to examine the situation in the history department where I majored and which inspired me to go on to complete a Ph.D. in American social history.

I am hoping that the University will not go the way of so many other colleges, and I am sure that students currently enrolled as history majors would agree with me. I think it is imperative that the integrity of the history department and the quality of its course offerings in U.S. history to be preserved.

Forum opens eyes

By Helen Britz
Staff Writer

It was not a surprise to discover that Public Safety is widely unpopular on our campus. Let's face it, from the constant distribution of parking tickets and alcohol points, these men and women have not been generally well received by students. Therefore, when the idea of a forum was addressed during a Student Affairs Committee, my immediate response was rather pessimistic. Even as a freshman, I know that the relationship between students and public safety has traditionally not been strong. When the forum was launched, the idea was to create a setting where students could meet and talk with numerous public safety officers in a non-confrontational environment. Naturally, after its conception in early November, some of us did not know what to expect of the meeting.

For Student Affairs, the forum stood as a symbol that our work could make a difference in the general atmosphere of the campus. Not only did we get a chance to spend time conversing with officers—discussing ways to better our campus, but we also fostered relationships within the public safety office that we hope to maintain well into the future. At the very least, the evening's forum promoted the initiative for safety on campus, as well as served as a means of encouraging students to become familiar with the role of public safety. With the help of Andy Findlay, member of the Student Affairs Committee, the forum was complemented with a comprehensive pamphlet that answers frequently asked questions, and more importantly, puts an end to the universal misconceptions that have shaped our campus thoughts on Public Safety.

During his speech, DeCerchio stressed the importance of Public Safety on campus and elaborated on the central reason for its existence: to improve campus life and to protect the general welfare of the students. I strongly believe that the tone set by DeCerchio was instrumental in the success of the evening. Towards the end of the forum, along with Katie Michaels, member of the Students Affairs Committee, I took part in the annual Public Safety Walk. During the walk the officers seemed very responsive to the changes needed on campus, and were actively recording them. I realized that public safety has taken an active role on campus and in improving student life. From the time spent touring campus, I also realized how seriously Public Safety takes its job.

During the forum, it was clear to me, as to many other BSG officers, that public safety has only been doing its job from the beginning. It has never sought to set hurdles for students or create unnecessary problems. The efficiency in its work is evident, and was certainly apparent throughout our walk with the officers. I am pleased that the forum was a success, as I see it as one step closer to satisfying the requests of the student body.

Locking Horns

Will the end of bin Laden end our problems?

By Sandi-Jo Galati
Features Editor

No American will ever forget seeing that airplane crash into the second Twin Tower, the subsequent explosion or the resulting buckling and collapse of the financial center of the United States. Maybe it was the fact that our capital's air space was invaded and our center of defense was attacked that alarmed others. Perhaps what is most alarming is that those were not the only icons of our nation that were targeted.

On the other hand, maybe we should be grateful that we are fortunate to have the means to build these formidable structures and the brilliant minds to oversee their operation. The Afghans are not so fortunate.

The distinction of being the most powerful nation in the world is a title that imparts a certain amount of responsibility to care for the needs of less developed nations. The Afghans obviously cannot contain Osama bin Laden using their own means. We have a responsibility to them and the rest of the world to use our wealth to benefit all of humanity.

Bin Laden represents an era of terrorism and fear that can be eradicated from the world with the involvement of the United States. Pursuing and assassinating him is the only way to end this regime. This is not revenge or an emotional response to the attacks of Sept. 11. This is our preservation instinct.

The world knows that the four terrorists caught in New York are being housed just down the road from our own university. What if there was an attack on the prison or a demand that those prisoners be released? This should not have to be a concern for anyone in our community, but as long as bin Laden is alive, he will have followers all over the world willing to sacrifice their lives for the completion such an act.

If we fear the influence of these four prisoners, the level of fear will certainly escalate if a terrorist as powerful as bin Laden was taken as a prisoner. Imprisoning him will only result in further acts of terrorism and hostage situations enacted by his followers demanding that we release bin Laden. The United States would never surrender to such a demand. The memories of Sept. 11 and terrorism in the name of bin Laden will just perpetuate until he dies in prison. Are we willing to risk the lives of more innocent people? Are we willing to perpetuate this fear for a few more decades until bin Laden dies of natural causes?

This is certainly not the first time that the United States has participated in a similar act. Take for instance our involvement in breaking up the Medellin cocaine cartel headed by Pablo Escobar. Escobar terrorized and threatened the operation of the Columbian government for several years previous to the involvement of the United States, and was a prison escapee. He was a threat to the people of Columbia and as well as the United States, due to the large quantities of cocaine that reached the our country from his operation. In response, the United States supplied Columbia with troops, equipment and millions of dollars beginning in 1989 to cause the collapse of the drug cartel, until Escobar was finally shot to death in 1993.

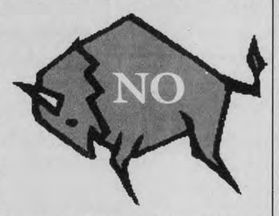
It is time to make a statement. In the case of Escobar, the United States simply provided the means for the Columbians to hunt down Escobar, abiding by its policy not to conspire to assassinate a foreign leader. This is not an option for the Afghans, nor is it an option for us.

The Unites States cannot always be the passive supporter. We must take an active stance. The Afghans can never hope to contain bin Laden. It is our duty to help them.

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

For the moment, the might of the U.S. military is focused on capturing or killing Al-Qaeda leader Osama bin Laden. The question is, will this solve the United States' terrorist problem? While taking bin Laden out of the picture would be a huge victory for us in the war on terror, the fact remains that he is far from the only threat, or even the greatest threat, facing the United States today.

First, I think we can all agree that bin Laden is not stupid. He has taken great care to establish a network of terrorist soldiers that can, if necessary, operate without him or any other Al-Qaeda leaders. The finances of the organization are extremely diversified, and many people have access to the funds besides bin Laden. In fact, as we learn more about how his network operates, it is becoming increasingly apparent that he has very little to do with the daily workings of the network. Rather, he has his lieutenants control the details of his finances and the plans for attacks against America while he serves more as a religious figurehead. Don't get me wrong, he plays an extremely important role in determining the actions of Al-Qaeda, but if they had to go on without him, they could.



Killing or capturing bin Laden will also do nothing to solve the problem that the United States currently faces with Iraq. Many government figures are beginning to acknowledge that not removing Saddam Hüssein from power when we had the chance back in 1991 was most definitely a mistake. There were legitimate reasons for stopping at the time, but it now seems that the long-term effects of leaving him in power are decidedly negative. For several years now we have allowed his weapons programs to develop unchecked by any international authority. Personally, I support economic sanctions as punishment for past actions, or to prevent future actions. However, there comes a point when we must be realistic. These sanctions are doing nothing to actually prevent Saddam from developing weapons of mass destruction, and they are only serving to incite anti-American sentiment in the Arab world. There is evidence that he is becoming increasingly bold in coordinating with terrorist networks both by supplying them, training them and helping them plan attacks. It is time for him to be stopped once and for all before he gains the ability to deliver a supremely catastrophic attack on the United States.

Bin Laden is the currently the most known and feared terrorist in the world. However, if we kill him, how long until another mastermind steps up? He certainly needs to be neutralized, but there are scores of other people just waiting for the chance to lead a jihad against the United States. Why? Some would have us believe it is our own fault so much hatred for the United States exists. Critics say that our foreign policy initiatives often create resentment among foreign communities for the U.S. government. For the most part, I disagree, and am offended at the idea that we brought this death and destruction upon ourselves. Nevertheless, I think one area that we need to improve is our definition of an "ally." Is Saudi Arabia really our ally? Yes we protect them militarily from their neighbors and they sell us oil to fuel our economy. Yet the royal family also promotes schools that preach anti-American sentiment to their students. Some political analysts have argued that they support this proliferation of anti-Americanism to draw attention away from their own corruption, and to ensure their power status within the country. Maybe they aren't such a great ally after all.

Bin Laden is certainly a major threat to every citizen of the West, and removing him will improve the safety of the world, but we should not lull ourselves into thinking that he is the only terrorist threat that we face.

Turkeys don't give thanks

By Philip Martoma
Staff Writer

As the holiday season approaches, one holiday that remains a favorite in my heart has been Thanksgiving. My family would always spend the holiday at home celebrating all types of foods and counting our blessings. We would work all day preparing for that one Thanksgiving meal, the central part of the meal being the turkey. The images of cornucopias, pilgrims and turkeys always came to mind when I thought of that holiday. However, that all changed the more I learned about how factory farms produced the turkeys I enjoy so much.

Growing up, I was not completely removed from farm life. I understood death, and had visited the farms of relatives and seen turkeys slaughtered. I never once considered that it might be wrong to kill turkeys or that they were ever treated inhumanely before their deaths. The farms I visited were cared for by people who had respect for and a very personal relationship with the animals they worked with. Nevertheless, I had many vegetarian friends who told me about animal cruelty on factory farms, and through what they told me and my own research I found all the information I needed to feed my own philosophical query that led me to vegetarianism. I went to the People for Ethical Treatment of Animals (PETA) website (www.peta.org) and numerous other sources to corroborate what I had heard already and to learn more for myself about these abuses. The facts startled me.

This year, 300 million turkeys were bred for slaughter because of the holiday—the vast majority came from factory farms. Factory farms are particularly inhumane in their practices as they are often managed by people who have no direct contact with the animals that are being utilized. They usually center their practices around efficiency rather than the quality of their products to consumers, the environment and least of all the humane treatment of their animals. In order to save space and increase productivity, turkeys are crowded into large pens that give individual turkeys no more than three square feet of space. The high stress of close confinement causes many turkeys to fight. So in order to prevent damage to turkeys that will be sent off to market, turkey beaks are broken and their toe tips are cut off. This is done without anesthesia because it would be an added cost to the farmers, even though these mutilations are painful to turkeys. When turkeys reach the slaughterhouse their throats are slit while they are still conscious, but those that miss the automated knife go into a scalding tank and are boiled alive.

Some might believe it is only natural for turkeys to die for food purposes, but the truth is that factory farms use unnatural methods to produce the food items that are all too common to us. No turkeys bred on these farms have been conceived without the use of artificial insemination because of the farms' selective breeding practices. In the past, consumer reports showed that most people preferred turkeys with larger portions of breast meat, and as a result turkeys with enormous breasts were bred. These physiological changes were so dramatic that turkeys could no longer mount to reproduce naturally. Some turkeys cannot even stand or walk when they are full grown because the weight of their bodies is simply too great and their legs break. These turkeys are tortured by the other highly stressed birds around them until they die. As a result of these frequent deaths and the close confinement, these turkey have numerous diseases that affect human health. Recent suggestions of sanitation reforms made by factory farmers include the idea to irradiate all meat. Though little testing has been done to show what effects irradiating meat will have on human health, it may actually be healthier than allowing the current unsanitary conditions to continue.

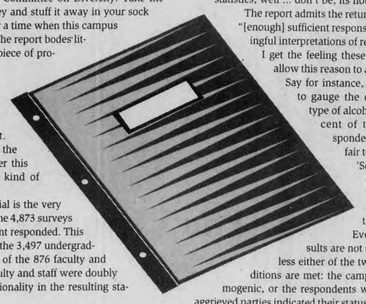
Before you put down this paper, ask yourself, even if you believe there is nothing wrong in eating meat, is there anything wrong with having no standard or limit to human activity with respect to our environment? Should we never deny our desire for an abundance of meat even if it is detrimental to our health?

University climate report hardly a "wake-up call"

Lack of comparative data from previous years and other schools renders statistics useless in assessing the campus climate

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

Attention Campus Committee on Diversity: Take the Campus Climate Survey and stuff it away in your sock drawers and save it for a time when this campus is otherwise, perfect. The report bodes little more than a mere piece of propaganda nonsense.



The biased report does not even begin to warrant the "wake up call" its authors have dubbed it. First, consider some of the peculiarities that render this report useless as any kind of real incisive exposé.

The most substantial is the very minimal response. Of the 4,873 surveys sent out, only 22 percent responded. This breaks down to 709 of the 3,497 undergraduate students and 365 of the 876 faculty and staff; meaning, the faculty and staff were doubly represented in proportionality in the resulting statistics.

The authors of the report have informed the readers that, "the differences between the sample and population proportions, while statistically significant, are not especially problematic nor practically important." Interestingly, somehow it is both statistically significant but not practically important; Professor Richard Fleming could attest to this flawed logic.

It does not further explain why these large disparities are "not problematic" or "significant," all-the-while being "important." This essentially means the authors value statistics when copasetic towards their cause and if others are bothered by the underlying quandaries with bases of the statistics, well ... don't be, its not important.

The report admits the return rate is low, but, "[enough] sufficient responses to allow meaningful interpretations of results." Somehow I get the feeling these people wouldn't allow this reason to apply universally. Say for instance, a poll was taken to gauge the campus' favorite type of alcohol, if only 20 percent of the students responded, it wouldn't be fair to say that the few 'Schaeffer Light' responses represented the "climate" of the campus.

Even more, the results are not substantiated unless either of the two following conditions are met: the campus is utterly homogenic, or the respondents who made up the aggrieved parties indicated their status (you know, gender, sexuality, ethnicity, etc.) I will hereby attest that this campus is not homogenic, something the report indicates as well.

Secondly, without knowing who the respondents were that suffered some form of harassment or perceived environment of intolerance, the results are again, useless.

Common sense will confirm that people who feel victimized will be more inclined to respond to the survey. This greatly skews the results and should not be inferred to be the overall 'climate' of the campus. Without knowing who exactly it was who responded, we are unable to tell how well the actual "climate" was represented.

Moreover, derogatory comments and perceived intolerant attitudes are all subjective things. It is the opinion of the respondent of what constitutes these things. What could be one person's joke might be an unintended cuff towards another who happened to overhear it.

In the conclusion there are two good points that are brought up and summarily dismissed. First, there is no comparative data from other schools to compare this to. Thirty percent of the respondents indicated that they had heard six or more insensitive comments over the past year. While the authors feel this unquestionably so atrocious to label it a "wake up call," it could, conversely, show a very high level of tolerance if others schools had percentages that double or triple this thirty percent figure. However, this data is unavailable.

Second, there is no longitudinal data that could provide a framework to comprehend these figures. This is the first survey of this kind taken at this school. Theoretically, these results could be the best this school has ever seen, but that's impossible to know with certainty. Suspiciously, this doesn't preclude the authors to pen this the "wake up call" they feel it to be.

In this wake of terrorism and heightened national security, it seems many citizens of this country have reassessed their priorities. As the Wall Street Journal noted in it's lead editorial on Friday, most of America's top universities don't require courses in history or Western Civilization to graduate—only three do. A disturbing study by the American Council of Trustee and Alumni reveals how poorly America's top collegians grasp our country's history. The article concluded by indicating these universities might want to stop caving to the multiculturists and reassess their priorities.

Common sense will confirm that people who feel victimized will be more inclined to respond to the survey. This greatly skews the results and should not be inferred to be the overall "climate" of the campus. Without knowing who exactly it was who responded, we are unable to tell how well the actual "climate" was represented.

It seems our university does not share this national trend. According to the faculty minutes of the Oct. 10 meeting, Professor of History Richard Chew asked University President Steffen Rogers if authorities had requested information on international students. Rogers said that yes, they had, but that they had not complied. Here at the University we are insanely ranking the trendy multiculturism fad a higher priority than our own national security.

Dynegy ends merger deal with Enron

By Michael Gorman
Business and Politics Editor

On Wednesday, Dynegy Inc. officially cancelled its plans to merge with Enron Corp. CNN*fn* is reporting that the collapse of the $9 billion deal could force Enron to file for bankruptcy in the near future. In a statement released Wednesday, Dynegy cited "breach of contract" and "material adverse change" as reasons why they scrapped their merger plans. MSNBC has said that Dynegy still plans to exercise its option to buy Enron's Northern Natural Gas Pipeline for $1.5 billion.

Enron's new headquarters in Houston, Texas.

According to CNN*fn*, Enron has faced numerous problems over the last year, and it is believed that some of these problems may have led to the cancellation of the deal. The company's stock has lost nearly all of its value within the last year, and is currently trading at $0.65. This is down from a high of $84.87 reached less than a year ago, and the company's debt was recently downgraded to "junk bond" status by Standard & Poor's due to bankruptcy concerns. According to MSNBC, the loss of "investment grade status" makes $3.9 billion of the Enron's debt payable immediately.

Investors had lost faith in Enron recently as new information regarding accounting practices came to light.

According to MSNBC, the company, formerly considered an "agile risk manager," was actually using partnerships to hide parts of its debt off of the balance sheet. The partnerships are now the subject of an Security and Exchange Commission investigation. Sources told Reuters that in recent days Enron's "complex and often indecipherable finances" were becoming a sticking point for the Dynegy executives.

CNN*fn* has found out that executives from both companies were trying to renegotiate the deal as late as Tuesday night. However, Dynegy CEO Chuck Watson said that they simply had to walk away from the deal. According to MSNBC, Watson told analysts on Wednesday that "Under the present circumstances we feel we had no choice but to act to protect our shareholder interest."

While Enron says that it will retain personnel necessary for its core operations, CNN*fn* reports that the company has already shut down its lucrative energy trading business. This division accounted for up to 90 percent of Enron's earnings, and analysts on Wall Street view its shutdown as a negative sign.

Marines move into Afghanistan

U.S. forces set up base near Kandahar as Northern Alliance crushes prison riot

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

American Marines landed in Afghanistan to aid in the fight to take Kandahar, a southern city which is the Taliban's last major base. Meanwhile, a prison riot erupted in Kunduz, the city that most recently fell.

The Marines now in Afghanistan constitute the first major infusion of American ground troops in the war against terrorism. According to The New York Times, The Pentagon says that 1,000 troops will eventually be committed. Currently, the troops are based at a primitive airfield outside Kandahar. They will fulfill several roles: directing air attacks, launching raids on the Taliban forces in Kandahar and the mountains near the Pakistan border and also tracking down Osama bin Laden.

The Marines' insertion marks a departure from the U.S. strategy to date, which involved using American air power combined with Northern Alliance ground troops. CNN reported that Washington is turning to its own soldiers who, in the words of Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld, can "crawl around on the ground and find people." The air support will, of course, continue.

According to The New York Times, the Marines encountered no resistance upon landing. That, however, is not expected to be the norm. Experts anticipate that the war in the southern Afghanistan will be much different from the war in the north, which was characterized in the past two weeks by major cities falling in rapid succession to Northern Alliance forces amid substantial jubilation. Kabul, which fell in that fashion, may be the capital of Afghanistan, but Kandahar is the center of Taliban power. The Taliban's grip on power has always been stronger in the south than in the north, and the south also boasts some extremely mountainous terrain that the Taliban could use to fight a guerilla war.

Over 600 Marines have been moved into Afghanistan to set up an airbase.

Though their deployment does demarcate a major strategic shift, the Marines now preparing to hunt bin Laden down are not the first American ground forces in Afghanistan. There have been a few hundred ground troops in the country, but they were mostly Special Operations forces and served usually in an advisory role.

The Taliban forces are said to be preparing for a brutal fight in Kandahar, but defections are detracting from their numbers significantly.

While the Marines outside Kandahar encountered no resistance, some Northern Alliance troops outside Mazar-i-Sharif were not so lucky. According to The New York Times, a prison revolt erupted there on Sunday, led by some surrendered Taliban troops. It took place in a 19th-century fortress that is being used as the headquarters of Uzbek general Abdul Rashid Dostum. Hundreds of surrendered Taliban forces are being held there.

The details are murky, but a possibly large number of people were killed. The New York Times has confirmed that one of the dead is an American, the first American combat death of this war. The 32-year-old CIA operative was possibly in the area to interrogate Taliban prisoners.

According to The New York Times, the revolt started when some of the surrendered Taliban fighters seized guns from and killed several guards. General Dostum sent several hundred troops back from the front to help out, and American warplanes actually dropped at least four bombs on the prison. The uprising lasted for three days, and will only serve to deepen the distrust that exists between the Northern Alliance and the thousands of Taliban soldiers who, it appears, will surrender eventually. It was one such distrustful Taliban soldier who started the riot by detonating a grenade while police were searching him on Saturday.

Economy enters recession as holidays approach

The holiday shopping season could be the worst in more than 10 years for retailers as the economy officially enters into a recession.

By Matthew Hinson
Staff Writer

For the first time in the memory of current University students, the United States has entered a recession.

According to CNN, the number of unemployed workers increased to 7.7 million people last month, or 5.4 percent of the working age population as counted by the government. This is the highest level seen since 1996. The consumer price index, indicating inflation, which is a major indicator of growth, fell 0.3 percent in the past month. The fear caused by terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, combined with an economy that had been slowing since the third quarter of last year, has pushed the economy out of its longest period of peacetime expansion in history, lasting throughout the 1990s.

CNN reported that this deceleration has created fears within the commercial sector and amongst those at the Fed. The Fed has slashed the federal funds rate in recent months to two percent, in hopes of stimulating the economy through borrowing and investment. Thus far, it has not seemed to work very well.

Though the economy appears to be stabilizing, with consumers beginning their holiday shopping, retailers and manufacturers fear one of the weakest holiday sales totals in recent times. According to CNBC, discount stores are seeing improved sales, but general retailers, those found in department stores and malls, have experienced sluggish sales when compared with last year's Black Friday weekend and early Christmas shopping.

CNBC also reported that high-end retailers are likely to be hurt the greatest as families slash budgets due to job loss fears. These poor sales have retailers worried, especially as the fourth quarter is usually when sales pick up most rapidly. Many businesses depend upon holiday sales to attain a profit for the year.

However, the National Bureau of Economic Research's Business Cycle Dating Committee, a think-tank out of Cambridge, Mass., predicts an end to this recession very soon. This recession, the 10th since the end of World War II, is unique in that it did not begin with a large jump in inflation nor a decline in worker productivity; new home and car sales—usually the first victims of a recession—have also remained strong.

According to the Bureau's data, average American recessions also last about 11 months, and this recession, according to economists probably started sometime around March of this year. This means that the economy should begin to recover sometime early next year.

The greatest worry is the effect America's recession will have on foreign markets. With excess worldwide manufacturing capacity, businesses may continue to eliminate jobs and institute hiring freezes until demand picks up. If this occurs, another "Asian flu" could affect Asian and European markets, like in 1997 when a multitude of companies folded or laid off good portions of their work force in those areas. During this economic slowdown, the only thing that brought back these economies was the great strength of the American economy. However, being in or just coming out of our own recession does not put this country in a position to help or bail out companies in these nations.

Despite these concerns, the rate cuts by the Federal Reserve, the President's $1.35 million tax cut and traditional spending surges for the holiday season ought to bring America back on track. The American economy has historically been cyclical. It rises and falls due to a number of factors, such as interest rates, savings/spending rates, how comfortable businesses feel about their chances of surviving, government spending and other factors, that combine to create either a strong or a weak economy. Notwithstanding many retailers' fears, it appears that the American economy should be coming out of this recession by early springtime.

Student wins case over patriotic posters

By Michael Gorman
Business and Politics Editor

After the terrorist attacks of Sept. 11, Aaron Pettit, a junior high school student from Ohio, decided to display several patriotic posters on the outside of his locker. Pettit, 16, has an older sister who was injured in the attack, and felt he needed to show support for the nation and its war against terrorism.

Three weeks after Pettit first put the posters on his locker, several of them were ripped down, and replaced with a note telling him to go see the Assistant Principal, Hotelli. Hotelli told Pettit that he found the posters offensive, divisive and said that they pointed the finger at all middle eastern students. Pettit told Fox News that later in the day, he was recalled to the principal's office, and was informed he was being suspended for 10 days because of the posters.

Immediately upon his suspension, Pettit's parents contacted an attorney, and sued the school district for violation of the 1st and 14th Amendments. After a court hearing, Pettit was awarded the right to return to school until the jury trial was over.

In a follow up interview earlier this week, Pettit told Fox News that the school district admitted that they had in fact violated Pettit's rights under the 1st and 14th Amendments, and the court overturned the suspension. The court now has the power to decide whether the principal and superintendent are liable for any financial damages. According to Fox News, the family has already decided to donate all financial awards to the relief fund in New York.

Football outplayed 15-13 in season finale

Jess Brinson '03 will lead the Bison running attack next season.

By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

After a tough loss to Lehigh that put the Bison football squad out of contention for the 2001 post season, Bucknell headed to Hamilton, N.Y. to face a Colgate team that had given them trouble in the past. The final game for the seniors did not turn out the way the Bison would have hoped, as Bucknell dropped their final match up of the year 15-13 and finished the season with a record of 6-4.

The Bison began the game on the right foot, forcing the Raiders to punt quickly on their first possession. Todd Wenrich '03 marched his team down the field in impressive fashion, and the Bison took an early 3-0 lead on a 23-yard field goal from Chris Lundberg '03, capping the 13 play, 59-yard scoring drive.

The Raiders looked as if they were going to move ahead on their next drive, but Virgil Rush '04 intercepted a pass in the end zone to keep the Bison on top for the time being. However, Bucknell could not take advantage of the turnover due to a Jess Brinson '04 fumble on the ensuing drive. The Bison were able to counter with another take away of their own when Reed Tunison '02 picked off another Raider pass and returned it 26 yards to the Colgate 44-yard line.

This time the Bison capitalized on the Colgate turnover. Brinson finished off a seven play, 44-yard scoring drive with a two-yard touchdown run to put the Bison up 10-0 early in the second quarter.

The Bucknell defense continued its strong play by forcing Colgate to punt early in its next drive. On the next drive, the Bison moved the ball quickly into the Colgate red zone, thanks in large part to a 25-yard pass from Wenrich to Mark Wyland '02. The five play, 30-yard scoring drive was capped off by another field goal from Lundberg, this time from 32 yards out to give the Bison a 13-0 lead.

Colgate finally answered back on their next drive with a touchdown of their own making the score 13-6 in favor of the Bison. The Raiders were only able to score due to a costly pass interference penalty on the Bison in a third and long situation.

The remainder of the second quarter and first half of the third quarter proved to be a defensive struggle, with neither team moving the ball much at all.

But, with just under three minutes remaining in the third quarter the Raiders connected on a two-yard touchdown pass to make the score 13-12, with the Bison still holding a slim lead. Once again a Bucknell penalty proved necessary for the Raiders to get the ball in the end zone, when a Bison face mask enabled Colgate to convert another third and long situation.

The Raiders scored their final three points when the Bison fumbled a Colgate punt, and the Raiders recovered the ball at the Bucknell 23 yard line. Three plays later Colgate knocked through a 33-yard field goal to take the lead 15-13.

A final scoring attempt by the Bison came up short as time ran out, with the final score remaining 15-13 in favor of Colgate.

"It was a tough loss," linebacker Vic Cole '04 said. "I felt we were pretty much ready to play, but some unfortunate things happened, and we fell short."

"We went in feeling pretty good, but turnovers at the end were the difference," Wenrich said. "Turnovers were definitely a big key."

Even though the Bison were not able to pull out the Patriot League title, they did come away with yet another winning season. That was not good enough for the players.

"We did some good things as a team," Cole said. "We had good team chemistry, and good unity, but at times we wouldn't have the will to put it away."

Bucknell's success relies on the Bison defeating teams like Colgate and Lehigh in future seasons.

"The games we've lost have been to the top two teams in the league," Wenrich said. "Whoever works harder in the off season will be the difference," Wenrich continued.

Looking forward to the 2002 campaign, the Bison will be returning almost their entire defense, which should mean that they will only improve on the dominance that they showed this year. The Bison will be graduating most of their offensive line, as well as running back Jabu Powell '02.

"A lot of the younger players have played a lot this year," Wenrich said. "Jess is an all around awesome tailback, and we have a lot of depth. We will just have to see how the offensive line will gel."

"If we continue to work hard we should be set to take another run at the league title," Cole said.

Women's basketball squad starts perfect with 3-0 debut

The Women's Basketball Team has exploded out of the gate this season, winning their first three contests while holding their opponents to an average of 51 points per game.

In the season opener on Nov. 16, the Bison welcomed non-conference foe Albany to Davis Gym. Last season's Patriot League player of the year Molly Creamer '03 stepped in right where she left off, pouring in 26 points for the Orange and Blue on 11-20 shooting from the floor, including 3-5 from behind the arc, to lead her squad to a 64-45 victory.

"I think there are always those jitters in the first game of the season. I was really pleased with how we set the tone defensively and it was a good win and a good start for us," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said.

Both teams got off to slow starts, as the first two minutes featured four missed shots and three turnovers before the Bison finally got on the board at the 17:57 mark with a layup from senior Tri-Captain Vicki Quimby.

Just over a minute later, the Orange and Blue went on a 14-0 run to build a 17-2 lead with 8:49 remaining in the half. The Great Danes responded with a 5-0 run of their own to cut the Bison advantage to 10, but Creamer hit a three-pointer to extend the lead to 13, which never fell below 12 during the remainder of the half.

Team of the Week

Bucknell began the second half with a 30-16 edge. Albany would cut their deficit to nine with another 5-0 run at the 13:47 mark, but that was as close as they would get. The Bison went on to increase their lead to as large as 22 points before winning by 19.

Creamer led all players with 26 on the night and senior Tri-Captain Monique LeBlanc led the team with nine rebounds. Quimby added 11 points and eight rebounds and became the sixth player in school history and eighth in Patriot League history to accumulate 700 rebounds in her career.

"Molly started off very strong. She is certainly a catalyst on the offensive end, but I think this year she has matured to a different level and has really evolved as a major floor general. Also, her defensive effort has been very, very strong," Fedorjaka said.

The Tuesday before Thanksgiving, the Bison traveled to Pittsburgh to take on Big East opponent, the Panthers. Desire Almind '04 came off the bench to score 10 points, including the game-winner with 1:14 remaining to give the Orange and Blue a 58-57 victory.

"I was really proud of how the players approached the game. They came in and said we could beat them. It shows maturity and growth and that is great to see," Fedorjaka said.

The Bison scored first at the 18-minute mark, but Pitt responded with seven unanswered points to take an early 7-2 lead. With Pitt soon up 12-6, Creamer scored 12 points over three minutes, capped off by her second trey of the evening contest at 18 with just over nine minutes to play. The Panthers went up again 26-20 but the Bison responded again, putting in six unanswered points to tie the game at 26. The Orange and Blue went into halftime tied at 30, thanks to a last-second jumper from Creamer.

"Tying the game at the half was big. Molly hit a huge shot. A year ago, being down five, I think we would have panicked, but I never saw it in them. They never looked in doubt," Fedorjaka said.

At the 16:19 mark of the second half, Bucknell took its first-lead since the 18-minute mark of the first half on a four-point play by Creamer. The home team came back to take a 47-41 lead and held the Bison scoreless for five minutes. But the Orange and Blue would not go away, going on a 7-0 run, capped by another Creamer three-pointer to take a one-point lead, 48-47. During the last seven and a half minutes of the game, there were five lead changes and one tie before Almind hit the game-winning jumper.

The Bison came up with a big defensive stand to secure the win. Creamer had another big game, scoring 27 points on 11-23 shooting, including 5-7 from three-point range. Her five three-pointers tie a school record for treys in a game. Quimby led the team with eight rebounds.

"Our defense came up huge, especially at the end. Molly led the charge. She showed maturity and stepped up and took big shot after big shot. I was really impressed with

Buzzer-beating three-pointer sends Bison to overtime victory over Cornell

The men's basketball team capped another week of action with an exciting overtime victory over Cornell. Boakai Lalugba '03 and the Bison rallied to a 71-62 overtime victory over Cornell in the Bison's home opener at Davis Gym. Lalugba grabbed 15 rebounds and added 30 points to lead the team.

Cornell led 53-50 and was at the free throw line for a one-and-one to ice the game with 4.5 seconds remaining. But Cornell missed the front end and Lalugba rebounded and called timeout. Off the inbounds, Chris Rodgers '04 dribbled through traffic and found Lalugba at the top of the key where he drained his first three-pointer of his collegiate career at the final buzzer of regulation to send it to overtime. From then on the Bison "roamed free" culminating with a victory.

"The play wasn't designed for me, but Matt Quinn '04 was double covered and I was open and shot it for the tie," Lalugba said.

"I wasn't surprised that he drained the trey. He has been consistently making those types of shots in practice. He is the first one in the gym working on that. You draw plays up during timeouts, without knowing how a team will react. This time we executed nicely," Head Coach Pat Flannery added.

Bucknell took their "new found glory" into the extra session and outscored Cornell 18-9 for the victory. Shooting six for seven at the free throw line in the final minute of play sealed Cornell fate. Quinn and Dan Blankenship '03 added 16 points for Bucknell, career highs for both.

Flannery sighted his stingy defense, forcing 16 turnovers and limiting Cornell to 35.1 percent shooting (20-57) as keys to the win.

"We have been forced to try different combinations of players and sometimes it leads to good team defense," Flannery said.

Last Saturday the Bison fell victim to St. Francis 59-44. The loss was the Bison's fourth straight to start the season. Once again Lalugba lead the Bison with 10 points and six rebounds for a team who had five players out of the lineup, including All-Patriot League guard Bryan Bailey '02, who injured an ankle last Tuesday at Rider. Bailey's replacement, Roland Webber '04, did his part contributing a career high nine points, but even his superb performance was not enough to conquer St. Francis.

Rounding out the previous week Bucknell took a tough loss against Rider 75-62 in Lawrenceville, N.J. Bucknell grabbed an early 18-16 lead, but Rider went on a 15-2 run late in the first half and never trailed again. Leading the Bison was Lalugba scoring 20 points and corralling seven rebounds and Quinn adding 13 points, including three 3-pointers.

Unfortunately, Bucknell has been faced with many early season injuries to key players. On the top of the list is Bailey, who earned a that especially because she was beget frustrated and instead fought harder to get the ball," Fedorjaka said.

"The win against Pitt was a special one and a great win for this program, especially for the six seniors and a great way to start a long season," Quimby said.

"Beating Pitt was a great win for us, but we went in there confident, knowing we could win. We know that we can compete with anyone," LeBlanc said.

"Desire came off the bench and hit some big buckets. Kate Rounsley '02 and the interior played big defense. Kate Franks '03 played a solid game all-around and Kristin Valdner '04 played a clutch five minutes off the bench and was really big in her role," Fedorjaka said.

The Bison came back to Lewisburg to begin a four-game homestand this past Sunday against St.Francis. After an even-played first half, the Orange and Blue would break it open in the second half en route to a 67-50 victory.

St. Francis	50

"St. Francis is a good and very athletic club. We beat them last year at their place so I knew they would play us tough," Fedorjaka said. "We were not in sync offensively at the beginning. Our defense was a staple as opposed to last year. The team has learned how to have defense carry you through stretches in a game when the offense is struggling."

There were nine ties and seven lead changes in the first half, and the teams went into the locker room all square at 28. Franks put in a lay-up at the 17:12 mark to give her team a 34-33 lead that it would never relinquish. With six and a half minutes to play, the Bison were up five, 55-50 and would go on to hold the Red Flash scoreless for the rest of the contest on their way to their third win.

"We went inside more in the second half and our guards did a good job of getting the ball into the post and we got big games from our post players. It was our most balanced offensive game of the season so far," Fedorjaka said.

Quimby led all players with 16 points and 14 rebounds to earn her first double-double of the year. Rounsley and Creamer also put double digits on the board for the Orange and Blue, with 14 points each, as did Franks, who scored 12.

"Being 3-0 is awesome and we've got a great chance to have an impressive out-of-league record. The Pitt game was so much fun, and it was a great win for the program—I'm glad I was a part of it. And it was important to come off that huge win focused and get another win over a good St. Francis team. Everyone is looking great, the team is psyched, and right now we're on a roll," Rounsley said.

"The best aspect of each win has been our commitment to defense. After last year we made that our primary focus for this season, and it has shown. As long as we can hold teams down on the defensive end as we have, we will continue to win games," LeBlanc said.

"I give the players all the credit for the improvement in our defense. They made a commitment to it in our off-season and I am really proud of how they have responded," Fedorjaka said.

Bucknell continues their homestand with a non-conference matchup against Marist at 2 p.m. this Saturday.

"We want to challenge ourselves with our non-conference record to get prepared for League play. The kids love playing at Davis and they are focused on having a good home record. We will try to go at them with our pressing game and take the game out of a frontcourt game. We are also looking to experiment with our players to build a rotation in time for conference play," Fedorjaka said.

Dennis and Costello compete in nationals

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer

Nov. 19, 2001 is a day that will forever remain memorable for Bucknell runners Theresa Dennis '03 and Captain Greg Costello '03. Receiving bids to the NCAA Cross Country Championship after their outstanding performances at the Mid-Atlantic Regional race, these two standouts attained both individual and school goals at the National meet held at Furman University.

Dennis definitely made her mark in Bucknell history and raised the bar for future runners during her 2001 trip to the NCAA Championship. In a field of 249 runners, Dennis finished with a time of 21:53 to earn her the 73rd spot. Her showing marks the lowest finish ever at NCAA's in Bucknell Cross Country History. This race marks a personal best for Dennis. In 1999, she finished 143rd. This shows an improvement of 70 spots since her NCAA debut in 1999.

"Theresa ran her best race of the year and she picked a good time to run it. Seeing as she is only a junior, this will set her up for next year when she has the opportunity to become and All-American," Head Coach Kevin Donner said.

Greg Costello is the first individual member of the Bucknell men's cross country team to qualify for Nationals sine 1994. Out of a pool of 244 competitors, Costello finished at the 127th spot with a time of 31:41 for the 10,000-meter course. Overall, Colorado claimed the men's title, edging out Stanford by only a point. The new men's individual champion, from Eastern Michigan, ran a time of 28:47.

"Greg came out a little too strong in the beginning of the race. At the mile mark he was among the top 50 or 60 runners. By the second, he had fallen to around 150. His fitness level and endurance helped him chip his way back up. This experience will prepare him to react to this type of competition next year," Donner said.

While these two members of the cross country team were off competing individually at Nationals, the rest of their teammates were fighting for other titles. The Bison men traveled to Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx for the IC4A Championship. Despite the absence Costello, Bucknell was able to beat out the other 18 schools present to win the championship meet. The team finished with a total of 91 points, a difference of 14 points over second place team Yale. Junior Bryan Johnston captured fifth place, with a time of 25:14.20, only 10 seconds behind the first place finisher. Bucknell captured places 16, 21, 28 and 34 by P.J. Ward '02, Wes Reinhardt '04, Lou Palma '03 and Evan Honeyfield '02 respectively. This meet marks a huge accomplishment for the Bucknell Cross Country team and our athletic program as a whole. This is the second time that Bucknell has captured this title, the first being in 1980.

"It was an incredible day, and even more incredible because Greg wasn't there. We beat some pretty impressive teams. I felt that it was the silver lining to a not as strong patriot league meet," Donner said.

While the men were at the IC4A meet, the Bucknell women's team was at the ECAC meet. As a team, the Bison tied Duke for the third place spot, behind James Madison and Georgetown. Chris Crowe '02 finished in second place among 106 runners with a time of 18:02. This marks the first time in her career that Crowe finished the race as Bucknell's top runner. Becki Marshall '02 got seventh place and Kristen Ferrell '02 captured 21st.

"I felt we were amongst the top 15 teams in the country. But unfortunately the chips didn't fall our way according to our schedule. Seeing our performances at NCAAs, ECACs, and the IC4A meet made me realize that we should be in the top 15," Donner said.

No rest for the weary though. With the end of the Cross Country season comes the start of indoor track. Bucknell's finest sprinters, hurdlers, throwers and jumpers have been training for the past 12 weeks and are ready for their first home meet this Saturday at 11:00. After such a strong cross country season, Donner looks forward to seeing how all of their weeks of hard training have paid off.

spot on the all-tournament team at the Mohegan Sun Classic the week prior after scoring a tournament high 48 points in losses to Central Connecticut and Vermont. Rounding out the list are Ben Slater '04, Jack Namvou '04 and Kevin Welch '04 who have all shared their time on the bench. The Bison are looking like the "walking wounded".

"The injuries to Bailey and Slater early into the season have made us play reserves in positions they aren't used to. Although they have done very well, when our starting unit is back no team is safe."

Despite the slow start the season looks bright for the Bison, with sights set on the 'Big Game'.

"Every game we played has been tough so have and the injuries have hurt us. It is still early, but we have a chance to go for the Patriot League crown," Lalugba said.

Flannery added, "We have two goals for right now. One is to get healthy; two, focus on winning the Patriot League title. With hard work and a healthy team, this is within our grasp."

Student athlete volunteers lead by example

By Dave Cohen
Staff Writer

Bison Athletics has not only prided itself annually on its excellence in competition, but also on its involvement in the local community. In particular, the Bison men's basketball team visited with sick children at Geisinger Medical Center on Halloween and has consistently volunteered its time playing the role of big brother to kids at the Heiter Community Center in town.

On the eve of Thanksgiving, the team continued to make community service a priority as they passed out turkey at Heiter to residents of the Lewisburg area.

"It helps the people feel special that the team found it important to take time out of their day to serve them," said Andrea Tufo, assistant director at the Community Center. "These guys are down to earth. They are willing to not eat to make sure somebody else does. They are willing to put themselves on the back burner for a night. That's not just the sign of a good helper, but the sign of a good heart."

Junior forward Boakai Lalugba was raised in the Newark area of New Jersey and has come across many people that have been brought up in the same predicament as the kids he helped out at Heiter.

"It feels great to help people who have less than you do," said Lalugba. "Growing up in a neighborhood with people who are less fortunate gives me a greater understanding of what these kids are going through. The least I could do is give a little bit of my time and let them know that people care about them. It is a great honor to be told that I am a mentor for these kids."

Senior forward Pete Santos has found it imperative for a student at Bucknell to involve him or herself in the Lewisburg community. He noted that whether the students are cognizant of it or not, they are local residents in a sense as well.

"Taking part in the local area here is essential because we live here too," explained Santos. "It is our duty to give back to the community that we currently live in.

Santos also stressed that while taking part in community service, one must believe in what they are doing. He pointed out the tremendous discrepancy between those who merely go through the motions and those who actually put their heart into it.

"I am glad that I could spend time with the kids. For many people community service is a chore, but I think it's important that we get as much out of it as the people at Heiter do. It feels really good when you walk away and realize that you actually made a difference in someone's life. Our team is comprised of kids from all over the world, so it was cool to share our respective backgrounds with the kids and let them know that we care about them."

"The impact on the kids is huge. So many of them need role models ... To tell you the truth, it is volunteer work like this that makes the community look at the University as a whole in a different light.
—Melissa Reinhard

The players gave a lot of information about their home states and countries," added Tufo, in agreement with Santos. "Some of these people have never left Lewisburg, so it was a learning experience for both our kids and the athletes."

Melissa Reinard, this year's coordinator of the Thanksgiving dinner, couldn't say enough about how much the Heiter kids in particular have benefited from just a few hours with the guys.

"The impact on the kids is huge," she said emphatically. "So many of them need role models because not many of them have a male or female figure in their life. When these kids meet a college athlete, it's like meeting an NBA star. Being able to attend a Bucknell basketball game and identify a player as someone who personally spent time with them at the Community Center means a lot. To tell you the truth, it is volunteer work like this that makes the community look at the University as a whole in a different light."

According to Tufo and Reinard, there has been a great deal of tension between the residents of Lewisburg and the students of Bucknell over the years. However, student athlete volunteering has played a significant role in the healing process.

"Our community has not had a great relationship with Bucknell, but this volunteer work helps bring the community and Bucknell students in general together," said Reinard. "The team coming to Heiter helped the community realize that Bucknell cares about the community."

Junior Co-Captain Dan Blankenship explained that Bison athletes that have come from backgrounds similar to the kids can help alter the misconception that the local area has about Bucknell students.

"I think it is extremely important for us in athletics to reach out to the community and display that there is more to Bucknell than the fancy cars they see driving down Market Street," explained Blankenship. "In particular many athletes here have come from similar backgrounds to the kids at the community center. The community should view these kids as role models and recognize that they are trying share the similarities that exist between them. I think athletic volunteer work will ultimately be the greatest factor in patching up Bucknell's shaky relationship with the town."

Sophomore center Davorin Skornik is confident that the diverse backgrounds of Bucknell's student athletes aids their volunteer work. It allows the community to learn more about aspects of the University that may be overlooked at times. This will ultimately help improve the school's relationship with the local community.

"I think it can really make a difference," said Skornik of the student athlete diversity factor. "Because of my background, I can reach out to people in a way that a lot of others can't. Being a native of Slovenia and a member of the basketball team, I am actually able to help the community open up to Bucknell and realize that there is a lot more diversity in the school than they realize. I look forward to seeing improvement because I know there will be."

Denver (6-5) at Miami (7-3)
Miami is in a tough battle with the N.Y. Jets for the AFC East lead, while the Broncos are merely struggling to get a wild card berth. The Dolphins had a miracle comeback against Buffalo last week and better not count on that again. However, the Broncos had a defensive collapse last week against the lowly Cowboys that would hint the Dolphins might have this game in the bag. Fiedler will out sling Griese in an offensive barrage.

Indianapolis (4-6) at Baltimore (7-4)
The Colts are falling apart and are in the middle of their second three game losing streak of the season. That must mean that they are due for a win, right? Wrong! Indy has only beaten one team that is currently over .500. The Ravens are coming off a huge emotional win against a division rival to keep pace with the Steelers for the AFC Central lead. Grbac has shown why the Ravens picked him up and why they need him if they hope to go anywhere in the playoffs. The Ravens will win this one easily.

Minnesota (4-6) at Pittsburgh (8-2)
The Steelers are tied for the best record in the NFL. They have a number one ranked defense and Stewart is stepping it up. He is making teams pay for stacking eight men in the box against the Bus, who is the NFL's leading rusher. His accuracy is improving and his receivers, namely Burress, are holding onto the ball. Minnesota's usually potent offense is struggling this year, due mainly to an unhealthy offensive line. The Vikings have not won on the road this year and will continue that streak this Sunday in Pittsburgh.

New England (6-5) at New York Jets (7-3)
The Patriots will be looking for retribution against the Jets, since it was the Jets' Mo Lewis that injured Bledsoe in week two. However, they may be thankful that he did, since under Brady the Pats have gone 6-3 and are now wild card contenders. The Jets are battling Miami for the AFC East, and control their division in a span of four weeks during which the Jets have gone undefeated. The Jets will win.

Detroit (0-10) at Chicago (8-2)
Chicago wins because they are playing Detroit. Still, maybe the Lions are due for a victory. After all, their last seven losses have all been decided by one score or less. Nah, the Lions will get mauled by the Bears in this lopsided game.

Denver (6-5) at Miami (7-3)
As a general rule, pro athletes should stick to athletics. When athletes start appearing on commercials like Doug Flutie's 1-800-COLLECT commercials or Mike Piazza for Claritin, you know it's all downhill from there. However, I must say that sometimes they get it right. For instance, Michael Jordan in "Space Jam," or Hulk Hogan in "Suburban Commando." But the most recent addition to these ranks is Jay Fiedler, Miami quarterback, who has made a stunning off-Broadway debut in the new hit musical "Fiedler on the Roof." His beautiful rendition of the oft-sung "Matchmaker, matchmaker, make me a match, find me a find, catch me a catch" entitled "Place kicker, route runner, score me some points, pick up your blocks, you worthless hacks" brings the crowd to tears every time. Bring the kids, but be careful, it's a two-hanky show. Den-enver

Indianapolis (4-6) at Baltimore (7-4)
I am honestly surprised by Baltimore's success. They started out looking like Thanksgiving leftovers in July but still managed to be mediocrity's cabana boy. Imagine how they'll do next year when they have a running back. Then they'll be Mediocrity's pimp, arranging its schedule and list of "associates." I can't wait. Balto-more. (Balto is the best animated movie about a dog since "The Call of the Wild").

Minnesota (4-6) at Pittsburgh (8-2)
Kordell Stewart has risen from the depths of "horrendous" to the lofty heights of "eh" in just four years. Now he is bursting with adequatacism. In the words of Phil Hartman, "It's one thing to know you're adequate, but to have a member of the press stand up and say 'Yes! You, sir, are adequate.' Well let me tell you, it's a very special honor." As for the Bus, keep on trucking.

New England (6-5) at New York Jets (7-3)
It's a story, of a Q named Brady, who was trying not to run the team into the ground. Not that it would have been any different, under Bledoe, but now he's all alone. And one day when Tom Brady started throwing, Belichek knew it was much more than a hunch, that this Q would somehow find a way to win, and make everyone in Boston proud for once.

Detroit (0-10) at Chicago (8-2)
Hmm, working hypothesis: Soft Batch cookies = great. Charlie Batch quarterback = bad. If you were to combine them to make "Soft Charlie cookieback," you would have a string of words that were utterly nonsensical and useless. Never mind, that didn't work. Umm, how about this ... do you think Chicago will beat Detroit? You Batch-a. That was bad too. Yet still better than the Lions.

Men's water polo ends season 13-17

Taking to the road for the last time this season, the men's water polo team traveled to Princeton for the Eastern Championships on Nov. 17 and fell to St. Francis 17-6 and Princeton 13-1 before pulling out a victory against Johns Hopkins in overtime 9-7.

The Bison had their work cut out for them as they took on 15th ranked St. Francis (NY) in their first game on Saturday. Despite a total team effort on offense, where goals were scored by six different members of the squad, the Orange and Blue fell 17-6. Junior Dan Lonnerdal also handed out four assists on the day. In the cage, senior Dave Kennedy made 11 saves, as well as having two steals and an assist.

Being the most challenging tournament of the year, we went in with confidence... We fought through the losses and ended the season with pride
—Christ Saxton '03

Playing Princeton later in the day, the Bison struggled offensively against the 12th-ranked Tigers, and fell 13-1. The lone goal for the squad was scored by junior Chris Saxton, assisted by both junior Adam Yerkes and Kennedy. Kennedy tallied 15 saves in three quarters in the cage, while Ernest Martin '05 made four saves in the last quarter.

Bucknell then played Johns Hopkins, the second-ranked team in Division III schools, hoping for seventh place in the tournament. Taking the game into overtime, the Bison prevailed 9-7. The Orange and Blue got a team effort offensively, with six different players scoring, including two each from senior Co-Captain Ryan McCarty, Saxton and freshman Elliot Benoist. In addition, McCarty had two assists and Benoist had one steal. Sophomore Jamie Saettele scored once, handed out two assists and grabbed a steal, while freshman Aaron Platshon had one goal, one assist and a steal, and classmate James Danforth scored once while adding two take-aways. Also playing solid defense in the win was Lonnerdal with two steals.

"Although the weekend was really tough, we left Princeton feeling good about our win against Johns Hopkins, an ongoing intense rival throughout the year," Saxton said. "Being the most challenging tournament of the year, we went in with confidence, knowing how tough it would be. But we couldn't step it up in the first two games. We fought through the losses and ended the season with pride."

In goal, Kennedy played a solid game all around, making 15 saves, and having a team-high three assists and four steals. This brings his career total to 1,002 saves.

"It's been a great four years and the water polo team has been a significant part of my college experience," Kennedy said. "It has really been a pleasure playing with this team."

The team is looking forward to the new Olympic-sized swimming pool scheduled to be available for next year.

"It has been difficult all season to adapt to the bigger pools and this way we won't have to make such adjustments," Saxton said. "Getting our intensity and confidence going is the key to our success. The new pool will definitely encourage this. We're looking forward to it."

The Bison end their season with a 13-17 overall record and a 4-4 mark in the Southern Division of the Collegiate Water Polo Association.

Old football rivalries still nail-biters

By Rob Schmicker
Senior Writer

There is nothing better in college football than rivalry week. For fans, rivalry week always presents the most exciting and emotional games of the year, but for the players, it means much more. Rivalry week is the first thing mentioned to freshmen football players when they step on campus in late August. With one victory, they can atone for all the past failures, but with a loss, they just add to the frustration—never does the phrase "wait 'til next year" mean more. Simply put, be a hero and go down in history; be a goat and go down in infamy.

Thanksgiving weekend had a full slate of rivalry games with such trophies as Paul Bunyan's Axe, the Old Oaken Bucket and the Golden Egg on the line. All three games, though, fail to compare with Saturday's game: Army-Navy.

While both service academies have had better seasons, their annual meeting will once again be the best game of the year. It's all about tradition and pride and is determined solely by who wants it more. The players aren't playing for money; they don't have lucrative deals waiting for them in the NFL; they play because they love the game. For the seniors, this is the end of the road. Because this is their last game, they don't leave anything on the field—you will never see either team give up midway through.

With the events of September 11, this year's game has even more meaning. In a few months, both Cadets and Midshipmen will be sent overseas to play on the same team. Football gives them a chance to leave the reality of what is to happen in the future. While football is not their life, for three hours on a cold December day, it means everything. The game will continue to go on and when it is done, Army and Navy will be united as one. But until then, I think I speak for all Army fans: Go Army, Beat Navy!

If you're not one for a classic matchup of two tradition-laden teams that have combined for two wins this year, then rivalry week has a lot more to often as well. Filling out the schedule are several makeup games, as well as the Civil War: Oregon vs. Oregon State.

College football rivalries like Army and Navy are still alive

As for Thanksgiving weekend, the biggest game was appropriately "The Big Game", pitting the Ohio State Buckeyes against the first place Michigan Wolverines. Former OSU Coach John Cooper was fired because he couldn't beat the Wolverines (2-10-1), as the Buckeyes looked to former Youngstown State coach Jim Tressel to bring a victory back to Columbus. Last fall, Tressel guaranteed a victory over Michigan, and since then has had his team believing. After a long week in which QB Steve Bellasari was arrested for DWI, Ohio State defeated Michigan 26-20, ending the Wolverines BCS Bowl hopes.

Also in the Big 10, Minnesota defeated Wisconsin, Indiana defeated Purdue and Iowa lost to Iowa State for the fourth straight year. Down south, Grambling ended an eight-year drought as they defeated their Bayou rival Southern, 30-20, while Texas defeated Texas A&M, 21-7, to move to 10-1 on the year. In the SEC, Eli Manning came up short in his first meeting against Mississippi State, as MSU defeated Ole Miss, 36-28.

But the biggest rivalry game involving an SEC team was Georgia-Georgia Tech. Bulldog fans (myself included) have suffered through three straight losses to the 'Ramblin Wreck' of Georgia Tech and would like nothing more than a victory over their heated rivals.

The Dawgs traveled an hour and a half to Atlanta to take on the 19th ranked Yellow Jackets, and quickly showed that this year would be different. They dominated the first half, but were unable to punch the ball in the endzone, taking a 12-10 lead into halftime. The second half was more of the same as Verron Haynes led Georgia to two scores and a 31-17 victory.

If that wasn't enough, the Big 12 added an extra element to the emotion of rivalry week: the chase for the national championship. Top ranked Nebraska had the Rose Bowl in their sights—all they had to do was defeat Colorado and then Oklahoma in the Big 12 Championship.

The Cornhuskers obviously had the Sooners on their mind as they overlooked the 14th ranked Buffaloes in a 62-36 blowout loss. One half of the title game was now shaken up, as Colorado awaited Oklahoma. But that wouldn't even come to be, as the Oklahoma State Cowboys (3-7) upset their in-state rivals 13-10, effectively ending any chance for Oklahoma to defend their national title. Instead of Nebraska-Oklahoma, the Big 12 Championship game is now Texas vs Colorado.

For the Cowboys and Buffaloes, victory could not have been any sweeter. Both teams were expected to be mere speed bumps along the way to Nebraska-Oklahoma II. But no one ever told them that, as they not only defeated their rivals, but ended their dreams of the national championship. That is what rivalry week is all about—not only beating your rival, but making them miserable for the rest of the year. When pride and bragging rights are on the line, anything is possible.

MLB awards aren't clear-cut

COMMENTARY

Cecily Cairns

It's only been a couple of weeks since the 2001 baseball season ticked to a close, and already the postseason action is in full swing. The games may be over, but sportswriters didn't waste any time before leaping into the world of free agency rumor and contraction debate. Unbeknownst to many, somewhere between the decision to euthanize a pair of teams and the advent of hourly Jason Giambi/Yankees reports, the Baseball Writers Association of America handed out a few awards. For those of you who missed the announcements, I've compiled a brief summary of each award, complete with ranting and raving.

NL Rookie of the Year: It would be hard to make a case for any rookie in the National League other than Albert Pujols, who set a NL rookie record for RBIs (120), hitting 37 home runs (one away from the NL rookie record) and batting .329 along the way. Not a single voter attempted to dispute his dominance, as he became just the ninth unanimous pick in the history of the award. Second place wasn't much of a battle either, as Astros hurler Roy Oswalt outdistanced Jimmy Rollins, the third place finisher.

AL Rookie of the Year/AL MVP: In the history of the BBWAA awards, only one man has ever won the Rookie of the Year award and the MVP award in the same year. That is, until this year, when plucky outfielder Ichiro Suzuki took the MLB by storm. Fred Lynn accomplished this feat in 1975, a year in which he batted .331, pumping out 21 home runs, 47 doubles and 105 ribbies Ichiro's .350 average and 56 stolen bases led the league in 2001, and his 242 hits set a new rookie mark. So everyone's saying Suzuki had a better rookie season than even Lynn (which is arguable based on numbers alone), but let's keep one thing in mind: Lynn was 23 when he won that award, barely out of his college years at USC. Suzuki is 28 and has already had nine seasons in professional baseball. Only one sportswriter had the brazenness to act on that discrepancy, casting his first place vote for 21-year-old C.C. Sabathia. Rules are rules, and according to technicalities, there's nothing that says Suzuki didn't deserve that award. But maybe it's time to rethink the technicalities, because throwing nine-year veterans in the same award category as unseasoned kids is essentially as unjust as allowing Danny Almonte to bully around a bunch of Little Leaguers.

NL Cy Young: Could life get any better for Randy Johnson? The Big Unit tore up the strike zone (as well as the occasional pigeon) all year, racking up a 2.49 ERA, 21 victories and 372 strikeouts. The only pitchers to compile more Ks in a year are Nolan Ryan (383) and Sandy Koufax (382). Along the way, he became the third pitcher in history to strike out 20 batters in nine innings. He received 30 of 32 first place votes, the other two going to his teammate Curt Schilling. The Co-World Series MVPs worked their one-two punch once again, becoming only the third pair of teammates to be first and second in the voting since the award's inception in 1956.

AL Cy Young: In the case of this award, I'm not even sure if the voters bothered to look at the stat sheets for these guys. Roger Clemens may have been a good choice according to the Triple Crown statistics (ERA, wins, Ks), but pitching goes a little beyond those three numbers. If this were an award about the W-L record or the most strikeouts, then give it to Clemens. If it's for the best ERA, then Freddy Garcia's your man. But I was under the impression that this award was to be given to the best all-round pitcher, in which case the most qualified individual was Mark Mulder.

Mulder had more wins (21/20), more complete games (6/0 - in the process of winning this award, The Rocket became the first pitcher in the history of the Cy Young to go an entire season without pitching a single complete game), a better ERA (3.45/3.51), pitched slightly more innings (229.1/220.1), had less run support (5.81/6.58), a lower BB/nine innings (2.00/2.94) and accumulated a significantly lower WHIP (1.16/1.26) than Clemens. That leaves Clemens with the honor of having more strikeouts (213/153) and fewer losses (3/8). I'd say the scale tips a bit towards Mulder's side.

As it happens, 21 of 28 writers managed to sleepwalk right past all of those statistics, and proceeded to hand Clemens his record sixth Cy Young Award. While I respect the addition of this accolade to his surefire Hall of Fame career, I'm not sure it wasn't given to him based more on his historical prowess and less on the actual numbers.

NL MVP: Does Barry deserve this award? Sure. But, as if it wasn't soul-sucking enough to watch this guy break Mark McGwire's home run record, watching him become the first player in history to win four MVP awards was really icing on the cake. Bonds may have had the numbers to claim the best offensive season in modern history, but his self-centered demeanor makes it painful to acknowledge him alongside historical greats. Bonds was unequivocally valuable to the Giants this year, but that certainly wasn't a mutual affection—Bonds cared about his team about as much as certain readers of The Bucknellian care about Bill Buckner.

While it pains me to say this, all subjectivities set aside, Bonds is a deserving recipient of this award. But the truth remains that when it comes to all the intangibles—charisma, team leadership, selflessness and probably heart—Barry is about as productive a baseball player, let alone an all-time great, as Bob Uecker.

Vicki Quimby '02

The senior tri-captain had 16 points and 14 rebounds against St. Francis.

The 3-0 start to the women's basketball season is in large part due to forward Vicki Quimby '02. In the team's most recent win over St. Francis, the senior tri-captain grabbed 14 rebounds and had 16 points in her first double-double of the year.

"The confidence that everyone else had in me helped me out a lot," she said. "My teammates did a good job of getting me the ball and everyone was behind me."

It was a 28-28 tie at halftime against St. Francis, but the Bison pulled away in the second half to take the win 67-50. Quimby shot eight for nine from the foul line, helping her team ensure the victory, and 11 of her 14 rebounds came on the critical defensive end of the floor.

"Our defense as a whole really stepped up," she said. "We made a conscious effort after last year to step it up."

It was solid defense that enabled the Bison to come up with a 58-57 upset over Pittsburgh in the second game of the season. Quimby nearly had a double-double in that contest too, adding eight points and eight rebounds. The game went down to the wire, and Quimby once again was a presence underneath the basket, dominating the glass and playing tough defense. Her performance helped contain Pittsburgh's strong forwards and center who had their way with everyone before playing the Bison.

The strong start has Bison fans hoping for a shot at the Patriot League title, but Quimby knows the team can't look that far ahead just yet.

"In our hindsight the Patriot League championship is our goal, but right now it's doing the little things and taking things one at a time that we need to focus on," Quimby said.

The responsibility of keeping the team focused lies on Quimby's shoulders as tri-captain, but for Quimby being a captain isn't much of a difference from other years. The nucleus of the team this year is veteran players who all have experience leading the team. To Quimby, the fact that this is the last year that she will have an opportunity to play does make it more special than years past.

"It means that everyday I have to give my best so that I have no regrets when I look back at my last season," she said.

Volleyball drops last game to American

The Bison women's volleyball team gave undefeated American the biggest run that they had seen all season from any Patriot League foe, but fell to the eventual champions of the tournament 3-0 (30-13, 32-30, 30-22). The defending league champions finished the season with a 12-12 overall record, but were unable to go back to the NCAA tournament.

After being beaten 30-13 in the opening game, the Bison put things together and almost became the first Patriot League team of the season to take a game from the Eagles, coming just two points shy of taking the second game. The 2-0 lead was all American needed as the Eagles never looked back and finished the sweep.

For Shannon Walker '02, it was her final match of a stellar career for the Bison. Over her four-year varsity career, the captain finished second on the school's all-time kills list with 1,254 and fourth on the all-time blocks list with 482 rejections.

"It was by the far the best match of the year," she said of the American contest. "Even though we lost, it was a great way to go out." For the second year in a row, Walker's efforts earned her a spot on the All-Patriot League first team.

Walker's eight kills and two blocks were not enough to compete with the outstanding offense of the Eagles. Brandi Trapasso '04, who will most likely repeat as Patriot League Defender of the year, tried her best to contain the powerful Eagle attack, recording six digs, five kills and three service aces.

"In terms of offense and serving, that's the best team we've played all season," Trapasso said.

Other bright spots in the Bison effort were Jackie Leahy '05, who contributed a team-high nine digs and Melanie Ghiz '03, who added eight digs and two blocks in the loss.

There could be no questioning the Bison's will to win or effort, as the lopsided first game loss could not deter the squad from putting up a fight.

"We started off slow in the first game because we were hesitant, but we just kept building," Trapasso said. "We wanted it so badly, and that's the best we've played all season despite the outcome."

The Bison knew early on in the season that it would come down to getting through the newcomer to the league, American, in order to repeat as Patriot League champions. Many of the Eagles received volleyball scholarships, an advantage that the rest of the Patriot League schools do not have. The Eagles had five first or second All-Patriot League players and were strong in every area of play. Still, the Bison refused to make any excuses going into their three matches against American this year. The Herd put up a better fight as the fourth seed in the tournament than anyone had been able to do all year against the Eagles and do not look at the match as a disappointing end to their season.

"We had a good shot at beating them and we surprised everyone," Walker said. "We made the point that they're a beatable team, but unfortunately we couldn't get it done."

Women's soccer gives Penn State a scare in national championship

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

In its first-ever appearance in the NCAA tournament, the women's soccer team certainly left a good impression. For 65 minutes, they held Penn State, the seventh-ranked team in the country, to a 1-1 draw on their home field before giving up two goals in two minutes to eventually fall to the Big Ten Champion Nittany Lions 3-1.

Penn State	3

"I knew we were going to be a more defensive-minded because of what we witnessed during our first game with Penn State and their transition," Head Coach Chrissy Findlay said.

"The first time around we wanted to play them full out and see what would happen. I knew it would be a good indication of how our team was doing at that point in the season. Our strategy in this game was to cut the field in half and play good half-field zone defense and make sure Penn State plays their best game to beat us," Findlay said.

This match was the complete opposite of the encounter between the Bison and the Nittany Lions during the regular season, in which Penn State prevailed 9-2. After giving up a goal 22 minutes into the contest, the Orange and Blue responded two minutes later. Front-runner Savannah Rennels '04 hit a high shot from the left wing that looped over the Penn State goalkeeper to even the game at one.

Bucknell battled hard throughout the rest of the game. Penn State controlled the possession of the ball for most of the match, but the Bison hung in there and found themselves with a great scoring opportunity near the halfway point of the second half. Rennels broke through on the right wing and had an open look at the goal, but her shot sailed over the net. Penn State responded immediately by putting the game away with two quick strikes.

"All I would ask is for them to give everything they had and that's what they did," Findlay said.

"Playing against Penn State in the NCAA Tournament was a memorable experience. I think as a team we did an excellent job of modifying our style of play to be successful. We frustrated Penn State and I think we proved ourselves individually, and as a team," Lauren Schwarz '03 said.

The Bison were out-shot 19-5 for the match, but goalkeeper Laurie Purse '03 had an excellent game between the pipes, registering 11 saves. The Orange and Blue finish the season 12-7, tying their single-season record.

"Penn State was a chance to redeem ourselves from the first time we played them, and we did just that. The crowd was amazing ... we had more fans than Penn State and even though we lost 3-1, they made us feel like we won at the end of the game," Purse said.

"Savannah is a big-time player and I knew she would stand out. Laurie did a good job in net and the whole defensive unit played with composure and made good decisions," Findlay said.

"It was a great way to end the season, and we have so much to be proud of. This year has been filled with so many 'firsts' for the program, and playing in the NCAA Tournament was just icing on the cake," Schwarz said.

"We wanted to show Penn State that we deserved to be in the tournament, and that they had to put up a good fight if they were going to advance to the next round," Purse said.

"A couple of years ago I never thought we'd be sitting here with a trophy because of all the work that was ahead. I am really grateful to the seniors who have gone through the ups and the downs and really happy that they are graduating as champions, because I always knew they were all along," Findlay said.

"The seniors are a strong group of young women who are going to be successful in the real world. We're really going to miss them," Findlay said.

Scientists rethink radiation dangers

The dangers of exposure to radiation being reevaluated by scientific community

By Josie Cetta
Science and Technology Editor

Radiation exposure is a problem that can be either natural or manmade. Besides the exposure that comes from nuclear power plants and such, people absorb cosmic rays, and the byproducts of radon escaping the earth, radioactive substances in soil, water, food and even of potassium in the body.

Recently, scientists are questioning whether excess exposure is truly a problem. According to The New York Times, the General Accounting Office, the investigative arm of Congress, said in a report given last year that, "The standards administered by E.P.A. and Nuclear Regulatory Commission (N.R.C.) to protect the public from low-level radiation exposure do not have a conclusive scientific basis, despite decades of research."

The standard method for determining the amount of radiation is called the linear-nonthreshold dose-response model. It assumes that there is no safe dose of radiation and that the risk of getting cancer or genetic damage increases in line with radiation exposure. Some, however, argue that low levels of radiation are harmless, while others go on to say that some levels are beneficial. They say that low doses protect against cancer by activating cells' natural defense mechanisms.

The Environmental Protection Agency (E.P.A.) calls for a standard of 15 millirem a year of radiation exposure from any single source, and no more than four per year from ground water. For reference, a standard chest X-ray gives off 10 millirem to the chest, the equivalent of one or two millirem to the whole body.

The standard set by the Nuclear Regulatory Commission is higher—25 millirem a year from any one source. The average level of background radiation in the United States is 350 millirem a year. According to The New York Times, New Yorkers absorb 100 millirem of radiation each year just from cosmic rays.

"When you look at the exposure of the population from radiation, about two-thirds is due to natural background and about 15 percent is due to doctors and chiropractors," Dr. Fred Mettler, chairman of the radiology department at the University of New Mexico medical school, said in a New York Times article. "Everything else is, to tell you the truth, very minimal. Less than a couple of percent is from all the nuclear reactors and all the research industry."

So why haven't scientists agreed on what to do about the problem, or even what level of exposure constitutes a "problem"? One cannot blame the government for not trying after all, there has been research going on for the past century. The EPA, the N.R.C., the Department of Energy, the National Institutes of Health, the National Council on Radiation Protection and Measurements and the National Academy of Sciences have all contributed to the effort.

"We know a lot. We've studied populations all over the world since the turn of the last century. We know what happens at high doses. We know what happens at medical doses. And we know that at low doses the risks are low. The controversy is just how low are they. Are they really low or are they really, really low?" Dr. John Boice Jr., a radiation expert and scientific director of the International Epidemiology Institute in Maryland, said in a New York Times article.

The cost of having stricter standards is another issue. According to last year's G.A.O. report, the price of cleaning soil around areas containing reactors and nuclear weapons ranges from thousands of dollars to over $100 million, depending on which standard—15 or 25 millirem a year—is used.

It is not well known that of the 80,000 survivors of Hiroshima who all received high doses of radiation, under 500 of them have illnesses that are attributable to the radiation exposure, according to www.iaea.org. Eight thousand survivors have died from solid cancer tumors, but studies show that less than 500 of these deaths can be attributed to radiation effects.

Currently, scientists are reanalyzing the linear-nonthreshold method and trying to agree on the safest, most efficient radiation standards.

Technology may never fully replace books

By Erin Grim
Staff writer

There is nothing more prevalent on a college campus than books. The Bertrand Library holds 600,000 volumes, in addition to textbooks and other required reading. Students and staff use books in most aspects of their lives, from assignment books, address books and phone books to novels, biographies, textbooks and reference books.

In this age of technology, Gene Spencer, associate director for Computing and Information Services at the University, says that books are going through a period of evolution as radical as that in which Gutenberg invented the printing press.

I-books, pocket computers that can download and display full books, are already on the market providing the first competition that paper books have ever seen. There is, of course, the question of whether people really want to read in this manner. Some people feel that part of the experience of reading comes from the physical act of holding the book, curling up by a fire and turning paper pages.

"There's something comforting about grabbing your favorite book and having it there. I don't see how anyone could enjoy reading off of a little screen. It's not the same," Tyler Weiss '05 said.

The benefits of technology are easily seen. For example, the sheer number of books in the Bertrand Library makes them troublesome both in the space they consume and the maintenance they require.

"It's just more convenient to have all of the information from a huge set of encyclopedias on a CD. It takes up so little room, and online encyclopedias can be updated more easily than a whole set of books," said Erica Salamon '05.

Over the past years, the availability of information over the Internet and the availability of the Internet in dorm rooms has made students' lives much easier. A changeover to electronic books could have a similar effect.

Spencer said that he believes that even textbooks could be affected by this changeover. Made-to-order textbooks could be printed, or at least uploaded, for a single class. If a professor wants sections or chapters from many books, these could be bound into a specialized edition for the class.

The possibilities for the future of the book are endless. As so many facets of life today are altered and improved by technology, perhaps reading may soon follow.

Abroad perspective: a year in Bath

By Maren Johnson
Opinions Editor

When I decided to study aboard in Bath, England for a year I had to realize exactly what I was getting into. I was leaving the familiarity gained from two years already spent at Bucknell. I was taking my "Bucknell experience" and eliminating an entire year of it. I would miss parties, concerts, and even the chance to celebrate my 21st birthday at the Bull Run. Most of all I was leaving my friends. In two short years I had made some of the most wonderful friends I could have hoped for and I now I was leaving them for two semesters in a country where I had never been with people who, for the majority of them, I had never met. But I never regretted my decision.

I had never been to Europe before I made the decision to spend my entire junior year of college there. I hadn't even really been out of the country. I packed pretty much everything I owned and boarded the plane for six hours of flying over an ocean I had never crossed. I thanked my lucky stars that I at least spoke the language—little did I know that just because they speak English does not mean it was an English that I would immediately understand.

When I got off the plane and navigated my way through London's Heathrow Airport I had no idea where to go or what to do. All I knew was that I had to get to Paddington Station and catch a train to Bath—almost two hours to the west. Completely naïve to the geography of England, let alone the maze of London I was a cab driver's dream. While getting to see the city and ride in the funny little black cab, so indigenous to England, was an experience to remember; I also ended up taking what I believe will be the most expensive cab rides of my entire life. A word to the wise: Heathrow is nowhere near Paddington Station.

When I finally got to the station and ran into the familiar faces of two fellow Bucknellians I felt a wave of relief. I had chosen my program, Advanced Studies in England (ASE), because it was not exclusive to Bucknell. Students from at least 10 different schools participate in ASE, which is part of what made it so attractive; a chance to break out of the bubble a bit and see what other students are like. But when I saw Erica DelSandro's smiling face I was glad that I wasn't the only Bucknellian to make the trek to Bath. That semester there were eight of us from Bucknell, out of 40-some students on ASE, and I appreciated every one of them being there.

That night, my housemates and I ventured out to the small pub across the street from the house that would be our new home for the next four months. We were sure that there was no better way to quickly immerse ourselves in English culture than to find out where they hang out and go there.

Because our house was a little way out of the hustle and bustle of the city center our pub was small, quiet and patronized by only a few very old men. The bartender (or, as the English call it, "barman") looked to be about our age and seemed just as delighted to see us as we were to see him. He quickly became friends with us and also became our link to the English world.

As we would eventually learn, if you want to make English friends on ASE, you have to find them yourself. So "Ben the barman," as he became known was our first English friend, but as it turned out, the old men weren't so bad. In fact, many of them befriended us as well and proved to be a valuable source of real English culture. Of course they had a jolly good time with us as well. Since we were lucky enough to be in Bath during the American presidential election fiasco, the old men made sure to get all the jabs in at us that they could while letting us experience what its like to have the rest of the world laughing at you.

Out of the innumerable new things I experienced while in England, one that was truly foreign and very important to me was Thanksgiving. Thanksgiving had been one of those things I hadn't even considered when I decided to go to England. It hadn't entirely occurred to me that of course the English would not be celebrating our very American holiday. While ASE was entirely accommodating, putting together a Thanksgiving feast for its students, I had the good fortune to spend my Thanksgiving in a home with an American family. A fellow Bucknellian from the ASE program, who soon became a very dear friend, had just had her family relocated to a small town outside of London. She invited me to her new home to celebrate the holiday.

While spending Thanksgiving with an American family made the holiday that much more special to me, I have to admit it was a bit strange to celebrate it with two English friends who joined us. This year, when I sat down to enjoy my turkey with my own family, I remembered the curiosity and wariness our English friends as they tried their first piece of pumpkin pie.

When second semester came around I was far more confident. I truly felt the benefit of a year abroad when I returned to Bath, with five other full-year students, and saw the look of anxiety and uncertainty on the faces of the fifty new ASEers. It was such a relief to know where I was going, what coins I needed to pay for a soda, and which pubs to stay away from. I was comfortable in my surroundings (or as much as one can be in a foreign country) and ready to explore more of England and the rest of Europe.

And then it happened: foot and mouth disease. Not only did I go four months without a steak or a burger, but much of the travel within and from England was restricted. I was fortunate enough to be able to travel to Scotland, Ireland, France, Spain and Italy, but in most places I was subjected to disinfection mats and strict customs inspection. Traveling within England we all got used to seeing funeral pyres of cows, pigs and sheep from the train windows.

Before I start to give the impression that my year in Bath was all about dead animals, pubs, and exposing English people to American desserts, I will say that I did my fair share of work. While the administration and the professors from ASE understood that a large part of our abroad experience revolved around travel and experiencing the culture, I still feel like I came out of the program with an education that I might never have been exposed to had I not chosen to go to Bath.

This is not to imply that I haven't gotten an incredibly valuable education here at Bucknell, I have, but being able to experience what you learn and be taught in a new and different way makes your education unique. Most of the professors who work for ASE are from the many universities located in Oxford, England (one thing we learned is that there is no Oxford University, there is University College, and others located in the city of Oxford-of course no one told us this until everyone had bought souvenir t-shirts that had "Oxford University" written on them).

When I took a class in Shakespeare, during my first semester, my class traveled to London to visit the Globe Theater and saw his plays performed by the Royal Shakespeare Company on Straford-upon-Avon. During my Tales of Victorian Ghosts and Ghouls class, second semester, we again traveled to London to follow the trail of Jack the Ripper. When I took a class about the works of Jane Austen, my first semester, I also became an intern for the Jane Austen Centre in Bath, where I got to meet people from all over the world as well as work alongside English people. Ironically, I also found out that during her short residence in Bath, Jane Austen actually disliked the city very much.

All in all I feel extremely fortunate to have had the opportunity to spend a year being part of another culture. I had so rarely been in situations where I was the foreigner. At the risk of pointing out the obvious, the world is so much bigger than Bucknell, than our country. For as much as I saw and heard and generally experienced, I realized there is that much more out there that I have yet to know. I will never regret coming to Bucknell, and I will always look upon it fondly, but I will also never regret leaving its comforts and familiarity for a year of my life to see what else is out there.

ROTC remains unaffected by attacks

By Katy Zachry
Senior Writer

One of the most widespread concerns that plagued Americans after the tragedy of Sept. 11 was the idea that our stable, unbreakable superpower was going to war.

To many, the prospect of going to war was not as threatening as the concern for who would fight in that war. This anxiety was felt from our country's leaders to students who were enrolled in their college's ROTC program.

For those individuals already involved our national security, this apprehensive attitude was both pervasive and rampant. Numerous Army bases throughout the country have modified their programs since the attacks in New York City and Washington, D.C. on Sept. 11 and its aftermath.

However, on a local level, the University's ROTC program has not seen any changes or modifications to its agenda.

"The curriculum is mandated by U.S. Army Cadet Command, and they have made no revisions to the program," said Dan Brillhart '02, a Cadet and ROTC Cadet Battalion Commander.

"However, the Cadre (officers and enlisted persons who are instructors) have opened their doors to any Cadets (individuals with military training) with concerns about the incidents, and they have attempted to answer Cadets' questions as best they can," Brillhart said.

It is understood that those involved in ROTC on campus are first and foremost students, but the fact that there has been no change to their military training is surprising to some.

"Of all areas on campus, I thought the ROTC program would be most drastically affected in terms of changes made to its program. It just seemed likely that their training would be modified so it corresponded with the current efforts of the U.S. Army," Brandi Herman '02 said.

While many outside of the program are surprised at the lack of modification in the curriculum, those within the program do not see this as a problem.

Emily Rentschler '03, an ROTC Cadet, does not view a change in training as an issue.

"I don't really think that it's a big deal that there weren't any changes made to the curriculum. After all, we are always learning and preparing for conflict and combat. Whether there is a horrible tragedy that calls us to action or just a conflict somewhere, we have to be prepared the same way and be able to react with the same knowledge," Rentschler said.

Others in the program embody similar attitudes. Jenny Schlack '03, also a Cadet, recognizes why different measures haven't been taken over the past couple of months.

"I understand in a way because the Cadre members have a duty to teach us how to become officers, and they only have four years to do so," said Schlack. "This is a pretty big job, plus our teachers only know what CNN broadcasts to the general public, so it's not as if they have any different insights in what is being done tactically, nor are they able to make predictions."

The University's ROTC program consists of 15 Cadets, or students who make a four-year commitment to the program while they are in college. Students enrolled in ROTC during their college years are not considered part of the Army. Individuals simply take an ROTC class that is viewed as a regular college elective. It is a credited class, but the program is unique in that Cadets are provided with both classroom and "hands on" experience.

After college, Cadets are required to fulfill their active duty, which is the time when they are assigned to a specific branch of the Army for a certain number of years after graduation.

"Nationwide there are tens of thousands of Cadets," Brillhart said. "The Bison Battalion currently has approximately 80 Cadets enrolled at five colleges."

The University is the host school of the Bison Battalion, with its Cadets joining others from Susquehanna University, Bloomsburg University, Lycoming College and Penn Tech.

When asked if the attacks of Sept. 11 enlisted any fear, apprehension, or reservations about being a part of ROTC, Schlack said she was forced to consider the reality of the situation.

"I wouldn't say that it made me scared to go into the Army; however, the attacks made the commitment that I made to my country more real. I am most definitely ready to finish ROTC here at Bucknell and move on to my active duty commitment," Schlack said.

Rentschler shared Schlack's sense of urgency, remarking that the attacks "made everything a little more real."

"The situation made me very proud to be an American and to be a future member of the military so that I would be able to serve my country," Rentschler said.

ROTC not only offers students the opportunity to eventually represent their country in a powerful cause, but their time enrolled in the curriculum is a powerful source for learning life-long skills.

"Being a Cadet in ROTC has taught me time management and responsibility for myself and others. I have gained a wealth of leadership skills and opportunities," Schlack said.

To date, our nation's leaders and armed forces are continuing their efforts with Operation Enduring Freedom. The idea that we are a country ready and willing to fight for our nation's principles still looms in the minds of many. However, we should take comfort in knowing that we have such devoted and committed individuals willing to make this cause their own.

"The main focus of ROTC is to encourage leadership, and responsibility, especially as they relate to the seven Army values: Loyalty, Duty, Respect, Selfless Service, Honor, Integrity and Personal Courage," Brillhart said.

WVBU serves community

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Senior Writer

If you have ever wanted to have your voice heard not only throughout the University community but also in the surrounding area one of the best and most interesting ways is to become involved with the University's radio station: WVBU.

WVBU, found at 90.5 FM, is the University's entirely student run radio station with the only exception of Todd Fogel, the professional engineer for the station. The station plays a variety of music and features different radio shows hosted by students.

Craig Laskowski '02, the station manager, feels that WVBU reaches a very large and diversified audience.

"In addition to listeners on campus we know we have a very strong audience in the community. Most people outside the University don't even realize that we are a college station because of the great efforts we have made towards making the station sound very professional," Laskowski said.

One of WVBU's main goals for the future is to work on making the station sound even more professional in efforts to further increase their off campus listener base.

WVBU has a large variety of radio shows and DJs. One of the best things about the station is that anyone can become involved and become a DJ. The present DJs differ in the type of music they play and the basic premises of their shows.

David Meilleur '04, hosts an eclectic rock show, entitled "The War Room" with Joshua Tepley '04, that airs on Saturday nights from 11 p.m. to 2 a.m.

"I decided to become invoived with WVBU because music has always been a favorite hobby of mine. Having a college radio show seemed like a good way to put my extensive collection of music to use and to maybe turn some people on to music they may not have heard before," Meilleur said.

Meilleur's would also like to see the station reach a much wider audience that it already does.

"I'd like to see more DJ's at WVBU with a wider range of programming. I think college radio is cool because it had the freedom to play music that falls outside the pressures of the large, corporate realm," Meilleur said. "It would be great to see WVBU diversify its programming to an even greater extent so that is can take full advantage of this opportunity to support artistic integrity."

Nathan Patterson '05, enjoys the fact that working at the University radio station enables him to speak to the community.

"Personally, I enjoy being able to reach the entire campus with whatever is on my mind. I hope to build a large listener base, while keeping the personal attention on the students," Patterson said.

Patterson's career as a DJ began with his dissatisfaction with local radio stations.

"I co-DJ with my roommate, Adam Clark '05. We decided to do a show mainly because there aren't really any great stations around here. We play a variety of music, from classic rock to techno to songs by the Muppets," Patterson said. "We try to incorporate all this together with guests, contests and other wacky ideas. We just want to offer the University and the surrounding areas a show they can get good music from while enjoying the DJs."

Management 101 students design business and management strategies.

By Katie Michaels
Contributing Writer

Often suggested to be "the best class at Bucknell", Management 101's companies have once again completed a semester of organizing and operating student-run businesses.

The sales of each company are only a small aspect of the lasting experience of this class.

Beginning with simple get-to-know-yous and ice breakers, we chose a service and business project, elected a CEO and Executive Board and distributed positions through a job fair. It is the responsibility of each company to organize its own structure and positions. I was involved with Company A, "A Different Beat," which marketed and sold the Bucknell Tank Top, a sleeveless designed t-shirt offered in gray or white.

"A Different Beat" consisted of five separate divisions, including Service, Business, Human Resources, Finance, Reports and Information Systems, each led by an individual vice president. The experience shared by the members of "A Different Beat" revealed real-life business problems and decisions which affected the entire company's success.

In order to receive the loan approval to fund each company, group members presented their ideas to a panel of stakeholders, consisting of faculty, students and alumnae. Although Company A's service idea, a week of overnight volunteering followed by a Saturday of physical renovations, was approved graciously, the business plan, the Bucknell tank tops, did not pass so easily.

The Business Division lacked a strong supplier, a sample shirt, color and size ideas as well as advertising and selling plans. This was the first of many setbacks that alerted members of the company, forcing them to get their plans in gear. During the second presentation to the stakeholders, the Business Division arrived prepared and the project was successfully approved.

Next, the company faced the "Beater" name controversy. Many students believed that the best name for our product was "The BU Beater" because of its similarity to the so-called "beater" tank tops worn to the gym and to athletic events.

After intense class discussion and the advice of Janice Butler of the Women's Resource Center, the class agreed to name the shirt "the Bucknell Tank Top" in order to avoid unnecessary criticism from outside stakeholders. This decision proved to be beneficial to the image of the company considering the fact that it was raising money for a local charity.

After several weeks of heated debates and pressured deadlines, the week of service at Haven Ministry provided a necessary change of pace to the company. Although each of us averaged 15 hours of service apiece, the experience improved company morale as students interacted in a new setting and worked with the less fortunate, learning to appreciate their own lives.

Every night from Nov. 5 through Nov. 9, five company members worked at Haven Ministry from 5:30 p.m. to 5:30 a.m. They served dinner, played with the children and organized supply closets.

During the later evening, each group cleaned and prepped a bedroom to be painted on Saturday. Around 11 p.m., they had free time to do homework, watch a movie or sleep. The following morning they were awoken by the director and returned to campus, tired yet fulfilled from the event.

The week culminated on Nov. 10, when 23 members of "A Different Beat" returned to the facility to paint three bedrooms as well as the large common room. Students were assigned to rooms, given supplies and instructions, and the renovations were completed by mid-afternoon.

Strong cooperation and coordination between the Service Division and the directors at Haven Ministry led to an incredibly effective and successful service week.

Following the completion of its service project, Company A began its tank top sales. In the first day of selling, one third of the product quickly sold, however, after a few days, not enough shirts were sold to break even with the costs. The CEO encouraged sales throughout Thanksgiving break, and "A Different Beat" managed to promote its product and reach a level of profitability.

With over $350 to donate to Haven Ministry, the company presented its final oral report on Nov. 29. A Management 101 requirement for each company, this presentation depicts the story behind each business.

No two companies are alike; each walks away with different experiences in and out of the classroom. However, the leadership displayed throughout the semester taught us lessons about business and life, forming close bonds within each company.

Habitat for Humanity plans Bucknell House

By Alyson Walker
Senior Writer

Maybe you noticed the group of people sleeping outside of the Langone Center over Homecoming Weekend. Did you know who they were or why they were sleeping out in the cold?

This group is Habitat for Humanity, and the function of this sleep out was to demonstrate an important point to the University community. Habitat for Humanity members slept in cardboard boxes to raise the awareness about substandard housing, as well as for fundraising purposes.

The purpose of Habitat for Humanity is to eliminate substandard housing by building adequate homes.

Habitat for Humanity has been an established University organization for the past six years. During those six years, it has created ties with the affiliate chapters of Union/Snyder, Northumberland, Williamsport and Harrisburg Habitat for Humanity programs.

The organization has also been active in the Collegiate Challenge program of Habitat for Humanity International, traveling during spring break to different local affiliates around the United States. The group has traveled to Birmingham, Ala., Franklin, W. Va., Boston, Mass., Wheeling, W. Va. and Lynchburg, Va.

This semester, Habitat for Humanity has been building with affiliate chapters, consisting of trips to Harrisburg almost every weekend. The group will be traveling to the hills in Beattyville, Ky., over spring break.

The members of Habitat for Humanity are not content in simply helping to end substandard housing in other communities. Presently, the group is actively fundraising to gather funding to build a University-sponsored house in Union/Snyder County.

"The house was a direct response to the question students often ask of 'When can I go and build?'" said Brian Stadinski '02, co-president of Habitat for Humanity.

Most of the Habitat for Humanity chapters in this area do not build during the school year. However, because the houses are typically completed in August, which allows the families to have children begin the school year in the appropriate school district.

The house would be a joint project between the University and the Union/Snyder affiliate chapters. A meeting last spring with Theodore Chappen, president of the Union/Snyder chapter and also a University alumnus, determined that if the University chapter could raise $20,000 of the $50,000 cost of a house in this area, the Union/Snyder chapter would provide the remainder.

This amount might seem like an impossibility, but it is certainly not enough to discourage the members of Habitat for Humanity. The University chapter has risen to the challenge and through various fundraisers has already raised $3,000.

"I am excited about the growth and enthusiasm of the group," Stadinski said.

With inventive and creative fundraising techniques, Habitat for Humanity will be working hard to reach their goal of $20,000. The group is excited and enthusiastic, especially the new officers.

"The new officers are definitely the reason why Habitat has been so successful this past year," Stadinski said.

Different fundraisers have included the sleep out, the sponsoring of a contestant in the Mr. Bucknell Pageant and the "Popsicle Stick House." The "Popsicle Stick House" allows people who make donations to have their names on a Popsicle stick that is then glued to the frame of a house, representing the future University-funded house.

The group also met with two of the University Trustees, who were pleased with the organization and offered them support. Habitat for Humanity also received a grant of $1,000 from the Pennsylvania Association of Student Councils.

The profits from Phi Gamma Delta's Luigi Fuji also will be given to the University House.

Future fundraising events are planned. Next week, the group will be accepting donations for the house, but not in the traditional way. With a donation, people can buy specific items for the house, such as a box of nails, a certain amount of roof shingles or even a wall. These items can then be given as gifts to their friends and families.

Band concert features patriotic tunes

By Grace Annis
Staff Writer

With Thanksgiving Break fast approaching, many students were in their rooms finishing up last minute work or were out celebrating. Others were performing or attending the University Symphonic Band concert conducted by Dr. William Kenny Nov. 17.

The Symphonic Band, consisting of about 70 musicians, performed a selection of works by composers ranging from famous to relatively unknown composers. Several of the works performed were patriotic or incorporated patriotic themes, providing a timely and appropriate musical program enjoyed by all.

The first piece in the program was "American Pageant" by Thomas Knox. It featured patriotic songs including "America," "Yankee Doodle," "Battle Hymn of the Republic," "Dixie," "America, the Beautiful" and "Columbia, Gem of the Ocean." The brass and wind sections were very strong in this piece, which strung together all of these patriotic songs in a moving tribute to our country.

Following was Pavel Tschesnokoff's "Salvation is Created," a beautiful piece featuring the winds at the beginning, with brass gradually taking over. The percussion in this piece was also featured, building to a powerful crescendo towards the end of the piece.

Robert Russell Bennett's contemporary "Suite of Old American Dances" was the third piece in the program. Bennett, who scored Broadway musicals, chose a very broad selection of dance genres for the piece, from Waltz to Rag. It was a lively addition to the program and featured the brass and wind sections.

The fourth selection in the performance was Pieter Leemans's "March of the Belgian Parachutists." Kenny described this piece as "a delightful, quirky little march."

Gordon Jacob's "Fantasia on an English Folk Song" followed. Starting out slowly and picking up in the middle, the composition featured the low brass and winds. It contained some exciting tempo changes, going from jubilant to more subdued and then picking up again.

Following intermission, the concert began again with "Second Suite in F for Military Band." The composer, Gustav Holst, most famous for his work "The Planets," intended the piece for a small military band. In keeping with Holst's original intention, the performers on stage were a smaller group of band members. The piece featured low brass and winds, with solos by clarinetist Alyson Walker '04.

Next, the entire band returned to perform Frank Ticheli's 1999 work "Vesuvius," inspired by the eruption of Mt. Vesuvius in 79 A.D. The composition, with an air of doom, featured the brass and percussion.

The final selection of the night was Charles Ives's "Old Home Days," a suite of random pieces incorporating some familiar tunes, including "Auld Lang Syne" and "London Bridge is Fallen Down." This varied assortment of songs made for a fine finale to this superb concert.

Holiday season brings new movies

Many different types of movies to hit theaters in coming month

By Kristi Johnston
A&E Layout Editor

The holiday season is officially in full swing, and that means that dozens of big movies will soon be coming our way. Some will undoubtedly make those weekends over break a little less boring, while others will make us wish we'd never set foot in the theater. In any case, variety is key this year.

Recently released "Black Knight" stars Martin Lawrence as a regular guy who is thrust into Medieval times. He soon finds himself in the midst of a plot to overthrow the king (in large part due to his newfound friendship with a beautiful handmaiden). While there won't be any Oscar hopefuls in this cast, "Black Knight" is slated to be the comic relief we all could use about now.

Also just released is "Spy Game" starring Robert Redford and Brad Pitt. The combination of these actors alone is said to make seeing the movie worthwhile. Pitt plays a spy who is arrested by the Chinese government. He relies on his mentor (Redford) to rescue him. Throughout the process, we see glimpses of the past relationship between the two characters.

Pitt will also be gracing the movie screen this season in "Ocean's Eleven," which also stars Hollywood heavyweights George Clooney, Matt Damon, Andy Garcia and Julia Roberts. Clooney plays Danny Ocean, who teams up with several associates to rob three casinos. "Ocean's Eleven" is nothing like the original 1960 version, though its comic elements make it just the right blend of a sound story and an outstanding cast.

In "Kate and Leopold," Meg Ryan plays Kate, a woman who falls for a handsome nobleman (Hugh Jackman). The only problem? He's from the 19th century. When he is finally able to return to his own time, he has been inured into modern culture—including Kate. Look for great chemistry between Ryan and Jackman, but guys, beware—this is definitely a chick flick.

"The Lord of the Rings: The Fellowship of the Ring" is first in a movie trilogy of fantastic proportions, and is one of the most-anticipated films of the season. Elijah Wood plays a hobbit who sets out with his friends to destroy a ring that belongs to a dark lord. Adventure and intrigue follow him throughout his journey. Also starring in this movie are Ian McKellan, Liv Tyler, Cate Blanchett and Sean Austin.

Martin excels in music programs

Senior music major has list of impressive achievements in vocal music

By Andrew Clugston
Staff Writer

Amalia Martin (affectionately known by many as "Mollie"), is a senior music major who actively contributes to the University music scene through a variety of organizations and activities, such as the Rooke Chapel Choir and the Bucknell Opera Company. Upon entering the University, this was not her plan.

"I originally came here thinking I would major in business as well ... so much for that!" Martin said. "When I asked myself what I really wanted to do for the rest of my life, music and song were lying at the heart of my aspirations."

The road towards a successful, professional music career requires strong determination, solid self-discipline, talent and exposure. At 21, Martin has already integrated all four of these requirements and enjoys every aspect of the work.

"Music is the most perfect thing that exists in the world because any emotion can be expressed or evoked through this phenomenon," she said. "So it deserves our time, our energy, our everything."

A protege of voice professor Catherine Payne, Martin's talent has developed into a rich and beautiful mezzo-soprano (the voice level between soprano and contralto).

"Bucknell was the perfect match for me," Martin said. "It provided an alternative to my original career plan in business, and I found the high quality of training I needed. The advantage with this school is that I get the personal attention hard to come by in a large university, and a excellent liberal arts education I would not find at a conservatory." In addition to voice lessons, Martin is supplementing her career potential with classes in foreign languages. She is taking classes in French, German and Italian—all of which are popular languages in the operatic world.

Her hard work is paying off, allowing her to accumulate a list of impressive achievements. The summer after her sophomore year, Martin sang for the College Light Opera Company, one of the most intense but satisfying musical experiences in which she performed nine operas over nine weeks. She performed for world-renowned mezzo-sopranos such as Fredericka Von Stade and Blanch Thebom from the Metropolitan Opera, receiving positive acclaim. Most recently, she was awarded second place in the prestigious National Association for Teachers of Singing competition.

When asked what inspires her singing, Martin does not hesitate to answer.

"I don't do it for the applause," she said. "I do it because I have a desire to move people, to touch the lives of those who listen."

Strong in her faith, Martin's religious convictions underlie much of her actions within and beyond music.

"Christianity is a fundamental part of my everyday existence," she said. "I believe in sharing my voice with others because that is where I believe God is leading me."

Recent alumnus Jeff Leeman '00 recently wrote a piece for Martin which will be featured in this year's Candle Light Festival in Rooke Chapel, where she will be singing with the Rooke Chapel Choir.

"Monsters, Inc." is hilarious and endearing

John Goodman and Billy Crystal provide voices for latest Disney-Pixar feature

By Krista Reisdorf
A&E Editor

Remember the times when you were a kid and you tried to convince Mom and Dad that there were monsters in your closet? You had never actually seen one, but they were in there somewhere—huge, hulking monsters that would scare you senseless. But what if you had known that those same monsters were actually scared of you?

Disney-Pixar's newest computer-animated cartoon, "Monsters, Inc.," explores the world of the monsters that lurk behind your closet door. "Monsters, Inc." is a business in the monster world where employees earn their living by capturing their source of energy—the screams of human children. However, there's a catch: it is said that if a monster has contact with anything human (even a sock), he or she is doomed. The film continues with many amusing incidences as a human child accidentally crosses over to the monster world, posing a threat to all monster life.

John Goodman is the voice of Sully, the large and intimidating monster who triumphs as the best scream-collector in the biz. He is also the one who first encounters and then protects the young human girl, Boo, who is in the monster world. His sidekick and best friend is Mike Wazowski, a much smaller and less intimidating one-eyed monster, played by the voice of Billy Crystal. The friendship between these two is both hilarious and endearing. Other cast members include Steve Buscemi as the villainous Randall who tries to capture Boo for his own evil plan, and Jennifer Tilly as Celia, Mike's main squeeze.

The idea behind "Monsters, Inc." is ingenious. Disney conjured up a way to help children get over their "monster-in-the-closet fears" by showing that the monsters are actually terrified of the children. The film is uniquely funny, following in the shining footsteps of the "Toy Story" movies and "A Bug's Life." It also pulls at the heartstrings as Mike and Sully begin to become attached to Boo, who is undoubtedly the cutest computer-animated child ever.

If you feel the need to take a child to a movie this Christmas, or if you want to squelch your own fears of monsters in the closet, "Monsters, Inc." is the way to go.

Krull leads students in "Gutterballs"

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

Gutterballs—isn't that how we all feel our life is going sometimes? Like we just bowled a gutter ball in the 10th frame and the preceding nine frames weren't much better?

"Gutter Balls," an original musical written and directed by guest artist and Adjunct Professor Jackie Krull '83, is about the main character, Janet, changing through a series of trying events revolving around her bowling league.

The play spans a period of time from 1973 to 1986, during which the audience is introduced to Janet's friends, Mindy and Craig. Krull said the show is "poignant" and the score includes a variety of styles, from jazz to blues to gospel to pure musical theater. Krull wrote the libretto, lyrics and music and drew largely from her own experiences during the late '70s and early '80s.

"It's been very gratifying to hear my music and script performed by such a talented and enthusiastic group of students, particularly as I honed my craft of musical theatre at Bucknell from 1979-1983," she said.

J.C. Whittaker '02 also plays a large role in the production, assisting in the composition of two numbers and playing a variety of instruments in the orchestra pit. Other integral contributors are Lacy Gonzalez '04, doubling as cast member and stage manager, and Theresa Newhard '04, participating both as ensemble member and choreographer.

The ensemble piece, developed throughout the fall semester using a workshop model, utilized University students' talents in music, theater and dance. Most of the songs and scenes were written based on the students' strengths and insightful input. The collaboration of all involved parties was vital in pulling off the show. Krull said the cast is remarkable, especially because of their "enthusiasm for the work and their team spirit."

This showcase performance, sponsored by the University's Department of Theater and Dance, will premiere Nov. 30 and Dec. 1 at 8 p.m. and Dec. 2 at 2 p.m. in Larison Dining Hall. General Admission tickets are $1. Doors open 30 minutes prior to each performance. For further information, please contact Chris Fry at 570-577-1235 between 9 a.m. and 5 p.m., Monday through Friday.

Newman House vandalized

By Jen Jenchura
Senior Writer

A cross was uprooted from the yard of Newman House last Thursday, home of Father Martin Moran and the University's Catholic Campus Ministry (CCM).

The vandalism occurred in the early hours of the morning while several downtown parties occurred. Later that morning, the cross was found unearthed. Because of the weight of the cross, it is suspected that more than one person was responsible.

"We found it completely uprooted and tossed over. This was a huge task considering that the cross has a large cement base holding it in the ground," said Moran. "I want people to have fun, but when something like this occurs, it's crossing the line."

The white marble cross served as a remembrance of a former University student who was killed by another University student driving under the influence of alcohol.

It is unclear if the vandals were associated with the downtown parties or if the incident was motivated by religious intolerance. There are currently no suspects in the investigation.

"It's hard to believe the vandalism was a random act of violence when there were several other non-religious objects in the backyard of Newman House," Moran said.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro speculates that the incident might have been an attempt to be "deliberately hurtful from a group expressing bigotry." He also reminds the community that no one should jump to conclusions about the vandals.

Rogers' leadership matures over first year at University

By Andrew Burr
News Editor

Transferring from one institution to another is never easy. Adjusting to a new environment and leaving behind friends, memories, a familiar lifestyle, even your favorite restaurant, can be a cruel and difficult process.

At least one particular transferee, however, has made himself an exception to that rule.

Coming to the University along with the Class of 2004 last August, he shared the same cautious optimism and excitement as many of those students. His stay at South Carolina's Clemson University had been wonderful, but like other new members of this University, he was looking for a new challenge—a new frontier to conquer.

But while he faced many of the same emotions and fears of his incoming class, a few things distinguished him from the normal University freshman.

For instance, as far as first-year students are concerned, his class-load was curiously light, although his workload was curiously heavy. He would not be living in a traditional freshman dorm either—his new home was instead located on Loomis Street, along with his new garage, patio and lawn. His roommate, in contradiction to the University's usual policy of single-gender room assignments, was his wife Athena.

And instead of listening to President Stefen H. Rogers' Inauguration Speech on Oct. 29, 2000 with the rest of the campus, he delivered it.

President Rogers begins his fourth semester at the University after winter recess.

Though Rogers was still a stranger then to most members of the University community, his speech that afternoon opened with words attesting the warm and welcoming personality that faculty and students have come to expect from him.

"I feel a little like that old line in the John Denver song, 'Rocky Mountain High'; I'm coming home to a place I've never been before," he said. "I'm coming home to Bucknell."

Now in his sophomore year, Rogers still insists the strangest part of his presidency was how comfortable he felt the first time he entered campus.

"The chemistry was so positive—it was a wonderful, powerful feeling," he said. "Athena and I were in our car and we drove around campus five or six times because it felt so right. We were both at home here since day one."

In less than three full academic semesters, Rogers' presidency has already been tested with challenges both small and great. From having to drop two male varsity athletic programs to the unparalleled chaos and consternation of Sept. 11, Rogers has surprised the community with leadership skills far more mature than his short time here might indicate.

According to Rogers, the University's decision to eliminate the wrestling program and re-classify the crew program was "not something I relished doing in my first year here. It was unfortunate that the University's five-year plan to become Title IX compliant culminated in the decision-making process

Parking petition makes way to administration

By Brad Clemens
Staff Writer

Morgan Lloyd '03 responded to a campus-wide concern about parking by drafting a petition that called for reform to the present parking situation. Concerns from fellow students, specifically with reference to safety and the disappearance of parking spaces as a result of construction, prompted Lloyd to make her opinion on parking heard.

"As a female student at Bucknell, I know what it is like to have to park on the other side of the campus and then have to worry about my personal safety while walking home in the dark," Lloyd said.

Lloyd received 300 supporting signatures on her petition. The majority of the signatures came from members of Greek organizations, who passed the petition around during weekly chapter meetings.

"The petition specifically addresses the lack of safe, convenient parking, especially for those students who live uphill," Lloyd said.

While institutions across the country have problems with parking, University students and faculty here agree that cars are much more of a preferred mode of transportation here as compared to other schools.

"Our transportation culture at Bucknell is centered around driving," Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said.

According to Ferraro, the large

University budget's future looks positive

By Jason Rubinstein
Associate Editor

The University has been carefully monitoring its budget and endowment because of the current economic slowdown. Fluctuations in the stock market have been met with proportional fluctuations in the endowment, but have not had a significant effect on the budget.

Four and a half percent of the endowment is used to offset the operating budget. This figure is calculated using a 12-quarter rolling average. Therefore, the budget has not been as significantly affected by the economy.

A large portion of the endowment is invested in equities and stocks, which are managed by the Investment Committee. Fund managers are expected to compete with the Standard and Poor's 500, and have decided, due to the current economic conditions, to take a long-term approach investments will primarily be stocks as opposed to bonds and treasuries.

"Fund managers are doing very strong in relation to their peers," Vice President for Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema said. "They are doing what they need to do to maintain the integrity of the endowment."

Dining Services prepares Bison for spring changes

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

Students are enjoying more options at venues in the Bison recently.

By Sandi-Jo Galati

As the end of the semester approaches, students who regularly eat at the Bison have expressed concern over the closing of Bostwick Dining Hall after spring break, which may cause excessive crowding in the Bison.

"The Bison is the best alternative to the caf," Matt Baker '05 said. "Unfortunately, you often can't eat there because it is so crowded."

Despite assurances that the Terrace Room and Larison Dining Hall will be able to accommodate students who would normally eat in Bostwick, students are still skeptical of this transitional period and its effect on the Bison.

"I think that there will be too many people still trying to eat in the LC with the caf closing," Adam Turbett '04 said. "The Bison is the obvious choice of where to go because people know of it already. They have been there and enjoy it, so why would they take a chance anywhere else?"

In response to such concerns, Dining Services will be utilizing cafeteria staff members to work at the Bison and other eating locations on campus to improve efficiency. Dining Services will be enhancing the menus of the other eating locations on campus in hopes that students will be drawn to the other alternatives.

"We think that students will be surprised with what the variety will be in Larison and the Terrace Room and with what the choices would be," said Tim Tenon, director of Dining Services. "Hopefully not everyone is going to want to go to only one location."

Pending administrative approval, Dining Services is planning to move forward with a proposal supported by the Dean's Office to offer a limited dining option uphill, which will hopefully contribute to decreasing crowds at the other majority of students use their cars so often.

"Parking should reflect that transportation culture," Ferraro said.

The administration has been responsive to Lloyd's petition by setting up a meeting between herself, Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock, members of Bucknell Student Government and Public Safety.

"These are important legitimate issues and I'm glad they're being brought up," Ferraro said. "The administration is looking at ways to try to improve the condition."

Concerns that the administration will face while trying to deal with creating better parking include "how to maximize parking spaces while preserving both the Green and safety," according to Ferraro, who encourages students to look at the parking situation with an open mind.

"Of course we just create more parking lots, but who wants to walk on concrete everywhere he or she goes," he said. "The decision on how to remedy the parking situation must reconcile the variety of parking interests, including the concerns of faculty and students."

Lloyd said that her petition had accomplished her first goal, which was getting the administration to address the problem. Now that her main concern has been addressed, she only hopes that administration won't just "put up more lighting to compensate for safety and forget the rest of the problem."

New organization looks to improve town-gown relations

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

Outgoing Borough Council President Yvonne Morgan and Borough residents Ken LeVan, Paul Mauger and Matthew Kasdan '03 met on Monday to discuss a new organization that will deal with town-gown relations.

In the past, the Coalition of Bucknell and Lewisburg Residents (COBLR) dealt with these issues, but according to Morgan, COBLR was a "tea and cookie" group. She would like the new organization help town-gown relations in a more effective manner.

Although a specific number of members for this organization, as well as a name, has not yet been decided, likely members would be student residents, permanent residents, a member of the Bucknell Student Government Community Affairs Committee and both Greek and non-Greek students.

Kasdan also believes it would be beneficial for Ward III Borough Council members Judy Wagner and Peter Bergonia to be on the committee because they are also representing a large number of students.

LeVan, Chairman of the Historical Architectural Review Board (HARB), enjoys having students in town. According to LeVan, he knows it is September when he starts to see students running in Lewisburg.

Morgan also feels that students living off campus is a good thing, and therefore relations need to improve.

According to Morgan, this new organization will help residents talk to students, as Mauger, member of the Zoning Hearing Board, currently does.

"All of us recognize that there isn't enough communication with the residents," Morgan said.

Although Kasdan believes that communication can still be improved, he feels that Election Day was a step in the right direction. According to Kasdan, residents were talking to him on Election Day, although they do not normally talk to their own neighbors.

"Just by them talking to me, it helped to break down walls," Kasdan said.

> "Right now there is a difference in lifestyles and it needs to be mediated.
> —Matthew Kasdan '03

Both Kasdan and Mauger agree that the different lifestyles between students and other residents is a source of many problems.

"Right now there is a difference in lifestyles and it needs to be mediated," Kasdan said.

Mauger, a resident of South Fourth Street, believes that problems often stem from areas that are composed of mainly permanent residents.

"There has to be an understanding of not only hours, but also the type of neighborhood you're in," Mauger said.

Another concern that this organization hopes to deal with is the relationship between student residents and their landlords. According to Mauger, landlords often do not give necessary information to students, and there are sometimes problems with absentee landlords.

According to Mauger, students do not have to put up with problems from landlords.

"It seems like a big mystery to students that they can go back to their landlords," Mauger said.

Aside from improving the situation with landlords, this new organization expects to influence ordinances and their creation.

According to Kasdan, there should be equal input from all residents for the development of ordinances.

Morgan echoes Kasdan's idea.

"We want to see fair ordinances for all residents," Morgan said.

Another possible goal of the organization is to try to get a non-voting student representative on Council, if the motion is not passed in the Dec. 18 meeting. The idea of a non-voting student representative will be presented at the Council work session on Dec. 11, and Kasdan will present the idea at the Dec. 18 meeting.

According to Morgan, the organization will lobby on the student's behalf if needed.

"Matthew and the students have shown a strong interest in the community. Matthew came very close to achieving his goals," Morgan said.

The first meeting of this organization is tentatively scheduled for Jan. 28. Anyone interested in joining should call Morgan (523-6133), Mauger (523-9528) or Kasdan (577-8393).

this year. Each step of the way, alternatives and options were considered."

The events of Sept. 11 were truly a defining moment for the University, in ways that still probably have yet to be seen. To persevere through the crisis, all factions of Lewisburg—town residents as well as University administrators, students and faculty had to band together.

"We all talked about the Bucknell family," Rogers said, "but it was proven to be true that day. I felt very good about the positive response to me personally and the positive response the University is still receiving."

Indeed, in the days following Sept. 11, Rogers was one of the most visible figureheads at the University. His initiatives included keeping regularly scheduled classes available to students so as not to "leave them without a purpose," and creating the Crisis Response Team as well as a multitude of other support mechanisms for students and faculty. Rogers believes many of the new vice presidents assimilated so quickly into the University because of the total team effort put forth by students, faculty and administrators.

"I came to have a more full appreciation for the person behind the position during the events surrounding the Sept. 11 tragedy," said Vice President for Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema. "Over the years I have worked with many persons in positions of authority, and sadly, several of them would have 'delegated out' the responsibility for addressing this tragedy. Yet there was never a moment of hesitation on his part, never a waver or indecisive thought. It's easy to be smart, or courageous, or generous, or thoughtful when everything is going right. The real test of a person's character, though, is how they respond when things aren't going right, as with Sept. 11. He passed the 'test' with flying colors."

With the shock of Sept. 11 attacks just now beginning to subside, Rogers can shift his attention to an initiative he first mentioned Aug. 29 in his convocation speech called Vision 2010. Last year with many interim administrators, Rogers says, the start of such a project was not possible.

"We were about to launch Vision 2010 right around the time of Sept. 11," he said. "We've settled down a little bit from that now, and Vision 2010 is ready to be relayed to the appropriate committees and vice presidents for action.

"President Rogers has a vision for Bucknell that is inspiring and invigorating," said Lema. "As Vision 2010 takes shape, we'll see his vision take life."

According to Rogers, the current construction on campus was not specifically part of Vision 2010, but "addresses issues of overcrowding in dormitories and classrooms while fitting nicely into the process."

As far as the University's relationship with the town, which continues to serve as source of tension, Rogers believes the participation of students Mathew Kasdan '03 and Nate Sorber '02 in the most recent borough elections is a step in the right direction.

"In the end, both young men did a wonderful job and it was a positive for the University," he said. "I believe relations with the town are better now than when I arrived and I credit people on both sides for showing a willingness to make relations even better."

When asked if he felt there were any areas that had not excelled to his level of satisfaction in the past year, Rogers answered no.

"Honestly, my experiences here have all been positive," he said, "and I am looking forward to the future.

locations.

A modified concession trailer will give students the option of purchasing a bagel, beverage or snack using cash, declining balance and possibly meal credit. The trailer will be equipped with a microwave and a small grill so that limited hot food items can be offered.

In addition to overcrowding, students are questioning the effect that the closing of Bostwick might have on meal plan prices and meal credit availability in the Bison.

According to Tenon, meal plan prices will not increase from the fall '01 to spring '02 semester, nor are price increases of individual items in the Bison anticipated for next semester.

"What we are doing right now and what we have been asked to do by the vice president for finance and administration is to conduct a survey of other institutions to find out what their meal plan options are, what the requirements are for students and what the prices are," Tenon said. "That way we can have a broader comparison to share with students and families."

Dining Services follows a similar procedure by surveying other schools and also investigating the prices of local eating establishments before pricing individual items in the Bison.

The Bison is also hoping to extend meal credit hours next semester. In response to student petitioning this year, credit hours were extended to encompass the entire lunch hour.

"As a student with early morning classes, it is too inconvenient to go to the cafeteria when you are in a rush, so I go to the Bison," Turbett said. "I have to use declining balance to pay for the food because meal credit doesn't start until I am done with classes. Basically, it made me run out of declining really quickly."

Currently, Dining Services is responding to such complaints by implementing meal equivalencies during the early morning hours next summer, so credit hours will extend from early morning through the night. The Bison has no plans, however, to extend meal credit hours to encompass weekends.

"The whole process of meal equivalency was put in as a convenience for the students who may have had a difficult class schedule that did not come to Bostwick during the times that we were open for meals, Tenon said. "Because the institution does not hold classes on the weekends, there really hasn't been the need to expand that convenience."

Because the cash value of meal credits also will not increase next semester, Tenon is hoping to increase the variety of food in the Bison. Dining Services is currently implementing more food items to give students more options and to help students who pay with meal equivalencies to more efficiently utilize the allotted amount.

Throughout this semester, Dining Services has been testing promotional items at Pete's Arena, Subversions, Salsa Rico and Sky Ranch Grill, such as more bread choices at Subversions and moving all Rappz options to the main area of the Bison.

"We are not unwilling to change or consider new menu items, but sometimes because of the limited size and space of the facilities we have, there's only so many things we can do," Tenon said.

New selections to look for next semester include expanded specials and combos, new hot food items, such as fried and barbequed chicken and more additional pre-prepared items in the refrigerator.

In addition to fruit and yogurt smoothies, Dining Services is hoping to make ice cream available at the smoothie section next semester, as well as fresh baked cookies.

Above all, the Bison's objective is to accommodate its patrons.

"We are interested in what the students have to say, what they're looking for and how we can support them and make changes. We can't always do everything that they want but we do try to think about what some options might be and tweak some things," Tenon said.

pus Ministry are saddened and surprised by the vandalous acts.

"It is disheartening that members of the Bucknell community might vandalize a cross that is both a sign of many students' faith on campus and a memorial to a student who passed in a very tragic way," said CCM Co-President Herman Weimer '02.

Although the community is saddened, CCM members are supporting Moran and each other in dealing with the incident.

"My heart sank when I heard the horrible story; it was truly a terrible act that destroyed not only a crucifix but also a memorial for a fallen Bucknellian," said CCM member Joe Flutie '03. "I believe the good that came of this was an opportunity created for us to support Father Marty like he has supported us over the past few years."

Ferraro believes that although the incident is not a reflection of the community as a whole, it awakens us all to the need to be mindful of the religious diversity on campus.

"This reminds us of how respectful we should be of other people's beliefs and symbols, especially now when many religions are celebrating holidays. We have recognized the hurt and that we will not tolerate it. It is also important to remember that this incident is not emblematic of the Bucknell community," he said.

auxiliary income. These revenues account for 75 percent of the University's budget.

More than 80 percent of the budget's expenses are allocated to compensation, financial aid and other expenses. The budget line, titled "other expenses," are primarily the day-to-day expenses incurred by the various departments of the University. Allocations, which make up eight percent of the budget, are primarily for debt service, capital equipment, information technology and facilities. Debt service is similar to a mortgage payment, and the repayment is the "servicing" of the University's debt. This expense will be significant in upcoming years, and the budget has taken this into account.

"We have issued some bonds, which is similar to borrowing money, to pay for some major projects we have done, such as building dormitories and the utilities infrastructure project," Lema said.

Revenue that was budgeted, almost one-and-a-half million dollars for sponsored research, was in fact about two-and-a-half million dollars, or an 89 percent variance from budgeted to actual. Also notable is that compensation expenses were down approximately three percent, or two million dollars. This portion of the budget was underspent because of the savings in the support staff pension plan.

The financial plan will stay similar for fiscal year 2002, which begins July 1. Tuition, which currently accounts for 60 percent of the budget, will likely increase greater than the Consumer Price Index.

The University Committee for Planning and Budgeting makes a recommendation to University President Steffen Rogers about likely changes in tuition. However, the board of trustees has the final say in what it will be for next year, and a decision will probably be made by the end of the semester.

Overall, any lags experienced because of the stock market have not significantly affected the budget and Lema is happy with the current situation.

"We are doing a good job of rebounding from the low point in the market and I am confident that we will achieve our target," Lema said.

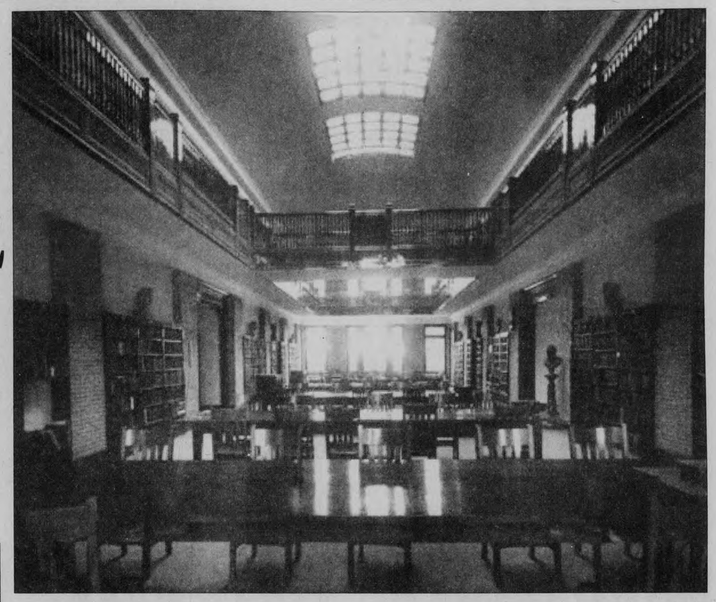
Catching up with Carnegie



Born out of the need for a new library and a generous $30,000 grant from Andrew Carnegie, what will become of the once proud and illustrious building?

It sits there, unassuming and yet so visible, occupying its own slice of the RTK Quad, on the east side of Seventh Street. As the home of the Geology Department, its days are numbered. The Department will move in the fall of 2002 from its current space into the enormous new O'Leary Center, currently under construction across the street. And, with the move, another chapter in this building's eclectic career will come to a close. However, the Carnegie Building's future remains questionable, even if its past is so rich and so important.

Ground was broken in June of 1904 for the University's new library. University President John Howard Harris was given the task by the Board of Trustees to look for funds for the library after it was determined that the current library in Roberts Hall was too small. Roberts, then the center of University life needed space and the library was a perfect candidate for a new facility. Harris decided to call on steel magnate and philanthropist Andrew Carnegie for funding. Plans and a request for $50,000 for the construction of the building were sent to Carnegie's foundation.

Carnegie responded with $30,000 for the construction of a new University library. The rest of the funding would come from other sources including the Board of Trustees. In short order, construction began, and on June 20, 1905, one of Andrew Carnegie's over 1,600 United States libraries was dedicated—Carnegie was an ardent believer in the importance of higher learning and access to research materials.

In its original incarnation, Carnegie was a beautiful building. A raised second floor gallery that overlooked the activity below surrounded the main floor. The ceiling contained many skylights that allowed much natural light to filter into the building. The stacks in the Carnegie Library held almost 150,000 volumes. They served the University until 1951 when the Ellen Clarke Bertrand Library opened for use.

That move of the library from Carnegie initiated a long and muddled process of change in the layout of the building's three floors and its list of tenants. There have been five major movements in and out of the Carnegie Building from 1951 until the present and there promises to be another major move in the coming year.

The first change Carnegie underwent was from library to center of numerous University administrative offices. Its first new tenants included the Alumni Association, the University switchboard and the Placement Office and Counseling Services. At the time, the student bookstore was also moved into Carnegie. To achieve this change, much of the interior of the building needed a renovation to allow for more office space and less general floor space that the library offered.

In 1960, more renovations came to the Carnegie Building when more offices were added to the building's upper floors. The University's Development Office was moved into the building while the Alumni Office and Counseling Services were moved out.

From 1961 to 1970, there were other comings and goings within the Carnegie Building and, in addition, the building received more renovations. The Geology and Geography Departments, as well as WVBU moved in. The Placement Office kept a small office on the third floor for job interviews.

With the opening of the Langone Center (then called the University Center), the Bookstore was moved out of Carnegie and down to its present home. That, followed by the move of the Geography Department, allowed the Geology Department to move into more space and expand the facilities it needed for instruction.

Finally, the Career Development Center moved to the Botany Building in 1992 and WVBU moved back to the basement or Roberts Hall, leaving the Geology Department as Carnegie's sole tenant.

Today the Carnegie Building stands as a shell of its former self, a heavily used and somewhat neglected facility. The Geology Department is watching as its new home—the O'Leary Center—is rising across Seventh Street. Next fall, the Department will move into the new building and leave Carnegie behind, relatively empty. For the first time in its long life, the Carnegie Building will not have a major tenant to call its own. However, there are many ideas for what the building will do in the future but few answers.

When asked what Carnegie would be used for, Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 said "I'm not sure there is any definitive answer on Carnegie's future just yet."

Director of Physical Plant Dennis Hawley '72 added on that theme. "The long-range plans for Carnegie are not set, other than it will continue as a part of the campus building inventory," said Hawley.

"The exact occupants of the space have as yet to be identified, but it will be used for academic offices and classrooms after a minor freshening up with some paint and carpet this summer if time permits after the Geology Department moves out."

Hardly living up to its original function as the University's library (as the names of people like Newton, Vergil, Dante, Milton and Franklin suggest), the Carnegie Building still stands today as one of the University's more historically significant buildings on campus. Occupying its space on Seventh Street for almost a century, Carnegie has a rich past and a promising future.

Non-voting seat could improve town-gown communication

Although Matthew Kasdan '03 lost the election, the possibility of having a student voice on the Borough Council has only been further pursued. Kasdan is now trying to have a non-voting student representative on the Council and will present the position at the Dec. 18 meeting.

Even though this was attempted last year by Matt Cole '01, The Bucknellian believes that Kasdan's strong efforts during the election and the Borough's increased awareness of town-gown issues will make this seat a likely possibility.

The Bucknellian feels that a non-voting seat will serve as a formal link between the students and the Borough Council, therefore increasing communication between permanent residents and students. This communication is key because students should know the concerns of the permanent residents. Also, the permanent residents need to be aware of students' problems.

As a representative, the student should bring students' concerns to the Council and also relay information from the Council to the students. If this is accomplished, both entities will be able to work together better.

A non-voting student representative will also give students a voice in issues concerning them. For example, when the Council voted on the noise ordinance, students did not have any input. Although the representative would not be allowed to vote, he or she would be able to voice an opinion and have the potential to influence Council members.

As it stands now, Peter Bergonia and Judy Wagner represent Ward III, where the majority of University students who live in the Borough reside. Although they may be aware of certain student issues, a student representative would be more cognizant of student issues because of the mere fact that he or she has more daily interaction with students.

Some residents are hesitant to have a non-voting student representative on the Council. They feel that if a University student is on Council, why shouldn't senior citizens or firefighters have a non-voting seat as well? Not only does the University add to the population of the Borough, but it is also a private institution that is part of a community in which its concerns are not being heard. The representative would help to break down this communication barrier.

Another aspect of this position that must be taken into consideration is who would choose the representative. The Bucknellian believes that the whole student body should vote and not just the Bucknell Student Government (BSG).

Although BSG technically represents the student body, many students feel as though BSG does not serve the student body effectively and efficiently. Even though we believe the whole student body should vote, BSG is very knowledgeable of town-gown issues and could potentially choose an appropriate representative.

Not only would a student body vote be the right way to elect a candidate, but the representative should be allowed to be any member of the student body, not necessarily a BSG member. A student not on BSG may have just as much or more knowledge and concern for town-gown relations as a BSG member.

The Bucknellian fully supports a non-voting student representative on the Council. Kasdan's initiative throughout the election process and the attention brought to town-gown relations were only a start to dealing with problem. A non-voting student representative could increase communication and therefore finally pave way toward improving relations.

Experience not most important quality

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

Last week's Bucknellian endorsed a candidate for Bucknell Student Government (BSG) president. The editorial board (of which I was once a member) cited "experience" as a decisive factor in their determination of whom to endorse.

I see nothing wrong with their selection; it seems as though any of the candidates would make fine presidents. But I'm starting to wonder about the criteria that The Bucknellian used in the selection.

Maybe I'm wrong, but this is my third year and I get the feeling that BSG is not taken very seriously by the student body. When it is discussed at all, it is often with mild disdain: I've heard it described as ineffective at best, and a self-serving resume-builder for its members at worst. I'm not saying I agree with that sentiment; I think BSG has done some good things, and its members probably work hard at what they do. But I do think the feeling is out there. It's not like there's hostility towards BSG. People are too busy ignoring it to get upset about it.

Endorsing a candidate simply because of his or her experience will do little to reverse this trend, because a candidate with "experience" can only have experience within the system that is so widely viewed as ineffective. Experience is necessarily limited by the known process. The most likely result of the "experienced" presidency is simply more of the same. The status quo will prevail. Another year, another round of candidates, more promises, few results, more apathy.

> Why do we still seek remarkable leadership from those most deeply entrenched in such an unremarkable political process?

Is there some definitive point at which BSG "experience" ceases to be a positive and instead becomes a negative, a strike against? I'm not really sure. But I know that in the election of the last few presidents, "experience" has been a winning theme. And we are still where we are; that's why I question why election after election we continue to value BSG "experience" as an unexamined good.

I realize that there is something to be said for a candidate having some experience with BSG's labyrinthine procedures. But honestly, most of us here are reasonably intelligent—most any candidate could be taught all the operational stuff. What's more, BSG has a resident parliamentarian to police its processes. What can't be taught—or rather, untaught—is something about the mindset that goes with being part of the BSG system. It is nearly indescribable, but there is something within that mindset that perpetuates the disconnect between BSG and the student body.

I would ask simply whether it is time to look for us to look collectively for a new set of qualifications in selecting our student leaders; this applies to each and every student as much as it applies to The Bucknellian. This is meant more as an honest question than a criticism, but after our long experiment with "experience" and the results it has yielded, why do we still seek remarkable leadership from those most deeply entrenched in such an unremarkable political process?

News media exaggerates major national and international events

By Tom Elliot
Senior Writer

I have a secret for some of you. You didn't hear this from me, but, shhh—it's Ramadan. And we are at war? Ah, 'tis true. Where is all the zealous anti-American rioting in the streets, the worldwide Islam condemnation and the global outcry over this unholy barbarism you ask? The answer: it was never even an issue.

The spokespeople that made this non-issue an issue was the elite liberal media, and their campaigns to deride anything—Bush has not been thwarted by their previous erring, but instead perpetuated; into the supposed loss of civil rights surrounding the use of military tribunals and detainees of non-citizens of questionable backgrounds.

This is just the latest circumstance of the media making a story out of something that only the media is talking about (and of course, college professors) while the American people still are steadfastly united behind their president.

The need to detain visa-bearing non-citizens is both clear and rational. It must not be forgotten that these people are officially considered "guests" of the United States—so why then would it be unreasonable to simply ask if they are intending on killing us? Seems like a fair deal to me.

The necessity of military tribunals is even more pertinent in combating this terrorist threat. People who argue otherwise have clearly not examined the alternatives wholly.

We are undeniably at war. This was initiated by the acts of war brought upon our country on Sept. 11 and later concurred by the United Nations when its Security Council declared in two resolutions that America had the right to use force in self-defense.

Ruth Wedgwood, a former federal prosecutor and a professor of international law at Yale, notes the absurdity of storming the al-Queda caves, only to then barrage them with Afghan-language Miranda cards notifying them of their new rights.

Generally, the purpose of detaining combatants is to remove them from the battlefield as a means of reduction of their force. These POWs are then in the hands of their adversaries.

U.S. federal courts have never been used to try such cases, and for good reason, they weren't designed for it. The inherent necessities of protecting jurors with lifetime witness protection programs is encumbering to the allocation of jurors phase of substantive proportions.

Hearsay evidence is allowable in military commissions, European criminal courts and international courts, but not be permissible in a trial by jury. Wedgwood paints an example of bin Laden, on the eve of his terror-frenzy, calling his mother to boast of the awaiting massacres. His mother's good friend who overheard the conversation would not be allowed to testify.

Criminal trials also require an open record, something detrimental if this situation were to present itself. Bin Laden and his cohorts rely heavily upon CNN and the likes to inform them of enemy troop whereabouts. Churchill said that your enemy shouldn't know how you penetrated their operations. This open record would allow just that when prosecutors are forced to reveal such things when presenting evidence.

And what's all this talk about the constitutionality of such tribunals? Since when have foreign terrorists been protected under the U.S. Constitution? And should we even provide more rights to peoples with essentially no rights than our own servicemen who are tried in the same courts?

The Constitution reads, "The privilege of the Writ of Habeas Corpus shall not be suspended, unless when in Cases of Rebellion or Invasion the public safety may require it."

Who is in charge of deciding this? Congress decided the president has the right to convene such commissions long ago (U.S. Code, Title 10, Section 821). The Supreme Court went further and declared unanimously in 1942 that the president, as commander-in-chief was allowed to summon military tribunals as well as write the rules of procedure and proof surrounding these entities. He is permitted, by statute, to decide whether or not it's practicable to adopt the ordinary rules of common law and evidence.

The media, in all its inequitable pervasiveness, must be the whole 10 percent of Americans who think that the Bush administration has "gone too far" in "restricting people's civil liberties in order to fight terrorism." This, according to a USA Today/CNN poll. In regards to the people supposedly suffering this reduction of civil rights, a Washington Post poll notes that 69 percent of noncitizens from Arab and Muslim countries think the government is "doing enough" to protect the rights of Arab-Americans and American Muslims. The figure is 71 percent for "people who've been investigated for suspected involvement in terrorism."

Maybe the media should consult with the alleged "victims," or lawyers, or Constitution experts, or international law specialists, or even the Supreme Court before continuing this maddening ranting.

Medical advancements void sodomy laws

By Philip Martoma
Staff Writer

Sodomy is defined as any form of sex involving penetration that does not lead to procreation. Recently, there has been much debate about so-called "Sodomy Laws," or laws that prohibit some type of sex between consenting adults or consenting minors. These laws have recently been cited to justify various forms of discrimination against homosexuals but are protected by those who would say that sodomy spreads disease and is inherently unhealthy. However, with recent advancements in modern medicine this will soon be a moot point and the disapproval of society on gay sodomy has a clear double standard when compared to heterosexual sodomy.

There is the stigma on sodomy that viral infections will always remain untreatable with modern medicine. Antibiotics can only treat bacterial infections, and therefore diseases, such as AIDS, have no cure. This is slowly changing, though, with the advent of many new anti-viral drugs. The scientific community is developing several new antiviral medicines due to the field of viral genomics. Due to the increased speed at which we can sequence the genome of a virus we can spot several weakness of any particular viral strain. This in turn will lead to numerous new drugs and approaches to attacking viruses.

In America today, 16 states have sodomy laws, and FIVE have laws that only apply to homosexual sodomy. Though most states that have these laws, ban both heterosexual and homosexual sodomy, the laws are almost never used against consenting heterosexual adults or minors. In Florida, Governor Jeb Bush's son was arrested for giving oral sex to a girl in a public parking lot, however no charges were pressed. The reason that Bush's son received no reprisal may have been due to the fact that he was the governor's son, but still, no legal action has ever been taken against heterosexual sodomy in Florida (http://www.geocities.com/privacylaws/USA/Florida/flnews03.htm). In Kansas, 18-year-old Matthew Limon was sentenced 17 years for giving a 15-year-old boy oral sex. Heterosexual teens in Kansas are normally given mild penalties for sodomy, and adults who date someone between the ages of 14 and 16 are given almost no penalty as long as they no more than four years older. Called Romeo and Juliet laws, they do not apply to homosexual couples.

Proponents of these discriminatory laws try to create the impression that STDs make sodomy much too unsafe for rational people, thus gay people must be addicted to sex if they continue to practice it. Gay sodomy does spread disease more easily than heterosexual sodomy, but lesbian sodomy is perhaps the safest. This is only one of the contradictions of that argument. If our society was only concerned about the safety of its citizens perhaps we should ban all forms of sex other than lesbian sex. Men could no longer have sex with women or men because the nature of male sexuality leads to ejaculation, which makes the exchange of bodily fluid much more likely. I would never make the claim that unprotected sex at present is safe because the drug companies will be able cure in you in a few years. But I am saying that the stigma that sodomy is inherently unsafe, and that viral diseases are incurable is a fallacy. So long as we do not abuse the blessings of these drugs with overuse (as we have with others in the past) and continue to produce new ones, there really is no logical argument for these sodomy laws.

Students respond to Diversity Report criticism

To the Editor:

I wholeheartedly agree with Tom Elliott's '03 argument that American educational institutions should reassess their priorities. Ironically, the best evidence of this is not demonstrated in the argument Elliot presents, but in his thought processes. Oh yes, Elliott prattles on about Americans' weak sense of national and cultural history, and I must say, he does a great job demonstrating this—in word and deed. With such a strong grasp of history of the Western World, Elliott should not be surprised that his views parallel closely the ideologies of the Third Reich. During perhaps the darkest time of human history, Nazi Germans took the art of genocide to the new level-millions of Jews, gays and lesbians, Slavs and the physically and mentally challenged were systematically executed all under the pretext of national security.

As Elliott's understanding of Western Civilization history should have taught him, Nazi Germany did not prevail. To much of the World, these ideologies are unthinkable, if they don't simply approximate pure evil. Elliott's own sense of American history should have taught him our country once did exactly what Elliott advocated, exploiting the constitutional rights of the minorities in the name of national security. Thousands of Japanese-Americans were displaced into internment camps despite the fact that they were legitimate American citizens. I find it hilarious that such a strong advocate of American history would at the same time perpetuate history's greatest blunders.

Furthermore, Elliott fails to recognize that America is great because of its incorporation of multiculturism. It is the diverse culture and population of our country that allowed for our eventual economic and technological hegemony. The South was built with the backbones of African-Americans. Many Chinese-Americans toiled to create the railroad system that eventually linked our country into prosperity in the 1800s. Today, Asian-American programmers dominate Silicon Valley.

Indeed Elliott has a point—our priorities today should be reassessed. Elliott argues that at our university "we are insanely ranking the trendy multiculturism fad," yet these are blind arguments that Elliott himself has not proved in his article. When was the last time Elliott has actually participated or observed multicultural activities on campus? Elliott argues that the survey inadequately represents the true picture of the student population, and further asserts that our campus is indeed not "homogenic"[sic]. Well, Elliott, I am sorry to disappoint you, but the University, out of 331 best colleges, is ranked tenth by Princeton Review as having the most homogenous student body. May I remind you that, Princeton Review; a well-established institution surveys thousands of students yearly in the development of their ranking systems. I should also point out, that our student population is 85 percent Caucasian and around fifteen percent minority and international students. With college students who are less inclined to defend their arguments based on facts, rather than loosely based assumptions, half-truths, and stereotypes, one must fear what sort of future our country is building today.

To the Editor:

I find myself obliged yet again to respond to a rather troublesome article written by Tom Elliott '03. Elliott basically asserts that the Campus Climate Survey should be considered void as only 22 percent answered. I agree that the survey would be more telling had more people replied, but to say that thus the survey's responses are "a mere piece of propaganda nonsense" is not only inane but insensitive to those in this community who feel ostracized and have experienced some form of intolerance. Elliott doesn't mince words; he makes it clear that "this campus is not homogenic." Well, maybe we're not homogenic but our diversity leaves a little to be desired. To ignore this fact is ridiculous, and why Elliott seems to find the need to proclaim the University not only too focused on a "non-existent" problem but too focused on "trendy multiculturalism" is incomprehensible.

He further goes on to mention that only people with grievances fill out the survey and therefore the startlingly high reported incidences of insensitive comments are exaggerated. My hypothesis is this: the survey did not come close to reflecting our "campus climate", as in, had more people taken the survey, there would have been a further increase in negative results.

Lastly, Elliott asserts that we should do a background check on international students in the wake of the terrorist attacks. He states that not implementing this procedure is a threat to our national security. I realize how controversial this issue is, but it's a pretty ridiculous statement to make when trying to prove that the majority of this campus is accepted for their ethnicity, sexual preference or gender. If I was an international student, I think I would feel intimidated to be on a campus where some believe I should be profiled!

To the Editor:

Give me my Campus Diversity Report survey back—I need to report another incidence of intolerance—and yes, I was offended by it.

Let's talk statistics: 22 percent of the student body and a relatively disproportionate percentage of faculty responded to this survey. It is a fair to say that, by statistical standards, a clear statement of the University's overall "climate" would be hard to make. However, Elliott thinks himself capable, and without the survey, to make not only a clear statement about the "cultural climate" here on campus, but also about multiculturalism in general.

Somehow we always do make these statements and decisions, don't we? I vaguely remember President Bush winning in Election 2000 by a very slim "majority" of negative 539,947 votes. Approximately 51 percent of Americans voted in this election to decide the "climate" of the United States and pick a president based on that. I hope I don't go too far out on a limb by making the assumption that Elliott sees President Bush's victory as legitimate in this case.

Over thirty percent of the respondents reported hearing students make derogatory comments about individuals or groups based on gender, race, sexual orientation, or religion six or more times within the year. That is at least 1,937 incidences of voiced intolerance - and those are just the ones that were reported. Elliott can hide behind the flaws in the statistical sample group and response rate, but wake up, Elliott: 1,937 incidences is 1,937 incidences too many.

Statistics aside, a derogatory comment about a lesbian, gay, bisexual, or otherwise, for example, is an attack on people I love, and thus an attack on me. Homophobia is a social disease, and in my opinion, there is something wrong with a campus climate in which I am ridiculed for my tolerance and my general celebration of diversity.

Most national top universities do not require courses in Western Civilization to graduate, and most of America's top collegians do not have a very strong sense of history either. Elliott supports the idea that "universities might want to stop caving to the multi-culturalists and reassess their priorities." Open your eyes, Elliott—the history of the United States and the Western world is not the history of the world itself. There is a world of knowledge outside the borders of the United States, and if people would take the time to view it from a different perspective, maybe they would also reassess their priorities all over again—maybe Bucknellians students would stop parading themselves every Friday and Saturday night to play beirut in poorly lit basements smelling of cheap beer and vomit. But then again, I might just be delusional to think that there is more to life than that.

You are your own worst enemy if you think that lesbians, gays, bisexuals, feminists, ethnic and racial minorities, or even international students threaten your lifestyle. And you can't hide behind national security or an "anti-terrorist bill" in order to assuage your personal insecurities, because people like me aren't going to let you take away our constitutional right to live life and perceive meaning in it howsoever we wish. In the University "climate," as I see it, I am a minority because I am peace-loving person, proud to be a feminist, a friend to the LGBT and a global thinker.

Attacks against religious groups deemed disturbing

To the Editor:

As University Chaplain, and on behalf of the student representatives of the Inter-Religious Council, I wish to express our concern over the vandalism at Newman House on Wednesday night, November 28.

The fact that a memorial to Michael Mullins, a University student killed in 1994, was dug up from the Newman House garden late that Wednesday night is troubling. The lack of respect for the dead and the memory of this student is deplorable. But the fact that it was a Christian cross dug up from the garden of the Roman Catholic program house on campus is even more disturbing, and necessarily causes us to wonder whether this incident was conscious bigotry against Christians generally, or Catholics, more specifically, at the University.

Catholics as a group at Bucknell have been the target of ugly attacks in the past, always anonymous and cowardly, but nonetheless hurtful. Individual Catholic students have been the target of specifically harassing remarks and ignorant words about the Church and the tradition. Such attacks violate the spirit of an open community of learning.

This incident, along with the recent theft of Bucknell Hillel's banner from the front of the Berelson Center for Jewish Life, have made us more aware of the problem of possible incidents of intolerance of religious groups on campus.

As people of many different faiths on campus, we hope that this desecrating act at Newman House is fully investigated and the seriousness of the act impressed upon those who did it. If the motivation was only stupidity and disrespect, we hope the University sees this as a challenge to our educational task as a community. If the motivation was conscious prejudice, we hope that everyone at the University will share our belief that an attack on people of one faith group is an attack on all people of faith. No one, whether their tradition be a popular one or an unpopular one, a small one or a large one, should have to face personal attacks or obvious disrespect.

Student's efforts praised

To the Editor:

Regarding Joseph Trullinger's '03 very interesting letter, it's laudable, and an enriching ingredient in the University's educational experience that students are engaging in extra-curricular political activity, as seen by the sit-in about the war; as well as the formation of the Conservative Club. Let us hope that we may also have a YGOP forming, and a YDEMS and other liberal and leftist associations, too.

Also in regard to Trullinger's letter, most of the innocents-probably well over 90 percent—so far killed in war related to and since Sept. 11, were those, from about 80 countries, who died in the WTC bombing in lower Manhattan on Sept. 11, anthrax victims in the United States since then, and Israeli teenagers and other citizens in Jerusalem and Haifa. Most—probably well over 90 percent—of those killed in the war in Afghanistan so far have been soldiers of reactionary imperialism in Middle Eastern politics, which has a long history tracing back to premodern times Arab imperialism.

The United States and its allies today, including Afghan resistance forces, are engaged in liberating the Afghan people form this imperialism. The United States today is battling this imperialism also right here in the United States , which is under invasion by this imperialism, as much as the rest of the world understands, for example, as in effect recognized by the U.N. Security Council, but NATO, and by the alliance in this resistance, with the United States, of Pakistan, India, Jordan, Turkey, Russia, China and many of the former Soviet, now independent central Asian republics, not to mention the great majority of Afghan people. It is wonderful that this kind of dialogue and debate is taking place now at the University, and let us all welcome more of it, and engage in it, and keep our minds open, so that we may all learn form one another.

Suicide bombings spark fresh violence in Middle East

Israeli Prime Minister Sharon launches new "war on terror" after Hamas attacks kill 26 civilians in Jerusalem

By Matthew Hinson
Staff Writer

Once again violence has come to the Middle East. Suicide bombers rocked Jerusalem and Haifa this week, killing 25 and wounding hundreds; not the least of which was the fragile peace process. The Islamic resistance group Hamas has claimed responsibility for these bombings, which they say are in response to the Israeli killing of a Hamas leader a week and a half earlier. Israel has since struck back.

According to CNN, Israel has blown up two of Palestinian Authority Chairman Yassir Arafat's personal helicopters and launched strikes against other targets in the West Bank. Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has declared a new 'war on terrorism' and called on Arafat to do his part in bringing to justice those who are responsible for the suicide attacks. Many cabinet members of Sharon's government favor the removal of Arafat from power, and the elimination of independent Palestinian governing power.

According to MSNBC, Sharon went on Israeli television Monday, denouncing Arafat, stating that he is responsible for the attacks no matter who claims responsibility. CNN reported that Palestinian cabinet minister Saeb Erekat responded, saying that it is Sharon who will be responsible if war ensues. Erekat asked that President George W. Bush intervene and stop the Israeli reprisal attacks.

However, CNN is reporting that the U.S. response thus far has been one-sided with the administration condemning Arafat and stating that Israel as a sovereign state has a right to defend its citizens against terrorism. It is widely believed that this gives Sharon a free hand in dealing with those responsible for the attacks. President Bush Tuesday announced the freezing of the assets of those financial groups said to back Hamas.

Israeli missile strikes hit Gaza City in response to a series of Hamas suicide bombings during the weekend.

The U.S. position, which has become decidedly pro-Israel since the recent uprising, is a departure from the administrations recent policies. In the wake of the Sept. 11 attacks, the Bush administration quietly leaked its support of a Palestinian state and was accused by Sharon of selling out Israel for the sake of the coalition against terrorism.

Arafat has called on the nation of Qatar to host a meeting of the Islamic Conference Organization to allow for a forum to discuss these latest attacks with the Muslim community in the Middle East. In addition, under pressure from both Israel and the United States, the Palestinian Authority has begun to arrest members of Hamas and related groups in its territory.

These attacks come at a delicate time in world events. With the campaign in Afghanistan seemingly nearing its end, the United States is looking toward pushing its 'war on terrorism' elsewhere. One target often mentioned in the media is Iraq—both for harboring and backing terrorists, as well as for its lack of cooperation with the U.N. weapons inspectors. The inspectors have not been allowed into the country since 1998.

If the United States unconditionally backs Israel's retaliatory strikes against the Palestinians, they could lose the support of the Arab world in a campaign against other states harboring terrorists. In that case, the United States would be faced with the difficult decision of either giving up the war on terrorism or acting unilaterally against other nations.

The situation certainly remains volatile and ripe with opportunity both for Israeli hard-liners and Islamic resistance fighters. With the U.S. military and administration engaged elsewhere in the world, both sides could likely operate with little intervention from the United States.

For Palestinian resistance fighters, this is an opportunity to rise up against Israel without too many repercussions since the United States needs Arab support for the war against terrorism. For Israel, calling these latest attacks on Palestinian forces a 'war on terrorism' ensures that the United States will not intervene, since they are, in fact, engaged in their own war on terrorism.

The situation remains as one of the most volatile in the world as recent events threaten to cast the entire region into a war with global impact.

Once mighty Enron files for Chapter 11

Employees clean out their desks at Enron's headquarters after being laid-off by the now bankrupt firm.

By Jim Leahy
Managing Editor

Last week, the business world received the news it had been fearing for some time. Although not a huge surprise for most, the stunning collapse of Enron sent shock-waves through the economy and the stock market. What happened to make this one-time Fortune 500 company tumble to bankruptcy in little over a year? The answers are numerous and the fallout from this collapse will go on for years to come.

A merger between Houston Natural Gas and another gas pipeline company formed Enron Corporatiion in 1985. Soon after, Kenneth Lay, the company's current CEO assumed the position he has held for most of the life of the company.

Since its founding, Enron has played a major role in the power business. Built on a foundation of infrastructure and power generation, Enron began to focus itself on the energy trading business as it saw profits in that division grow. Despite this focus on energy trading, Enron's list of products and services is extensive. The company handles everything from risk management and facilities management to generation of power, transportation of natural gas, semiconductors and telecommunications.

The company rode the wave of online business to the top. In November of 1999, Enron Online began as a marketplace to trade energy and commodities and as a centerpiece to the growing company. According to Forbes.com, by October of this year, Enron Online was handling more than 60 percent of Enron's trading business—almost $3.5 billion in trading every day. The bidding is done in the open and Enron serves as the market maker, transacting every deal made in the energy market.

Enron was living large at its peak. Towards the end of 2000, the company saw its stock hit an all time high just north of $90. Their name was on the new ballpark in Houston and they were building a huge new office complex in the city. However, like the dot-com bubble, Enron began to leak in 2001.

The rumblings about Enron's business practices began earlier in 2001 but did not gain steam until August. The company's CEO Jeff Skilling resigned the post and turned it back over to Lay. October saw other major problems mounting for the company. According to Fortune magazine, the company's third quarter earnings number met expectations but did not include a huge $1.01 billion charge to write off bad investments. The company also wrote off other investment partnerships taken on by the CFO Andy Fastow. Those partnerships were later part of a Securities and Exchange Commission (SEC) investigation.

Not too long after the announcement of the SEC inquiry, MSNBC.com reported that Fastow was terminated and replaced by Enron's industrial markets chief Jeff McMahon. On Nov. 1, MSNBC said that JP Morgan and Solomon Smith Barney had agreed to provide the company with more than $1 billion in additional funding. A week later, the company announced that it had misstated its earnings by more than $600 million, dating back to 1997.

Some good news came across the wires on Nov. 9, when Enron announced that it had agreed to a $9 billion stock buyout by its smaller rival Dynegy. Chevron Texaco would add an additional $1.5 billion in capital to the merger. Most of Wall Street saw this as a possible break for the company. However, that would soon change.

On Dec. 2, Enron filed with the Federal Bankruptcy Court in New York for Chapter 11 bankruptcy. The claim will be the largest single claim ever in the United States at over $80 billion-$49.8 billion in assets and $31.8 billion in debts, according to CBS Marketwatch. That dwarfs runner-up Texaco that claimed $35.8 billion in assets when it filed for bankruptcy in 1987.

In addition to filing for bankruptcy, Enron announced that it would sue former merger partner Dynegy for terminating the merger. According to The New York Times, Enron is seeking $10 billion in damages from Dynegy for a number of reasons. Many thought that Enron would see trouble due to weakening trading business and Enron thinks that Dynegy saw that and used the merger to weaken Enron. By weakening Enron, Dynegy would be able to strengthen its own business.

Speaking in response to the lawsuit, Dynegy CEO Chuck Watson said in a company press release that "we want to be perfectly clear on this point: Enron's lawsuit against Dynegy has no merit whatsoever in law or in fact, and is one more example of Enron's failure to take responsibility for its demise." Watson added, "Dynegy will not lose Enron's frivolous case and intends to pursue an action for the damages that Enron has caused Dynegy."

There is one possible positive for Enron in the midst of all this gloom. The company announced on Monday, Dec. 3, that it secured $1.5 billion in emergency financing to stay in business and begin a massive reorganization. According to CBS "Marketwatch", the money comes from its primary lenders JP Morgan Chase and Citigroup and it will be paid in stages, as the company satisfies a list of demands that are designed to protect the lenders.

However, the negatives severely outweigh the positives. According to various reports, there have already been 4,000 layoffs made at Enron headquarters. Many of the company's employees had their 401K money invested in Enron stock, now worthless after once being a force in the markets. And in USA Today, the company's association with the Houston Astros is also in question—the company heavily financed their new baseball stadium, Enron Field. The Astros say that the stadium will carry the Enron name as long as they receive payments from their 30-year, $100 million deal.

The legal proceedings surrounding this mess will last for years. In addition, the U.S. Congress is beginning hearings on the matter, due to the strong relationship between Enron and the Bush Administration. According to a letter made public on Dec. 4, Henry Waxman (D-Calif.), the ranking minority member of the Committee on Government Reform, sent a letter to Vice President Dick Cheney asking him to release information stemming from meetings Cheney had with top power executives.

"In light of Enron's financial collapse, it is important to know whether Enron communicated pertinent facts about its financial situation to the [energy] task force. It is also important to know to what extent the task force relied on information from Enron that may have been unreliable of self-serving," says Waxman. He went on to say "Enron's collapse has shaken public confidence in energy markets. Continued secrecy from the White House will only compound public concerns."

Once a symbol of the technological and business revolutions, Enron is now a fallen star that is wavering on the edge of the cliff, waiting for someone to come along and save it. The company's stock hovers below one dollar a share and may be delisted in the coming months. What happens to Enron in the future is anyone's guess. However, what is certain is the company's impressive fall from greatness.

American John Lindh was captured fighting for the Taliban.

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

In Afghanistan, it appears that a handful of Americans have been fighting on the side of the Taliban—one of whom has been captured and identified.

According to the Associated Press, three men who claim to be Americans are in the custody of U.S. and allied forces. One of them, who emerged with bullet and grenade wounds sustained in the prison revolt in Mazar-e-Sharif, is said to be 20-year-old John Philip Walker Lindh of Marin County, Calif. Lindh initially identified himself as simply John Walker, but his parents saw him on television and recognized him. Since converting to Islam at age 16 he has also gone by the names Suleyman Al-Lindh and Abdul Hamid.

Lindh made his way to Afghanistan totally without his parents' knowledge. According to The New York Times, Lindh convinced his parents to send him to an Islamic school in Yemen in 1997. He told them after completion he would return to the United States to attend medical school, and then move to Pakistan permanently to minister to the poor.

He never came home.

Lindh emailed his parents in May from another Islamic school in northwest Pakistan. He told them only that he was moving somewhere cooler for the summer. After that, they lost contact with him.

But if the "somewhere cooler" was Afghanistan, Lindh certainly got himself into some hot water. The government has not decided what it is going to do with him yet, the AP is reporting that he could possibly be charged with treason. In order for that to happen, though, there would have to be two eyewitnesses to testify against him—something that is considered unlikely. A more feasible route might be for the government to charge Lindh with seditious conspiracy—one of the charges radical Islamic cleric Omar Abdel-Rahman, who plotted to blow up New York City's landmarks, was convicted on in 1995.

However, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld has been quick to note that the Pentagon currently has far more pressing problems than Lindh. At a press conference, the AP quoted Rumsfeld as saying, "We found a person who says he's an American with an AK-47 in a prison with a bunch of al-Qaida and Taliban prisoners. You can be certain he will have all the rights he is due." But as far as what to do with Lindh, Secretary Rumsfeld simply said, "We'll get to that in good time. I do know a bit about the various options and I have not landed on one at the moment. I've got lots of things that are front and center that we're dealing with at this time."

Lindh's father was on CNN's "Larry King Show" on Monday night. He said that he has hired a lawyer and that, "He's really not much more than a boy,.. we want to give him a big hug." He added that, "I don't know of any information that he [Lindh] has done anything wrong. I hope he could be debriefed and come home." The father has also told reporters that it did not occur to him that his son could be in Afghanistan and that, "We want to see John right away. He's been through a horrible ordeal."

Men's crew losing varsity status but not hope

By Aaron DeRosa
Sports Editor

When word hit that the University would have to make some changes in the athletic department in order to comply with Title IX regulations, the men's crew team was not surprised that they were one of the names mentioned on the chopping block, for no other reason than that crew is not a Patriot League sport. The NCAA does not sanction men's crew, and they are unable to contribute to the penultimate Bucknell athletic goal, the President's Cup.

Early on, the team knew that it may face possible elimination. In response to this, a group of alumni gathered together to figure out what could possibly be done to save the team.

"Instead of working against the system, we decided to work with the system," said Victor Arcelus '96 M '98, a crew alumnus and current staff member. "There had to be a compromise between helping the crew team function and having the University comply with Title IX regulations."

After extensive research, including ongoing communication with alumni, trustees and University officials, the alumni committee proposed a plan to the University that looked to be a viable compromise.

"We received assistance from the trustees and University administration in terms of ideas and support," Arcelus said. "Charlie Pollock has been tremendously supportive of us."

"Working with the committee's representatives has been an excellent experience," Vice President of Student Affairs for the Athletic Department Charlie Pollock '70 said. "They approached Bucknell's needs for rebalancing its overall athletic offerings in a most constructive fashion and they've been willing to work together with the University to make that concept a reality."

The plan, based on a similar program installed at the University of Michigan, called for the re-categorization of men's crew as a "club varsity" sport, which can be distinguished from both varsity and club programs.

As a club sport, men's crew would be subject to Bucknell Student Government (BSG) regulations. Since the team already raises half of its budget through fundraising efforts, compliance with BSG and club sport rules would further hinder its efforts because no money could be donated to the crew team specifically, rather to club sports as a whole where it would be disseminated among all the programs.

However, as a club varsity sport, crew would be exempt from club sport regulations as well as become financially unaffiliated with University athletics in order to aid the University's compliance with Title IX.

Some alumni were disturbed by the loss of varsity status after fighting so hard to achieve it in the late 1980s, but one of the primary hindrances on the team has been an imposed roster cap on the men's team at the varsity level.

Due to the nature of crew, large allowances must be made for roster movement due to injuries, willingness to compete and other forms of attrition. With roster caps, this is difficult to manage. Currently the cap is set at 20 men, only enough for two boats.

"Crew is a sport driven by numbers," Ben Pfeiffer '03 said. "Not only does a large squad offer the best possibility for the creation of winning boats, but Bucknell men's crew relies heavily on its rowers for administrative and fundraising tasks. Roster caps limit both the competitive potential of a team as well as placing added responsibility on a reduced number of athletes."

In the years prior to the roster cap, the men's crew came in first in 1995 and second in 1996 in the Championship International Regatta in England. Since then, the team has struggled to reach that level of success.

Although the team is immensely pleased with its position and its ability to control its own destiny, there are still issues that need to be resolved. A meeting of the men's crew alumni committee, current students and University officials has been scheduled for January.

Among the issues to be discussed will be availability of lockers, use of the ergometer room where the bulk of the off-the-water training takes place, transportation and equipment allocation.

"My hope is that we will leave the meeting in January with the athletic department impressed with our ability to specifically define our operation at the club varsity level, the University pleased that we have worked with them to find a solution and the alumni and current team optimistic for the future of the team and the support we will receive from the University as we travel this challenging road ahead

Track team predicted to continue Patriot League dominance

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer

Having been in training since mid-September, the Bucknell indoor track team was ready to see all of their preparation pay off against some new opposition. Last Saturday was evidence that all of the preseason training they did was well worth it, as they sprinted, jumped, hurdled and threw their way to seven first place finishes.

Although no team score was kept, the Bucknell Invitational provided a great chance for the squad to discover their strengths and examine their weakness before they get into the tougher meets later this winter.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The Bucknell Invitational gave Coach Kevin Donner and the team a chance to identify their strengths and weaknesses for the upcoming season.

The Bucknell women's team had quite a few standout performances. Stephanie Bango '02 and Andrea Nyce '02 dominated in the 800 meter run and the pole vault, respectively. Nyce won the pole vault with a height of 11'0", while Bango blazed through 800 meters in a time of 2:13.45, already qualifying for ECACs.

Other outstanding performers included Jennifer Malcolm '04 in the mile, Quad-Captain LaTonya McSwain '02 in the middle distance events and Maria Garcia '04 in the 35lb-weight throw. Amy Calvo '05 took third place in the 400-meter dash with an impressive time of 59.00 to record the fifth fastest time in University history.

Emory Strother '04 has a good showing in the men's long jump.

Team of the Week

After winning two of the past three indoor Patriot League Championships, as well as three consecutive outdoor Patriot League Championship titles, the Bucknell women look forward to defending their titles this year. This meet gave them confidence in their potential to do so.

The men captured five individual victories this past Saturday. Noel Powell '04 earned two of those, with his performances in the long jump and the 200-meter dash. In addition, Powell anchored the winning 1,600-meter relay team comprised of Powell, Matt Nini '05, Ryan Newberger '05 and Christopher Edwards '04. Adam Kaufman '03 placed first in the 35 lb. weight throw with a distance of 52'4 1/2". Thomas Prochilo '04 won the 800-meter run with a time of 1:57.37, while Emory Strother '04 came out on top in the high jump with a height of 6'5".

The men have been the Patriot League runners-up for the past couple of seasons, beaten out both times by league rival Army.

"Our goal this season is to give them a better meet than we have in the past and finally win the championship," Coach Kevin Donner said.

When asked about the upcoming season, Donner said, "One of our goals is to qualify as many people as possible for the Eastern Championships and we think that we will have a lot who will qualify for the National Championship as well.

Overall, this meet was a good opportunity to see where we are at early in the season. I think we are at the level that we should be at in order to go for the Patriot League Championship."

The team looks forward to their next meet of the season as they host the Bison Heptagonal tnis Saturday, Dec. 8.

Molly Creamer '03 led the team with 21 points, but still fell to St. Bonaventure.

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

After starting off the season 3-0 the women's basketball team has hit some bumps in the road in the middle of their five-game homestand. They have been the victims of second half collapses after holding leads in their first three losses of the season.

Last Wednesday, the Bison welcomed Delaware to Davis Gym for a 7:30 tip-off. Point guard Molly Creamer '03 continued her scoring ways, dropping in 30 points for the Orange and Blue and dishing off seven assists. Creamer and her team led by six points at halftime but were unable to put the Fightin' Blue Hens away in the second half. Delaware had five players in double figures in an 86-66 comeback victory.

"Molly was spectacular in the first half. It was one of the best halves I've ever seen a player play," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said.

After 10 minutes of the first half, the Bison had a 22-16 advantage over the visitors. Delaware came back with a 10-0 run to take a four-point lead. The Orange and Blue answered this with a 14-4 run to take a 40-34 lead heading into the locker room.

Delaware	86

Creamer opened the second half with a trey to give the Bison their largest lead of the contest at 43-34.

Soon, the Fightin' Blue Hens found themselves down 47-38. They then came alive with a 12-3 run to tie the game at 50 at the 14:20 mark. Both teams did not score over the next two minutes before Creamer hit two free throws to put the Bison back on top.

The score was tied at 58 for three minutes before Delaware broke the game open at the 5:56 mark with a three-pointer.

Then the Orange and Blue's offense went dry, shooting 22.6 percent for the half while their opponents outscored them 28-8 over the final six minutes en route to their second victory of the season.

"I knew it would be one of our toughest games. I was proud of how the team came out and went at them physically. We came out mentally and physically aggressive and our defense was outstanding in the first half," Fedorjaka said.

Guard Kate Franks '03 had a season-high 15 points for the Bison. "She has played solid all season," Fedorjaka said. She hit some big shots early in the game and she steadies us a lot of the time in games."

"I was very pleased with how we approached the game but I think their depth and size wore us down at the end and we ran out of gas. It is a great game to grow from," she said.

The Orange and Blue hoped to get back on track this past Saturday against Marist. Franks bettered her season high with 18 points and had four starters in double figures.

Marist	64

Despite holding a nine-point advantage the Bison were victims again of a second half comeback and lost to Marist 69-64.

"It was a disappointing loss after having a 16-point lead. We played well to build a lead but we weren't able to put the game away," Fedorjaka said.

Things looked good for the home squad as they burst out to a 10-0 lead at the beginning of the game, holding to Marist to 0-13 shooting from the floor.

The Red Foxes did not register their first field goal of the contest till the 11:08 mark of the first half and they were trailing 15-6 at that point. Marist battled to cut the Orange and Blue's advantage to three, 20-17 at the 6:40 mark. The Bison responded with some offense, entering halftime with a nine-point lead, 33-24, thanks to a four-point play from Creamer with 20 seconds remaining in the half.

The Bison extended their lead to 16 with an 11-4 run three minutes into the second half. At the 12:34 mark, the home team held a 15-point lead courtesy of a three-point play from center Kate Rounsley '02.

Marist countered with a 15-3 run over the next four minutes to get within three, 50-47, and neither team had more than a five-point lead the rest of the way. Marist knotted the game at 64 with 56 seconds left and then took their only lead of the game on a three-pointer with 17 ticks left on the clock. Creamer misfired on a three-pointer with seven seconds remaining and the Bison were forced to foul. The Red Foxes hit both free throws to seal the victory.

In an amazing turnaround, Marist shot just 25.8 percent in the first half but improved to 55.6 percent in the second. Rounsley and Tri-Captain Monique LeBlanc '02 had 11 and 10 points for the Bison respectively. Tri-captain Vicki Quimby '02 tied a career high with a game-best six assists. The Orange and Blue fall to 3-2 on the season.

"The Delaware and Marist losses were both very disappointing because there were numerous bright spots in each game, but we didn't close out the win when we had the opportunity. It is early in the season and although we are not at all satisfied with being 3-2, these two losses will not slow us down. There is still plenty of work to be done, and we are trying to learn from our mistakes and move forward positively," LeBlanc said.

"Our execution in our half-court offense has been up and down. We need to have all of our guns loaded at all times and we need to be more confident and consistent on offense," Fedorjaka said.

"Kate Rounsley had some big plays in the game and is off to her best start ever in her four years here. Monique always gives us that all-around performance and does the little things. She is very versatile and always plays solid," Fedorjaka said.

"Also, Laura Hatalsky '05 played seven minutes and was confident and very relaxed and hit a three-pointer for us," Fedorjaka said.

"We had two tough losses this week, but I feel we are ready to get back on the winning track with what we have learned from the last two games," Franks said.

The team travels north, just over the state border, to square off against non-conference foe Binghamton at 1 p.m. on Saturday.

"They are a good, physical team that beat us at home last year. Our team is definitely going to have some motivation to win," Fedorjaka said.

Swim team does well at Princeton Invitational

By Pat Evans

A much-improved Bison swim team traveled to the Princeton Invitational, where the women's and men's teams took second and third place, respectively, out of the four teams competing.

Two days before, in the Drexel Invitational, Sarah Petcavage '04 broke the long-standing school record for the three-meter dive and captured sixth place overall.

"We were happy with our placing in the tournament," Head Coach Jerry Foley said. "But we were more concerned with our own results. We were satisfied with our attitude, performance and times overall, and we looked at our placement as a bonus."

"We were happy with our placing in the tournament, but we were more concerned with our own results. We were satisfied with our attitude, performance, and times overall, and we looked at our placement as a bonus.
—Head Coach Jerry Foley

The women took first place in the 400-medley relay event to help them to their second-place finish. Darby Golino '03, Jamie Flick '05, Ashley Aiken '05 and Abby Weaver '02 combined for the winning time of 4:03.50 to upset Princeton's foursome, which was favored by 12 seconds in the event.

"Certainly it was an upset, which really boosted our confidence to be able to compete against a team like Princeton," Foley said.

For the men, the third-place finish overall is not indicative of the strength of the team. Drexel, a team that the Bison had beaten earlier in the season, shaved for this tournament, something that the Bison won't do until later in the year, when trying for their best times. The team was also without several members due to injury or illness.

Foley was still pleased with the effort of the men's squad. "I was equally pleased with the results of the men's team, considering the circumstances," he said.

Both teams showed vast improvement, as the women and men boasted 67 and 40 best swims, respectively. The improvement should help carry the Bison into the remainder of the season, as they strive to win the Patriot League Championship.

The diving team had a productive outing in the Drexel Invitational with Petcavage breaking a University record that had stood since 1974 for the three-meter dive. Adam Freeman '05 finished first in the one-meter and seventh in the three-meter dives to help the Bison at Drexel.

Football team wraps up season with honors

By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

After yet another winning season (the Bison had a 6-4 final record) for Head Coach Tom Gadd and his Bucknell football team, the Bison proved that they belonged near the top of the Patriot League with ten players selected to the All-Patriot League team.

The Bison had six players named to the first team, and four to the second team. All five defensive players that made it were on the first team.

The Bucknell defense ranked nationally in three major categories this season. They were fifth in the nation in yards allowed per game this season with 260.1 yards per game, eighth in rushing yards per game with 89.3 yards per game and eleventh in points allowed with 15.7 points per game. The Bison defense also did not allow a 100-yard rusher all season.

Senior defensive tackle Tom Kuhn moved up from a second team selection last season to the first team this year, and so did junior nose guard Adam Lord. Linebackers Joe Massey '03 and Mark Tallman '02 were also named to the first team. The lone representative from the secondary was cornerback Reed Tunison '02.

On the offensive side of the ball, senior guard Jon Churchill was the sole first team selection. Center Carson Book '02 and tight end Greg Readinger '02 round out the blockers that made the second team. Running back Jabu Powell '02 was a second team selection for the third year in a row, and wide out Jim Horan '03 was also a second team selection.

Both Kuhn and Lord had a lot to do with Bucknell's success against the run all season long. Lord finished the season with 42 tackles, 16 of which were for negative yardage. Kuhn had 26 tackles on the season, which was shortened due to a torn anterior cruciate ligament on a low block during the Holy Cross game.

Massey finished the season with 28 tackles, seven of which were sacks. Massey missed three games in the middle of the season with a dislocated shoulder, but came back strong at the end of the year to earn his first all-star selection. Tallman, another first time selection, was a definite leader on the defense. He recorded 46 tackles on the season, including 4 sacks, and also tallied an interception.

Tunison finished the season with three interceptions, two of which he returned for touchdowns, helping to earn him his second all-star selection. The other was in 1999. Tunison sat out much of last season following a season ending leg injury, but returned to his old ways to anchor a young defensive back field that was a question mark for the Bison at the beginning of the season.

The two offensive linemen, Churchill and Book, selected to the all-league team saw a lot of time from the beginning of their careers, and finished strong helping the Bison average nearly 400 yards per game on offense in their senior seasons. Readinger proved to be a great blocking tight end, as he helped the offensive linemen protect the Bison offensive attack. But, he also was a reliable receiver when needed this season, averaging 13.4 yards per catch.

Powell, an all-star selection for the third straight year, moved up in the record books with another great season for the Bison. He finished his career at Bucknell second all time on the rushing list with 2,919 yards for his career. He also ranks second in all purpose yards for Bucknell. Powell finished this season with three 100-yard games to help earn him the spot on the second team.

Horan finished second in the league in receptions this season with 59. He was one of the guys that the Bison counted on when they needed a big play this season. Two of his three touchdown catches on the season proved to be game winners against Lafayette and Holy Cross.

Four of the Bison all-stars were selected captains for the season by their teammates. Book, Powell, Tallman and Tunison received the honors before the Colgate game. As senior leaders of this team, it is obvious that these players deserved what many would call the greatest honor an athlete can receive.

Golf team makes best of transition year

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The men's and women's golf teams each concluded their seasons with strong finishes to cap off stellar transition years. Both teams had first-year coaches who did a good job of continuing the tradition of successful Bison golf.

The women's team was led throughout the season by Molly Campbell '03, who placed in the top 25 at the ECAC Women's Open Golf Championship to lead her team to a fifth-place overall finish out of the 23 schools competing. Her score of 81 placed her 23rd on the opening 18 holes of the course.

The best overall performance in the ECAC tournament was by Jess Hetrich '03, who produced an 81 on day two after shooting a 78 on day one, to finish eighth out of 120 competitors with a score of 159. Hilary Mainka '02 also cracked the top 25 with a score of 165 to place her 20th overall.

The men's team also finished strongly, battling blustery conditions in the final match of their season at the Lehigh Quad Tournament, to finish third out of the four teams competing. Scott Leeder '04 led the way for the Bison, shooting an 81 on the challenging course, tying for seventh out of 20 golfers.

"It was absolutely the hardest conditions I've ever played in, in a while," Leeder said. "And we've played in some bad conditions this fall."

Charles Markey '04 and Alex Dolle '05 also finished in the top 25, tying with a score of 81 for 14th place. In his collegiate debut, Brent Bramnick '05 shot an 88 to tie for 16th place and round out the Bison scoring.

The men's team only got through one round of the ECAC Fall Tournament as weather was once again a factor. Nick Leibowitz '02, Markey and Tyler Braun '05 all shot a 78, and the Bison finished 11th out of 26 teams with a 321 team score. Leeder rounded out the scoring this time with a 36th place, 79-stroke performance.

"It's too bad that we couldn't finish the tournament the second day," Leeder said. "Nick was getting hot and we were about to reel in some of our opponents."

Both teams finished their seasons with promise, after showing glimpses of their full potential at different points in the season. The women finished second at the Rutger's Invitational with Mainka and Campbell cracking the top ten, setting a new University record for a 36-hole course. At the East Carolina Invitational, the Bison set the record for an 18-hole course, shooting an impressive 319. The squad was able to pull together their efforts and overachieve their way to fifth-place at the final ECAC tournament.

The women's side will soon be without Campbell, who is going away for the spring. The captain will undoubtedly be sorely missed by her teammates.

For the men, many season-low scores were present at different times throughout the season. In the Lehigh Quad, they were able to coincide their low scores and achieve their full potential.

The Bison will kick off their spring season on March 16-17 at the Florida Gulf Coast International.

Inside Sports

This season, Bucknell's cross country program has continued to distinguish itself as one of the most dominant athletic programs on campus. The women's team stormed to victory in its fourth straight Patriot League Championship, while the men's season was highlighted by a win in the IC4A Championship race. In addition, Greg Costello '03 and Theresa Dennis '03 represented the Bison at the NCAA Championships.

Boakai Lalugba '03 earned the PL Player of the Week honor after averaging over 20 points a game last week. He is ranked third in the Patriot League in scoring with 15.2 points per game, third in rebounding with 8.2, eighth in field goal percentage at .500 and tied for eighth and seventh respectively for steals and blocks per game. His most notable achievement was his first career three-pointer that swished the net to beat the buzzer and allowed Bucknell to beat Cornell in OT.

Brian Neuman '02 advanced to the semifinals in the 184-lb. wrestling weight class on the wings of his fourth place finish at the Penn State Open on Sunday. Last week, he placed eighth in the same event and was the only Bison to earn a medal in the 300 athlete competition.

Molly Creamer, the junior guard on the women's basketball team, had 21 points, four steals, three rebounds and five assists in the team's defeat at the hands of St. Bonaventure. Against the University of Delaware last week, she led both teams in scoring with 30, and assists with seven.

Savannah Rennels '04 of the women's soccer team was named to the 2001 National Soccer Coaches Association of America All Mid-Atlantic Region Third-Team, the first since 1994. She led the PL with .67 goals per game and was an All-Patriot League First-Team selection earlier this season. She had a team'high of 12 goals and helped the team to its first Patriot League Championship victory and scored the only goal for the team in the first round of the NCAA tournament against Penn State.

This game has deep playoff implications, for both teams. The Bears lost the first matchup this season because they gave Favre too much time in the pocket and dropped two men deep in an effort to force Favre to throw interceptions, but it backfired on them. Hopefully, the Bears can maintain a flow of pressure on Favre and even force him into a few mistakes. It's too close to call, can't I just call a pick like in Vegas? Fine Bears.

Cleveland (6-5) at New England (7-5)
Both teams are fighting to stay in the playoff hunt. New England has been on fire lately winning four of its last five games; while Cleveland has lost three of its last five after getting off to a quick start. The Patriots are coming off a huge emotional win over their division rival the Jets, while the Browns are coming off one of their worst showings of the year in a loss to their division rival the Titans. All signs point to a Patriots domination, but don't worry the Browns will show them a game.

San Francisco (9-2) at St. Louis (9-2)
This may very well be the NFC Championship preview game. Niners QB Garcia is probably the most underrated player in the NFL right now. Yes, it is hard to follow in the footsteps of two of the most prolific QBs ever, Montana and Young, but give this guy his due. Unfortunately, I have to pick the Rams in this one though, since Niners RB Kevan Barlow used to play against, and beat, some of my high school friends (Go Spartans).

N.Y. Jets (7-4) at Pittsburgh (9-2)
After week 12, the Steelers sit atop the AFC and look poised to grab home field advantage. The NFL's leading rusher, Bettis, is listed as doubtful for this Sunday but Jets' RB Martin, who is only two yards behind Bettis, is in. The Jets are coming off a huge one-point loss last week and still have the chance to stay strong in the playoff picture. However, Heinz Field won't be as friendly as the other places on the road they have played. The Steel Curtain II will dominate in the end.

Indianapolis (4-7) at Miami (8-3)
Indy has been beating themselves now for four straight weeks behind Manning's 8 interceptions. The slide started with a loss to Miami. Maybe they can end it with a win against Miami. If the Colts hope to beat the AFC East leading Dolphins they will need to protect Manning so that he can protect the ball. In my gut I feel Indy is due and I wanna pick the Colts, but I just don't have the balls to pick against the Dolphins at home.

Chicago (9-2) at Green Bay (8-3)
Oooo. Now this game looks interesting. Da Bears versus Da Bay. Where's Mike Ditka when you need him? I'm trying to channel Chris Farley from Saturday Night Live here, gimme a second. Last year nobody knew who Jim Miller was. Nowadays, people still don't know who he is, but at least he hasn't given up his passion for country line-dancing, right?

Cleveland (6-5) at New England (7-5)
Well the color of New England clam chowder is brown, plus you need to take into account the saltine distribution ratio of cubic inch of chowder per ounce of salt averaged out over a box of saltines. I wonder if Tom Brady can eat 10 saltines in a minute. That Brady, he can do anything. But luckily for Cleveland, Brady will be benched this game in place of tomahawking Mel Gibson. "Before they were soldiers, they were family. Before they were legends, they were heroes. Before there was a nation, there was a fight for freedom." -"The Patriot"

San Francisco (9-2) at St. Louis (9-2)
Jeff Garcia, the San Francisco treat. Bing Bing. In an interview once, I asked Jeff "if you were a type of rice, what type of rice would you be." And he said "BLUE 32! BLUE 32! Hut HUT HIKE!!" Of course, it didn't help that I was interviewing him from my living room while I watched him on television in the middle of a game. Oh well, maybe next time. San Francisco.

NY Jets (7-4) at Pittsburgh (9-2)
Ah. The Steelers without the Bus. Oh how I've longed to see this moment. Will Kordell shine in the ultimate test of his skill? As much as I'd hate to put my foot in my mouth (aside from the orthodontic repercussions) Kordell Stewart has forever been, is now and will forever be, a worthless bungler, a trogloditic leader and an unholy succubus of skill and experience where time and talent have no meaning and the dark lord Lucifer rides upon a chariot of damnable hell-fire. With that said, I'll probably have to take the Jets.

Indianapolis (4-7) at Miami (8-3)
What do Dolphins and Colts have in common? Nothing, don't be stupid. But the Colts do have Marvin Harrison on their team and as we all know, George Harrison passed away this week. On the other hand, Miami has a receiver named OJ McDuffie and as we all know, OJ is innocent. So the relationship between the Colts and the Dolphins may be undefined, but at least we know that OJ McDuffie did NOT kill Marvin Harrison.

of us," Crew President Jeremy Urban '02 said.

"Based on the University's experience to date, I anticipate continued productivity and excellent working relationships as we design the 'club varsity' model in fuller detail," Pollock said. "The University is eager to support the program and we're confident we can do that in meaningful ways without tipping the relationship into varsity territory."

Currently, the alumni committee and the team are trying to establish an endowment fund of three million dollars to ensure the future success of the team. This money would be put towards hiring a head coach as well as covering the team's operating expenses.

"It appears the University is in favor of our efforts and our proposal and the challenge now is raising enough money to create an endowment to fully support the men's team," Urban said.

Until that $3 million can be raised, the members of the team will be forced to fundraise every semester to establish an operating budget. One such program that the team runs is the "rent-a-rower" program which offers one rower at $10 per hour to perform odd jobs like raking leaves and moving furniture for the community.

In addition to such fund-raisers, it is proposed that the members would need to pay dues. The amount has not been determined and will be another discussion topic at the January meeting.

"Dues are not an issue," Aaron Bates '03 said. "If it is what will allow our sport to stay on campus, then it is what we have to do. We will never have a chance to have this experience again in our life. Whatever we get out of our dues is priceless."

Both the current team and the alumni base are working hard to keep the team floating, both for the team itself and for the University. The women's team has also been very insistent on the survival of men's crew.

"When we refer to the crew team we mean both the men and women's teams," Jill Harrington '04 said. "It's not like soccer, where you have the men's team and then the women's team. It's a unified group. We're on the water at the same time, we share a coaching staff. They are such compliments to each other that if you get rid of the men's crew, it's like losing half the team."

The team is a valuable resource for both students and the University.

"Crew is such a visible sport," Arcelus said. "We compete on rivers in the middle of cities with a lot of spectators. It's a great way to put Bucknell out there, especially in a University so athletically oriented. It gives students who haven't trained their whole lives for a college athletic career an opportunity to be a part of that community."

"The crew experience has given me as many, if not more, opportunities in my college career than anything else," Bates said. "It has given me a chance to meet new people. Racing in boats of four and eight rowers, you create bonds that will last. Once you have raced with a person, you are always a boat-mate."

Women's soccer earns Bucknellian 'Team of the Semester' award

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

The women's soccer team was selected as the Bucknellian team of the semester. They certainly had a good argument after their most successful season in the history of the program, culminating with their 2-1 overtime victory over Navy in the Patriot League Championship.

After qualifying for the Patriot League tournament last season, the Orange and Blue came into this season with a lot of optimism and set a final goal to win the League Championship. The squad got off to a great start, winning their first four games, including a 1-0 victory on the road in their opener against Big East opponent Pittsburgh. The Orange and Blue started their League schedule on the road against new League member American. The Bison fell behind early and were unable to recover in a 2-0 defeat. The team next traveled to Penn State to go up against the nationally ranked Nittany Lions. Even though they lost 9-2, the Bison played well and became only the third team this season besides national powers North Carolina and Notre Dame to score two goals on the Nittany Lions.

The Bison rebounded with a 3-2 road victory over St. Joseph's before hosting defending Patriot League regular season champion Colgate. Forward Emily Keber '03 scored the game-winner with two and a half minutes remaining in the contest to give the Bison their first victory over the Red Raiders since 1995.

"The Colgate win was critical. That boosted our confidence, and we proved to ourselves that not only can we come close to beating good teams, we are capable of beating good teams," Head Coach Chrissy Findlay said.

"I think one of the most memorable team experiences was our win against Colgate. The smiles that were on each of our faces after the game just showed that we were on top of the world," Lauren Schwarz '03 said.

"I think the turning point in our season was beating Colgate. Up until then, we all believed we could win the Patriot League, but I think that after that game, it became even more clear to us, and we sent a message to the other teams in the league also," Kristie Simon '04 said.

The women rode this momentum into their next game against defending Patriot League Tournament Champion Holy Cross. Simon netted the game winner nine minutes into the first overtime period to give Bucknell the 2-1 victory.

The Bison stumbled on the road against Columbia in a 1-0 loss, then came home to play Army and could not get much offense going in a 2-0 defeat at the hands of the Cadets. The Orange and Blue responded the following week on the road in two crucial League games. After defeating Lehigh 2-0, the Bison went a little farther East to beat Lafayette 3-0, thanks to two goals from Co-Patriot League Rookie of the Year Ashley Dincher '05. With that win, they clinched a playoff spot. By their last regular season home contest against Navy, the women found themselves with an opportunity to host the Patriot League tournament with a win over the Midshipmen. The Bison dominated Navy for the entire contest, but were unable to put one in the back of the net. In the first overtime, the team fell victims to a sudden defensive lapse off a set kick from the Midshipmen and gave up the game-winning goal. The women regrouped to win their last regular season game on the road against Howard and then prepared for the League Tournament in Annapolis.

They entered the tournament as the No. 3 seed behind Navy and American and came in emphasizing the theme of paybacks as they squared off against American in the first round. With nine seconds left to play and the game knotted at one, Keber showed her late-game magic again, hitting home the game-winner to send the Bison into the finals. The Orange and Blue were looking for revenge as they went up against Navy for the championship. The Bison dominated the Midshipmen again and thanks to Simon found themselves up 1-0 with just over 20 minutes to play. The women were on their way to the title before a defensive error led to Navy tying the game with just under a minute to play. They were no strangers to overtime, for they had already played three overtime games in the season. The Orange and Blue did not wait long to win the title. Just over three minutes into the extra session Tri-Captain Tara Utchel '03 was pulled down inside the penalty box. Schwarz stepped up and hit a shot into the upper left corner of the net to give the Bucknell Women's Soccer program its first ever Patriot League Championship. Schwarz was named the Most Valuable Player of the Patriot League Championship for her efforts.

The Best of the Mediocre

As the 2001 NFL season enters the turn for home, the plot lines are thickening and the battle for playoff spots is picking up momentum faster than Refrigerator Perry rolling down a mountainside. Quarterbacks go to sleep dreaming of the Lombardi Trophy, receivers begin planning overly elaborate endzone antics and kickers begin having recurrent nightmares involving Scott Norwood and Bono. Aspirations are rife, fueling a "win-or-die-trying" attitude in teams from all reaches of the country.

Except Detroit. Lombardi went out the window long ago for this disastrous squad—desperation, not aspiration, is the prevailing spirit for the Lions. While the hard-luck Lions are frantically trying to avoid notoriety,

COMMENTARY
Cecily Cairns

NFL fans are secretly enjoying their misery. Not because they hate the Lions, not because they hold some mysterious grudge against the city of Detroit, but because sports fans simply adore losers.

We mock losers. We grumble about them. Sometimes we even throw things at them. But let's be honest: We're secretly captivated by those who have mastered the art of athletic failure, and have been since the dawn of organized competition.

If the 0-11 Lions should fail to win one of their next five games, they'll most likely be permanently affixed to a storied list of the athletically challenged and the unlucky. But exactly how tough are the credentials for inductance into sports history's "Hall of Infamy"? Here's a quick look at what Detroit is up against.

As far as the NFL goes, history looks to one team as its measuring stick—the 1976 Tampa Bay Buccaneers. Donning their pale orange jerseys—which were roughly the shade of regurgitated sweet potatoes—and a somewhat effeminate pirate logo, the expansion Buccaneers managed to fumble and stumble their way through 14 games without winning a single contest. In defeat, they only accumulated 15 touchdowns and were goose-egged five times. Over the years, the Bucs' jerseys have evolved into a color less reminiscent of vomit, and the logo has become decidedly more virile, but the team can rest knowing that they were the last franchise to go without victory for an entire season. For now.

Football isn't the only sport with a history of chokers; America's National Pastime has had its share, too. Everybody remembers the 1962 Mets, the only club ever to drop 120 games in a season, but believe it or not, there's actually a team that may have been worse. The Mets, an expansion team, at least had an excuse. But the 1915 and 1916 Philadelphia Athletics, a franchise that had been to the World Series four times from 1910 to 1914, simply made an art out of going from hero-to-zero at the speed of light. They scrounged up a daunting record of 79-226 over the span of those two seasons, finishing a combined 113 games out of first. They stayed in the basement until 1922, losing over 100 games three more times—that's five 100-loss seasons in seven years.

In the NBA, the L.A. Clippers have set a standard for lousiness that may never be matched. In 22 seasons, including 2000-2001, they've had an astounding 19 losing seasons, 16 of which they finished at least 20 games below .500. Their reign of terror has to end sometime, though, and with a mighty 8-9 record, this might be the year they nail .500. I suppose you could say they're breathing down the neck of mediocrity.

Now, when it comes to the grandiose Olympic games, mediocre and sub-par athletes are generally as rare as the passenger pigeon. Sub-par athletes always find a way, though, and Eddie "The Eagle" Edwards was no exception. In fact, Edwards is more remembered for his failure as a ski-jumper than anyone is for their success in the sport. The sole representative of Great Britain in the 1988 Olympic games, he taught himself how to ski in a country with little snow, no ski jumps and no sponsorship—a bit like Cool Runnings, only without the peppy Jamaican charm or anything that resembled success. The Eagle floundered his way to a distant last place, but he did it with the whole world cheering him on.

Twelve years later, Eric "The Eel" Moussambani stamped himself into the annals of Olympic lore in an unconventional style reminiscent of Eddie Edwards' rise to fame. Moussambani represented his native Equatorial Guinea and, like Edwards and the crew of Cool Runnings, he had to train in facilities unfit for a prison. Moussambani, who didn't start swimming until the January before the 2000 Games, had to do his workouts in a 20-meter hotel pool. And when hotel guests wanted to use that, he took his routine to the waters of Africa's West banks—compared to hotel guest playing Marco Polo, the crocodiles and sharks off the West banks seemed somewhat amicable. Exposed to a 50-meter pool for the first time, and making his debut at 100 meters, Moussambani needed every ounce of heart he could muster to simply finish the race. But he did—it only took him one minute and 52.72 seconds, over a minute slower than the world record.

This is only a small sampling of the names that weave the intricate tapestry of athletic ineptitude. We fondly remember the '76 Bucs, Eddie Edwards and pretty much every Clippers team that ever existed—not for their contribution to the dignity of their respective sports, but for their ability to spit in the face of hopelessness and keep plugging along as though restitution sat just over the horizon.

The Detroit Lions of 2001 have a long way to go before they earn a place in this elite corridor of history. Will losing all 16 games be enough to put them in a class with the '76 Buccaneers? Can the Lions possibly embarrass themselves enough to stand beside the 1916 Athletics? All this remains to be seen, but if misfortune continues to shine upon the Detroit Lions as it has been all season, their names will surely be emblazoned upon the pages of "The Idiots Guide to Sports Incompetence."

Athlete of the Semester By Jen Gianis

Becki Marshall '02

Drawing inspiration from the late Coach Gulden, Becki remembers how he used to say, "The strength of the wolf is the pack, the strength of the pack is the wolf."

Who knew that a passing suggestion from a high school soccer coach could lead to such awesome accomplishment? As a high school freshman, Becki Marshall '02 took her coach's advice and went out for her high school's spring track team. She has been on the fast track, literally, ever since.

"I love to compete, and it is a never ending challenge. There is always room for improvement, Marshall said. "I love the team and I am having a lot of fun. Every time I place my foot on the starting line, I take a deep breath and smile. I love this sport."

"Becki has been a tremendous captain for what ended up being a tremendous team. We had a great season," Head Coach Kevin Donner said. "Everyone was running very fast at the end of the fall. She is one of the best runners we have. She set an example everyday which brought out the best in her teammates."

This athlete has been a stellar role model for her fellow teammates both on the track and in the classroom. A civil engineering major, she has truly taken the Bucknell Cross Country and Track Program to the next level.

Her list of accomplishments is endless and will undoubtedly continue to grow with the start of the indoor and eventually the outdoor track seasons. This season, Marshall's victories included the Gulden Duals meet, the Lock Haven Invitational, and, for the third year in a row, the Patriot League Championship race.

In addition, she placed 61st at the Pre-NCAA Championships, eighth in the Paul Short Memorial, 14th at the Mid-Atlantic Regional meet and was seventh in the ECAC Championship race. The latter two achievements earned her All-Region and All-East honors, respectively. During her four-year college career, she has been named to the Patriot League All-Decade Cross Country team, was the 2000-2001 Patriot League Academic Athlete of the Year and was given the title of Most Outstanding Patriot League Athlete in the fall of 1999, 2000 and 2001.

Marshall claims that her teammates have had a huge impact on her abilities and performances. "Running may be thought of as an individual sport, but during a cross country race, you depend on your teammates more than anything," she said. "We run as a team and help each other out if anyone starts to fall off. The support I have received from my team, coaches, friends and family is immeasurable. I would not be where I am today if it were not for them. The team makes running fun."

Despite all of her goals that she has reached over the past three years, Marshall is not yet ready to settle. With two seasons left, there are still plenty of things to shoot for.

When asked about her aspirations for the rest of the year, Marshall said, "I want the team to win both the indoor and outdoor Patriot League Championships. I would also like to qualify for the ECAC Championship. The upcoming indoor and outdoor seasons will be the last time I will get to compete wearing a Bison uniform, and I plan to put my body to the limit and give everything I have."

"Winning the Patriot League title three years in a row and the Mid-Atlantic Regionals three times puts her in the category as one of the finest that Bucknell has ever seen," Donner said.

Men's basketball outscored 19-2 in closing minutes to seal defeat

Lalugba's 11 points couldn't lead the Bison to victory.

On Dec. 1, the Bucknell men's basketball team took to the paint vs. Big East rival Villanova Wildcats at the Pavilion in Philadelphia. In what was almost a momentous upset, the Wildcats launched a 19-2 run in the closing minutes to seal a 69-45 victory.

Bucknell	45
Villanova	69

The Bison fell to 1-5 on the season, while Villanova improved to 3-1 with a win in the first meeting between the teams since the Truman administration.

Bison guard Chris Rodgers '03, a native of nearby Norristown, Pa., scored a career-high 12 points, as well as four assists and three steals in 25 minutes off the bench.

"It was a great experience, playing in front of family and friends. It was great to see everyone — felt like a welcoming home party," said Rodgers.

Villanova's 17-2 run broke open a slim 17-14 lead to 34-16 with 2:34 remaining in the half. Using a great low post game, the Wildcats outscored Bucknell in the paint 22-0 in the first half alone.

"Villanova was a great opponent. They shot the ball well and battled us down low to pull out the win. BT and Dan had solid games for us," Head Coach Pat Flannery said.

The Bison kept the score close in the first half, thanks to a barrage of three-pointers. Rodgers and Dan Blankenship '03 nailed three treys apiece as the Bison canned six of 10 from behind the arc in the opening 20 minutes.

Bucknell closed the first period with an 8-2 run, as Rodgers sunk a pair of threes to improve to 6-for-6 in his career from beyond the arc. The Bison trailed 36-24 at halftime, with Blankenship and Rodgers accounting for all but three of Bucknell's 24 points.

Boakai Lalugba '03 finished with 11 points and a team-high seven rebounds, while Blankenship scored 10 points, all in the first half. The Bison shot only 28 percent from the field, but played great team defense, forcing 17 Villanova turnovers and coming up with a season-high 10 steals.

The Wildcats shot 54.2 percent from the floor and drained six of 11 three-pointers, while Blankenship launched five of seven from long range.

Bucknell is still hurting from injuries, playing its third straight game without All-Patriot League guard Bryan Bailey '02, who is still nursing an ankle injury.

Things were tense for the Wildcats' first-year head coach Jay Wright, a 1983 Bucknell graduate, when he received a scare from his alma mater — the Bison trailed by only 10 points with eleven minutes to play.

"I knew Jay when he was attended Bucknell. He is a great guy. When we had the opportunity to play one another, we took advantage to get my kids out there."

The Orange and Blue look to turn things around on Wednesday, when they take on Albany at home.

The men's basketball team is off to a horrible start with a 1-6 record, despite strong individual efforts.

Women's soccer team has season to remember and earns Bucknellian honor

"[Lauren] stepped right up to the ball with all the composure in the world and rifled it in her signature spot: the upper left 90. The celebration and jubilation afterwards are far from describable. We all are so very fortunate to have been able to experience it together. Out of the 17 years that I have been playing the game, I have never won a league championship. The 2001 season will forever remain in my memory," Utchel said.

By winning the Patriot League Title, the Bison guaranteed themselves a spot in the 64-team field NCAA Tournament. The Orange and Blue drew a familiar foe, Penn State, in the first round. The game was very different this time around at State College. After falling behind 1-0, the Bison tied the game thanks to a beautiful shot from forward Savannah Rennels '04, which arched right over Penn State's goalie's head. The Orange and Blue battled hard throughout the rest of the half and went into halftime tied with the Big Ten Conference champions. The Bison continued their excellent play in the second half, almost taking the lead on a golden scoring opportunity for Rennels, who shot it just over the top of the net. The Nittany Lions answered with two quick tallies. The Orange and Blue continued to fight until the final whistle before losing 3-1.

It was a monumental season for the women's soccer team that garnered them several awards along with being Patriot League champions. Defender Lindsay Slomer '02 and Rennels were named to the All-Patriot League First Team and Utchel was selected to the Second Team. Findlay was named Patriot League Coach of the Year for the second consecutive season.

Also, Rennels was just recently named to the National Soccer Coaches Association of America All Mid-Atlantic Region Third Team. She is the first Bison to gain NSCAA All-Region honors since Lisa Gibbons in 1994. Rennels led the League with a .67 goals per game average and led her team in overall scoring with 25 points (12 goals, one assist).

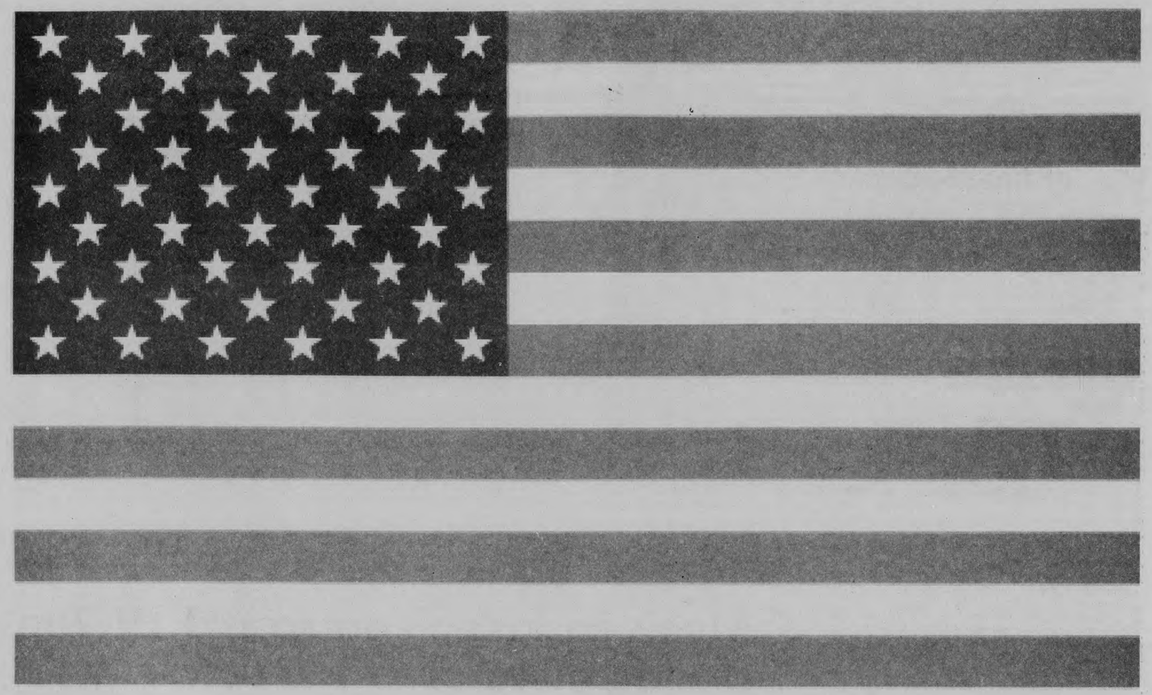
"This season was something I have never experienced before, and it wasn't just because we won the Patriot League Tournament, but even more it was because we were all so close we played for each other and we played with so much heart. As a goalkeeper, I am one of the last to arrive for the celebration of high fives and pile ups after a goal is scored and honestly there was more heart and passion witnessed in those celebrations than any other team I have been on," Laurie Purse '03 said.

"We not only were talented players with depth and experience, we possessed a tremendous amount of team chemistry. We worked hard at maintaining chemistry and camaraderie. Having a team that cared about each other and worked hard for each other is something every coach needs and I was fortunate to have it this season in my program. If you walked up to our field, you would not know who was a starter, who was a reserve, who was a senior, who was a freshman," Findlay said.

Findlay cited Keber's game-winning goal against Colgate and Purse's big save against American in the Patriot League Tournament as among of her most memorable moments this year. Also, Schwarz's penalty shot and seeing her team, especially her seniors, rejoicing as Patriot League Champions was very memorable to the head coach.

Findlay will be losing her first recruiting class at the University to graduation this year. These six seniors have left an indelible mark on the women's soccer program and with their hard work over the past four years, have helped put Bucknell women's soccer on the map.

"We will miss the talent and experience of our seniors. They are a special class to me since they were my first recruiting class. Looking at next season I anticipate for the team to be strong again with the returning talent and experience. Through continued training on the field and in the weight room, the depth will speak for itself," Findlay said.



See you next semester!!!
Good luck on your finals and have a great break.

Abroad perspective: Seville, Spain

By Melissa Maher
Contributing Writer

After spending a few days at the "Zenit" hotel of Seville, my new friends and I of the Council program were finally able to go to what would be our new home for five months.

It was early January and the sun was shining bright. I had my winter coat with me, but after the first week I was beginning to think I wouldn't need it. The white and green taxi dropped me off at 42 izquierda, calle Juan Diaz de Solis, in Triana. The second the taxi driver stepped out of the car, he immediately grabbed my bags for me, went to the door and rang the bell of my new home. We heard a buzz and the door opened. A very short woman with red hair, who looked in her 60s, was standing on the stairs and she greeted me with the biggest smile. She didn't wait for me to come to her door, which was on the second floor of a small apartment building. I could tell that she was genuinely excited.

I had two suitcases and one travel bag. Following the small woman up the stairs, I felt like a giant. I am 5'7" and was wearing boots with heels. The woman was only about 4'5". She kept laughing and commenting on how tall I was. She showed me where my room was and already had dinner ready. I placed my suitcases in my room, with the cutest decorations I had ever seen. It was pink, with a floral quilt, curtains and a matching cover for the small desk. There was also a small table and a vase with fake flowers.

None of the apartment was carpeted. When I took off my shoes, the woman nervously insisted I put something on my feet before I would catch a cold. I found my slippers and we sat at the tiny dining room table to eat dinner. The dining room table had a blanket over it and a furnace underneath it. She had the furnace turned on and told me to put the blanket over my legs while I sat at the table.

Her apartment always remained very cool and there didn't appear to be any other source of heat. She told me that because of the hot summers the housing needed to be configured in a way to keep everyone cool. The temperature can get as high as 40 degrees Celsius. After I finished dinner she almost demanded that I take a nap, knowing I was suffering from jet lag and could use a good sleep. I already adored her.

Maruja was the name of the senora with whom I stayed. She was a widow of just about 10 years. On my program we had a choice of either staying with a senora, a family or in a residence hall. Because of my picky eating habits, I decided this would be best, considering a family would have to cook for everyone who lived there and a senora would be more accommodating.

I absolutely loved my senora. I never needed to set my alarm because she woke me up every morning. We would eat toast and drink our coffee together as we chit chatted. It was not long before she became one of my best friends. A day never went by without her telling me how beautiful and nice I was.

My abroad experience really jumped to a new level after the second week I had been in Seville. I had made some new friends through my program all of whom were from the Boston area and attended Northeastern University. On Jan. 20, we decided to go to a club called Luna Park. One of my friends was a Spanish major and very eager to speak. We started talking to two guys from Seville that we met inside the club. They didn't speak a word of English, but that was good for us.

We had two weeks of vacation in the month of April. One was called "Semana Santa" and the other "Feria". Semana Santa is a religious celebration and Feria is a time of family and friends. I've never seen people so emotional as I did during Semana Santa. My Senora cried just from watching it on the television. It is said to be the most beautiful in Seville. Everyone in Seville and many travelers come to see the beautiful statues as they are carried throughout the streets of Seville. Thousands of people gather in the streets to watch them. Some of the statues are watched in complete silence. It was an amazing experience.

One of my favorite weeks was definitely the week of Feria. All my friends had gone to visit other places towards the beginning of this week, so I spent my time at my boyfriend's house.

Feria is a fair. There are amusement park rides, games and food booths. There was something very distinctive about how the Sevillanas celebrated Feria. All the women purchase dresses that cost as much as $500 called Flamenco dresses and every single one is different.

My boyfriend's (who I met in Seville) next door neighbor let me borrow her dress for one of the days. Women of all ages buy these dresses just for Feria. They also have many garments that go with it as well. It was absolutely beautiful. The other half of Feria was tents. Hundreds of tents. Some were rented by restaurants and others were rented by families. You had to receive a personal invitation for most of the tents.

My group of friends and I still keep in touch today because of all the great memories we had. I never traveled very far outside of Seville for two reasons. First, I was having such a great time I never wanted to leave; and second, because I decided I wanted to live there and could do the traveling in the future. I can honestly say that I loved everything about Spain. My 30 minute walk to class in the morning was relaxing. Even though buses were accessible, I never took the them anywhere.

I also loved the Spanish food. I loved every meal my senora made for me. There was a lot of meat and olive oil in everything. I also absolutely fell in love with the sunny weather of Seville. It was brisk and somewhat cold at night. I plan on living in Seville in the future. After graduation, I'm hoping to have a job in Seville because my experience there was the best time of my life.

Is stem cell research really that bad?

By Nate Ivanick
Staff Writer

Science & Technology Commentary

As the debate over stem cell research rages through Congress and the nation, it becomes important to examine some facts about the issue. The largest problem that scientists face is that many people misunderstand the concept of stem cell research.

What is stem cell research exactly? The concept is quite simple. An unfertilized human egg is taken, and the nucleus, which contains all the genetic material of the cell, is removed. In its place, the nucleus of a skin cell of another person is replaced. This means that the new egg cell has all 48 chromosomes that a regular cell has. Normally, an egg cell would only have 24 chromosomes, and would need to receive the other 24 chromosomes from the sperm. The idea is to then grow this egg in a proper condition to obtain its stem cells. According to Yahoo!, scientists feel that they could then direct these stem cells to become neurons, or possibly an organ, such as the heart.

The potential for curing diseases with this new technology is infinite. A person with heart disease could receive another heart without the risk of their body rejecting it, since it would be a perfect clone of the heart they already have. This would be safer and more reliable than heart transplant methods currently used. This treatment could also be used to treat Parkinson's and diabetes. Kidneys could be grown, as well as livers. Perhaps, eventually neurons could be grown and surgically inserted into the body to fight paralysis.

Along with this gain come some ethical issues. Most of these issues stem from problems regarding religion. Cloning challenges the very idea of the soul. Would the cloned egg have a soul? Also, is it right to "harvest" organs?

Perhaps, most troublesome are the implications of the ability to clone stem cells. If cloning stem cells is possible, it is very likely that human beings can be cloned as well. Do these new clones have a soul? These are difficult questions that everyone must decide for himself or herself. Finally, are we playing God by delving into this Pandora's box?

NBC news reported that Advanced Cell Technology, the company that has reported major breakthroughs in human cloning, stresses that their aim is simply to create stem cells for therapeutic, not reproductive, use. As Senator Sam Brownback (R-Kan.) moves to ban all cloning, Dr. Michael West told the Senate Appropriations Committee that his group should be able to achieve major scientific advances within the next six months.

West predicted that a ban on such research could prevent roughly 3000 people a day from receiving potentially life saving treatments. The issue has divided those who believe that the benefits far outweigh any ethical questions, with those who believe that man does not have the right to interfere with nature and natural processes.

61- year-old 'Millie' ready for retirement

By Josie Cetta

Only two days shy of working 30 years at the University, Mildred Dreese, known to most as "Millie," will retire on April 1, 2001. Her husband, a mechanic, who plans to retire this March, will join her.

Millie, at 61 years old, is "anxious to start her retirement," but is leaving "in good spirits." In her first 12 years at the University, Millie worked as a custodian in Vedder Hall. She was promoted to custodial supervisor of the center campus for her remaining 18 years. Millie supervised eight people who worked in Roberts Hall, Dana Engineering, Taylor Hall, Phi Kappa Psi and the test lab.

"The people I have worked for, professors, secretaries and even students, have been a pleasure to work with and I will miss them," she said.

Through the years, Millie remained loyal to the University. As students came and went, she saw many transformations in her 30 years at the University.

"There are a lot more buildings to take care of and we have started doing outside work in the summers, which had never been done before," she said.

Millie has a lot planned for her spare time. She hopes to spend more time with her children and grandchildren. Millie proudly reported having three children and three grandchildren.

She intends to keep busy and help her local church in Winfield by making bulletins and newsletters.

"I'm going out of retirement into a part-time job, but its something that I want to do," Dreese said.

"Considering everybody I had worked with, I wouldn't trade any of them. I was fortunate to work with such a good group of people," Dreese said.

Tour guide program helps campus

By Katie Michaels
Senior Writer

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
The Admissions office has taken great strides to improve its tour guide program.

You see them everyday and everywhere around campus; walking with groups of prospective students and their parents. Tour guides are the driving force behind high selectivity rates at the University, motivating students to apply.

After receiving almost 100 tour guide applications this fall, the Admissions office has accepted 28 new students to begin working in January. Along with those students returning from abroad, about 45 guides will be available this spring.

"A tour guide is the first, and possibly only, contact that a family has with Bucknell. A very important connection must be made, sharing personal experiences and balancing each family's needs and interests," Pamela Glass, tour guides co-coordinator, said.

During their recruitment process each fall, the Admissions Office focuses on involved applicants with a variety of experiences, majors, geographic locations and backgrounds. Tour guides are involved in every aspect of campus, including Varsity sports, Bucknell Student Government, Activities & Campus Events, President's Council, Brothers and Sisters Empowered, Greek organizations, religious groups and various other clubs.

"They must be knowledgeable about Bucknell, and willing to learn more," Paula Cogan, co-coordinator of the program with Glass, emphasized. "Enthusiastic and committed students become the best tour guides."

"These students need to go the extra mile with families, staying after the tours to reach out to individuals and to answer questions," Cogan said.

Many students become tour guides as a direct result of their positive experience when they visited the University.

"When I was a senior in high school, some of my tours were positive, and some were negative, but my tour at Bucknell was very impressive," remembers Lindsey Gentel '04. "I hope to effect prospective students in the same way, being an advocate for Bucknell and having an impact on college decisions."

Other students view this job as an opportunity to encourage variety among incoming students. "Basically, the tour guide was the only student I had contact with during my visit to Bucknell," said Kellen Smith '03. "During my tours, I want to influence many types of students by describing the many activities that Bucknell offers, beyond parties."

The Admissions Office conducts the largest number of tours during April, August and October—critical months for high school seniors. Conducted in rain or shine, the tours, as well as the guides, constantly receive positive feedback from visitors.

"I love the interaction with visitors, especially seeing their expressions and hearing their questions," Bill Anderson '04 said.

"The only thing that we don't see enough of is group cohesion among our guides," added Glass. "Because it is such a scattered position, it is difficult for them to get to know one another."

To improve these relationships, next semester's tour guides will be required to return to campus on Jan. 14, for a full day of training. Compared to the half-day training session conducted in the past, students will meet with different departments during the morning and afternoon, broadening their knowledge of the University. Afterwards, they will be required to give a tour to a veteran tour guide, who will pose difficult questions for them to answer. This new opportunity will enable the students to interact as they perfect their skills.

During the past few weeks, potential guides have attended three lunchtime training sessions, introducing them to groups such as the Office of Campus Activities & Programs and the religious organizations.

When Glass first arrived at the University 18 years ago, guiding was a paid position. In the late 1980s and early 1990s, however, admissions changed the job to a volunteer position. Modeled after programs at other universities, many students signed up to volunteer, but lacked the time to fulfill this commitment. Therefore, in 1999, the Admissions office returned guiding to a paid position. As application numbers rise steadily to roughly 8,000 a year, the demand for tours has increased.

Today, each guide is required to give two to three tours a week. Glass and Cogan, along with the tour guides, work hard to serve the student need, offering tours six times a day with two separate tours during each time slot.

"The program has improved even since I've become a tour guide," observes Lindsay Dills '02. "Many of my friends have become involved and really enjoy meeting new people each week."

Student to run half marathon

By Meredith Atkinson
Features Editor

Over winter break, Kate Love '02 will be running in a half marathon for the Arthritis Foundation called Joints in Motion. The marathon is at Disney World and Love will be participating with her mother.

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian
Kate Love is running to raise money for arthritis research.

Inspired both by her upcoming graduation and by an internship she did over the summer working on cancer research, Love decided it would be the ideal way to mark the turning point.

"My mother, Linda Love, just turned 50 and I am a senior off to Temple Medical School. That's why we have both pledged to raise about $3,000 in order to fight the debilitating disease of arthritis and to run/walk the Walt Disney World Half Marathon in January," Love said.

In an effort to draw attention to the cause, Love will use a grease pencil to write the names of people who give donations on parts of her body while she runs. For example, $25 donations will receive a spot on her arm, while $100 donations will go on her forehead. Her fund raising campaign on campus is called 'Love for Sale' and she has raised about $2,300 so far. She noted that the response from people on campus has been excellent.

Love has been a serious runner for the past year and a half, and this is her first major event. The race itself is 13.1 miles long.

Theriault dances through BU career

By Krista Reisdorf
Senior Writer

Many children dabble in different activities when they're young—a soccer game here, a Brownie troop there. Leah Theriault '02 started taking ballet when she was five years old.

"Before I came to Bucknell, that was pretty much all I did," Theriault said.

However, it was not the reason she chose the University. Dancing since her freshman year, Theriault is majoring in French and economics.

"I chose Bucknell for its small size and because it had my major," she said. "But the dance program was definitely a bonus."

Theriault said that because dance is not a major at the University, it's easier to relax and enjoy herself.

"When it's not a major, it cannot hold the professionalism," she said. "It's not the be-all, end-all of your life."

This fun environment is enhanced by the people in the program, Theriault said.

"I really like all of the people involved," she said. "The professors are great. The way that you dance reveals your true personality, so the professors know us really well."

Professor of dance, Danna Frangione has enjoyed working closely with Theriault throughout her University career.

"My respect for Leah has grown steadily in the past four years," she said. "Always an excellent dancer, Leah has become an important and charismatic performer through her work with the Bucknell Dance Company. She is also a quietly strong leader, working with all members to make the company more democratic and vibrant."

Courtesy of Leigh Theriault

Theriault has been dancing for many years.

Theriault believes that the dance company boasts diversity, consisting of people from different backgrounds.

"Our group is just so diverse," she said. "People come with different perspectives and goals. It's a good experience for me, since I came from a traditional, classical background."

Although she likes other types of dance, Theriault feels that classical ballet is her style.

"I like modern (dance), although it doesn't come as naturally to me," she said. "I was trained in ballet, so I'm more comfortable with that. I like a lot of things ... it's just sometimes hard to get your body to move in so many different ways."

Theriault said that her family has always been supportive of her decision to dance.

"I'm pretty much the artsy kid in my family," she said. "My mom is very involved in the arts, being a part of community theater. She's been very supportive."

As she prepares to graduate next semester, Theriault wants to take in all the University has to offer.

"I hope I'll be able to dance a lot, since I missed it when I was abroad in France last year," she said. "I'm taking advantage of everything at Bucknell—going to lectures, taking classes I'm actually interested in ... sometimes, being so busy, you forget to enjoy the good things. I don't want to work less, but I want to appreciate more."

Although unsure about her future, Theriault has some ideas.

"No definite plans yet," she said. "I'd love to go back to France ... but I think I'll eventually find myself in the business world."

Any dancing in the future?

"Of course," she said. "Dancing for me is like regular exercise for other people—you can't not do it."

Haines publishes new poetry collection

By Neil Angis
Staff Writer

American poet and essayist John Haines, recipient of numerous honors including the American Academy of Arts and Letters Award in Literature, recently published his fourteenth book of poetry, For the Century's End: Poems, 1990-1999. Recognized as one of the leading American poets living today, Haines also shares a special tie with the University community, as he spent the spring semester of 2001 as the University's poet-in-residence.

For the Century's End is a brilliant collection of poems that drifts through time and space like the memoirs of a wandering ghost—pensive, critical, curious, dark and heartening all at once. Haines seemingly leaves little of humanity's experience and relationship with the physical and spiritual universe untouched; from the bones, ice, blood and stone of our bodies and earth in poems such as "In the Cave at Lone Tree Meadow" and "Another Country," to anxieties about outer space exploration in "Star Photo" and "NASA Dreams Quietly of Mars."

Another theme for Haines in this collection is an artistic response to contemporary political issues, predominantly negative in comparison to his treatment of self and earth. Haines writes in his introduction to For the Century's End, "I have always sought a poetry that, as in the classical past and in the case of many of our prominent modernists, can include the public events of our time and do so in a way that makes them at once contemporary and unavoidably linked with humanity's long and troubled history" (ix). In contrast to poems like "The Legend," which conveys a sense of calm and comfort for our "earthly life and experience" (x), other pieces such as "Notes on the Capitalist Persuasion," "Politics and the Dead" and "The Last Election" create a mood of unrest concerning the tremendous influence of political issues on human life. In his "Notes on the Capitalist Persuasion," he writes,

> Suppose I sit in an oval office:
> the public polls are sliding,
> and to prove I am still in command
> I begin a distant war. Then, > in obedience to reciprocal fate,
> by which everything is connected,
> my war is your war,
> my adventure your misfortune.
> As when the dead come home, > and we are still connected,
> my truce is your surrender,
> my triumph your despair. (47)

For Haines, a slick-smiling politician can be more frightening and dangerous than an untamed beast in the wilderness. Surrounded by political conflict and turmoil, we must learn to unwind with art, with the ones we love, and perhaps most deeply with an observance of the wonders and intricacies of the natural world:

> Each subdued and thoughtful > citizen closes his door, turns > off the news. He opens a book, > speaks quietly to his children, > begins to live once more. ("The Last Election," 52)

My personal reaction to For the Century's End is one of awe and appreciation for Haines as a poet and scholar. While this collection of poems is first-rate in lyric excellence alone, its investigations of our pasts and futures, our collective struggles and triumphs, and of life's journey to find harmony between self and universe, leaves one paralyzed by a state of starry introspections. A true master of language and poetic art for the latter half of the 20th century, most could only dream of gathering in 50 lifetimes what Haines has produced in this slim little book of timeless poetry.

> All that remains of a childhood, > restored in a faded album:
> the fleeting image of a vacant house,
> a dust of snow on the steps -
> All that was and would be. ("To the End," 82)

Dance Company to perform fall show

By Andrew Clugston
Senior Writer

Dance, the art of movement, has been cultivated into a dynamic and multiculturally encapsulating extravaganza at the University. The fruit of this labor can be seen in the Bucknell Dance Company's (BDC) Fall 2001 performance, where months of rehearsal will culminate in an exciting performance on Dec. 7 and 8 at 8 p.m. in Harvey Powers Theater. As in past years, this fall's production promises to be a spectacular event integrating a wide range of dance styles, music and moods.

A program that can only be described as complete in itself, rich in emotions and relevant to both dancers and audience members alike, it draws from the beautiful and always innovative choreography of two guest artists, two professors and three students.

David Berkey, chair of the dance department at the University of Iowa will present "The First of the Wine," a modern piece that explores the vitality of youth and the playful richness of this stage of life. As a renowned teacher, he has choreographed for France's Ballet du Nord, Canada's Royal Winnipeg Ballet, American Ballet Theatre Studio Company, Kansas City Ballet, Ballet Arizona, The Eugene Ballet and other regional companies.

"Hymn of Angels," choreographed by Penny Askew, who currently serves as visiting artistic director of Ballet Quad Cities and is a staff member at Cedar Rapids Ballet Academy, brings to the University a spiritual contemporary ballet set to Russian choral music inspired by the recent tragedies of Sept. 11. The piece uses a beautiful imagery of angels to portray a sense of spiritual nurturing.

The contribution of the University's own professors of dance have consistently brought acclimation to the ability of the BDC. "In the Aftermath," choreographed by Dana Frangione, the director of the University dance department, is danced by a trio of members and portrays the images and feelings prevalent in the few days following the Sept. 11 tragedy.

"The piece attempts to capture the raw emotions as a consequence of this sad day, to allude to the survivors emerging from dust-ridden streets, to mourn the losses and show the rise of patriotism," said Frangione.

This Fall Performance of the BDC also reiterates its strong connection with Chinese culture through Professor Er-Dong Hu's "Once Upon a Time."

"I wanted to integrate the talent of our western-educated dancers into a distinctively Chinese piece, a piece which articulates the fading old-world traditions of China through the story of a South Chinese tribe," said Hu. "China is changing rapidly in the face of technology and globalization, so the sharing of this culture through the arts is important because it sustains and enriches the beauty of this country's illustrious heritage." The piece is framed around the setting of a fairytale describing both the emergence of Chinese culture and those of a Chinese minority group that formed its cultural beginnings by surviving off of the land. The piece intricately combines modern and ballet techniques, along with elements of traditional Chinese dance.

Time after time, student choreography is regarded as one of the highlights of each BDC performance and I speculate that this year will be no different. One of the reasons for a performance of high quality is the dynamics between Dance Company members and professors.

"We are all close, we support each other, look out for each other both in and beyond the rehearsals and we push one another toward excellence," says Stephanie Turi '02, an officer and member of the BDC. We will undoubtedly see such excellence when students Laura Hager '03, Ryen Hermann '02 and Kara Hartman '02 bring to the stage choreographed works that will capture the attention of every audience member.

Set to, and named after, the Neville Brothers' song, "Fever", Hager's pieces is sensual and enticing stylized jazz whose tone is dictated by a dichotomy, incorporating a sense of sophistication with the more 'funky' side of jazz.

Hermann probes the depths of a more philosophical subject matter in "Coming to Fruition." Exemplifying individualism through a united process, this modern piece addresses the matter of destiny, human relationships and their significance in everyday life. Through this work, Hermann hopes to inspire the audience to "reflect on the past, anticipate the future, but more importantly live in the present."

Hartman and Lyn Wheeler have co-choreographed "Noche Caliente," a work best described as an exciting fusion of jazz and Latin styles. Supplemented by an abundance of luscious, full-bodied choreographic phrases and set to the heat of Ricky Martin and Jennifer Lopez, this work will end the fall performance.

The concert is funded by the Department of Theater and Dance, the Bucknell Student Government and a generous grant from the Bucknell Association for the Arts. Furthermore, what partly makes this production possible and enhances the significance of each choreographer's creation, are collaborations with an amazing crew of technical, clothing and set designers. Led by Heath Hansum, Paula Davis-Larson and F. Elaine Williams respectively, all can be lauded for the spectacular effects, stunning clothes and tasteful props that add so much to both the grave and mirthful moments of this concert.

A veritable festival for the senses and appropriate for all age groups, one can look forward to works of inventive and expressive body maneuvers created with kinesthetic intelligence and executed by talented artists. Tickets to the BDC's Fall 2001 performance are $5 for adults and $4 for children and senior citizens and are available at the Langone Center Box Office or at the door.

Beatle George Harrison dies at 58

By Chad Flood
Staff Writer

No band in the history of rock and roll can come close to claiming its influence in modern rock like the Beatles. From their first album, 1963's Please Please Me to last year's compilation of top hits 1, it is impossible to claim that these four musicians from Liverpool did not change popular music forever. I was not even born when John Lennon was assassinated in 1980, and while I respect him as an individual and a brilliant musician, I never felt the connection to him that I do now with the rest of the Beatles. That is probably why George Harrison's death last Thursday was something that I could not conceive of.

George Harrison at a 1992 concert.

Harrison was born on Feb. 25, 1943, in Liverpool. He started playing the guitar at age 13 and was soon introduced by his friend Paul McCartney to Lennon, who had already played in a band. Ironically, Harrison was the one to show Lennon the basics of playing, and from then on, the two were inseparable. "John and I had a very good relationship from early on," recalled Harrison in a 1998 interview.

From that point, the success that the Beatles enjoyed was something unique and something that the four members never could have prepared for. Touring the world and playing to packed stadiums of screaming teenage girls, they can now be looked upon as an early version of N*SYNC.

Harrison is famous for his experimental work with the Beatles, introducing them to the sitar and the concept of transcendental meditation, which the others soon dropped and even joked about in Lennon's song "Sexy Sadie." This was the start of Harrison's objections with the band. He liked the quiet side of stardom, keeping out of the public eye and often travelled to India in order to practice meditation peacefully.

Harrison soon began to take on projects outside of the Beatles, recording with his friend Eric Clapton, setting up a benefit concert for starving victims in Bangladesh and Pakistan during their war in the 1970s and producing films, including Monty Python's cult classic Life of Brian.

In 1998, Harrison admitted to the world that he had been diagnosed with throat cancer. He was able to stave off a knife attack the next year, but in the months before his death, it became clear that his cancer would soon get the best of him. Harrison passed away on Nov. 29, 2001, in his home, with his wife and son by his side. He was 58 years old.

The Beatles still have a remarkable effect on music. Dave Matthews included a line from Harrison's "Norwegian Wood" in a song, the British rockers Oasis cover the Beatles on a regular basis and even during Live's recent concert here at the University, the band performed a rendition of "Imagine" in light of the tragic events of Sept. 11.

Harrison was thrilled to see the effects of the music that he and his three friends had created. Speaking of the success of 1, he said, "I think that popular music has gone truly weird. It's either cutesy-wutesy or it's hard, nasty stuff. It's good that this has life again with the youth."

Bob Dylan, with whom Harrison had worked both on and off stage, responded to his death as only a friend and musician could.

"George was a giant, a great, great soul with all of the humanity, all of the wit and humor, all of the wisdom, the spirituality, the common sense of a man and compassion for people ... The world is a profoundly emptier place without him," Dylan said.

As I sit here writing, I have decided to play a copy of Phish's version of Harrison's masterpiece "While My Guitar Gently Weeps." My own feelings on Harrison's passing could not be expressed better than by George's own words:

> "Well I look at you all
> see the love there that's sleeping
> While my guitar gently weeps..."

Junior-Sophomore recital offers variety

By Kristi Johnston
A&E Editor

The department of music presented a Junior-Sophomore recital this past Sunday, Dec. 2, featuring Daniel Sitomer '03 on the clarinet and Katherine Palumbo '04 on the piano. They were assisted by Laura Heijerman '05 on the piano, Andrew Clugston '02 on the violin, Alexis Zackey '04 on the viola, Christina Meng '04 on the violoncello and Elsbeth Fager '04 on the flute.

The concert began with Palumbo's performance of Paul Hindemith's "Sonata No. 2." Sitomer then performed "Concerto in G" by Giuseppe Tartini, accompanied by Heijerman, and "Three Latin-American Impressions" by Gordon Lewin, accompanied by Fager. These two pieces were followed by Palumbo's playing of "Sonata No. 15 in D Major, Op. 28" by Ludwig van Beethoven.

Following intermission, Sitomer performed two more pieces, Krzystof Penderecki's "Tre miniature per clarinetto e pianoforte" and Rene Herbin's "Imitation of a Gavotte," again accompanied by Heijermen. The final piece of the performance was "Piano Quartet in G Minor, K. 478," performed by Palumbo, Clugston, Zackey and Meng.

While all the selections were technically challenging, they presented a wide range of musical styles. The audience enjoyed the concert, prompting Palumbo and Sitomer to present an encore of "Someone to Watch Over Me," with Sitomer on the piano and Palumbo singing.

"I liked the integration of different styles and influences throughout the performance," Daniel Opperthauser '03 said.

Both Palumbo and Sitomer practiced the music for the concert for several months prior to their performance. They both worked extremely hard and were pleased with the culmination of their efforts.

"The hardest part is waiting for everything," Palumbo said. "It's just such a long process. You feel differently each time you play."

"The week before the concert is very hard," Sitomer said. "We've been practicing a good three hours a day. The day of the concert itself is easy."

The concert drew crowds to the Sigfried Weis Music Building. The variety of pieces and the immense talent of all involved performers contributed to the overwhelming success of the event.

Council denies Kasdan's proposal for non-voting seat

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

Jason Rubinstein—The Bucknellian

The Council did not motion to discuss the non-voting student seat.

Continuing his effort to improve town-gown relations, Matthew Kasdan '03 presented the idea of a non-voting student representative at the Dec. 18 Council meeting. Council members asked Kasdan questions, but did not motion to discuss the issue further.

"Honestly I was very disappointed with the outcome of the Borough Council's decision to let the matter die on the table and not even bring the issue of the non-voting student representative seat to vote," Kasdan said.

According to Kasdan, the Council declined an opportunity which would have streamlined communication and possibly improve town-gown relations.

"When it came down to making a motion to vote, all of the Council members sat there with blank faces, dismissing all of the work and effort that has gone into this campaign, as well as with the incredible press and town involvement with the issue," Kasdan said.

Former Council President Yvonne Morgan believes that discussion would have been beneficial.

"I was disappointed, but not really surprised that the Council did not motion to discuss the non-voting student seat. I thought there should have been discussion," Morgan said.

Kasdan said that a non-voting student seat would be advantageous for the Council, as well as community residents and University community.

"Students represent a dynamic and unique constituency which currently is lacking in representation on the Council," Kasdan said.

Kasdan also believes that a non-voting student seat could increase communication and have a positive influence on the town.

"As students, we currently lack a voice in the community of which we are a part; our concerns are not being heard, nor are the concerns of the permanent residents being effectively communicated to the student community. By working together we can all be a positive factor in the life of the community," Kasdan said.

Ward IV Representative Swan Stull expressed her concerns regarding the non-voting student seat.

"If there is a non-voting member on Council representing students, why not open it up to any other special interest group?" Stull asked.

Stull also sees other ways in which students can be involved with the

Lawsuit challenges Title IX

Committee to Save Bucknell Wrestling one of five plaintiffs in federal case

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

The constitutionality and legality of Title IX provisions will come under fire in a lawsuit filed in federal court.

By Andrew Burr
News Editor

A lawsuit filed by the National Wrestling Coaches Association (NWCA) seeks to challenge the legality of certain Title IX provisions often blamed for the cancellation of male athletic programs around the nation.

The NWCA as well as the Committee to Save Bucknell Wrestling (CSBW), Marquette Wrestling Club, Yale Wrestling Association and the National Coalition for Athletics Equity (NCAE) filed the suit on Jan. 16 in federal district court for the District of Columbia.

The suit claims that the Department of Education authorized "intentional discrimination under its unlawful Title IX rules" by illegally altering the way it interprets Title IX in 1996. The suit also contends that Title IX violates "the substantive discrimination prohibitions of Title IX and the Equal Protection

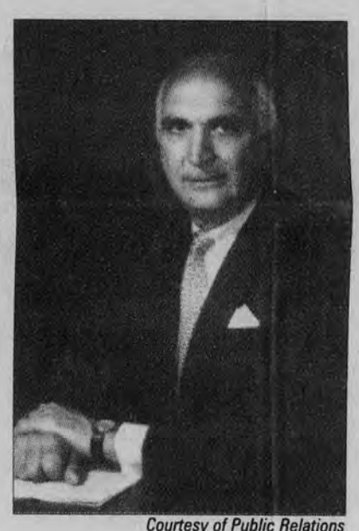
Langone named Commencement speaker



Courtesy of Public Relations

By Jennfer Jenchura
Senior Writer

Kenneth Langone '57 was announced Wednesday as the Commencement speaker for 2002 graduation. The philanthropist, businessman and former professor will give his speech May 19, on the academic quad.

"The processes of selecting a commencement speaker is started shortly after students begin classes in the fall. This year's speaker was finalized a little sooner than normally, said Executive Editor of Bucknell World and Public Relations Department Member Sharon Poff.

"A commencement speaker is not about how well-known or accomplished an individual may be, but rather, he or she should be someone who can inspire us with words to follow our dreams and achieve our ambitions," said Class of 2002 President Marsha Lewis.

Langone received his bachelor's degree in economics and political science from this University, then earned his Masters in Business Administration from New York University's Stern School of Business and entered Wall Street as an analyst in 1961. He founded Invemed Associates Inc., a New York brokerage and investment banking firm in 1974 and co-founded Home Depot in 1978. After graduating from NYU, Mr. Langone taught at the School of Business for three years and returned as an adjunct professor in 1991.

"Having Ken Langone as the Commencement Speaker for the Class of 2002 is symbolic to the metamorphosis that we, as graduating seniors, will be experiencing upon graduation. It is a common occurrence at many universities to have the commencement be delivered by a distinguished member of their community, and this year, our University has decided to do the same," Lewis.

Langone's success stems from his entrepreneurial spirit and strong values.

"Some guts will do anything to make a buck. Not Ken, which is unique on Wall Street. You could trust him with your life," said former Home

Last month the Weather Channel broadcast the efforts of the fifth Bucknell Brigade, which took place from March 10-18, 2001 in Nueva Vida, Nicaragua. This Brigade participated in the dedication of the Nueva Vida Health Clinic, a medical facility completed by the Brigade in the January.

Aired from Dec. 12-16, the four-minute segment was titled "Rescue Hurricane," and was an installment of the Weather Channel's program "Weather Heroes."

An article in "Bucknell World" featuring the Brigade intrigued Michelle Birnbaum '86, producer of the Weather Channel. The mission of the brigade, she felt, was well suited to the "Weather Heroes" theme.

New BSG officers assume duties

BSG President Amir Sadaghiani '03, VP of Administration Jessica Briski '04, VP of Operations Omar Zalatimo '03 and VP of Finance Megan Joseph '03.

By Kristen Jancuk
Senior Writer

The results of the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) Executive Board elections find four eager students taking control and preparing themselves for a promising new year.

Amir Sadaghiani '03 takes the reigns as president after serving in numerous other positions since his first days at the University. He began his student government career as a first-year class congressman. He continued as a class congressman during his sophomore year, then moved on to become vice-president of finance and finally, student body president. During that time he has also been a member of the Internal Affairs Committee, the Appropriations Committee, the University Committee on Planning and Budgeting and the Community Judicial Board.

In his new role as president, Sadaghiani hopes to alert students to BSG's goals and policies and encourage input from all students, not just those affiliated with the BSG. Sadaghiani also pledges to keep the best interests of the students in mind at all times.

"I take great pride in calling myself a Bucknellian. I think I will bring my great love of both this school and its students to the office of president," Sadaghiani said

Sadaghiani foresees several important issues at the forefront of the BSG's efforts this year, including cable in the dorms, an uphill eatery and online course registration. He states that two other issues, off-campus living and student parking, are becoming increasingly important and will be brought up this year as well.

BSG is also undertaking a new club recognition process and Sadaghiani predicts a great deal of focus on the transition.

As former president of the Class of 2004, Jessica Briski brings experience to her new position as vice president of administration. Since her freshman year, Briski has also been a member of the Academic Affairs Committee, the Community Affairs Committee and the Fiscal Affairs Committee and plans to continue her participation in the Executive Committee.

"One of my main initiatives for this position is to efficiently and accurately publicize what student issues tBSG is currently working on, the status of these projects and important information from weekly meetings," Briski said.

Briski promises to work to ensure that student concerns are heard and to make students aware of BSG's efforts to resolve those concerns. She sites her strong work ethic and dedication as skills that will make her effective in her new position and predicts a "productive and positive" year for BSG.

Omar Zalatimo, vice president of operations, has a history with student government as well. He acted as a congressman for the Class of 2003 during his sophomore year, was a parliamentarian for one year, a member of the Internal Affairs Committee for two years,

Vision 2010 off and running

By Michelle Dombeck
Arts and Entertainment Layout Editor

The University is an organization that is growing and changing. As a responsible organization, the University is taking time to examine and plan its long-term priorities. The name of this plan—Vision 2010.

"As in the life of any large organization, it's important to occasionally pause and assess where we currently are, and think about how we want to set our priorities in the future," said Stephen Bowen, Provost and Vice-President of Academic Affairs. "This is one of those occasions. We want to be well-prepared to meet the needs of future students and members of the greater Bucknell community."

The University Council, serving as the Steering Committee, has been at work throughout the last semester to put together a document that is planning out what Vision 2010 will focus on in the coming years. This document, released to faculty and staff on Jan. 15, is "essentially a plan for a planning process," Bowen said.

Even though the University is doing very well as an organization now, Bowen believes that it's important to be responsible and plan ahead.

"Some organizations begin strategic planning exercises when they're in crisis; what they're doing isn't working, so they need to put to put their heads together and develop a plan for change," Bowen said. "Bucknell is not such a situation. What we are doing now is very effective, but it's important to take time out and discuss with all the campus constituents the challenges and opportunities ahead."

One such opportunity lies with the faculty. Currently, they have a 3-3 load (three courses per semester, two semesters per year), and could potentially receive just a 3-2 load, allowing them one lighter semester per year that could give both them and students more time to work together on student projects.

"There has been a planning process in place for this for about two years, and it will probably take at least another two years to implement the changes of that goal," Bowen said. "However, it's already in progress and may have benefits for students soon."

Even though the student body will indirectly feel the impact of Vision 2010 in the near future, students can choose to get involved directly by serving on committees created by Vision 2010.

While some longer-range Vision 2010 initiatives will take more than a few years to implement, Bowen feels that involvement is key to the entire process.

"My number one priority in the near future is to get as large a segment of campus as possible engaged in the strategic planning process," he said.

New poetry prize announced

By Alyson Walker
Staff Writer

The University English Department announced an exciting new student prize, the Stadler Children's Literature Prize. The writer who creates the best piece of children's literature will receive the $500 prize.

John M. Stadler '75 established this prize hoping that it would provide new opportunities for University students. Stadler is an award-winning author and illustrator of many children's books, including "Hooray for Snail," "Hector the Accordion-Nosed Dog," "The Cats of Mrs. Calamari," and "What's So Scary?"

Stadler views the college years as "a time for surprising discoveries of new talents we never knew we had, or never gave ourselves permission to take seriously," attributing the spirit of the prize to this exploration.

"It is the hope that some talented Bucknellians, no matter what their field of study, will use this as an opportunity to explore a vista they might otherwise never have taken a close look at," Stadler said.

Stadler returned to the University last fall to give a presentation on a career in children's literature. After his visit, he decided to establish the prize in order to encourage and foster interest students in children's literature, a field that he finds compelling.

"Think for a moment about your favorite books from childhood. Now consider, maybe for the first time, the enormous impact these books had on you. They taught you to read, look, think, and they brought you great joy. Children's books are a powerful presence in our lives whether we consciously realize this or not," said Stadler.

Entries can be any type of children's book, with or without illustrations. If illustrations are used, a fully executed "dummy book" will be required. Text-only entries should be neat, double-spaced manuscripts. The winner will be announced prior to the end of the final exam period.

Any questions can be sent to John Rickard, (rickard@bucknell.edu).

Fifteen-passenger vans declared unsafe

By Chris Styers
Senior Writer

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration (NHTSA) concluded a comprehensive study regarding the safety of 15-passenger vans on April 9, 2001. Based on its research, the NHTSA decided that these vehicles were unsafe and issued a cautionary warning concerning the roll-over risks of 15-passenger vans under certain conditions.

The study, prompted by a series of rollover accidents including the DePaul women's track team, Kenyon College swim team and a fatal accident taking the lives of four Prairie View A&M University track team members, illustrated the hazards of such vehicles.

Immediately following this announcement, campuses across the nation began reevaluating the safety of their fleets. There are over 1.4 million 15-passenger vans registered in the United States, many filling vital roles in colleges and universities across the nation.

After long, idle debates and a reluctance to recognize the 70 percent rollover ratio of a van loaded with 16 or more passengers, ABC News ran a special report demonstrating the enormous risk these vehicles pose.

In a response article addressed to University faculty and staff, Vice President for Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema stated, "Bucknell is not going to put its head in the sand ... We will not knowingly endanger the lives of members of our community."

With the start of a new year, the University's Administration Council announced its plan to discontinue the use of these vehicles and to replace them with safer alternatives.

As of Jan. 1, 2002, students will no longer be permitted to drive 15-passenger vans, regardless of distance or purpose. Instead, students will have the opportunity to use any of the four seven-passenger minivans or one of the five 14-passenger minibuses. The Committee hopes these will provide satisfactory alternatives.

Concerning the minibuses, both University President Steffen Rogers and Lema have driven the minibuses and consider them "easy to maneuver and handle and comfortable to ride in."

Judy Mickanis, director of Reservations, Information and Conference Services, will head a committee to ensure that these vehicles will adequately provide for academically related transportation needs. The remaining passenger vans will be converted to cargo vans for use in various departments.

Relief group provides clinic in Nicaragua

Publicity has been a large part of the Brigade's success, both in securing volunteers and sponsors.

"Since 1999, when the Brigade began, we have worked hard to let people know what we're doing, partly because we are so proud of the Bucknell students who take this on, but also because we want the whole Bucknell community to feel involved, and to help us in the rather daunting task of raising enough money to keep the Nueva Vida medical clinic going every year," said Reverend Ian Oliver, a director of the Brigade.

The Bucknell Brigade was established in 1999 as a response to Hurricane Mitch, which dropped approximately 10 feet of rain on Nicaragua in 1998.

The first trip to Nicaragua was largely due to the efforts of Jamie Cistoldi Lee '99, who arranged as a commission of students and staff of the University who wished to provide emergency aid to the Nicaraguans. This pioneering effort was the birth of the Brigade.

The Brigade's efforts in Nicaragua are in conjunction with the Center for Career Development in Central America (CDCA), a community development agency. University students and staff worked with the volunteer residents from Nueva Vida, who were recruited by the CDCA and promised free clinic treatment as compensation for their services.

Top: Bucknellians walk among the residents of Nueva Vida. Bottom: Sarah Rives '02 was featured in the television broadcast.

The bonds that form between the members of the Brigade and the Nicaraguans characterize much of the experience of the Brigade.

"The brigadistas are there to help, but also to listen and learn about the realities of life there, and to hear peoples' stories," Oliver said. "Even though many of us don't speak Spanish, the warmth and grace of the people of Nueva Vida comes through."

The Brigade recently returned from its sixth trip to Nueva Vida where they began building a women's health clinic. The next brigade is planned for spring break 2002.

"I think the Brigade experience gives University students a chance to see the realities of the kind of lives poor people live, and to get over all the myths we have about poverty and the Third World, Oliver said. "It is a 'real life' experience that helps put things in perspective and makes students both more grateful for what we have, and yet questioning about just how we got it."

Lockerbie bomber appeals case

CAMP ZEIST, Netherlands, Jan. 23—A former Libyan intelligence agent convicted in the 1988 Lockerbie bombing began his appeal case Wednesday, a year after a Scottish court gave him a life sentence for the murder of 270 people. As proceedings began, the United States and Libya reportedly neared a deal that could take Tripoli off Washington's list of terror sponsors.

Peru seizes drug supply

LIMA, Peru, Jan. 23—Peru, the world's No. 2 cocaine producer, burned nearly 18,000 pounds (just over eight metric tons) of seized drugs on Wednesday with a street value of tens of millions of dollars, the Interior Ministry said. Most of the pyre of drugs seized since December was made up of semi-processed cocaine. The remainder was marijuana and a derivative of poppies from which opium and heroin are made. The ministry said in a statement the drugs would have fetched more than $5.8 million on the streets of Lima, $82.7 million in the United States, $206.7 million in Europe and $248 million in Asia.

Lebanese warlord killed in bombing

BEIRUT, Lebanon, Jan. 24 - A former Lebanese Christian warlord held responsible for a massacre of Palestinian refugees 20 years ago that for many symbolizes the outrages of Lebanon's civil war was killed Thursday in a car bombing at his house. There was no immediate claim of responsibility for the attack, although Lebanese and Palestinian officials were quick to blame Israel, suggesting it wanted to silence Elie Hobeika because of his willingness to testify in an upcoming court case in Belgium, where survivors of the massacre are seeking an indictment for crimes against humanity against Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. The allegation was described as "a complete lie" by a Sharon aide.

Pontiff leads prayer for peace

ASSISI, Italy, Jan. 24—Imams, patriarchs, monks and rabbis from around the world joined Pope John Paul II on Thursday to pray for peace and to proclaim that following the Sept. 11 attacks, religion must never be used to justify violence. In a brilliant display of turbans, caps and veils, about 200 religious leaders answered the pope's invitation to come to Assisi. They filled a tented arena that was decorated with a single olive tree, the symbol of peace. The event represented one of the largest gatherings ever of Christian groups, bringing together Catholics, Baptists, Lutherans, Mormons, Mennonites and Orthodox Christians, among others. The ceremony will be a "pilgrimage of hope" for participants "following in the footsteps of St. Francis of Assisi, a prophet and witness of peace," the pope said Wednesday in his weekly general audience.

Australian immigrants protest with hunger strike

SYDNEY, Australia, Jan. 23—A key government immigration adviser resigned in Australia as a hunger strike involving more than 200 people at a refugee detention center entered its eighth day, with asylum seekers sewing their lips together and seeking to poison themselves. Neville Roach said he had stepped down "in sadness" as chairman of the Council for Multicultural Australia and claimed the government was too inflexible on the issue of asylum seekers. In that post, Roach had been a key adviser to Immigration Minister Philip Ruddock. Ruddock has suggested that if the refugees—most of whom say they are fleeing persecution and instability in places like Afghanistan, Iraq and Iran—do not like the regime in Australia they should return home.

Dr. King honored with speakers and march

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Senior Writer

The University commemorated the life of Martin Luther King, Jr. one week ago on Friday. The theme of the celebration was "What Have You Done?: Stepping Up to the Challenge."

Friday's events began at 4 p.m. in Rooke Chapel with Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc.'s reading of the speech given by President John F. Kennedy on the day of King's assassination. Following the speech was a performance by the Voices of Praise Gospel Choir.

Eloiza Domingo, director of Multicultural Affairs, then welcomed all students, staff and faculty members to the University's 11th annual commemoration.

University President Steffen Rogers spoke about the University's continuing efforts towards creating a more diversified campus environment. He also expressed pride in current efforts towards this goal.

Rogers' address was followed by an opening prayer read by Safiya Abouzaid '04, president of the Muslim Student Association.

The key speaker of the commemoration was Brian Johnson, director of the Office of Multicultural Affairs at Susquehanna University. He engaged the audience in an interactive presentation entitled "Don't Forget to Remember."

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro followed Johnson's speech with memories of his own experience with King's death. Tricia Bushnell '04, a representative of BSG, concluded the ceremony with a prayer.

The commemoration was followed by a march around campus. The march featured three musical performances representing King's life and goals. Skyra Blanchard, a Susquehanna University soloist, sang "Who Could Imagine a King" in front of Freas Hall. In front of Taylor Hall, Two Past Midnight sang "Lean On Me," and the march ended at the African American studies house, with the Voices of Praise Gospel Choir performance of "Lily in the Valley."

Sofia Abraham '02, vice-president of Voice of Praise Gospel choir, believes that singing at events like the Martin Luther King, Jr. commemoration is a good way to support all University students.

"As a choir and as University students, we decided that it was important to support the African American Community on campus. I personally enjoyed the program a lot. The choir always has fun singing irrespective of the location because we are singing praise of God," Abraham said.

After the march, all participants were invited to the Terrace Room for dinner and more entertainment.

"I think it's important to celebrate Martin Luther King, Jr. Day to remind our country what Martin Luther King fought for and that we need to continue working towards his goal. Even though as a country we have come so far, we still have farther to go," Michelle Miller '05 said.

"It is important that we recognize the great achievements of Martin Luther King, Jr. In my mind he accomplished a great deal in the way of rights for all people and if for no other reason he should be acknowledged as a truly great man." Matthew Baker '05 said.

'First Night' received well by Class of 2005

By Molly Koenig
Staff Writer

Rooke Chapel was recently filled with enthusiastic first-year students in what has become a relatively new and memorable tradition at the University. The Class of 2005 celebrated the second annual "First Night" on Tuesday night. "First Night" is a celebration of the completion of the first-year students' first semester at the University. The student-led ceremony was organized by the Class of 2005 officers, who had chosen their class colors and motto and designed a class crest for the event.

A member of the Bucknell Alumni Association and Class of 2005 Advisor, Assistant Dean of Students Amy Badal started off the night by welcoming and praising the first-year students on their accomplishments in the first semester. A posting of colors followed in which three first-year members of ROTC proceeded to the front of the chapel carrying the American flag, the University flag and a flag displaying the Class of 2005 colors, crest and motto.

The president of the Class of 2005, Patrick Halley then introduced all of the first-year members of BSG who had put hours upon hours of work into making "First Night" a success, and thanked the members of the administration, parents and volunteers who had helped plan the event.

> "I was so impressed with the turnout. With approximately 850 students in attendance, it was a wonderful display of class unity. —Assistant Dean of Students Amy Badal

Attention was then turned to the presentation of the class crest, colors and motto. The class crest features the figures of comedy and tragedy, a globe, a torch and a scroll, representing the fine arts, the diversity of the class, the talented athletes and the intelligence of the students of the Class of 2005. Maroon, gold and two shades of blue are the complimentary colors that were chosen for the crest. Its motto is, "We learn not for school, but for life."

The highlight of the evening was the compilation of a class book called The Class Chronicles. Each hall had a representative who presented its hall's page consisting mostly of pictures that create a collection of memories for the Class of 2005.

At the completion of the ceremony, a run through of the alma mater, "Dear Bucknell," was led by the first-year singers representing the vocal groups on campus, after which the first-year students were led by the Bison mascot to the President's house. There, the Class Chronicles were presented to University President Steffen Rogers and his wife, along with Board of Trustees President Lee Hamilton. To complete the event in true University spirit, the first-year students serenaded them with "Dear Bucknell." On the way home from the President's house, the students were given refreshments, t-shirts and mugs commemorating the occasion.

"I was honored that we could represent the class. It's a rare occasion when the whole class can come together and share in a night of unity and celebration," said Class of 2005 Congress Member Helen Britz.

Halley also shares this enthusiasm.

"I was excited to see such a big turn out. It's a class that is destined to do great things, this was just a preview of our commitment and enthusiasm," Halley said.

Badal summed up the celebration, saying that the event "accomplished its goal of celebrating the first-year class and welcoming them as future members of the alumni community. I was so impressed with the turnout. With approximately 850 students in attendance, it was a wonderful display of class unity."

University alumni among plaintiffs in Title IX lawsuit

component of the Due Process Clause of the U.S. Constitution."

A large part of the dispute arises from the fact that proportionality, according to the 1996 Title IX revision, applies to the actual number of male/female athletes, instead of the number of teams. When the decision was made at this University to eliminate the wrestling program and reclassify the status of the male crew team, 14 varsity athletic programs were offered for both males and females. Despite the equality of opportunity in terms of the number of programs, the University still carried 157 more male athletes than female athletes.

This most recent lawsuit challenging Title IX seeks to change proportionality to mean equality based on interest, not just sheer numbers.

While the Committee to Save Bucknell Wrestling is not funded by the University, committee member and alum Steve Caruso hopes that the University will still support the committee's actions.

"We have been told in past it was difficult decision to cut wrestling and the last resort. We asked the University to join us in our fight to see if what it is doing is right, to seek the real intention of Title IX. If we got that support, then I would feel the University truly explored every option," Caruso said.

In a written statement, Athletic Director John Hardt stated that the "position expressed in the lawsuit by the named plaintiffs (including University alums) does not reflect the position of the University regarding Title IX or related gender equity issues. The University's difficult gender equity decisions announced last spring were reached only after thoroughly exploring other alternatives. Though the impact of these actions on Bucknell's wrestling and men's crew programs is regrettable, the University maintains its commitment to providing and supporting equitable athletics opportunities for our Bucknell students."

including one year as chairperson, a member of Appropriations Committee for two years and a member of the Club Recognition Committee for one year. He also served as a junior class vice-president.

In his new position, Zalatimo hopes to implement the new recognition process for clubs and ensure a smooth transition. He also plans to increase interaction between the BSG and the student body.

"My greatest skill is my experience and involvement with student organizations, which will help make this transitional year a success," Zalantimo said.

Megan Joseph '03, vice-president of finance, also predicts a successful year for the BSG. She began her work with the BSG through the Appropriations Committee and became Accounts Manager earlier this year.

"I hope to make the appropriations committee more open to campus organizations and help iron out some of the problems associated with the budgeting process," Joseph said.

Joseph is eager to get to work and hopes that people will take advantage of her open-mindedness and approach her with new ideas. She believes her organizational skills and impartiality will be an asset to the position.

"Amir, Omar, Jess and myself are working very well together. I have no doubt that we will be very productive and open to the concerns of the student body," Joseph said.

Depot CEO Bernard Marcus in a USA Today cover story on Langone's profile.

Langone's idea of integrity may be his strongest asset.

"The thing I'm most blessed about in my business career is that I've never been even tempted to compromise my values," he said in the same article.

Langone and his wife Elaine, are listed as one of the top benefactors in the University's history. In April 1999, the Langones announced their commitment of $11 million as a lead gift toward renovations to the University's Gerhard Fieldhouse, as well a new multipurpose athletic center that they will have the honor of naming. They had previously committed nearly $6 million to The Bucknell Campaign, with the majority designated for financial aid involvement in the form of the Kenneth G. Langone Scholarship Fund. The Langones have also made major commitments to his own class' record-setting reunion gift for the unrestricted annual fund in 1996-1997. As a trustee from 1980-1996, he was one of the key leaders in strengthening the University's endowment.

"One of the nice things about wealth is the fun of giving it away," he told "The Challenge," the Bucknell Campaign newsletter in 1997. "Elaine and I feel strongly that our success should be shared. You have to do something with wealth to show that it has meaning beyond numbers."

Lock Haven students join city council

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

While Nathan Sorber '02 and Matthew Kasdan '03 were campaigning for mayor and the Ward III Council seat of the Borough of Lewisburg, respectively, two Lock Haven students were trying to achieve a similar goal. On Nov. 6, 2001, Patrick Johnson and Jim Manser, both seniors at the time, became the first Lock Haven University students to win positions on the city council.

Johnson and Manser began their four-year terms as city treasurer and city council representative, respectively, on Jan. 1.

Johnson, a democrat, received a little over 600 votes, making it possible to beat June Houser, a republican, who garnered approximately 500 votes.

"I don't think my opponent took me seriously and that is why it was a close election," Johnson said.

According to Johnson, he has always been interested in politics and therefore decided to run.

"The opportunity presented itself and I figured I had nothing to lose," Johnson said.

Johnson, from also did well in the primaries, which occurred while school was out of session. However, Johnson said only about 50 new students registered to vote for the election. He credits his success to the open-minded people in the town.

However, all reactions to Johnson's victory have not been positive.

"I've had mixed reactions. There are folks in City Hall who don't want me to be here and others who welcome me," Johnson said.

Another challenge that Johnson is currently facing is the fact that Lock Haven is a mill town. However, the mill is closing. According to Johnson, the University is now the future of the town.

Johnson also expects other transformations within the city, especially with respect to young people in politics.

"I think in two years there will be more people running," Johnson said.

Johnson had also heard of Kasdan's close election and understands his uphill battle.

"He must have done quite a bit right to get that close in a write-in campaign," Johnson said.

Johnson and Manser, who graduated in December and is now doing graduate work at Lock Haven University, knew each other before the election even began. Both students served on the student government together.

In fact, it was Manser's experience on the student government that gave him incentive to run for the city council seat. During his time as vice president, Masner started to see how the students and community did not get along.

"There were a lot of unfair biases and it was odd to see how they didn't mingle," Manser said.

Manser began to meet with the mayor of the town to talk about these issues and continued to do that through his junior year, when he ran for student government president.

According to Manser, he waited to see if any one else was going to run for the position, but nobody signed up. Manser got all of the signatures he needed within a week and ran unopposed.

Manser said he has a lot of support from the Council and has not had to face many challenges so far.

"I haven't faced any challenges that couldn't be thought through. There are challenges whenever you make a decision," Manser said.

Although Manser is not facing many problems now, he received some negative comments when he began his campaign.

According to Manser, once people read information about him in newspapers and realized that he had dealt with tasks such as doing a budget, they took him more seriously.

"They realized that I wasn't just trying to make a statement," Manser said.

Manser also commends students for their role in the election.

"The students of the University have been very complimentary of my election. Also, I am truly proud at their maturity in this matter, as not one student has come to me asking to bring up issue X, Y or Z. Rather, they ask what things are going on within the city and offer ways in which student groups may get involved," Manser said.

While in office, Manser has two main goals. First, he wants the community and University to work together and learn the positive aspects of each other. According to Manser, each group judges the other based on a small percentage of the population and he wants to solve that problem.

Second, he wants to get more students to be able to use businesses in town.

Manser encourages other students to run in future elections.

"It's not too young to start. What's the worse that can happen? You lose?" Manser said.

town. According to Stull, students should live downtown and they should have internships downtown.

"Anyone is welcome to come to any public meeting," Stull said.

Peter Bergonia, who recently won the Ward III seat against Kasdan, agrees that students should attend Council meetings. He also suggested that any town-gown concerns raised at Bucknell Student Government meetings should be brought to the Council's attention.

"Anyone can still go down there and be placed on the agenda," Bergonia said.

Bergonia said he considered the idea of a non-voting student representative at first, but then questioned its advantages.

"I considered the non-voting student seat in the beginning. I thought it might bridge relations. However, all Council members are elected. Judy Wagner and I make efforts to solve problems. All citizens can attend Council meetings and I don't know how beneficial the non-voting student seat would be," Bergonia said.

Morgan does not see a non-voting student seat being created with the current Council.

"If I was the only one willing to make a motion to discuss and no one remaining on Council stepped up to the plate, I don't see the Council moving in that direction in the next two years," Morgan said.

Kasdan remains optimistic about the future of town-gown relations.

"I am not going to let this issue die and be brushed under the table, which is something that I think some of the members on the board would prefer," Kasdan said.

According to Kasdan, a new committee is being developed. It will be comprised of town residents, student residents, students living on campus and members of various committees within Lewisburg. One of the committee's main goals is to get a non-voting student representative on Council.

Morgan also expects that this committee will serve a good purpose.

"I think there will be a better opportunity for open dialogue in this new Lewisburg residents' group than at a Council meeting. There are the same eight people at Council meetings and they have their minds made up. The new group will include interested people of town who want to hear all sides of the issues and cooperate," Morgan said.

The committee will have its first meeting on Monday at 7 p.m. in the Borough building.

BSG and Kasdan need better communication to gain seat

At last month's Council meeting, Matthew Kasdan '03 presented the possibility of a non-voting student seat in hopes to improve town-gown relations. Not only did the Council choose not to vote on the matter, they did not even motion to discuss the idea of a non-voting seat. If Kasdan and the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) had more cooperation and communication, the Council would have been more likely to motion for discussion.

It is BSG's responsibility to represent the student body. In this case, BSG could have voted to officially support the idea of a non-voting student representative on the Council. With this vote, Kasdan would have been at the Council meeting with BSG's full support. Although the student body is most likely in favor of a non-voting student seat, an official BSG vote would add more validity.

Along with an official vote, BSG could have also promoted the Council meeting and tried to get students to attend the meeting. At the meeting, Council Member Catherine Scheib asked Kasdan how many students were at the meeting. He could only answer "two," ironically referring to a Bucknellian reporter and photographer. BSG should have encouraged students to go to the meeting. Students and BSG members, especially the president and Community Affairs chair, should have also been present to not only back Kasdan, but also to support the idea of a non-voting student seat.

Whether or not Kasdan attempted to get students to attend, there was not a single student at the meeting (other than the two Bucknellian staff members). Again, if there had been more communication, organization and cooperation between BSG and Kasdan, there probably would have been more students at the meeting. With more students, the Council would have seen that a great number of students are concerned about Borough issues and support the idea of a non-voting student seat in hope to mend town-gown relations. This would have been particularly helpful since the Council seemed to "forget" that Kasdan tied a current Council member in the November election.

On Monday, Kasdan, along with other concerned Borough residents, will hold the first meeting of a new committee that will look to improve town-gown relations. One of the main goals of this organization is to try to obtain a non-voting student seat on the Council. Although the group has the potential to influence the Council regarding the non-voting student seat, it will need the cooperation and determination of the permanent residents and University students to make a significant impact. BSG members should be part of this committee, not only to show their concern for town-gown relations, but also to do their job—represent the students and their needs.

The Bucknellian continues to support the possibility of a non-voting seat on the Borough Council. However, we feel that this possibility is more likely if there was more active communication and some type of organization between BSG, downtown student and permanent residents, the Borough Council and Kasdan.

Jesse Jackson should be helpful not divisive

By Tom Elliot
Senior Writer

The Reverend Jesse Jackson has now introduced his shakedown shenanigans to collegiate athletics, the latest in his campaign against discrimination. He has expressed disdain that the proportion of African-American football coaches at Division 1-A universities was "unfair and unacceptable." He asked Notre Dame to right this wrong. Less than a month later, they did just what Jackson requested, and enticed Tyrone Willington from Stanford to South Bend.

While Jackson continues to accuse companies, schools, coaching squads and everyone else of being racist as a consequence of not having enough African-American employees, he improperly focuses too much attention on baseless and ineffective reactionary measures that don't benefit the African-American community as more proactive actions could.

Similarly, the NAACP has fallen down the same unconstructive path. On Martin Luther King Day they held a rally at the South Carolina Statehouse to protest a confederate flag on the building's grounds. The flag was moved to the Confederate soldier monument as part of a compromise, yielding to demands from the NAACP to have it removed completely and others who wanted it to stay atop the Statehouse. In the end, how African-Americans have been advanced remains unclear.

Like the NAACP, Jackson should focus his resources on areas that could benefit from the attention. If Division 1-A football is his interest, perhaps he should have centered his efforts towards a much more dubious scandal: the money being made off of black "student-athletes" who, in some cases, never end up graduating.

According to the NCAA, 43 percent of black Division 1-A athletes graduate while 59 percent of whites do. However, schools where football programs are dominant see much lower rates; remember, these are just the averages. Of the 64 teams making it to the postseason last year, the black athletes at seven of these had graduation rates of zero percent. Yes that's right, not one graduated.

Miami and Nebraska raked in a total of $12 million for playing in the Rose Bowl. Jackson should make a point of these profits and low graduation rates—an improper scheme for sure.

Instead, Jackson brooded over the idea of competition. When Notre Dame said that it was looking for a coach with experience and a record of success, Jackson jumped on this for being racist. "We must remove this idea that we set criteria that eliminate people from possibilities," Jackson said (www.opinionjournal.com). If you extend the logic of that statement further, it could have some funny applications in the "real world." For instance, why should I be denied a role in the Vagina Monologues, even if I am a man with no theatre experience.

A related issue: Celera Genomics, the company that mapped the human genome, recently announced the interesting correlation between genetics and race—there isn't one! So now the Founding Fathers' sentiment has been verified by science; that all men really are created equal.

Out of the 40,000 genes that go into making a human being exist, only six of these determine race. A report on the story relayed the following, "Black, white, Asian—all are artificial, really. A black man and a white man from Manhattan, for example, are likely to be more genetically similar than a black man from Manhattan and a black man from Nigeria," (www.foxnews.com). Meaning, race is essentially invented as a product of society.

Dr. Joseph L. Graves Jr., author of The Emperor's New Clothes: Biological Theories of Race at Millennium, has echoed the same ideas as Celera Genomics. This latest revelation means that ailments that were previously considered "black diseases" such as sickle cell anemia, in fact, have nothing at all to do with race. Graves explains that sickle cells provide immunity to malaria, so only places where malaria exists do people suffer from sickle cell anemia. American blacks are mostly from West Africa, where malaria is prevalent. He goes on to point out that people in Greece and Yemen also suffer from this occasionally.

Sickle cell shouldn't be considered a black disease, and federal funds should stop being directed towards eliminating health disparities among the "races." Meanwhile, black medical associations continue to fund research into black-only pharmaceuticals for "black-only" ailments.

Following the U.S. Census' lead, every faction of American life is being broken down by race to produce meaningless statistics. As Radley Balko has written, "Black Americans are routinely told that they are sicker, poorer, less intelligent, less upwardly-mobile, less motivated, more criminally-inclined and more prone to illegitimacy than their white and Asian counterparts."

Of course none of these maladies is predicated on biology. They are class disparities, not race disparities. As conservative columnist George Will recently noted, "if one could wave a magic wand over black America and make it white, black America's problems would not disappear with its pigment."

As long as Jackson divides America into factions according to color, he should at least focus his remediating efforts towards advancing blacks instead of telling them they deserve special privileges because they are black. This only infuses a sense of inferiority, which is contrary to America's integrity.

University student repeatedly searched at security check points

Most of you have probably heard the horror stories about the airport situation, whether or not you use them regularly to get home for the holidays or travel abroad as much as I do. Ever since Sept. 11, we've come to expect the sight of armed officers in military fatigues guarding the metal detectors and other important intersections of airport traffic. We've also heard about the random searches and the extra long waits we should count on. Coming from Florida, I depend on air travel to get home on the long breaks and have traveled four times from Pennsylvania to Orlando, Fla. since the bombings. What I've come to notice will, I hope, seriously disturb you.

I was often told to be cautious and wary in the airports, as there was the possibility that Arab-looking travelers might be targets of racial profiling or mistreatment from other travelers in the airport, but nothing they said prepared me.

Upon entering the airport during Thanksgiving break, I looked around at the other Arab-looking travelers and how the guards and other passengers seemed to be treating them and was surprised that they didn't seem at all molested. I mostly saw families with small children who seemed to be treated fairly and no differently than anyone else.

But, as I looked around I noticed that most of the other people who were not staring at the other Arab-looking travelers were instead staring at me, and it was then that I realized that I was not only Arab-looking, but also a single male walking around alone through the airport.

When I sat down next to people near the crowded gates they would get up, and move to another seat as if I had some disease. People stared at me with fear in their eyes, and I saw one elderly lady trembling with fear so much at the sight of me that she spilled her drink in her lap. Primarily I took notice of the so-called "random" searches. I know that I personally was searched "randomly" six times, at every opportunity the personnel had to do so.

I fear that the events of Sept. 11 may have been particularly detrimental in the hearts of the average American. Most of us are sensitive to issues of race and some of the most shameful events in the history of America's race relations, but oftentimes, when confronted on an individual basis with these issues, we forget ourselves and what makes this country worth protecting.

I feel that the major aftershocks of Osama bin Laden's attack on America are found in the manner in which we treat Americans who are Arab-looking. It is important that we face this challenge as individuals as it is the only way we will succeed, so I would ask that you remember that the next time you see me or any other Arab-looking person in an airport.

How Enron compares to rival shredders

By Peter Hackeman
Opinions Editor

The current political-economic scandal over Enron Corporation's massive bankruptcy filing has taken an interesting turn in recent days as reports of document shredding have come to light. While it is still unclear what documents were destroyed, who destroyed them, what they said and just when they were destroyed, it is evident that this story will continue to produce new and potentially embarrassing details for all those involved. Where, then, will Enron's shredding rank among the great document shredding fiasco's of the recent past?

In the realm of politics, Enron seems unlikely to eclipse the Whitewater and Iran-Contra scandals as the top two most embarrassing rushed shredding events. During the Whitewater investigation, it was alleged by two students working for the Clinton's law firm that they were asked to destroy documents of Vince Foster. The law firm claimed that none of the files were Foster's, who killed himself.

Oliver North gained national fame by admitting to destroying documents about the Iran-Contra program. North claimed the he was directed to do this by the Director of the CIA at the time. North was so effective in his document destruction that he later ran for Senate in Virginia, losing in 1994.

If current trends hold true, it seems unlikely that anyone at Enron will overtake G. Gordon Liddy for the title of "most proud document shredder." The day after the failed break-in at the Watergate by some of his fellow Republicans, Liddy got to work and promptly began destroying documents. Liddy, after serving time in jail for his action in the scandal, recently conceded that, "I was shredding documents left and right" (www.cnn.com).

Finally, Enron probably won't challenge Coke for the worst denial of document destruction. As the defendant in a lawsuit, Coca-Cola management was accused of destroying important records by buying a paper shredder. Coke refuted the accusation by declaring that it hadn't purchased a shredder or destroyed documents. Later, an invoice from an office supply store not only showed that a shredder had been purchased, but indicated for which member of Coke's defense it had been ordered (www.cnn.com).

If Enron wants to gain entrance into the document destruction hall of fame, there needs to be some more salacious revelations to come. A few records of bribes or other illegal contributions to some important political figures, a memo from former CEO Ken Lay discussing how funny it was that his 401K and other bank accounts were overflowing with the proceeds of his sale of illegally inflated stock from Enron or the appearance of an intern somewhere in this story would certainly boost Enron's chances. If two of these come true, maybe the scandal will create enough space for Arthur Anderson to get a spot next to Enron on the wall of shame.

Locking Horns

Should CD copying be illegal?

By Ryan Gee
Staff Writer

Somewhere along the line, the recording industry has been pushed into some indefinite sector of the commercial world, a mix of conventional business aspirations and a somewhat nobler desire to send a variety of messages to people around the world through the language of music. Because of this, many people have come to adopt music as a part of the public domain, believing that it is their right to have free access to music, either through mp3s or burned CDs. Unfortunately, these people have forgotten that the music industry is indeed an industry, one that ultimately relies on profits for its very survival. By creating free music through CD burners, we are hurting the musicians, the entire music industry and most likely ourselves.

Of course, the most heinous form of CD replication is when it is done in mass quantities by music pirates, who later resell the CDs for illegal profits. This used to be mainly done in CD manufacturing plants, with pirates manipulating the factories into creating illegal CDs. However, as the Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA) continues to push for tighter restrictions, replication has moved underground to the use of CD-Recordable burners. Thanks to illegally replicated music such as this, the recording industry loses $4.5 billion every year worldwide. Although seizures of pirated CDs are increasing, the only true way to curb this growing illegal activity is to prevent CDs from being burnt in the first place.

Most people, however, aren't big-time music pirates. Most people simply use CD burners to create compilations out of already owned CDs for personal use. Sometimes they may copy a CD for a friend. It doesn't seem like that big of a deal, but even this form of burning is hurting the music industry. Every replicated CD that you give to a friend is one less CD that the musician sells and another $13 or $15 the industry loses out on.

Does this mean that we should stop burning CDs? It does seem to be a drastic choice to make because burning CDs for a few friends certainly does not deserve to become an illegal activity. However, this is one of those tough choices where we have to sacrifice something for the greater good. It is simply too hard for the RIAA, or any organization, to keep up with the skyrocketing amount of pirated music. While bands like Blink 182 or Madonna could stand to lose a few bucks, lesser-known or upstart bands cannot afford the lost revenue due to burnt CDs. We must sacrifice the personal convenience of CD-Rs for the good of the music industry, to fight against pirates and to protect more vulnerable musicians.

In the end, CD burning betrays the very ideology our economy is based on. One could argue that it is simply too insignificant to consider it an attack on capitalism, and on one level I would have to agree, but all these seemingly harmless acts can add up to a mammoth issue. If this weren't true, we wouldn't be arguing about it today. By buying, creating or simply giving your friends burned CDs, you are denying the artists exactly what they are guaranteed under a capitalist economy: the right to be paid for their services. No one has the right to take that away from them. The venerable Lou Reed puts it best by saying, "Artists, like anyone else, should be paid for their work."

Across our nation and all over the world are these wonderful places we refer to as libraries and museums. Millions of people visit them and take advantage of what they have to offer every day. These places are an opportunity to explore, enjoy and appreciate the art that another person has produced for relatively little, if any money. They are domains which make public the work of someone else. One can assume that if someone has put so much effort and so much of themselves into producing these works, then they want as many people as possible to enjoy and appreciate them. The best way to do this is to make their work available to as wide an audience as possible. This is why we have such places as libraries and museums.

With this in mind, can anyone enlighten me as to why the case should be any different for the art of music? The concept of producing CDs that are blocked and cannot be recorded has been a murmur in the news and music world lately. At the bottom of this concept is, essentially, money. We all saw what happened with Napster, and now it's happening again. Some greedy musicians decided that rather than have their music enjoyed by millions, billions even, of people for free was just not worth the sacrifice of not having the money to buy another Escalade or install a hot tub in their kitchen. It seems that the most noise is coming from pop and rock stars who are so popular right now that they fear not making enough money on their new album if they allow it to be burned. My point being that I do not hear anyone making much of a fuss about Beethoven mp3s or burning Elvis CDs.

Of course these musicians work hard and put their heart into their work (I'm sure that even *Nsync has some creative input in their bubble gum productions). I'm not denying that musicians should be making a living for all their effort, but why are they any different than painters and authors whose projects have been made available to enjoy for free for years?

Another factor to consider is that before the advent of CD burners and downloadable music people were making mix tapes and recording records, other cassettes and CDs in their entirety and it did not appear to be an issue. It may be that it is easier and quicker to record onto a CD now than it was to record onto a cassette tape ten years ago, but I fail to see the difference in the two practices. As far as making a new breed of CD that is unburnable, the artists are denying themselves the opportunity to spread their music to even larger masses than before.

Personally, I have heard a great deal of music on other people's burned CDs, that I might not have otherwise been exposed to, and then gone out and bought that CD myself because I enjoyed it so much. If the person burned that music off a CD to begin with (as opposed to downloading an mp3) then at least one person had to buy the CD in the first place, thus the purchasing of CDs is not going to die out anytime soon. It seems to me that rather than protecting their art, artists who wish to block their forthcoming CDs are only doing themselves a disservice by making their music available to a smaller audience. If the artist is truly in it for the sake of their art then they won't mind losing a dollar or two (which is about what they make on a CD) to someone who will truly enjoy it.

Rebuilding desolate Afghanistan costly

By Gretchen Schrock
Senior Writer

Representatives from the United States, Great Britain, and a host of other countries are meeting this week in Tokyo to assess the present and future financial needs of the war-ravaged state of Afghanistan and as a result, are attempting to practice their capabilities as political and economic magicians. The trick is how to turn nothing into something, how to turn a devastated country into a viable and relatively prosperous state.

In order to transform Afghanistan into a political entity that incorporates the necessity of stability, the United States has pledged $290 million in reconstruction assistance, while Great Britain has pledged $288 million over the next five years. These two financial promises represent only a minor fraction of the $1.7 billion needed to cover the first year of restoration expenses, according to the United Nations, the World Bank, and the Asian Development Bank. The United States pledge represents only 17 percent of the total, though it has taken the majority of the responsibility in fighting the war on terrorism. Is war more justifiable to a penny-pinching public than promoting peace?

Furthermore, the United Nations estimates the cost of rebuilding the Afghan infrastructure and installing an effective government at around $15 billion over the next 10 years and this amount may not be adequate. The interim government of Afghanistan is asking the international community for nearly $2 billion to finance the first year of rebuilding, in addition to $30 billion to fix every aspect of daily life that has been broken by 23 years of debilitating warfare. These differing opinions as to the financial needs of Afghanistan leave the question of which estimate is closer to reality.

Consider the present conditions in this Asian country. Leave the car at home. Eighty percent of the bridges and highways have been damaged or destroyed during the Taliban era and previous fighting between rival mujahedeen forces. Nearly one third of public buildings and 40 percent of houses have been leveled in Kabul. Outside of the city, in the Shamali Plain, entire villages have been razed, driving more than 100,000 people into refugee camps in eastern Afghanistan and in Pakistan.

Do not drink the water. The main water system in the Afghan capital is almost non-existent due to looting by fighters who sold the pipes and fixtures in Pakistan, leaving only 30 percent of homes with drinkable water. Grab another blanket. Most people heat their homes with wood-burning stoves or not at all because there are constant electricity shortages. Forget about making a quick telephone call to a friend or even a high-ranking government official across town because there are very few working telephones. Seventy-five percent of schoolhouses are destroyed or significantly damaged and the majority lack desks, chairs, textbooks, or supplies.

Do not expect the Afghan government to show anyone the money because it is essentially bankrupt, courtesy of the Taliban who looted the central bank before running for the hills and leaving the country with less than $100,000 in bank reserves. This amount will obviously not be enough to pay the back salaries of 235,000 government employees who have not been compensated for six months. Omar Samad, a spokesman for the interim government, as quoted by the New York Times, said, "You cannot have a functioning government if you don't pay the salaries of your workers. We need to have credibility in the eyes of the Afghan people."

The citizens of Afghanistan are truly in need of a credible and functional government that accurately represents their social and economic needs. Unfortunately, the United States and the rest of the developed world cannot wave their magic wand and produce a thriving, prosperous country out of thin air.

In order for the ideal of widely diffused abundance to exist, every country with the financial means to do so should contribute to reconstructing Afghanistan. Officials from the American government have already asserted that $290 million may not seem like a generous donation but have also stressed the fact that the United States has already spent $4.5 billion on the war effort since early October. Unfortunately, victory on the battlefield never brings lasting peace. Permanent serenity comes only after years of cooperation and support.

If the American political leaders wish to end the reign of terrorism in Afghanistan, they will have to spend more money to assist the Afghan people in establishing a stable governmental structure, strong economic policies to revitalize the depressed economy, and social programs to provide the necessities. Without this financial support, those living in misery will potentially sympathize with radical and extremist doctrines, providing the breeding ground for future terrorists as numerous historical examples have shown. Our actions will determine the success or the failure of the Afghan state, not the waving of a wizard's wand.

Student battles airport security lines

By Alisa Karlsons
Senior Writer

I've always loved the fact that I am from the west coast. Even after having visited the various metropolises of the east, I take pride in my west coast upbringing and calling the beautiful city of San Francisco home.

However, after having now struggled through the airport chaos of this past break, I admit I'm beginning to envy those Bucknellian's that are only a car ride from home. But unless I wanted to take a four-day car trip west across the country, I had no other choice but to fly home for Christmas.

Generally, I fly to and from the University three times a year. I've gotten used to flying and while airplane seats are no where near comfortable, I almost like the five hours of alone time on the plane when I think about the last or forthcoming semester. Unfortunately, the events of Sept. 11 and particularly the resulting heightened airport security measures have made my traveling experience increasingly unbearable.

I think it is important to emphasize though, that I felt very safe when flying. Perhaps I was a little apprehensive to get on the plane. I remember looking around the cabin, scrutinizing the passengers, but then again, I do this almost on any flight as it passes the time. In the end, I wasn't scared at all. The boarding procedure was still the same, the safety video identical and by take off, I was half asleep gazing out the window. Most around me also seemed comfortable; flipping threw magazines and reading the paper. Few even glanced at the safety demonstrations.

Importantly then, I think flying itself is not the problem. What I did experience was extreme frustration and anger at how much Sept. 11 has altered our lifestyles, especially in terms of heightened security.

Prior to Sept. 11, for example, I never arrived at the airport earlier than an hour and a half before my departure time. Over break, I gave myself two and a half hours and it was well needed.

As I began my travel back to the University, I foremost faced a frustrating baggage check-in line. Even with my parents' United Gold Card, which allowed me to check my economy class ticket at the business class counter, I waited at least half an hour. I cannot even imagine the line for all the other economy class travelers.

I was then hassled by the obviously overly tired United checker, who proceeded to argue with me for having my suitcase 1 pound over the allotted limit. In years past, my heavy bags have never been a problem. I finally gave in, finding something heavy to yank of my stuffed suitcase and carried it on the plane instead.

The greatest struggle is by far the security line. On my departure date of Jan. 13, this line at San Francisco International stretched the length an entire terminal and was four lanes (yes, lanes!) deep. My mouth dropped when I saw what I would have to wait through; only four security checkpoints for hundreds of people.

First and business class passengers had their own line, but even with their privileged tickets, they would also wait. For an entire hour, I stood in the daunting economy class line. I felt like we were herded cattle, waiting in line for thorough inspection.

I eventually did reach the checkpoint where security was at least reassuringly taking careful time to scrutinize your belonging. My photo ID was checked repeatedly. However, I found it a little ridiculous that my tweezers were considered a sharp and dangerous object and thus confiscated. Also, since I had a sweater tied around my waist, I was embarrassingly searched. Finally I was cleared and walked passed four armed guards who held tightly onto their rifles. Was this really America?

The last bit of chaos involved boarding the plane when IDs were checked again, lengthening the whole process. Passengers at random were also asked to step aside for searches. Here's a tip though: being searched is almost a welcomed reward as these passengers boarded the plane first.

Obviously I've arrived safely back to the University and conceivably my long hours of waiting were due to the holidays. The experience illustrates though, that I had often taken many of our freedoms for granted. Travel will be especially difficult for many University students who have no other alternative than to fly. Could prospective Bucknellians from a far be deterred by our university's remote location? Perhaps not, but I'm not looking forward to dealing with all this again as spring break approaches.

Stunning collapse of Enron leaves many questions

By Matthew Hinson
Staff Writer

The collapse of energy giant Enron has left thousands jobless with little hope of collecting either paychecks or retirement benefits, as well as costing investors millions. It has grown from a private sector failure to a near scandal on the part of both major parties, in addition to tainting the leaders of Enron and its accounting firm, Arthur Andersen & Co. Yet, it appears from emerging news reports that the failure is not the political hand grenade it once seemed to be, and that the fall of this company will not be a scandal of any concern to the powers that be.

Enron Corp., formerly the seventh largest corporation in the United States, has recently declared Chapter 11 bankruptcy, which allows it temporary immunity from its creditors while it makes an attempt to restructure its organization. This has lost investors millions of dollars, 20,000 people their jobs, pensions and the energy industry its natural gas leader. Stock prices declined steadily through the year, from a high of $83 per share in February to a recent low of less than a dollar as investors scrambled to abandon the wreckage of this company. Recently, the trading of Enron shares has been halted until further notice, preventing those still holding shares from selling them. Also, it has recently been discovered that Enron has been shredding numerous documents regarding some of the company's "partnerships." The FBI raided the corporate headquarters of the company on Tuesday in order to stop the shredding and take custody of some important documents. Having been a well-established company, in existence since 1930, its collapse sent a shockwave through the business community, and later the political community, when it was divulged that Enron had helped to chair Vice President Dick Cheney's energy task force, designed to help the Bush administration decide where its energy policy should be focused.

Enron's corporate headquarters in Houston, Texas was raided on Tuesday by the FBI to seize important documents and prevent futher shredding.

Democrats were quick to jump on this potential scandal, questioning just how close President Bush and the fallen energy giant were. Having discovered that Enron was part of the energy task force, it was then revealed that Enron was Bush's largest contributor during the presidential election last fall. The White House has been quick to point out that Enron received no special financial aid from the Federal Government. However, Enron's proposals to the energy task force did reportedly influence Bush's views on carbon dioxide emissions caps.

While Democrats have backed off a bit (it was revealed that the Democratic party has also received hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign contributions from Enron), Republicans in Congress, while denying a scandal, have urged the White House to disclose everything about its relationship with the failing company.

Another piece of the puzzle not yet fully drawn out is how Enron's accounting firm—Arthur Andersen & Co., is implicated. The firm gave Enron great leeway in how it reported its finances, missing the fact that Enron inflated profits by $600 million and deflated debt by more than $1 billion. Andersen claims that Enron's bad business practices, not Andersen's accounting, have led to the company's folding. What is clear is that no matter Andersen's real relationship with Enron's failure, Andersen will suffer itself—from congressional inquiries, to lawsuits from Enron's shareholders, to a loss of face (and business) as one of the Big Five accounting firms.

In this tangled wreckage of an American industrial giant lie more and more questions. What will become of the world energy market now that Enron is gone? What will become of Arthur Andersen, so mired in this drama? Perhaps more important, especially to the employees, is what will become of them?

K-Mart files for Chapter 11

K-Mart's biggest brand, Martha Stewart Everyday, will still be carried by the store.

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

The nation's second-largest retailer, K-Mart, has filed for Chapter 11 bankruptcy protection. The company blamed poor sales and the economic downturn for its financial troubles. CNN is reporting that the filing, which ended weeks of speculation in the markets, is the largest retail bankruptcy in U.S. history. The final straw for the embattled retailer came on Monday when their grocery supplier halted shipments to K-Mart due to lack of payment.

Despite the gloomy financial picture, K-Mart executives insist that they will emerge from bankruptcy. According to CNN, CEO Charles Conaway said, "We are determined to complete our reorganization as quickly and smoothly as possible, while taking full advantage of this chance to make a fresh start and reposition K-Mart for the future." Going along with that statement, the company has said that all of their 2,114 stores will remain open during the bankruptcy proceedings. Also, in the wake of Enron, the company was quick to point out that all retirement plans are intact and independent of the company. The company is targeted to come out of bankruptcy protection in 2003. Many analysts on Wall Street agree that the filing will actually be good for the company. A retail analyst for Prudential told CNN that, "They could reemerge as a smaller, more competitive company with stable cash flow. If I were Wal-Mart, I would be more concerned now than if K-Mart hadn't filed." However, some analysts disagree. A retail analyst with Bernstein Sanford told Fox News that filing for bankruptcy is going to mean shelves that are not fully stocked. "You're going to frustrate customers, and they're going to go, and it's going to be hard to get them back," Kozioff said.

In fact, it is believed that K-Mart could close as many as 500 stores while under bankruptcy protection, including the 350 they closed last year. However, the markets were less enthusiastic. The company was dropped from the S&P 500 index last week, and the stock is currently trading at less than $1 a share according to CNBC.

According to Fox News business analysts, K-Mart's biggest problem was that it did not have a plan. The stores could not compete with Wal-Mart on price, but they also lacked the name-brands and style of Target. K-Mart's biggest brand is Martha Stewart Everyday. Stewart has said that she will stay with the company "for the foreseeable future," according to Fox News.

One topic that all of the analysts agree upon is that if K-Mart is to ever emerge from this bankruptcy, they are going to have to develop a defined business plan, and trim operations to make the company more efficient and profitable.

Argentina economy collapses as government falls

By Jim Leahy
Managing Editor

Many different and equally important things have been headlining business sections of The New York Times, The Wall Street Journal and even Newsweek over the past few weeks and months. We have seen the collapse of megacompany Enron, the weakening of the Euro, the filing for bankruptcy by K-Mart, Amazon.com turning a profit, etc. However, there is one pivotal story that many people have been missing, one that has been just far enough away from the headlines to evade increased scrutiny: Argentina.

Most have just gone on to bypass the problems in Argentina completely. With the complete mess that Enron and Arthur Anderson have become, the Argentina story has evaded the media's radar. Sure, it has come up a few times in relation to companies like Citibank and JP Morgan Chase, but not at the level one might expect such an important story to appear.

The Latin American country has been in the midst of a recession for about four years and has seen its currency lose value. It has seen massive political upheaval in the past few months—multiple presidents, rioting—to go along with its money problems and the entire country is a ticking time bomb. Its problems are rippling out and beginning to effect the rest of the world.

The Argentinian government has created much of the problem that plagues the country today. It began to borrow money from numerous banks across the globe to try and plug the holes that were beginning to appear in its financial system. However, the loans grew to unbelievable heights and now the country cannot afford to pay any of them back.

According to Newsweek, a couple of problems currently exist in the Argentinian system needing fixing right away. The country's debt is the largest ever held by a single entity, an amazing $132 billion—infinitely bigger than Enron. The country also ended its policy of valuing the peso against the U.S. dollar—unfortunately, that policy had its positives and negatives. On the plus side, the peso was a very stable currency that was well respected in world currency markets through its ties to the dollar. However, it also led the goods produced in Argentina to become too expensive to export. This has caused the Argentinian peso to lose over 30 percent of its value.

Newsweek further reports that the citizens of Argentina cannot withdraw the majority of their money from banks because the government froze all withdrawals in an attempt to avert a massive financial crisis that could have come from a run on the banks.

All this has made itself known here in the United States in the form of problems at some of the nation's biggest banks. JP Morgan and Citibank were some of the largest lenders to the government of Argentina and are now feeling the squeeze, as their loans are not being repaid.

In its fourth quarter earnings release, Citibank said that "the current situation in Argentina has resulted in a $470 million pre-tax negative impact, including $235 million in a foreign exchange revaluation, and $235 million in additional credit losses, investment securities write-downs, and a charge related to the exchange of Argentine debt securities for loans."

Even worse was JP Morgan Chase. Not only has Enron hurt the bank, Argentina is hitting hard too. William B. Harrison, Jr., chairman and chief executive officer said in the fourth quarter earnings release that "2001 was a challenging year for JP Morgan Chase, and our financial results clearly reflect the difficult operating environment. Fourth quarter results were particularly affected by our exposure to private equity investments, and to Enron and Argentina." The bank's loss was particularly large and its earnings ($0.21 per share) were much lower than anyone had anticipated.

But U.S. banks are not the only ones to feel the pinch. Spanish banks were also large lenders to Argentina. As reported in the Financial Times, Spain's largest bank, Santander Central Hispano, has set aside $1.14 billion to cover potential losses in its Argentine loans. This has had a negative impact on the Euro as well. As the Spanish banking system has been forced to absorb large losses, many banks there are, according to AFX News, buying dollars instead of Euros to hedge their losses. This is putting pressure on the already unstable Euro.

The Argentina story continues to be important in the business spectrum as many companies and economies worldwide feel the effects of the default. Although the American media might continue to focus on the Enron disaster, we should not forget the problems happening in Latin America to prevent another economic disaster from harming us too much.

Walker returns to face an angry nation

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

John Walker, the American citizen found fighting for the Taliban in Afghanistan, arrived back in the United States late Wednesday, Jan. 23, to face trial in a U.S. civil court.

Beginning his trip from the USS Batann, located in the Arabian Sea, Walker was first flown to Khandahar. His flight to the U.S. took off from Khandahar airport amid tight security and military officials told CNN that Walker was the only detainee on the flight. According to CNN, FBI agents accompanied Walker on the flight from Afghanistan and he was handed over to U.S. Marshals upon landing in Washington. He will be held in the same detention facility Zacarias Moussaoui will be held in during his trial.

On Thursday, Walker appeared in the U.S. District Court in Alexandria to hear the charges he faces read to him. The most serious charge is conspiring to kill U.S. nationals abroad. According to CNN, if convicted, Walker could face life in prison.

When asked by U.S. Magistrate Judge W. Curtis Sewell if he understood the charges, Walker replied "Yes, I do, Sir." Walker also accepted the team of lawyers that his parents appointed for him.

According to Fox News, attorney James Brosnahan has already filed a motion to have Walker's statements suppressed. Although Brosnahan would not go into detail, he did claim that Walker had been denied legal representation for 54 days. However, the prosecution has pointed out that Walker waived his right to counsel both verbally and in writing. Fox News legal analysts agree that the ruling on the motion could determine the outcome of the entire case.

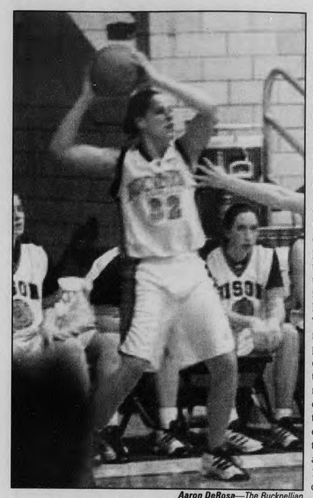
Women's b-ball remains perfect in PL competition



Aaron DeRosa—The Bucknellian

The women's team is on a roll with six straight wins.

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

The Bucknell women's basketball team experienced something this season that they have not encountered in over two years: a five-game losing streak. After jetting out to a 3-0 start, the squad put forth some good efforts in close games but according to Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka, "couldn't put it away."

After losing two games in the middle of an early four-game homestand, the Orange and Blue hoped to rebound against non-conference foe St. Bonaventure on Dec. 4th. The Bison shot 50 percent from the floor in the first half and went into the locker room at halftime with a three-point advantage.

The visiting Bonnies would outdo the home squad in the second half, shooting 60 percent from the floor en route to outscoring the Orange and Blue 43-27 in the half. The Bison tied the game at 34 just over two minutes into the second half, but they would trail the rest of the way, suffering a 72-59 loss. Molly Creamer '03 led the home team with 21 points and five assists. Tri-Captain Vicki Quimby '02 added 12 and Desire Almind '04 scored a season-best 11 points.

The Bison went north that weekend to try and halt their slide against Binghamton. The first half did not bode well for the Orange and Blue as they found themselves trailing at the end of it by eight. It was the first time all season that they were behind at the half. The Bison battled back and knotted the contest at 53 with three and a half minutes left. They would take their first lead of the game two minutes later, thanks to a three-pointer from Kate Franks '03.

The Bearcats answered and went up by one with 12 seconds left to play. Franks saw her game-winning attempt of an inbounds play bounce off the rim with two seconds left, as the Bearcats eked out a 58-57 victory. Kate Rounsley '02 poured in 14 for the Orange and Blue and Creamer, Quimby and Almind each added 10.

The Bison were back in New York State three days later to face Canisius and saw a great offensive effort fall short in losing their fifth straight. The Orange and Blue scored over 70 points for the first time this season in a 100-89 losing effort. The squad found itself playing catch-up throughout most of the contest, trailing by eight at halftime and by as many as 19 in the second half. Almind led the team with 17 points and Creamer scored 16. Tri-Captain Rebekah May '02 added 14 off the bench and Tri-Captain Monique LeBlanc '02 grabbed 10 rebounds.

After a difficult stretch on the road, the Orange and Blue returned to campus for exams and a 10-day break before their next matchup.

"I think the break for exams was nice for us this year. It gave us a chance to rest and get rejuvenated," Fedorjaka said.

On Dec. 21, the Bison welcomed Atlantic 10 opponent LaSalle to Davis Gym and set out on a mission. The home team exploded out to a 13-point lead just five minutes into the contest, and by the end of the half had a 15-point advantage. The Orange and Blue would continue their dominance in the second half, extending their lead to as much as 30 three different times before cruising to an 89-65 victory. The squad shot a season-best 57 percent from the floor and Almind matched her season-high for the second consecutive game, scoring 17. Franks added 14, while Creamer had 11. Quimby led all scorers with 26 in shooting a blazing 12-15 from the field.

"We played very well against LaSalle and we definitely needed that game," Fedorjaka said.

After Christmas, the Bison headed to Boston for two non-conference tests. Their first opponent was Northeastern on Jan. 28. The visitors fell behind early by seven, but fought back to take a 10-point lead with just over seven minutes left in the first half. The hosts would respond by going up by one at halftime and then extending their lead to 47-39 with 14 minutes to play in the game. Bucknell tied the game at 51 six minutes later and would go up by eight with just over two minutes left, to seal a 75-67 victory. Creamer scored 29 points and Almind poured in 14, while Franks had 12.

Two nights later, the Orange and Blue took to the floor against Harvard. The Bison were never in the game, down 38-21 at the half and found themselves trailing by as much as 24 in the second half. Creamer had 13 points while Quimby contributed 11 in a 67-44 loss. The 44 points were a season-low for the team.

"The 5 game losing streak right before break was a tough time, but you are going to go through some tough times during a season. We just wanted to learn as much as we could from it, and I think the team took as many positives as we could out of it," Creamer said.

"The losing streak was tough mentally. I think some of it had to do because our kids are used to winning," Fedorjaka said. "But adversity makes you stronger and ever team faces it in this game."

"The test of great teams is how you come out of it. Our kids have character and they showed out by coming out of the streak," Fedorjaka said.

The Orange and Blue traveled to the Bahamas at the beginning of this year to play in the Nassau Knockout.

"Even though we lost against Harvard, I knew the team could put it together. It was just a matter of doing it," Fedorjaka said. "The team was excited about the Bahamas tournament, especially the seniors, who have never played in another tournament besides the Patriot League tournament."

In the first round, the Bison squared off against Indiana-Purdue-Fort-Wayne. Bucknell was hot from the beginning, opening up an 11-0 lead and going into the locker room at halftime with a 42-21 advantage. In the second half, the Orange and Blue never let their lead dip below 18, en route to a 73-44 victory. The margin of the victory was the team's largest all year and the squad shot 50 percent from the floor and 62 percent from field goal range. Creamer scored 17 and Franks had 14 in the winning effort.

In the championship game, the Bison went up against Pac-10 member Cal-Berkeley. They found themselves trailing by five at halftime, 23-18. The Orange and Blue started the second half with a 15-4 run, to open up a 33-27 lead. The Golden Bears would battle back to take a six-point lead with just over four minutes to play. Bucknell fought back to take a 55-53 lead with 1:13 to play. Creamer would nail two free throws with 21 seconds left and the Bison made two huge defensive stops in the final 10 seconds for a 59-56 win. Creamer had 27 in the championship game and was named tournament MVP for her efforts. Quimby had 19 points along with 11 rebounds for her second double-double of the season and was named to the All-Tournament squad. The tournament win was the first for any women's team since the 1991-92 season.

"It was nice to experience winning a tournament and it gave the team a lot of confidence," Fedorjaka said.

"Winning the tournament in the Bahamas by defeating California really showed us how much this team was truly capable of," Franks said.

"The tournament was the defining moment for me to see this team create its own identity. After the win it felt like last year's pressure had been lifted and this team was its own team this year," Fedorjaka said.

A new part of the season began for the Bison as they returned home to open Patriot League play against Lafayette on Jan. 9. The Orange and Blue started off strong and found themselves up by eight at halftime. The home team maintained a double-digit lead throughout the second half on the way to a 78-65 win. Creamer had 23 points to go along with seven assists and Almind added 13. Franks had 12 and Rounsley put up 11 in the win.

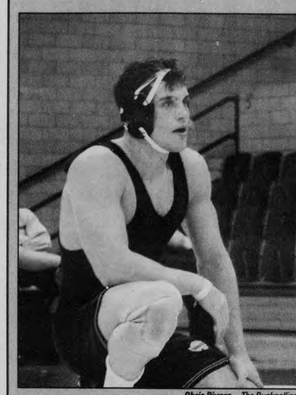
First wrestling victory holds historic ramifications



Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

Despite the victory at Shippensburg, Bucknell wrestlers are still grappling with a few demons of their own.

By Dave Cohen
Staff Writer

The Bison wrestling team endured its first triumph of the season on January 18th in a dramatic fashion over Shippensburg. The Bison led the match 17-7 after seven bouts, until Shippensburg quickly responded with a major decision and a fall. With the score deadlocked at 17, victory was placed in the hands of Bucknell's Josh Perrin '03 (133 pounds) as he squared off against Shippensburg's Joey Finkey in the match's final bout. Just 35 seconds elapsed before Perrin recorded a first-period pin of Finkey to solidify a 23-17 victory for the Bison and improve its record to 1-3.

Ironically, Perrin had been placed in an almost identical predicament two seasons prior to the match on Jan. 18.

"The same thing happened to me my freshman year against Shippensburg and I lost in double overtime," Perrin said.

Perrin couldn't help but recollect his first-year season experience as he approached the bout with Finkey on the 18th.

"I definitely did not want to lose twice in the same situation," Perrin said. "I knew that if the rest of the team could come through I could too."

Perrin then modestly stressed that, although the pressure was on him to win final bout, it took a complete team effort to win the match. "I felt pressure, but it could have been anybody (wrestling in the final match). It didn't completely rest on my shoulders because I could have gone first."

According to teammate Justin Hartrum '05, members of the team were cognizant of Perrin's prior match with Shippensburg, and were more than confident that he would prevail over Finkey and conquer the pressure.

"Perrin steps up to pressure, he loves it," Hartrum said. "We had confidence in him. We weren't nervous."

Also of note in the Jan. 18th match, Jen Perrin '05, the younger sister of Josh Perrin, became the first female to ever compete for the Bison wrestling team.

Hartrum (133 pounds) also recorded a victory by decision for Bucknell in the match and credited both his win and the team's eventual triumph to the squad's Co-Captains Rocky Miller '02 and Brian Neuman '02.

"Our captains really pushed us hard last week at practice. We really wanted to get a win under our belts and we were hungry," Hartrum said. "We knew we could beat Shippensburg and our captains helped give us both the extra needed motivation to win the match and the confidence to compete with Drexel and East Stroudsburg the next day."

Even with the future of the team in dire straits, the team still competes with intensity.

Despite this improved level of confidence following the Shippensburg match, the Bison subsequently dropped both of their matches on Jan. 19 to East Stroudsburg, 33-12 and to Drexel, 31-18.

The Bison were hurt in their two matches, both by the absence of Brock Hostetter '03, who injured his foot against Shippensburg, and by having to forfeit a total of six bouts.

Against East Stroudsburg, the hosts used two technical falls, a pin and a forfeit to compile a 21-0 lead through four bouts. On the bright side, Neuman proceeded to get the Bison on the board with his 5-2 decision over Shawn Smith at 184 pounds, which improved his record to a team-best 13-7.

The Drexel match began likewise, as the Bison trailed 22-0 early. However, Neuman stepped up again and recorded his 14th win, Brian Falciglia '02 defeated Chris Jones 8-2 at 197 and Andy Herbert '04 picked up a forfeit to make the score respectable at 22-12 after seven bouts.

"We didn't show up like we could have against Drexel and East Stroudsburg," Josh Perrin said, who was 1-1 on the day. "We could have beaten them on our best day but they are definitely respectable schools. They put forth the effort to beat us and they deserved it."

"Those teams were really tough," Hartrum said. "It was pretty tough because we lost Brock and had to give up some forfeits. We were just hoping for the best."

According to Josh Perrin and Hartrum, heart and persistence are attributes that opponents cannot pry away.

"We go into every match knowing that we can beat anyone," Josh Perrin said. "We haven't completely wrestled to our full potential, but we approach every match like we can win it and we give it our all."

"As long as I give 110 percent every time I wrestle, I know that I did everything I could possibly have done when the match is over," Hartrum said.

Bucknell is now 1-5 and returns to action at home on Jan. 27 when they face Maryland.

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

The Bucknell wrestling team had its first female grappler, Jen Perrin '05, compete in last week's match against Shippinsburg.

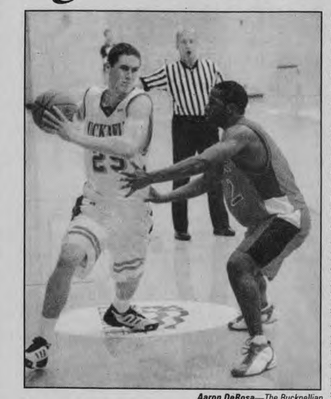
Men's b-ball team still struggling in light of critical injuries to starters



Aaron DeRosa—The Bucknellian

The men's basketball team is still looking to turn the season around.

By Pierre Hernando
Staff Writer

The basketball team's record fell to 6-11 (2-2) this past weekend when they lost to Patriot League newcomer American. However, the team's struggles should be put in perspective. Several key injuries have hit the Bison throughout the season.

It has been a tough beginning to the 2002 season, but now that the team is getting back to full strength, past losses have been placed out of mind. Wins are becoming more frequent, as shown by the team's improved play over the past several weeks.

The squad suffered a tough 69-52 loss to the American Eagles. The Eagles' Glenn Stokes proved too overwhelming for the Bison in the second half, as he propelled his team to victory with 18 points in the second stanza. Bucknell's Boakai Lalugba '03 led all scorers with 19 points, while also pulling down a game-high nine rebounds.

Point guard Dan Blankenship '03 was hot from the field as he equaled his career high with 16 points on 7-9 shooting, including 2-3 from downtown. Forward Matt Quinn '04 also contributed with eight points. The Bison held a 32-31 edge on the glass and committed only 12 turnovers.

On Dec. 29, the Bison squared off against the Hofstra Flying Dutchmen in the consolation game of the South Florida Shootout. The team picked up its third win of the season as Lalugba turned in a solid effort with 13 points and nine rebounds.

The Bison turned a one-point deficit into a 62-52 lead with a 16-5 scoring spree that spanned 7:23. The team survived the loss of All-Patriot League guard Bryan Bailey '02, who suffered a sprained right knee. The team was aided by a 13-point performance from Brian Werner '03 and 11 points from Quinn.

To start the new year, the Bison traveled down to Maryland to face Mount St. Mary's. The team earned its second straight win and fourth overall with a 58-46 drubbing over the host. The team hit a solid 50 percent of their shots.

Werner had a strong game as he recorded 16 points, shooting 7-12 from the field. He also added nine rebounds. Lalugba contributed with 15 points and three blocked shots. Blankenship had seven assists and two steals in 37 minutes of action.

Quinn provided a dramatic finish when he hit the game winning shot, and then blocked a potential game-winning shot against Lafayette on Jan. 9.

The Bison won 65-64 when Quinn hit a tough lay-up with 14 seconds left. Lafayette had a chance to increase their lead to three but missed the front end of a one-and-one with 30 ticks left on the clock.

Lafayette had one more chance, but was denied victory when Quinn swatted Reggie Guy's follow up as time ran out. Lalugba had 17 points and Werner turned in another stellar game with 12 points and 13 rebounds. Guard Chris Rodgers '04 was also very efficient with 11 points in 19 minutes.

The Bison soon fell to 1-1 in league play when they lost to Navy 64-49. Navy played tight defense and forced the Orange and Blue to commit 36 turnovers.

Navy's Jehiel Lewis nearly recorded a triple-double tallying 21 points, nine rebounds and a school-record 12 steals. Lalugba scored 11 points to pace the Bison. Rodgers played excellent defense, recording a career-high six steals.

Head Coach Pat Flannery liked what he saw when the team bounced back from its tough loss to Navy with a 56-53 come-from-behind victory over Army last Wednesday night at Davis Gym. The team trailed 28-18 at the half before Lalugba turned loose for 19 of his game-high 25 points.

The Bison launched an 18-7 run, which included two spectacular dunks by Lalugba and was capped off by a Blankenship three-pointer, to get their first lead of the contest with just over four minutes left to play.

The Bison were scorching from the field in the second half, shooting an astounding 75 percent (15-20). In contrast to their debacle against Navy, the team only committing 13 turnovers. Werner scored 15 points, and Blankenship added seven points and five assists. The win lifted the Bison's record to 4-1 at Davis Gym.

For now, the Bison are enduring the hardships and making the best of what is available to them. The imminent return of Bailey should improve the team's situation.

Despite the team's troubles, the starters have been solid and Rodgers, Peter Santos '02 and Ben Slater '04 have been sharp off the bench.

The Bison have two home games scheduled for the upcoming week—one against Lehigh on Jan. 26, and another against Holy Cross on Jan. 30.

Bison Octagonal boasts record-breakers

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer

On Jan. 19, the Bucknell track & field team hosted the Bison Octagonal in the Gerhard Fieldhouse. With a pair of record breaking performances and many first place finishes, both the men's and women's teams were able to emerge victorious in their first scored meet of the season.

The Bucknell women's team dominated the meet, while benefiting from several individual victories. The Bison compiled an impressive total score of 195, dusting second-place Temple by a solid 110 points. Pole-vaulter Andrea Nyce '02 set the stage for domination, breaking her own school record with a vault of 12-1.

Remaining undefeated this season and breaking into Bucknell's all-time top-10 list was Stephanie Bango '02 with her performance in the 1,000-meter run. Bango finished the race in 2:54.81, the fourth-best recorded time in University history. Chris Crowe '02 won the 5,000-meter run in 18:05.92 and Kelly McConnell '02 stormed to first place in the mile with a time of 5:09.18. LaTonya McSwain '02 won the 800-meter run with a time of 2:17.08, while Amy Calvo '05 recorded the fourth fastest time in school history in the 500-meter dash with a time of 1:17.01. Becki Marshall '02 cruised to victory in the 3,000-meter run with a time of 10:33.80.

In addition to the individual victories, the women's team won both of the relay events. The 3,200-meter relay team, composed of McConnell, Kristen Ferrell '02, Kelly Raffety '05 and Nicki Piper '03, turned in a thrilling victory as Piper reeled in Delaware's anchor in the final lap — the squad's final time was 9:47.75.

Capturing the ninth fastest time in Bucknell history, the Bison's 1,600-meter relay team dominated the event with a time of 3:55.02, outdistancing second-place UMBC by over eight seconds. The team consisted of Amy Calvo '05, Rehana Lanewala '05, McSwain and Bango.

"After this meet it is pretty clear that we are going to make a real nice run at the Patriot League Tournament," Head Coach Kevin Donner said. "We are strong across the board. We have some very nice athletes."

The Bucknell men won with a different approach than their female teammates. "The men did not have as many individual victories, but instead we won with our depth," said Donner.

The Bison men's team tallied a total of 147 points, 54 points ahead of second-place finisher St. Francis. Noel Powell '03 set the standard for his team with a standout performance in the long jump. With a jump of 24-9 3/4, Powell set a new school record and earned himself a NCAA Provisional qualifying standard.

Jeffery Arek '04, Eric Furst '03 and the squad's 4 X 800-meter relay team also made outstanding contributions to the team's overall victory. Arek won the pole vault with a mark of 14-9. Furst captured a victory in the 800-meter race with a time of 1:55.46.

The 3,200-meter relay team, consisting of P.J. Ward '02, Cotie Strong '02, Aaron Hanlon '04 and Thomas Prochilo '04, finished with a time of 7:57.36. Greg Costello '03 ran a noteworthy race in the mile, finishing in a time of 4:14.66, coming in second behind a national qualifier.

"It was nice to win the meet at such a large margin," Donner said. "I was a little worried going into a meet where we would have to compete against teams such as St. Francis and UMBC, but our overall depth helped us to come out on top," Donner said.

The Bison squad will be split this upcoming weekend—20 women and 20 men will travel to the National Invitational at Penn State, while the remaining part of the team will compete in the Bucknell Winter Classic, held in the Gerhard Fieldhouse.

Me like sports

New York sports teams limping home

For this inaugural column I though it wise to share some sort of anecdotal explanation for why I approach sports the way I do. A rationale for the pissiness, the resentment, the laughter, the mayhem and the romance (or lack thereof ... I mean, have you ever seen a picture of Randy Moss and his grotesque, chomping horse-teeth ... try being romantic with that). However, despite the wisdom in the aforementioned approach, I'd rather leave it up to your imagination and perhaps you'll keep reading, and <forced cough> enjoying, my articles. So without further ado:

Being a New Yorker, I often wonder what it's like to come from a region that doesn't possess one of the biggest markets in sports. New York, like it or not, has one of the strongest sports communities in the country with almost a continuous loop of year-round competitive excitement.

From the Rangers and Knicks to the Giants and Yankees, there always seems to be a game of some importance interrupting my prime-time scheduling. I mean, if I have to miss another 'Moesha Marathon' so that John Q. Cornerback can come up with a division clenching interception, I think I'll be forced to stab myself with a shiv just to keep myself focused from my Prozac-induced delirium.

Amidst the potluck bouillabaisse of wings, ribs and nachos that New Yorkers consider a "meal" during any athletic competition, I find myself increasingly agitated by the geo-centric euphoria and subsequent hubris that cascades from suburban New York with the intensity of a cartoon fire hose.

Unfortunately, the sad fact of the matter is that I too subscribe to this utopian sports arena. I bask in the warm glow of victory that few continental regions have experienced. I suntan naked under the intense, ozone-free, UV-laden bliss of New York dominance.

I'm sure non-New Yorkers, with the majority of you still being front-running Yankee-yokels, are taking not-so-secret joy in the malaise that New York sports have recently found themselves ensnared in.

The Rangers, after enjoying first place for a few weeks have finally slid behind Philadelphia and the Islanders (who are NOT a New York team, unless of course they win, in which case, I've always been a fan). On the upside, Wayne Gretzky is doing well. He's still on the team, right?

The Jets made every second of their season count with numerous come-from-behind victories that just couldn't sustain them into the playoffs. Now Vinny Testaverde will have to decide whether to go on being a well-paid, mooching, useless hack or retire and be an unemployed, mooching, useless hack. It's sad that Johnny Abraham spent much of the Wild Card game vomiting in the locker room. I think leaving little pockets of vomit across the field for running backs to slip on and noseguards to wonder, "Is that smell me?" would have been an effective defensive strategy.

The Giants, after winning the NFC Championships and getting romped in the Super Bowl by the equally dismal Baltimore Ravens, failed to even make the playoffs this year. The only gasp of fresh air for the Giants was Strahan's sack record. Thank goodness that was a completely legitimate sack, otherwise there would be nothing positive about the Giants' season.

The Knicks? This Knicks team is the most pathetic I've seen since the 2001-2002 Chicago Bulls. These people get blown out more than Hindus from the wheel of rebirth. The only thing that boosts their confidence nowadays is getting a free taxi ride home from the Garden because "Cabbie feel bad."

The Mets managed to go from World Series contender to street corner vendor. After finishing their season with the second worst offense in the league and a miniscule two games over .500, it's no wonder Steve Phillips has been working harder than an Enron executive at a bonfire. The only positive that can be drawn from the Mets season is the electric charge that one draws from the energy of fizzled hopes and dreams.

As for the Yankees ... ugh! What have they done for New York lately, huh? You were supposed to be the sure bet. Baseball's Secretariat. You were this decade's Dennis the Menace—the team everyone loves to hate. The team that stole our hearts while you picked our pockets and robbed us of our dignity. The team that sprayed mace in our eyes, told us to bend over, then pushed us off the Brooklyn Bridge.

But I digress. All you non-New Yorkers should get your laughs out while you can. New York isn't easily pushed around. We may lose a few buildings or a few championships but rest assured, next year we'll be back. We'll be back with stronger records and taller buildings. Hopefully when we rebuild, we'll bury the Knicks under the rubble. And if we place our bets right, maybe New Jersey too.

N. F. L. Predictions

Chris Perrella

New England at Pittsburgh
New England barely got by Oakland thanks to a pair of clutch field goals by Adam Vinatieri. The Patriots need Tom Brady to have a big game because it's going to be almost impossible for the Pats to run against the "Steel Curtain". Pittsburgh started to look flat in the second half against Baltimore but the return of Jerome Bettis should get the offense rolling again. The Pats only have a shot at winning if they can keep the Steelers out of the end zone and force them to kick field goals. Otherwise I predict Kordell Stewart to have a big game and send the Steelers to the Super Bowl for the first time since a guy named Neil O'Donnell was the quarterback. (I hope Kordell has a better game than Neil did). Steelers.

Philadelphia at Saint Louis
When both teams played each other during the regular season the Rams won by a field goal in overtime. The Philadelphia defense will do a good job of stopping Marshall Faulk and the Saint Louis run game but they need to get pressure on Kurt Warner to give their team a chance. Last week the Rams defense picked off Brett Favre six times and they aren't going to give Donovan McNabb any easier of a time. The Eagles have to get a ground attack going if they want to win. The quarterbacks for each team will have a tremendous effect on the outcome of the game. If Donovan McNabb has a big game then the Eagles are going to the Super Bowl; ditto for Warner and the Rams. Philadelphia.

Aaron DeRosa

New England at Pittsburgh
So Jerome Bettis was apparently ready to play in last week's game against Baltimore, but after receiving an injection in his groin that went horribly wrong, he was sidelined. Wuss. Perhaps the powers that be are trying to tell Jerome something. Not only should you not be playing football, perhaps you shouldn't be allowed to breed. That's all we need is the progeny of 'The Bus.' Little minivans rolling around, making a mess of the atmosphere, whining and pouting, taking the last McDonalds windup car so that I have to settle for the Hamburglar motorcycle. Little brats. Pittsburgh fans shouldn't be upset though. Without Bettis, they get to rely on Kordell Stewart to lead the game, and although he's proven me wrong consistently in the past, made me look like a fool in front of all my friends and even inspired me to gouge my eyes out with the sharpened end of a spoon instead of watching him play, I'm still confident that they will beat a New England defense that has a hole in it the size of the gap between Michael Strahan's incisors.

Philadelphia at Saint Louis
If there's any secondary in the league that can stand up to the Rams' wide receiver core, it's the Philadelphia Eagles. Kurt Warner, bruised and softened like a summer peach in sunshine, will roll a wheelchair onto the field to assist his movement in the pocket. Hey, for a second there it almost sounded like I knew what I was talking about. Don't worry, I read it on the back of a box of Special K. I have no original thoughts. Except maybe picking the Eagles.

Cecily Cairns Classic Corner

It is often said that when an athlete's career is placed in retrospect, it is not his best game that ultimately defines him, but rather, his worst. Or perhaps more accurately, his most adverse. It is in the clutch — in the waning minutes of a seemingly futile endeavor — that Hall of Famers are crowned and the love affair between athlete and fan is solidified.

Marty Schottenheimer once stated that if he had one football game to win, he would want Joe Montana at the helm — but if he only had one play, he'd want John Elway.

By the time he retired in 1999, Elway had amassed a storied reputation as the almost undisputed champion of poise in dire situations. So dynamic was his talent in the clutch that he could line up in shotgun on a fourth-and-never play, down by seven with a minute and a half left—caught up in a fiasco that even his teammates didn't believe there was a way out of—and the opposing team would actually quake with fear.

For the opposition, Elway was a nightmare; for the city of Denver, he was a savior.

Forty-seven times, he turned disastrous games into masterpieces. Forty-seven times, he was the "jaws of life" for a team that managed to recurrently land itself in a desperately pathetic state of affairs. Forty-seven games, forty-seven potential-losses-turned-victory, forty-seven works of art.

But of those 47 games, one stood alone to exemplify the quintessence of John Elway's approach to the game of football.

It is called, quite simply and gracefully, "The Drive".

On Jan. 11, 1987, Elway hauled his Denver Broncos from the realm of post-season death, and at the same time, dragged himself out of what had become a relentless inferno of scrutiny regarding his ability to quarterback an NFL team.

In the four years preceding The Drive, the cannon-armed Californian had sent the press reeling for a vast array of reasons, most either unfounded or unfair. He was labeled a draft-dodger, a spoiled brat and—after a calamitous rookie season—a complete disappointment.

But adversity breeds fortitude, and four years after his pathetic debut, Elway clawed his way back to partial respect when he led the Broncos to a berth in the AFC Championship game against the Cleveland Browns. The game itself, as it turned out, would serve as his official—and successful—appeal for redemption.

Surrounded by the din of thousands of eccentric fans, the two teams duked it out over a frozen field, and as the clock crept into the final minutes of the fourth quarter, Cleveland had taken control with a 20-13 lead.

When the Broncos mangled a kickoff return, Elway found himself lining up at the Broncos' own two-yard line, with five minutes and 43 seconds left in regulation. Standing between the Broncos and a Super Bowl berth was a daunting compilation of obstacles: Elway had 98 yards to travel and less than six minutes to do it. He had to do it on a sprained ankle, on the frozen, muddy ground and in a ruthless wind chill of five degrees. To make matters even more interesting, Cleveland fans pelted him and his team with their favorite projectile—canine snacks.

The situation was so dire that the League Office personnel had already moved the AFC Championship trophy to the Browns' locker room.

But Elway plugged away, seemingly unconvinced that his mission was inherently futile. Belting out commands over the pandemonium of the crowd, Elway scrambled, passed and simply pounded the ball downfield. As the two-minute warning rolled by, the Browns felt a collective lump form in their throats - but their confidence was reinforced when Elway was sacked for an eight-yard loss, leaving the Broncos to face a third-and-18.

Painted by Cecily Cairns

The next play started out on the verge of disaster, as the snap grazed the leg of man-in-motion Steve Watson. But Elway leaned forward and snatched the misguided snap, and almost as though it were planned, he just stepped back, glanced downfield, and rocketed the ball into the arms of Mark Jackson for a 20-yard completion.

And just like that, the whole stadium realized what was unfolding before them. Elway had just turned the unthinkable into a possibility, and needed only 28 yards to turn it into a reality.

Five plays later, Cleveland cringed as he lined up his team on the five-yard line. With 31 seconds left on the clock, Elway pelted Mark Jackson with a line-drive pass in the endzone, putting an exclamation point on the miracle that he'd just orchestrated.

Launching another drive in overtime, Elway set up Rich Karlis' barefooted field-goal, which just barely crept to the inside of the left upright, catapulting the Denver Broncos straight into a Super Bowl berth.

The Drive was only the 12th of what would eventually be a record 47 fourth-quarter comebacks for Elway. By the time he retired, it was only one of 128 victories. It didn't win him an NFL Championship—he wouldn't achieve that for another 11 years.

Still, The Drive provides the lasting image of John Elway's trademark perseverance: the right side of his bright orange jersey coated in dark brown mud, his wide eyes fixed on the first down mark, his stark white number seven radiating as he glides across the grayish-green grass, eluding linebackers and somehow always ending up exactly where he needs to be.

If an athlete is defined by his most adverse game, The Drive leaves John Elway on a pedestal.

Those 98 yards and five minutes would become the measuring stick for every last-second win, every improbable finish, every Hail Mary before and after 1987.

And fifteen years later, nothing compares.

Women's tennis squad ready for upcoming season

By Caity Selleck
Staff Writer

After a very successful fall, the University's women's tennis team began practice Tuesday in preparation for their spring season. They will be restricted to practice in the field house, until weather allows them to use the outdoor courts.

This fall, the Bison won all three of their dual meets, due to excellent individual and doubles performances from the team. The team also had a number of individual successes during the three Invitationals of the season.

Kristen Inglis '02, this year's lone captain for the squad, has shown a great deal of improvement from last year, according to Head Coach Rebecca Helt.

Other players noted to be a force for Bucknell are Samantha Berthod, '04, who last year was a force in both singles and doubles play for Bucknell, and Tanya Sichko '05, who went 9-1 in singles play for the 2001 fall season, going undefeated until the Patriot League individual tournament at the end of the season.

"All of our returning players have improved tremendously since last year, and I can't wait to see how our two juniors who were abroad last semester will fair in the spring season," said Helt.

Helt has a positive outlook for this year's team, both overall and in Patriot League play — though all teams in the league are very competitive in women's tennis, especially Army and American University.

"As long as we see top performances from our top six or seven players, and they play to their full potential, we should do extremely well in the Patriot League," Helt said.

Unreported Games

The men's basketball team defeated Colgate 80-75 last night to bring their Patriot League record to 3-2

The women's basketball team fell to Colgate 84-81 last night to snap a six game win streak. One more win would have set the Bucknell record.

Inside Sports

Sophomore Maria Garcia, a thrower for the Bison track & field team, has been named as the Eastern College Athletic Conference Division I Field Athlete of the Week. Garcia was honored for her victory in the 20-pound weight throw last week at the Bucknell Gulden Relays. She won the event with a throw of 49'10 1/2", nearly four feet better than her nearest competitor. It was also the fifth-best throw in University history. For her efforts, she was honored as the women's field meet MVP.

Junior nose guard Adam Lord was named as an Honorable Mention All-American by Don Hansen's Football Gazette. The Bison's most decorated player this season, Lord notched team MVP honors after a solid junior campaign anchoring the Bison's defensive line. A First Team All-Patriot League selection and a finalist for Patriot League Defensive Player of the Year, Lord finished the season with 42 tackles, more than a third (16) of which came in the opponent's backfield. He registered five sacks, forced a fumble and recovered another.

Freshman Jackie Feinthel led the women's swimming team with a pair of victories in the 1,000 free and the 200 fly. In the 1,000, she recorded a time of 10:30.19, good for a new Bucknell school record. That time will also forever be the Freas-Rooke Pool record. Feinthel captured the 200 fly with a 2:10.90 time.

Bucknell relief pitcher Gregg Farmery '02 has been named as the Patriot League Preseason Pitcher of the Year by Collegiate Baseball. Farmery finished with a 3-1 record and a 1.61 ERA in 28.0 innings pitched as the Bison's closer last season. He also established Bucknell single-season records in both saves (seven) and appearances (22), and was a First-Team All-Patriot League selection for the second year in a row.

NBA glory days a distant memory?

COMMENTARY

Rob Schmicker

Those with even the slightest basketball knowledge are aware that the NBA is not what it once was. Gone are the days of Magic Johnson and the Lakers vs. Larry Bird and the Celtics, when teams were led by an individual, rather than overshadowed by one. Today, the game is focused around individual achievement. While the current crop of young stars has helped inject excitement and energy back into the league, they have also taken away from the team concept.

With youth comes selfishness - everyone wants the spotlight for one reason or another. Over the past month, the media has had the pleasure of covering on and off-the-court distractions instead of game-related stories. Instead of focusing on teams, they have turned much of their attention to individual headliners. Whether it is bench clearing brawls or meddlesome owners, the NBA is no longer just about the game of basketball.

The first occurrence to have mired the outcome of a game came as a result of hard fouls by Kenyon Martin of the New Jersey Nets. On Dec. 11, Martin was suspended for closelining Karl Malone and, less than a month later, was suspended again, this time for nearly decapitating Tracy McGrady in the Nets' 109-96 loss at Orlando.

These incidents have helped Martin gain a reputation for being a thug instead of the talented and aggressive team player that he is. Without him, the Nets would not be 27-12 and hold the distinction of best team in the East. The team is unjustly being overshadowed because of Martin's two brief emotional breakdowns.

Speaking of breakdowns, Shaquille O'Neal also had one in the Lakers 106-104 loss to the Chicago Bulls. After a hard foul by the Bulls' Brad Miller, O'Neal attacked Miller, barely missing a knockout blow to the head. O'Neal, Miller and two other players were thrown out of the game, with O'Neal receiving a three-game suspension.

After the game, the media's attention was on O'Neal and Miller, rather than the Bulls' shocking upset victory over the defending champs. Rather than commenting on his team's incredible victory, Miller talked about how hard fouls were the only way to stop O'Neal, since he is bigger than the rest of the league and gets away with numerous offensive fouls.

If fighting between players isn't enough, the NBA then has to deal with the verbal jabs thrown by Dallas Mavericks owner Mark Cuban. Cuban, Internet billionaire, has once again found a way to direct attention away from his team and to himself. In the Jan. 6 issue of The Dallas Morning News, Cuban commented on league director of officiating by saying, "Ed Rush might have been a great ref, but I wouldn't hire him to manage a Dairy Queen. His interest is not in the integrity of the game or improving the officiating."

Dairy Queen, in return, challenged Cuban to manage one of their stores for a day. In what many considered a carefully planned media stunt, Cuban called their bluff and agreed to work for two hours at a local chain. Whether you love him or think he's just a jerk, Cuban has done everything right in turning around what was once the NBA's sorriest franchise. The problem is that he is taking all the credit away from the team — a team that had a 28-12 record through Monday.

While Cuban likes to think that he is above the NBA, Jordan remains larger than life, as his presence alone is enough to send the media scrambling. Since Jordan's return, the main story around the league has been his role in the resurrection of the Washington Wizards. He is the leading scorer and shooter on the team and has taken all the credit for Washington's dramatic turnaround.

He has been able to develop some of the team's younger players simply by playing next to them, but we all know that isn't the big story. The big story is Jordan himself. If Washington doesn't win another game this year, Jordan will be the one blamed. The Wizards are not a team — they are Jordan's team and will stay that way for the rest of his playing days.

If Jordan's impact on the court wasn't enough to overshadow the bigger picture, his recent divorce and return to Chicago helped direct all of the focus off of the team. The media wants to know how Jordan will react to his recent personal problems; they want to know how he will fare in his return to Chicago, where he won all six of his NBA titles.

The fact remains that Jordan is the reason people watch basketball in Washington. No one cares about the team, how the team won the game or how the team has progressed since the beginning of the year. Fans only want to see Jordan. But maybe we should have expected this all along. In a society where individual achievement is the norm, did anyone actually believe that the team concept could save the NBA? We want to watch the players on the court and know about them off the court. We want to see fights and we want to hear someone complaining about how the league is fixed. It seems as if controversy can do something that a pure sport can't — sell tickets.

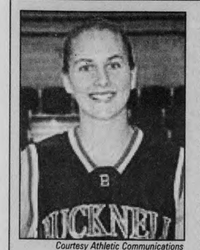
Athlete of the Week

By Scott Kloss



Courtesy Athletic Communications

Molly Creamer '03

Creamer averaged 39.0 points, six assists, four-and-a-half steals, and two blocks per game over the week.

Molly Creamer is this week's Athlete of the Week. Molly, a 5-10 guard on the women's basketball team, set or tied four different records, including points in a game. Creamer scored 43 points in a 79-69 win over Army, before tossing in 35 points in Bucknell's 85-76 overtime win at American this past Saturday. As a result of her dreamy play, Creamer has been named the Patriot League Player of the Week for the third consecutive week. During that span, Creamer averaged 39.0 points, six assists, four-and-a-half steals and two blocks per game.

"I very much was not expecting to have a certain point game, going into the Army game. We knew that Army was going to be tough, so we just tried to get a victory at all costs," Creamer said. "My teammates were setting me up, setting great screens and making great passes. We all try and do our part, and I guess that night my job was to hit the shots they were creating for me."

Against American, Creamer brought her "A" game, making her first four shots of the game, all three-pointers. She finished the first half with 18 points on 6-of-8 shooting, eventually tallying 35 points in the overtime victory. Scoring is one of the many gifts Creamer brings to the game. She has a polished game, leading the squad with seven assists, four steals and a career-best three blocks in the American contest.

Creamer couldn't be as successful without a supporting cast. As such, Creamer exemplifies a true teamwork spirit and entertains lofty goals for the remainder of this season.

"Our teams' ultimate goal is to be the best team we can be. We believe if we achieve that we can do big things," Creamer said.

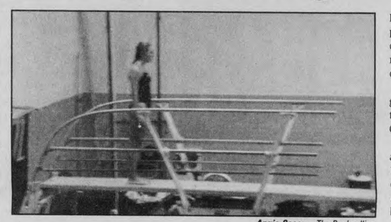
Excitement is not foreign to Creamer, and while there have been many exciting moments this season both on and off the court, being with her teammates gives her the strength to strive forward.

"My most memorable moment on the court, I would have to say, is our trip to the Bahamas. We became very close over that trip and had two big wins down there," Creamer said. "I would have to say our win versus Cal-Berkley was a great moment so far this season, everyone on the team came up huge, on the court and on the bench, all 15 of us."

The Bison are currently 11-6 overall — 4-0 in the conference — and continue Patriot League competition with a contest at Lehigh on Saturday, Jan. 26 at 1:00.

Off the court, Creamer enjoys perusing her major in education. Ideally, she would like to obtain a dual major in history to compliment her current studies.

Swimming and diving teams have strong showing in League meets



Angie Casey—The Bucknellian

The diving team finally found their rhythm.

The men's and women's swimming and diving teams are right where they want to be heading into the latter part of their season as they prepare for the Patriot League Championships.

In early January the team competed in the Florida Atlantic Invitational as part of its annual winter training program. A third place finish at the event prepared the Bison well for future League play, and propelled them to two key victories against rivals Lafayette and Colgate.

The women's team captured 12 of 16 events against Lafayette en route to a 182-113 victory over the previously unbeaten Leopards. Jackie Feinthel '05 took the 1,000 free, 200 fly and 500 free events. Another triple winner for the Bison was Abby Weaver '02, who won the 50 free, 100 free and 100 fly.

Darby Golino '03 and Jamie Flick '05 also racked up first place finishes for the Bison. Golino placed first in both the 100 back and 200 back, and Flick reestablished her own school record in the 200 breast and nearly did the same in winning the 100 breast.

"I'm really happy about how we've been swimming as a team," Flick said. "And I think that I've improved a lot with the transition to college, the new coach and learning new techniques that have helped me out a lot."

"The records that were set really got the kids fired up and helped them swim even better," Head Coach Jerry Foley said.

The men were equally dominant against Lafayette, dominating 166.5-116.5. Jack Sheehan '04 was the only one to earn multiple victories in the meet, winning the 200 back and 100 back.

Other first place finishes included Stellios Saffos '03, Adam Freeman '05, Stephen Schwanhausser and Gonzalo Diaz '03. The Bison also took the 200-medley relay to insure the victory against the Leopards.

In the final meet ever at Freas-Rooke Pool the Bison swept League foe Colgate. The women's side jumped out to a quick start and Colgate was unable to come back.

"The first events were really critical," Foley said. "I knew that if we could come out on top early that we would win the meet."

Once again Feinthel came out on top in the 1,000 free and 200 fly events. In the 1,000 her time of 10:30.19 was good for a new Bucknell school record, one that will stand at Freas Pool forever with its closing.

For the men's side there were several double-winners that helped the team defeat rival Colgate. Peter Garvin earned 10 points for the Bison with victories in the 100 free and the 50 free. Kurt McCoy '03 won both the 1,000 free and the 500 free, and Sheehan won the 200 IM and the 200 back.

The men also captured the 400-medley relay to win the event with a time of 3:38.42.

"We didn't expect to with that relay," Foley said. "So that was a huge upset, and a key part of our meet."

The Bison travel next to Lehigh where they will take on a very strong men and women's team.

"It's always tough to win on the road, and we're swimming two good teams that Lehigh has. It's going to be a much tougher task to win in their house, but I think we can do it," Foley said.

Both the men and women's teams have two Patriot League losses that they will try to avenge in the tournament. Foley is confident that the squad will continue to improve to the level where they need to be.

"We're a much better team than we were first semester," he said. "We've got some injuries, but that just means that everyone is going to have to step it up."

Women's b-ball still playing their strengths

"It was a good win, but me along with the team realized that we could have closed the game out earlier and need to work on that," Fedorjaka said.

"Desire was big in the game, especially after she didn't play in the Bahamas because of an injury and Kate Franks is putting together a great Junior campaign and just playing solid all-around," Fedorjaka said.

The Orange and Blue traveled to Navy for their second league game and fought hard for a 69-52 victory. Almind had anther good effort, scoring 12, while Creamer earned her third double-double of the season with 16 points and 10 assists. Quimby added 15 and Franks had 12 points and eight rebounds. LeBlanc had an excellent defensive game, holding Courtney Davidson, one of the League's top scorers, to a season-low nine points.

"We answered well down there. We played very well in the second half. Desire was huge with 17 and Kate Franks hit big shot after big shot," Fedorjaka said. "Monique is our defensive stopper. A lot of Navy's offense generates around Davidson and Monique really shut her down."

The Bison returned home to square off against Army in what would turn out to be a magical night for Creamer.

The Orange and Blue point guard scored a League-record 43 points and hit eight three-pointers to set the school record for treys in a game and also became the school leader in three-pointers. She also tied League and school marks with 16 field goals in the first half. Despite all this, the Orange and Blue were down by four, 40-36 at the half.

Army would go up by as much as seven in the second half, but the Bison battled back to knot the game at 50 with 12 minutes to play. After holding a three-point advantage, with two and a half minutes to play, the Orange and Blue held their opponents scoreless for the rest of the contest to secure a 79-69 victory.

"It was certainly a special night for a [Creamer]. She was in the zone as they say. It was a great performance by her but also by the team as well because they recognized how well she was shooting and did a great job of getting her the ball. Jealousy does not exist on this team," Fedorjaka said.

"[Creamer] was in the zone as they say. It was a great performance by her but also by the team as well because they recognized how well she was shooting and did a great job of getting her the ball. Jealousy doesn't exist on this team.
— Kathy Fedorjaka, head coach

The women were back on the road again this past Saturday to go up against new League member American. The Bison got off to a good start, building a 13-point lead. But 17 turnovers allowed the hosts back into it and they knotted the game at 38 with one minute to play in the first half.

The Eagles took a seven-point lead with 12:29 to play in the game, but the Orange and Blue fought back to tie the game at 60 five minutes later. Creamer put her squad up by one, 73-72 with 14 seconds left and American had two free throws to win it, but only connected on one to send the game into overtime.

Kate Franks scored six points in overtime to lead the Bison to an 85-76 victory and their sixth straight win. Creamer continued her tear, scoring 35 points, and Quimby and Almind each contributed 12. Franks and Rounsley had identical numbers as well, each scoring 10 points and hauling down 12 rebounds. With nine rebounds, Quimby became the third player in University history to reach 800 career rebounds.

"American is a very quick and athletic team and they press a lot. It was a very good road win for us," Fedorjaka said. "It was a big comeback for us being down seven on the road. I was pleased to see that the team did not panic and I remained confident. Experience definitely helped in that situation."

"We've been playing great and that is credited to our heart, hard work and devotion to this team," Rounsley said.

"We're very excited to be first in the league right now, but we also know that we have plenty of work left to do, and that every team is after us in League play. We're the team to beat, and none of us are satisfied," LeBlanc said.

The Patriot League season continues for the Bison as they welcome rival Lehigh to Davis Gym this Saturday at 1 p.m™.

"It is going to be a hard, defensive game. They like to play us and they have beaten us at home the past two years," Fedorjaka said. "We will be prepared. It is going to be a big game."

An abroad perspective: a semester in D.C.

By Carmen Mauriello
Senior Writer

After just four classes at American University's Washington Semester Program, I was already getting sick of journalism.

Two prominent speakers, a Newsweek editor and a CBS correspondent, as well as my professor, a Washington Post reporter, spoke endlessly about the sensationalist saga of Gary Condit and Chandra Levy. Did I enroll in tabloid journalism by mistake, I wondered?

Then Sept. 11 happened. What may be the worst tragedy in United States history transformed my semester in Washington, D.C., and turned out to be a great boon to my study of journalism and my proficiency in hard news reporting.

After being born and raised in small town Pennsylvania and moving to the Lewisburg "megalopolis" for college, I didn't know if I could adjust to the city life of Washington. Oddly, a tumultuous car ride at the beginning of the semester provided some answers. Ordinarily, the drive from my house to Washington should take four hours of highway travel; ours took 12. We got lost twice and my dad's 1987 Chevrolet Bonneville broke down three times, leaving us in a pitch-black highway pull-off at midnight. While my mother could only nervously chant the rosary, I walked outside and tossed a frisbee in the "murder capital of the world," thinking this place wasn't so bad. It was the beginning of my love affair with the city.

The Washington Semester Program has a small, satellite campus just down the road from American University, and I stayed in a dorm there appropriately named Capital Hall (see me if you want to have a Capitol/Capital spelling debate). The campus was very "high schoolish," since with only 500 students you knew just about everyone and inevitably cliques formed and gossip flied.

But looking back, I'm glad the program was set up like it was. It led to great discussions and debates with others who were also intensely interested in politics, the economy and journalism. It also exposed me to a diverse range of viewpoints and perspectives, as the program included students from almost every state and over 20 countries.

I spent the majority of my days with my journalism class, 25 students with diverse interests including newspapers, radio, broadcasting and law. The classes rarely met in the traditional classroom setting, as a big part was hearing from prominent journalists and touring the offices and newsrooms of magazines, newspapers and television news programs. This was definitely a refreshing break from the often-repetitive Bucknell routine.

The Sept. 11 attacks shut down our campus for essentially a week. Our campus was several miles from the Pentagon and downtown Washington, but we nevertheless received two bomb threats. Almost a dozen students left the program after the attacks, but I had no such inkling. I was definitely shaken by the attack on Washington, but at the same time I enjoyed being in the thick of things—my journalist instincts were kicking in.

My semester was transformed after Sept. 11, but not because the number and quality of our speakers and field trips diminished—what most students in my class feared. This was a legitimate concern because many organizations, particularly in our fields of journalism and government, tightened the hatches after Sept. 11. But amazingly, my professor's excellent contacts got us into almost everywhere, including the State Department, the Old Executive Office Building (on White House grounds), The Washington Post and ABC studios.

A panoramic view of the United States Capitol Building on a sunny Washington, D.C. day.

The real change was in the quality of the topics we studied—no more gossiping about scandals but now focusing entirely on Sept. 11 and its aftermath. We pried insiders about every aspect of the story, including a Washington Post reporter about anthrax developments and White House Press Secretary Ari Fleischer about the government's response to terrorism. We also heard the opinions of several top journalists, including Sam Donaldson and White House correspondent Helen Thomas.

But I probably gained the most from interacting with my classmates.

Many had been visibly affected by the attacks, and our discussions often led to thoughtful and emotional insights.

I don't want to give the impression that my semester was sober and dreary, in fact I had an incredible time exploring Washington and traveling throughout the East Coast. There's so much to do in the city, and most importantly for a college student, so much to do cheaply. Without a car, the subway system, called the Metro, was my refuge, and my weekends frequently included a steady diet of monuments, parks and museums.

The 14 Smithsonian museums are great, and all free of charge, but I was most moved by the Holocaust Museum. I thought I knew a fairly good amount about the Holocaust before I visited it, but I was wrong. The museum is thoroughly saddening, and the accounts it holds are shocking and explain more than any textbook.

My travels included a camping trip to Williamsburg, Va., where I was able to conquer my fear of the Big Bad Wolf roller coaster at Busch Gardens. I also checked out New York City, stopping in FAO Schwartz toy store and the Metropolitan Museum of Art and riding to the top of the Empire State Building. I observed the devastation at Ground Zero, and was astonished not only by the huge void that was left but by the extreme anguish and pain in the faces of the silent onlookers over three months after the attacks.

If I could have chosen any semester to study in Washington, I would have undoubtedly chosen this one. My experiences have impacted me deeply as a person and as a student, and I feel I am now better prepared to embark on my journalism career.

Upon returning to Bucknell, many of my friends have joked about my semester "inbroad," but compared to Lewisburg, Washington felt like another world.

Good things come in small packages

Who would of ever thought it possible to hold the powers of a cell phone, a PDA organizer, email, SMS messaging and Web browsing all in the palm of your hand? Today's modern technology gives Americans this privilege.

The Treo 180 is the newest of these technologies. It is the first radical redesign of the Palm Pilot in its six-year history. It is even smaller than a Palm organizer. It has a small Query keyboard and a monochrome touch-screen display. It costs $549 with service activation, or $399 without. The Treo 180 is the first in a series of Treo communicators that Handspring plans to introduce this year. However, according to Time , the phone is based on the GSM 900 and 1900 wireless phone frequencies, which is not standard in the United States meaning it will not provide the same wide coverage areas as CDMA and TDMA systems.

The e-mail system is good for consumers but does not provide the security needed by corporate users. Web-browsing features are somewhat limited by screen. The 180's rechargeable lithium-ion battery promises 2.5 hours of talk time and 60 hours of standby.

The four primary application buttons on Treo 180 are phone book, date book, web browsing and messaging. The phone features a speed-dial system, a speakerphone, three-way calling, call waiting, a call-history log for retrieving phone numbers and a simple on-off switch for turning off the ringer. There is also a built-in calendar, to-do lists and memos.

The Palm OS adds expense reporting, a calculator and other handy travel features, along with access to hundreds of Palm-based programs and games (the Treo has 16 MB of memory). There is even a jog wheel on the side helping one to scan through lists more quickly.

According to Time Magazine, color-screen version is coming mid-year, selling for $599. Handspring hopes to eventually offer a CDMA version, expanding the choices for wireless service beyond VoiceStream and Cingular. Right now, Treo users have to dial up Internet service providers in order to retrieve their e-mail and put up with a slow speed of 9,600 bits per second, but soon software, such as GPRS (General Packet Radio Service) may be installed avoiding this inconvenience.

Soon the Treo will be able to connect to the Internet automatically when the phone is turned on and speeds would increase at least fourfold.

Casting the Bucknell mold

By T. Patrick Halley
Staff Writer

The University community has long been under the criticism of being a living J-Crew catalogue. Perhaps this brand-name image fits the somewhat utopian side of town, high atop a sloping grassy knoll (though far more mountain-like when walking to a Thursday 8 a.m. class). They are the subject of this particular case study, a group more complex and intricate than the plot details in an adult film. Local animal behavior specialists have tagged them "Bucknellians" — and take note of two distinct genders within the pack. Male and Female, as we shall hereafter call them, do share common preferences, patterns and traits. For the sake of science though, and in the spirit of my own single sex floor (note to God: Why?!), we will examine the two subjects independently of each other.

Features Commentary

Bucknellians are indeed a species all their own, as the aforementioned studies of both male and female clearly indicate.

The male Bucknellian is of average height, with an athletic build and an overall attractive appearance - although the occasional runt (this journalist, for example) suffers from a genetically-attached spare tire. He is clean cut, although sideburns are used to express distaste with the status quo. Male partakes in a daily period of dormancy extending until lunchtime, with little regard for routines (case in point: the Thursday 8 a.m. class). Upon waking, stirred by appetite or loud noise, there is often headache, upset stomach and a general aura of disillusionment. Sleepwear consists of boxer shorts, frequently paired with a soiled white t-shirt. Completing an unusually fast bath process, Male then returns to the room to dress himself.

The first element is underwear, boxer shorts being the preferred style. A more supportive and flashy boxer-brief is to be worn only when there is a definite expectation of a romantic joint slumber session. Mesh shorts act as an appropriate substitute as well. Next comes a white undershirt, followed by an 'outer' t-shirt emblazoned with a slogan usually containing beer, Bucknell and/or a fraternity. The pants are chino material, in a khaki or stone color. They are usually flat-front, although cargo pockets sometimes appear for added excitement. Jeans are often substituted, but only if they suffer from severe distress and deterioration. Belts are convenient, but male is always prepared with safety pins and duct tape.

A button down shirt is then added, long sleeved and untucked. Plaids and prints are acceptable, but the more dominant breeds simply select a solid. The chest pocket contains a phone number (person: unknown) and a broken back clasp for a pledge pin. On top of the shirt, Male will often throw a wool sweater, dependent on his evolutionary body hair situation. On the head, hair is to be cut short and styled, or air-dryed in a "just-back-from-the-regatta-tousle." There is no jewelry, save an abnormally expensive watch. A backwards baseball cap is a headgear solution, often appearing as if it fell victim to a lawnmower. Socks are white or argyle, with little-to-no elastic. Footwear options include: Reef sandals, regardless of climate, brown or black oxfords or running shoes. Male is always prepared to retreat from the predator - public safety.

When braving the elements of his barren wasteland, Male looks to either a down vest, wool jacket or ski parka. In the jacket pockets lie a key ring and wallet, as well as a Chap Stick. The key ring doubles as a bottle opener, and holds keys for both a dorm room and a dark green sport utility vehicle. In wallet: parents' credit card, student id, driver's license, older brother's driver's license, a condom, debit card and $2.26. The penny will be discarded, but the quarter is placed in a sanitation-oriented trust fund (male term: "Laundry Money"). Other accessories include a hiking-style backpack, Nalgene water bottle and sport sunglasses. In all cases, cleanliness of a particular piece of clothing is determined by a smell of any high-contact area. Male's natural odors can be counteracted with cologne, after-shave or toothpaste. Febreeze is treated like a god, often the recipient of prayer and ritual sacrifice.

While the Male is comparable to that of habitants at other similar universities, the female Bucknellian is what initially prompted these very studies and is the source of national interest. She is thin, of average height, with long hair and snow-white teeth. Food intake consists of light cigarettes and bottled water, complemented during a rare hunger rush by Baked Lays Potato Chips. They travel in packs, often with a rendez vous at their lair of temptation (female term: "Terrace Room"), equipped with fruit and yougurt suitable for any national disaster. Male enters at his own risk, but must choose to observe the estrogen festival from afar, salivating. Female is always smiling, and walks with great speed and purpose. She has great intellect, social charm and inherent psychological advantages over Male.

Female awakes two hours prior to the first commitment of the day, braving overcrowded bathing facilities and weather-induced protein deficiencies (female term: "Bad Hair Day"). Clothing, in general, is designed to adequately prepare Female for a job interview at any moment. The professional look is achieved through black or grey trousers, white or blue oxfords and cardigan sweaters. Turtlenecks add warming effect, and Female often turns to a skirt for variety's sake. Footwear consists of multiple pairs of heeled boots, which travel up to the knee, covering black stockings.

Accessories bring female great joy and excitement. Simple pearl earrings and necklaces are a traditional choice, substituted sometimes with diamonds. She displays great efforts in selecting timepieces, rings, nail enamel and hair retention devices that correspond to her selected outfit. Over the shoulder lies a handbag, in which female inserts all elements necessary for her survival. Wallet, keys, cellular phone, cigarettes and chewing gum are among the items that clutter this self-sufficient sack. Wallet contains countless photographs, identification, Daddy's credit card(s) and business cards from an alumni career fair. Key chain is modest, enclosing keys to sports car, bedroom and locker at local fitness center. Bag is either a solid black, or quilted, vibrantly colored, and overpriced. When crisis is sensed, such bag cannot be physically pried from the clamped hands of Female. As cleanliness is critical to Female, she leaves male-numbing pheromones (female term: "perfume") along the campus paths. Her overall mystique is achieved through dark, tortoise-shelled sunglasses.

Bucknellians are indeed a species all their own, as the aforementioned studies of both male and female clearly indicate. Their shared responses to particular stimuli, Dave Matthews Band, physical fitness centers, Wednesday nights, J. Crew catalogues and certain liquid refreshment products (soda, for example), are astounding. Their long-lost origins can be traced to 1846, a time when bison roamed these very planes, claiming their homeland in the same fashion both Male and Female do today. The mighty grunts have long since faded with the frontier, but their echo rings true - "work hard, play hard," these hills cry. Perhaps we lost a little something in the translation.

By Rachel Gold
Staff Writer

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

Anyone walking into the Seventh Street Cafe between 8 a.m. and 4 p.m. can expect to be greeted by a wonderfully friendly woman, by the name of Shirley Erb. Erb has terrific sense of humor and appreciation for life. "[I feel] blessed to work in the Seventh Street Cafe and to be able to learn something new," Erb said.

Erb travels two and half miles to the University from her home in Montandon, Pa. Erb originally began working in the Botswick Dining Hall 11 years ago this coming March. She worked there daily from 11:30 a.m to 8 p.m. and laughing admitted: "they used to scold me for giving the kids too much food!" However, she explained that she liked being able to interact with the students.

Almost three years after Erb worked in the dining hall, she began working in The Bison, which she did not like as much. "I could work the cash register, give out the pizza and sometimes I even made the muffins, but that required me to be there as early as 5 a.m. and, well, that was just too early."

She described working at The Bison as "fast-paced and hard work," so when Mike, her supervisor, asked if she would like to work in the Seventh Street Cafe, she accepted the offer. "You silly goose! I would love to!" Erb recalls telling Mike.

Erb explained that the business in the Seventh Street Cafe changes as the day goes on. In the morning the Cafe is filled with students anxiously awaiting the morning kick caffeine offers by ordering delicious drinks named after candy bars such as: Almond Joy, the Milky Way or Mounds. "Students love the flavored drinks, after all, chocolate and espresso just belong together," Erb said.

In the evening, the Cafe is filled with mostly people ordering a wide variety of sweet and flavorful smoothies. Erb explained that she sees a lot of the same faces everyday and she knows what they want before they walk through the door. Erb said that the Seventh Street Cafe has a really laid back atmosphere and many students who work there come in to help her during their free time.

When not in the Cafe, Shirley can be found collecting teddy bears, flamingos, snowmen and milk glasses, which I have learned can be found in the form of sugars, creamers and even dinner plates. Erb's warm, friendly nature and sincere smile can brighten anyone's day.

Erb also has a tattoo of a rose on her wrist. She explained that when her friends and her went to get the tattoos, the artist wrote them in the book as "the over-the-hill gang." Erb just laughed and explained: "It was all in good fun."

"I have another tattoo, but we're not going to talk about that one," Erb said.

Shirley told me that she could see herself working at the Seventh Street Cafe for a while longer because she is truly happy there.

Joel and John play at Penn State

Legendary performers wow crowd with new hits and classic favorites

By Chad Flood
Senior Writer

Few artists are recognized by their own merits worldwide. Sure, Bono sings for U2 and Dave Matthews fronts the band to which he gave his name, but without their supporting casts, they would definitely not have the fame that they now enjoy.

Elton John doesn't need to have a band to get noticed—from his charity work to his flashy suits and never-ending supply of sunglasses, people know him whether or not they are fans of his music. The same can be said of Billy Joel. Who plays guitar for him? What's his drummer's name? Most people couldn't tell you, and judging from the duo's performance at the Bryce Jordan Center at Penn State on Jan. 16, no one needs to.

It seems almost impossible that musicians who are so different can work together so well. John wears wildly bright clothes; Joel is content in a black turtleneck. John is British; Joel is American. John is openly homosexual; Joel was once married to model Christy Brinkley. However, after the first few songs of the set, it was clear that their musical styles meshed perfectly.

The legendary duo traded piano licks back and forth, each seemingly trying to outdo the other, and each took turns singing verses from the other's songs. After closing the first set with John's Don't Let the Sun Come Down on Me, Joel took a bow and it was John's turn to shine.

With over 30 years worth of recorded material, it would seem impossible for the "Crocodile Rocker" to be able to capture his work in only an hour of music. What he could do, however, was to create a virtual tour of what those 30-plus years have meant. Performing both songs from his new album and classic hits like "Someone Saved My Life Tonight," and closing the set with "Crocodile Rock," John was able to do in 60 minutes what many bands cannot accomplish in three hours—give the audience a taste of what his music really is.

When John left the stage, the crowd cheered for what it had seemingly been waiting for - Billy Joel and his band. With so many songs to choose from, Joel did not make the common mistake of playing only new songs or those that he specifically liked; rather, he chose a variety of tunes that his fans, and even casual listeners, could recognize in just a few notes. Opening with Scenes from an Italian Restaurant, the audience immediately fell into his musical trap, and loved every minute of it. Joel took time to talk with his fans as well, joking about how, at his last performance at Penn State, it was with a full head of hair.

He ran through his most notable songs, including "River of Dreams," "Allentown," "Only the Good Die Young," and, at the request of revered Penn State football coach Joe Paterno's wife, a rare performance of "This is the Time."

The show would not have been complete, however, without a last hurrah between the two keyboardists. As expected, Elton John returned to finish out the evening.

In between dancing on each other's pianos, signing autographs for fans in the front row and making fun of each other, the two friends were able to put together an amazing collaboration of each other's music. They also performed a tribute to George Harrison with "Here Comes the Sun" and an explosive closer with "Great Balls of Fire." Once the stage was empty, the two headliners returned to play one more song from each man's repertoire, with John's classic, "Candle in the Wind," and Joel's sing-a-long favorite, "Piano Man," during which he allowed the crowd to sing the last chorus on its own.

Not only did those in attendance get to hear a "Piano Man" work his magic, but rather two, and without a doubt, they did not disappoint.

Creed and Incubus going in opposite directions

By Gregory Barchuk
Staff Writer

The careers of rock bands Creed and Incubus may never be formally compared, but with new follow-ups from both groups in late 2001 to prior multi-platinum records, this should be known as the year Creed's career took off while Incubus's disintegrated.

Creed has been criticized on many points, from sounding too much like Pearl Jam to being overplayed on the radio to essentially rehashing the same religious themes in every song. Most damning, Creed's detractors have claimed that all their songs sound the same, an accusation that can easily damage the popularity of a band with so much time on the radio. Creed's new album, Weathered, will define which course the band will take; that of the equally overplayed Matchbox 20, or that of fellow "all-songs-sound-the-same" band Hootie and the Blowfish.

While Incubus achieved major radio time with such hits as "Drive," "Pardon Me" and "Stellar" from their breakout album Make Yourself, it cannot be said that any of the band's songs sound the same. In fact, Incubus gets a great deal of press because they constantly re-invent their sound. Incubus appealed to the nerd in all of us, singing about astronomy, spontaneous combustion and "three-fold utopian dreams." But the pressure to live up to their reputation as intelligent and ever-changing rockers may have doomed their newest release; Morning View. Aside from their current single, "Wish You Were Here," an uninspired tune that is unfortunately unlike the Pink Floyd hit of the same name, nothing about this album is interesting. Make Yourself had something for everyone, while Morning View only functions to put its listeners sleep.

As Incubus' history makes clear, there is something to be said for sticking with a sound that works, something no one does better than Creed. Their newest single, "My Sacrifice," has already been criticized for sounding like a mix of prior smash hits "Higher" and "With Arms Wide Open." Yet Creed continues to sell records because there is much more to offer on Weathered than radio hits. The first four songs all contain not-so-thinly veiled retaliations at the band's critics. "At least look at me when you shoot a bullet through my head," lead singer Scott Stapp growls on the opener, "Bullets," and continues with "This is not about God / spiritual insinuations seem to shock our nation" on "Signs."

But after Creed subdues its anger at the press, the true development of the band becomes evident in four sincere, mid-tempo ballads, "One Last Breath," "Hide," "Don't Stop Dancing" and the simple, acoustic "Lullaby," the latter three serving as inspirational messages for times of despair.

Unlike Incubus, Creed has been able to follow up its success with a strong third record that should further solidify its place as one of the biggest rock bands in America. The band has weathered the storm of criticism (undoubtedly the inspiration for the album title) and produced a great rock record. If Incubus is to learn one thing from Creed, it should be that staying the same is not always such a bad thing.

Shanghai Quartet to open spring concert series at Weis Center

By Kang Tchou
Staff Writer

The Shanghai Quartet will begin this semester's Weis Center concert schedule tonight at 8 p.m. with a taste of the exuberant and cosmopolitan nature that defines the city of Shanghai.

The Strad has called the Shanghai Quartet "a foursome of uncommon refinement and musical distinction." Two years after the group was founded at the Shanghai Conservatory, it took second place at the London International String Quartet competition. In 1987, it won the esteemed Chicago Discovery Competition.

Since then, the quartet has toured internationally to New York, London, Hamburg and Amsterdam, among others. In its initial tour of the Far East, the quartet gave sold-out performances in both Tokyo and Osaka. For the past 10 years, the Shanghai quartet has called the University of Richmond its home. But in 2002, members of the quartet will also serve as professors in residence at the Shanghai Conservatory in China.

The members of this quartet are also cosmopolitan individuals. Violinist Weigang Li is a native of Shanghai and graduated from the Shanghai Conservatory. After a career as a soloist with various symphonies—including the Shanghai Symphony and the BBC Symphony Orchestra—Li studied and taught at Juilliard School as a teaching assistant to the Juilliard Quartet.

Born in Beijing, violinist Yiwen Jiang graduated from the Central Conservatory of Music. He continued his training at the St. Louis Conservatory and worked with Arnold Steinhardt of the Guarneri Quartet at Rutgers University. Besides his busy touring schedule, he has performed at many international music festivals.

Violist Honggang Li first attended the Beijing Conservatory after being selected from over 500 candidates. He completed his training at the Shanghai Conservatory and later served as a teaching assistant at Juilliard School of Music. He has soloed with both the Shanghai Philharmonic and the Shanghai Conservatory Orchestra.

Cellist Nicholas Tzavaras holds a Bachelor's in Music degree from the New England Conservatory and a Master's in Music degree from SUNY at Stony Brook. He has an extensive career as a soloist and recently performed with the National Repertory Orchestra, Tanglewood Festival Orchestra, SUNY Stony Brook Symphony, East Iowa Symphony and Fiddlefest at Carnegie Hall. Outside of this busy performance schedule, Tzavaras is also involved in music outreach and education.

The diversity brought by each of these members mingles in the music that they produce. While remaining true to the original score, this quartet brings a new pizzazz to every piece they play.

"These players ... achieved a beautiful blending of sonorities, and shared a melody with such perfect unity that a new color resulted and was delicately highlighted on the musical canvas," The Orange County Register said.

Tonight, expect an evening of delightful music that will set a bright tone for the newly begun semester.

Lord of the Rings rules the big screen

By Jessica Cortese

Movie Review
★★★★ 3.75

Sit down for The Fellowship of the Ring, the screen adaptation of the first volume of J.R.R. Tolkien's Lord of the Rings trilogy, and you will find a world filled with adventure, hardship and bravery. Elijah Wood is exceedingly well-cast as the most unlikely of heroes, Frodo Baggins, the hobbit who leads a fellowship of nine to bear the burden of the elven-ring across Middle Earth and into the land of Mordor.

A combination of first-rate casting, impressive prosthetic devices and significant achievements in make-up and costumes bring Tolkien's characters to life in this world filled with elves, wizards and monstrous orcs.

The book's dialogue isn't recited word for word, and those who haven't read the books may not pick up on the subtleties and complexities of the story that director Peter Jackson has shoehorned into three hours of fast-paced action. Even so, Jackson has managed to compress one of the richest fantasy novels ever into a film that remains true to both the spirit and the plotline of the book. Though die-hard Tolkien fans won't miss a single subtlety, they may recognize some slight changes in the plot. The absence of some beloved characters such as Tom Bombadil, as well as the embellishment of the two major female characters, Arwen and Galadriel, are necessary for the transition from novel to feature film and are made inconsequential amid all the fast-paced action and special effects.

From the perilous caves of Moria to the elaborate elven-splendor of Rivendell, this adventure/fantasy story is sure to please everyone, from those who have read the books several times to those who don't have a clue what a hobbit is. This movie is every bit as good as the novel, and the cliffhanger ending is sure to leave you dying to see if the second film can live up to the promise of the first.

Karaoke contest draws crowds to Uptown

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

Activities and Campus Events (ACE) held its first karaoke contest of the new year on Saturday, Jan. 19. By the time the show started at 10 p.m., the floor was packed with supportive friends and amused onlookers.

First-time entrant Melissa Milanak '03 opened the show with a rendition of Christina Aguilera's "I Turn to You." Old favorite Sterling Shrader '05 then entertained the expectant crowd with Blu Cantrell's "Hit 'Em Up Style." Two different ladies performed "I Will Survive" by Gloria Gaynor, and a group of five girls reawakened the fashion nightmare of the '80s, singing the Bangles' hit "Manic Monday" in vintage costume.

Always enjoyable, the karaoke contest lived up to its crazy reputation. Dave Caribardi '05, John Siwicki '05 and Brian Raves '05 pulled quite the crowd stunner when Adam Yukelson '05 joined their act dressed in drag. LFO's "Every Other Time" probably never got as many laughs as it did Saturday night when Yukelson impersonated the fickle female of the song.

"We practiced many hours and put a lot of effort into the dance, but we realized that we needed something to put our act over the top. Adrianna (Yukelson's female alter ego) was the key to our success," said the group.

In their third appearance in the contest, the trio placed first winning a cash prize of $150. Shrader, also making his third appearance in the contest, won second place, while newcomer Katie Palumbo '04 placed third with her rendition of Alicia Keyes' "Fallin'".

"[The show] is fun, but the same people keep on winning," said Matt Easterbrooks '05. The contest is open to all interested students. ACE plans to continue its new tradition and is already planning future contests.

Revised plan to strengthen Greek life at University

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

After more than a year of assessing and studying the University's Greek system, The Plan for Prominence in Fraternity and Sorority Affairs was fully implemented on Jan. 1 in hope to stress and support the University's academic mission, attention to the founding principles of national organization and members' intellectual, social and ethical development.

According to Associate Dean of Students and Director Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker, the Greek system, like most Universities, goes through a self study every 10 years. This assessment was done in 1989, and then again in 1999 when the Greek Life Strategic Planning Steering Committee formed in response to the Board of Trustees.

The Committee defined the responsibilities, policies and expectations of fraternities and sororities at the University. After reviewing data, conducting focus groups and looking to alumni and national fraternity and sorority organizations, the Committee put together a plan. The Board of Trustees approved the plan in April 2001.

"The new plan allows for fraternities and sororities to be rewarded monetarily for reaching the high standards that we are held to. It also sets new benchmarks that our organizations can aim to reach, furthering our campus involvement and support. —Sigma Phi Epsilon President Brian Lowe

According to Baker, the Plan has reduced the number of requirements that a fraternity and sorority must do to exist at the University, but it has identified the important things that they should do.

Aziz Megji '03, president of the Interfraternity Council (IFC), agrees that the plan has reduced fraternity and sorority requirements.

"The most important part of this plan is its streamlining of requirements for fraternities and sororities. The number of requirements for fraternities and sororities has gone down, but the quality and importance of these requirements has remained," Megji said.

The plan is composed of 11 strategic goals including strong almuni/ae involvement, responsible use of alcohol on- and off-campus, conducive living facilities and promotion of scholarship and intellectual development.

Previously, the University required that students in fraternities and sororities maintained a 2.20 minimum cumulative grade point average. The minimum is now 2.25.

The cumulative minimum grade point average for each chapter has also increased.

"The fact that we require chapters grade point averages to be .11 above the non-Greek average is phenomenal," Megji said.

Another component of the plan is getting seniors more involved. Starting in the fall, more seniors will have to live in fraternity houses and on the suites.

"The Committee heard students complaining that seniors check-out of the Greek system during their senior year. Seniors need to understand the value of their continued involvement in the Greek system," Baker said.

"When they check-out, they are sending a message to sophomore members that it is acceptable to check-out. It is not acceptable because the fraternity or sorority experience must be more valuable to them than allowing it to be a sophomore or junior experience only. And chapters should demand that their seniors stay involved in the organization," Baker said.

Under the new plan, each fraternity and sorority has to attend at least two University-sponsored events each year.

Guests may be prohibited from House Party

IFC and Panhel claim that BSG will not allow guests on House Party Weekend—BSG denies these claims, writes News Editor Andrew Burr

A glimpse of last year's House Party Weekend. It is unclear whether non-University individuals will be able to attend the event this year due to BSG's reported funding-related stipulation to ban such individuals.

A rule issued by Bucknell Student Government (BSG) that would prohibit non-University individuals from participating in House Party Weekend this year has not been confirmed, sources say.

According to former Interfraternity Council (IFC) President Jarred Gunther '02, BSG refused to finance Panhellenic Association (Panhel) and IFC for House Party unless both groups agreed to ban non-University individuals from the April 5-7 weekend. Gunther said he received an email last December from BSG Vice President of Finance Amir Sadaghiani '03 (who currently serves as President), in which BSG offered a list of stipulations which IFC and Panhel were required to meet before money was appropriated. One of those stipulations was a "no-friends" clause.

Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker and IFC President Aziz Megji '03, who both indicated a desire to allow guests on campus during House Party, believed the BSG decision was official.

"If House Party were tomorrow, I am under the impression that guests would not be allowed,"

Acclaimed God Squad reaches out to students with humor

By Jim Leahy
Managing Editor

The God Squad, a highly influential pair of active clergymen from New York's Long Island, came to the Weis Center on Tuesday night in a talk centered around Roman Catholic and Jewish relations since the Holocaust.

Sponsored by Bucknell Hillel, Catholic Campus Ministry (CCM) and the Office of University Chaplains, the lecture was attended by a strong crowd of about 600 members of the University community and local community as well.

Nationally known Monsignor Thomas Hartman and Rabbi Marc Gellman are important spiritual figures. Hartman is the President of Telicare, the television production arm of the Diocese of Rockville Centre, encompassing 1.6 million Catholics in Nassau and Suffolk Counties. In addition, he serves at Holy Trinity High School in Hicksville and St. Vincent de Paul Church in Elmont. Gellman is the senior rabbi at the Temple Beth Torah in Dix Hills. He also serves as president of The New York Board of Rabbis.

Nicknamed The God Squad, the pair have worked together for 18 years. They host a daily cable television show with almost 12 million viewers throughout the New York Tri-state area, appear regularly on the nationally syndicated Imus in the Morning radio program, work as religious consultants for ABC television and its "Good Morning America" and write a weekly column for Tribune newspapers.

The two have also written numerous books and have won a Peabody Award for their animated children's series "How do you Spell God?" which appeared on HBO.

The lecture was a mix of serious elements and levity. Hartman plays the straight man of the group, delivering the dry humor while Gellman is very much the jokester, adding a punch line wherever he can. Also, they mixed in serious stories and had the audi-

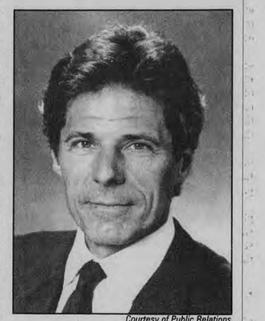
Wife of murdered trustee remarries

Widow of Ted Ammon '71 departs for England with new husband

By Alyson Walker
Senior Writer

Less than three months after the murder of Long Island millionaire Ted Ammon '71, his wife, Generosa Ammon, married Daniel Pelosi. The wedding ceremony took place on Jan. 15 in Queens, N.Y. just one day after Pelosi's divorce from his first wife became official.



Courtesy of Public Relations

Trustee Ted Ammon '71 was murdered in his home Oct. 22, 2001. His estranged wife recently remarried and moved overseas.

Shortly after the wedding, Mrs. Ammon and her 11-year-old twins flew to England to return to their former home, the estate known as Coverwood. A few days later, Pelosi joined them.

"Mrs. Ammon returned the children to the school they had previously attended in an effort to provide them with an environment where they could be free from the glare of the media that has been very painful for them," said Michael Dowd, Generosa Ammon's lawyer, in a statement reported by Newsday.

Dowd also alluded to the possibility that the move would be permanent.

Pelosi concurred, remarking to the Daily News that the Coverwood Estate was "beautiful" and "if things work out, who knows how long I'll be here?"

Pelosi also spoke to the Daily News of Ammon's concern for her children.

"It had a large emotional impact on the kids. We really want it to calm down. That's the only reason we're here. That's what it's all about, it's about the kids. For the children, it's been the worst," Pelosi said.

> "[The investigation] had a large emotional impact on the kids. We really want it to calm down. That's the only reason we're here. That's what it's all about, it's about the kids. For the children, it's been the worst."
> —Daniel Pelosi

Regarding the couple's alleged involvement with the murder of Ted Ammon, Pelosi told the reporters from the Daily News, "We had nothing to do with what happened to her husband."

Neither Pelosi nor Generosa Ammon has been identified as suspects in Ammon's murder, although both hired prominent criminal defense lawyers shortly after the murder. The police are displeased with the couple's sudden journey to England, according to Thomas Spota, Suffolk County District Attorney, but prosecutors are not concerned that their departure will in any way hinder the ongoing investigation.

"I don't think it's going to affect the investigation in any way. We're going forward with the investigation no matter where they are," Spota told the Daily News.

Ammon was found beaten to death in his multimillion-dollar mansion in East Hampton, Long Island on Oct. 22, 2001. According to police, the killer had to be someone he knew.

At the time of his death, Ted and Generosa Ammon were involved in a bitter divorce and custody battle. They had been married for 14 years. Ted Ammon ran the private equity firm Chancery Lane Capital in Manhattan, was on the University Board of Trustees and was also the chairman of the Board of Jazz at Lincoln Center.

Pelosi was hired by the Ammons to help install the complex alarm system at their mansion in East Hampton. He is one of the select few who knew the system's code. Pelosi and Generosa Ammon became romantically involved in 2000, living together in one of Ammon's Manhattan apartments throughout the divorce and custody battles.

Pelosi has not yet met with detectives or given a DNA sample for suspected involvement.

According to the Daily News, Pelosi will be returning to the United States within the next month, according to Mark Bergman, his attorney. Pelosi missed a court appearance on Jan. 24 for a felony drunken driving charge. A bench warrant was originally signed by Justice Roger Walker for his arrest, but the warrant was lifted when Walker discovered that the judge in Pelosi's other DWI case had allowed him to leave the country.

In the past few weeks, Generosa Ammon has been selling many of the former couple's properties including their Fifth Avenue co-op at $8.5 million and commercial property in East Hampton for $3.5 million. She was not in attendance at Ammon's memorial service by the request of his family. According to her attorneys, she has been fully cooperating with the investigation, but no further comments were provided.

University students among those broadcasted on Greenworks program

By Chris Styers
Staff Writer

Greenworks featured University geochemistry students in a program that aired Jan. 24 and 25 called "The Environmental University."

Greenworks, an organization spreading the message "real people are making a difference to protect our environment," highlighted the efforts of University students enrolled in a geochemistry class taught by Associate Professor and Chair of the Department of Geology Carl Kirby.

University students and faculty appeared with their counterparts from the University of Pennsylvania, Penn State University, the University of Pittsburgh and Slippery Rock University. Each segment in the program focused on a particular student and several faculty members in the environmental field.

Greenworks TV is an organization that has highlighted the activities of people trying to make a difference in the environment since 1997. In mid-October last year, it focused on the progress University students and faculty have made.

The University portion included interviews with Kirby and Associate Professor and Director of Environmental Studies Dr. John Gillroy, but most of the time the camera was turned to Darren Szuch '02 who is pursuing a bachelor of science in environmental geology.

Greenworks followed Szuch around campus, to class and into the field. Szuch explained that the University offers numerous opportunities for undergraduates to participate in real research and get hands on experience that undergraduates cannot always find in programs dominated by graduate work.

Another aspect the Greenworks broadcast focused on was how universities responded to local problems. Last October the geochemistry class was studying the potentially devastating effects of old, abandoned coalmines on Pennsylvanian waterways. When miners cleared a mine, very little was done to prevent harmful byproducts from contaminating water. Now, environmental students are trying to find ways to clean polluted streams and prevent further damage.

Greenworks followed Kirby, Szuch and class members Ben Hallett '02, Clay Slaughter '02 and John Iorio '02 to a treatment system in the receiving stream, Carbon Run. University students in the geology and biology departments have studied the stream both before and after the treatment system was put in place.

Kirby explained that on the trip his class "made measurements of the pH, dissolved oxygen, conductivity and temperature of the water ... upstream and downstream of the treatment system." By doing this, students were observing the effectiveness of the system through samples that would be brought back to the lab to determine whether anything needed to be done to continue the preservation of the stream and the environment around it.

Students and faculty such as Szuch and Kirby continue the tradition of the "environmental heroes" that are trying to protect the environment day-in and day-out.

Rentchler, Halper take over as president and vice president

By Molly Koenig
Staff Writer

Last week the Class of 2003 elected two new officers to be its representatives this semester: Emily Rentchler as president and Sara Halper as vice president. They are replacing former president Hannah Young, who is abroad this semester and Omar Zalatimo, who took the position of VP of Operations in Bucknell Student Government (BSG).

Serving as a class congressman for the past two semester's gives Rentchler valuable experience in BSG. She is also serving on the Academic Committee of BSG, where the main project last semester was obtaining online registration for students and the goal this semester is a much broader objective, reviewing the curriculum.

"I'm excited to have the leadership role after being on congress for two semesters. Working with Sarah will be nice, she brings a fresh perspective to congress," Rentshler said.

In addition to the larger objectives of BSG, Halper plans on introducing small yet important changes that she feels need to be made. One of those is the issue of student parking. As a junior, she knows the frustration of the lack of parking on campus.

One remedy she suggested was to give second-year students parking privileges for only one semester, which would cut down greatly on the number of cars on campus.

"I'm very excited to represent our class this semester. Hopefully I will be able to give new perspectives that will positively affect the student body. I'm working with an enthusiastic group of people and I feel like we're going to get a lot accomplished this semester," Halper said.

Halper also hopes to establish a junior class newsletter to keep the Class of 2003 better informed as to what is happening around campus and more specifically, proposals that are discussed in BSG.

According to Rentshler and Halper, some of their goals this semester include starting the search for a commencement speaker for the Class of 2003's graduation ceremony, and to do a significant amount of fundraising—in part by creating another class product to sell.

More than anything in her new role as president, Rentshler also hopes to "motivate the juniors, getting them excited and ready for their senior year."

Full of ideas, not only for the junior class, but also for the entire student body, Rentshler and Halper have everyone's best interest in mind.

They spoke about many facets of Jewish and Catholic faith, including the differences in theology to the histories of the two faiths. They spoke about interfaith marriage, cheating and plagiarism on the Internet and even life after Sept. 11.

They also spoke about religious toleration, which has become a popular topic because of the world's views of Muslims in the past few months. They stressed that the Muslim faith is very much understood in the world and that we need to have an open ear to our Muslim brothers and sisters.

Reviews were very positive following the lecture.

"Not only were they extremely entertaining, but they had such an important message as well. Their chemistry on stage helped the audience not only understand that message but relate to it as well," University Hillel President Danielle Cannon '03 said.

"Although there were fewer students present at the talk then I thought there would be, Monsignor Hartman and Rabbi Gellman had a lot to bring to the University. Their message will help to bring about further cooperation between people of different faiths here," said Lauren Scott '04, co-president of CCM.

"This was a wonderful opportunity for the University to extend itself to the local community. Students left the talk energized and the message that Monsignor Hartman and Rabbi Gellman will help the work that the Interreligious Council is doing on campus," Campus Minister Father Martin Moran said.

Former Panhel President Katie Richardson '02 and Treasurer Emily Resnick '03 also claimed to receive the stipulations from Sadaghiani last semester.

"BSG told us that our funding was contingent upon House Party being closed to non-University students," said Richardson. Sadaghiani denies such an obligation was ever placed upon IFC or Panhel, and says that BSG never threatened to withhold funding for the event if such stipulations were not met.

"BSG's official position is for an open House Party," Sadaghiani said.

Former BSG Appropriations Committee member and current Vice President of Finance Megan Joseph '03 agreed with Sadaghiani and said she never recalled BSG placing restrictions on IFC or Panhel. Former BSG President Nate Sorber '02 also never recalled mandating such a decision.

This year BSG appropriated almost $16,000 towards House Party expenditures. The BSG appropriations record has no indication of a motion to not allow guests for House Party.

New expectations and responsibilities on Greeks

"If fraternities and sororities go to the University-sponsored events as chapters, they send a message to non-fraternity and sorority students that they support the events," Baker said.

Kate Kenner '03, Panhellenic president, agrees that this part of the plan is beneficial.

"More participation in University-sponsored events will increase awareness of all student groups at Bucknell," Kenner said.

Megji echoes Kenner's thoughts.

"The fact that we now have to attend University events as one of our requirements will increase Greek participation in campus life, and really shed a positive light on what Greeks are doing," Megji said.

The Plan also makes risk management more strict. For example, the risk management policies for hosting registered social events with alcohol will include requirements for a 21-year-old segregated serving and consumption area.

"On the fraternity side, risk management will be affected, for the long term in a very positive manner. In the short term, implementing the new procedures, especially security guards and the segregated serving and consumption area will be difficult in the sense that IFC and chapters do not have experience hosting social events with these regulations," Megji said.

Baker believes that the new risk management guidelines will decrease the number of registered parties, although he does not hope they do.

"We want students to party on campus. We don't want the new risk management policies to say to fraternities and sororities that they should go downtown because it's easier. Chapters host events off campus because when they do, there are no risk management guidelines," Baker said.

"For some reason, chapters believe they are not liable for what might happen at an off-campus social event. The University cannot permit students who are underage to be served alcohol regardless of setting. I think our students know and understand that. They might not agree or like it, but it is the law."

Brian Lowe '03, president of Sigma Phi Epsilon (Sig Ep), saw the changes of the new policies at Sigma Ep's registered party last weekend.

"In my personal feeling, some of the changes actually made our most recent registered social event more chaotic and difficult to monitor than in the past. Some of the policies seem to make sense on paper, but implementing them actually causes more problems than it solves," Lowe said.

One of the most significant parts of the Plan is the Chapter Accreditation Program. Under this program, chapters will have to fulfill certain requirements to achieve either a good, silver star or gold star rating.

Lambda Chi Alpha (above) is one of the 20 Greek organizations on campus that must adhere to a new set of guidelines governing Greek life.

If a chapter meets minimum standards, it will be considered a chapter in good standing. A chapter that meets and exceeds minimum standards will be considered a silver star chapter and will receive a $2,500 grant, which may not be used for alcohol-related events. A chapter will be deemed gold star if it meets and dramatically exceeds minimum standards and will get a $5,000 grant.

For example, if each fraternity or sorority member has 10 service hours per semester, that fraternity will be in good standing. Fifteen hours will make it a silver star chapter and 20 hours will earn the chapter a gold star rating.

Lowe likes the idea that chapters will be rewarded.

"We are pleased that the new plan allows for fraternities and sororities to be rewarded monetarily for reaching the high standards that we are held to. It also sets new benchmarks that our organizations can aim to reach, furthering our campus involvement and support," Lowe said.

Megji believes that all categories within the accreditation system make significant achievements.

"Good standing is not average, or of minimum standard. Chapters that are in good standing have still excelled across the board, and would be recognized by their national chapters as doing exceptionally well," Megji said.

Chapters who fail to earn the good standing rating status during the annual accreditation review will be placed on immediate "conditional recognition" status for the subsequent spring semester.

According to Baker, schools across the country have been looking at the Plan as an example.

"I think the plan is a benchmark for other universities and Greek systems," Baker said.

Kenner believes the Plan will continue to help in the future.

"I think that the Plan for Prominence is a positive influence in the future of the Bucknell community. By setting clear expectations in the areas of risk management, service/philanthropy, University activities participation and facilities maintenance, Bucknell and Lewisburg will benefit," Kenner said.

Bison Express

CAP Subcommittee, conducted a survey to determine the priorities of students. After receiving over 500 responses, Michaels drafted a proposal, which was submitted to the deans and University President Steffen Rogers.

"This proposal developed out of a long-time student desire for a convenient food location uphill. Due to the limited available space on the University's campus, this type of service has been difficult to establish," Michaels said in the proposal.

Her initial hope was to utilize Uptown during its off-hours, but both the CAP Center and Activities and Campus Events (ACE) agreed that doing so might jeopardize the nightclub atmosphere inside Uptown.

The results of the survey indicated that the library was another preferential location. In conjunction with Tim Tenon, director of Dining Service, and Kari Conrad, assistant dean of Students, the Student Affairs Committee determined that a temporary facility was more feasible than a permanent structure.

"Tim Tenon offered many suggestions on how to operate the food truck, but the idea originally arose out of Student Affairs and has been fully supported by BSG," Michaels said.

In order to determine the most profitable operating times as well as the plausibility of opening a permanent facility, Dining Services and the Student Affairs Committee will evaluate the existing facility on a monthly basis.

If the "Bison Express" attracts large numbers of students, the committee hopes to develop a stronger case for the need for an uphill dining service.

"The future goal of BSG is to build a permanent facility for students. Through the Bison Express, we hope to prove the student need for a permanent uphill food eatery," Michaels said.

According to O'Donnell, the Board of Trustees also approved the eatery.

"The Trustees were in support of the idea, especially in respect to the new housing plans for the future," O'Donnell said.

Guests should not be allowed at House Party

Each year many University students look forward to House Party Weekend because it gives Greeks a chance to open their events to the whole campus. In past years, University students were allowed to bring guests to partake in the festivities. However, it is being debated as to whether or not guests will be permitted to attend House Party. The Bucknellian believes that by not having guests at House Party Weekend, the event and the University will benefit.

In the past, the majority of Public Safety reports included incidents pertaining to non-University students. Without the presence of guests, many problems could be prevented. For example, there is usually a lot of property damage during House Party. Although University students could have caused the damage, it is more likely a result of the guests because they do not care as much about the University.

Crowding in fraternity houses would also decline without guests. With fewer people, University students would hopefully enjoy the event more. Also, if there are too many guests, University students may not feel as comfortable. Although a student would not necessarily know every person at a party without guests, he or she would feel more comfortable with more familiar faces.

During House Party, physical and sexual assault often take place. Although this could happen any day, it is more likely to happen if there are many non-University students. In a case where guests are prohibited, all members of a party would be familiar with others at the party. Furthermore, University students are more easily identified in cases of assault, whereas guests would be more able to provide false identification or leave the scene.

As it stands now, House Party is an expensive event. By eliminating guests, the cost of the event will go down. Last year, guests were charged for a wristband. Even if this fee were raised from about $5 to $25, it would probably not stop many guests from coming. However, the extra revenues from a higher cost would possibly cover property damage and the overall expense of the weekend.

With the elimination of guests and continued implementation of wristbands, the number of high school students, townspeople and students from other universities will also decline. However, in order to make this event successful, wristbands must be completely enforced. Wristbands should be carefully examined when entering frat row and before entering each fraternity house. This way, the likelihood of a non-University student coming to the event is very small.

Another possibility to create a safer and more fun atmosphere is to limit the number of people at each house. In past years, some fraternity houses had just a few people in them while others had hundreds. By limiting the number of students allowed in each house, the parties will be more evenly attended and will not be as crowded.

University students can have guests visit any time. By prohibiting guests at House Party, the weekend would be safer and more enjoyable for University students. Students should to do what is best for everyone and be willing to make the sacrifice of not having guests.

Administration's lack of support for wrestlers an embarrassment

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

Title IX, the now infamous federal regulation that mandates "gender equity" in collegiate athletics has now rightly found itself on the opposing end of a nasty federal lawsuit. The measures the act mandates have come home to roast, as the act has manifested to become in violation of itself. The lawsuit seeks for the U.S. Department of Education (USDE) to revise its regulations to become more consistent with what it was originally supposed to accomplish, as well as prevent future gender discrimination as a means of compliance.

Our university now has the opportunity to prove to its wrestlers that it does in fact care about them and their program by abandoning its course of gender discrimination. However, the administration has opted to do the opposite, which is, quite frankly, an embarrassment.

For those of you who are still unfamiliar, the act was reinterpreted in 1996 by the Office of Civil Rights to require universities to provide equal opportunities to both genders by peculiar means.

It reads, "An institution must meet all of the following requirements in order to be in compliance with Title IX: 1. For participation requirements, institutions' officials must meet one of the following three tests. An institution may: a) Provide participation opportunities for women and men that are substantially proportionate to their respective rates of enrollment of full-time undergraduate students; b) Demonstrate a history and continuing practice of program expansion for the underrepresented sex; c) Fully and effectively accommodate the interests and abilities of the underrepresented sex; and, 2. Female and male student-athletes must receive athletics scholarship dollars proportional to their participation; and, equal treatment of female and male student-athletes in the eleven provisions as mentioned above."

In the last few years the University has added two female sports—golf and crew (which the wrestlers actually helped fund). The athletic department has implemented strict roster guidelines as another measure. The men's crew team has been re-classified. Clearly these are examples of doing just what Title IX requires.

The previous administration of University President Bro Adams was the first to have to grapple with how the University would handle compliance—they chose to go with the first option, which has been the most frequented route with the majority of universities. Their decision was to be athletically proportional in terms of gender versus enrollment by 2002. University President Steffen Rogers had the unfortunate task of seeing this through. But is this necessary?

The Independent Women's Forum has conducted a survey that blows the 'sexism as a blockade towards women's athletic participation' myth out of the water. It was conducted at four all-girls schools (Bryn Mawr, Mount Holyoke, Smith and Wellesley) where sexism is presumably inherently impossible. It shows participation rates around nine percent to 17 percent, far below the 49 percent quota Title IX set for our particular school. It also explains that if Title IX didn't apply to simply athletics, women would undoubtedly be booted from cheerleading, band, yearbook and choir where they are all disproportionately represented.

How can we comply with Title IX?

"It always came down to cutting men's sports or adding women's," Rogers told me. Fair enough.

The Equities of Athletics and Disclosure Act (EADA) produces gender representation statistics for collegiate athletics. This year we will most definitely be 1.1 percent away from proportionality according to enrollment. This is better than most schools, and easily close enough to argue compliance. With the reclassification of the men's crew team ensuing, this percentage would drop to 0.3 percent, undoubtedly within compliance range. The elimination of the wrestling program would increase it to 0.7 percent, although disproportionate towards women. It's undeniable that cutting wrestling would actually bring us further away from gender equity than bring us nearer.

It's also possible to add women's teams. Cornell recently added an equestrian team to become compliant, which would certainly work here as well. Our equestrian team is currently the best in its Region Four, Zone Three (Intercollegiate Horseshow Association) and would arguably be a dominant varsity team as well. Currently the ladies must pay $600 each to compete. This brings up the question of funding.

"They said funding was never an issue. Alumni have always been willing to help. Now supposedly its an issue," Steve Caruso, head of the Committee to Save Bucknell Wrestling's Alumni Committee, said. Caruso also told me that one alumni had announced a pledge to donate $500,000 to either go towards wrestling or finance a new equestrian team; this philanthropic gentleman's phone call was never returned. The elimination of men's varsity crew is also estimated to make an extra $125,000 available.

"We don't feel like this excuse is in line with the University's set goals of providing opportunities," Caruso commented.

But what if we already are compliant? The second compliance provision mandates a history of providing opportunities for the underrepresented sex. In the last few years the University has added two female sports—golf and crew (which the wrestlers actually helped fund). The athletic department has implemented strict roster guidelines as another measure. The men's crew team has been re-classified. Clearly these are examples of doing just what Title IX requires.

"While this lawsuit plays out, and the validity of its provisions are questioned, I don't see why we can't show compliance through the second measure," Caruso questioned.

So what would happen if we did nothing? Presumably we would be susceptible to a lawsuit from a female student who felt that any disproportion had disabled her from playing a sport. However, with a heavy precedent coming straight from the Supreme Court, this figurative girl would lose her case.

Last April, in the San Dova case, the Supreme Court ruled that a private plaintiff could not show discrimination through proportion, only actual intended discrimination. This was under Title VI, which is the same as Title IX except that its realm is federal programs instead of collegiate sports.

John Hardt, director of athletics, said that the decision to cut wrestling was "regrettable" and it was made only after thoroughly exploring all available options.

"It seems they are hypocritical, we have come up with another option and they don't even look at it," wrestler Andrew Bernstein '03, in reference to the school's lack of support for the lawsuit that made them "regrettably" cut the wrestling program, said.

Lawsuit aside, it is glaringly obvious we can be Title IX compliant without cutting the wrestling program. This begs the question: why exactly has the school turned against its wrestlers?

University helps Union County United Way

To the Editor:

The recently concluded Union County United Way campaign was helped greatly by the contributions by members of the University community. The faculty, administration, support staff and retirees collectively contributed a total of $36,750. Most notable is a very generous contribution of over $8,000 from the students on campus. The campus campaign thus totaled $44,750 this year, a new high. Coordinating the campus campaign this year, Judy Mickanis, director of Reservations, Information and Conference Services, gave students the opportunity to contribute through hall groups, athletic clubs, service organizations, Greek Life and other social groups as well as individually.

The result was a record level of giving to county-wide social services. Deserving of special recognition by giving $500 or more in the student campaign are the Class of 2003, the BU Comedy Improv, the mens basketball team and the football team. Individual contributions from many students also helped to make the campaign very successful.

The generous outpouring of support for the United Way indicates the commitment of the University community to support the larger community in which they live. It should also be mentioned that many Bucknellians contribute their time and energy to support such service organizations as Big Brothers/Big Sisters, The Heiter Community Center, the Girl Scouts and Boy Scouts, Lewisburg Listening Post, Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition, Red Cross, and the Union County Emergency Squad.

To the University community, the United Way of Union County says a big THANK YOU. We really can make a difference in the quality of life in this area by working together and looking out after each other.

Students should clean Borough, not just 15

To the Editor:

All thanks be to the Bucknell Engineering Societies for their efforts picking up debris and detritus on US 15 south of Lewisburg Saturday morning: a goodwill, if occasional, gesture much appreciated by passersby.

Now, to the rest of student body: how about a similar effort IN the Borough, down Bull Run and the South 6th and 7th Street ghetto, say once a week, like Sunday afternoons to complete the weekend's festivities?

Hmmm? You could call it: A War on Squalor. If you want respect and appreciation IN the Borough, you need to clean up your acts IN the Borough.

Think globally; act locally.

Merit aid should be reevaluated

By Ryan Gee
Staff Writer

When it comes to financial aid, there's a thin line that separates what is good and necessary from what is, well, the exact opposite. The former is the kind of financial assistance now offered by the University, which is only given to students who demonstrate a financial need for help.

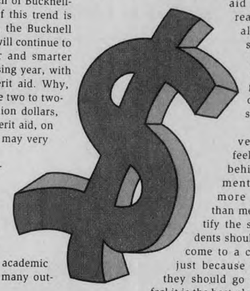
On the other side is merit aid, a course of action that the University is now considering to adopt. With merit aid, gifted applicants are given financial assistance, even if they do not demonstrate a need. While schools that adopt merit aid might do so with the best intentions of attracting more talented students, giving money to those who don't need it in the first place is not the way to go. It is both unethical and, in the end, unnecessary for the success of the University.

When you get right down to it, merit aid is simply a form of bribery—giving large sums of money to applicants so they'll attend a certain school.

According to Webster's Dictionary, "aid" has the following meanings: "1. to provide with what is useful or necessary in achieving an end; 2. to give assistance." However, it seems that when it comes to merit aid, many colleges have adopted a different definition: "1. to provide with what is wasteful or unnecessary in achieving an end; 2. to give unneeded assistance."

When you get right down to it, merit aid is simply a form of bribery—giving large sums of money to applicants so they'll attend a certain school. Under need-based financial aid, kids who otherwise couldn't afford to go to college finally have a chance to do so. They are not making any profit from this aid, and are only given the same chance that more affluent applicants have at receiving an education. Non-need-based financial aid recipients, however, do not need the extra money to go to college; they are essentially getting a chance to attain a college degree and a hefty sum of cash to boot. Is this fair, or ethical?

Or, is it even necessary? In the past years, enrollment in the University has steadily increased. Every class, including the Class of 2005, has been able to claim that they are the "biggest and the brightest" batch of Bucknellians to date. If this trend is any indicator, the Bucknell student body will continue to become larger and smarter with each passing year, with or without merit aid. Why, then, spend the two to two-and-a-half million dollars, which is the projected cost of merit aid, on essentially buying students that may very well come here anyway?



It seems to me that this money could be better used to serve the entire campus community. Instead of giving gifts to select individuals who don't need the money in the first place, the University could use these funds to update and expand its academic facilities or even spruce up the many outdated dorm rooms.

Since The Bucknell Campaign, our campus has seen and is still witnessing numerous improvements, including the new Weis Music Building, the still-in-progress Recreation and Athletics Center and the O'Leary Geology and Psychology Building. It is only logical to assume that these and other improvements to our campus could attract more and more talented applicants as well as benefit everyone in the University community. Instead of enticing students with more money, let's make the University itself a more desirable place to live and learn.

Or, why not just simply lower tuition? If the University feels that it can afford to give up revenue from students who are able to pay full tuition, why not just simply deduct this cost from everyone's bills? The University could then enjoy the same increased popularity as merit aid might pro-vide—it could cut back on financial aid packages already given and also make the school accessible to students from an even greater range of economic strata.

If the University truly feels it is falling behind in enrollment, there are more direct ways than merit aid to rectify the situation. Students should not want to come to a certain school just because it's cheaper; they should go because they feel it is the best place where they can learn about academics and about life. The size and quality of the University's student body will steadily increase only if the quality of the campus facilities increases along with it.

Shedding light on the Enron issue

By Gretchen Schrock
Senior Writer

The newest catch phrase in Washington, D.C. should be "Don't be infected by the Enron virus!" The most significant of the possible political and economic casualties is our own vice president, Dick Cheney. He has the vaccine to protect himself from the Enron virus but refuses to use it as a matter of political principle.

Cheney is in the midst of a politician's nightmare—the collapse of an energy trading giant, damaging ties to other financial corporations like Arthur Andersen, a deceased former executive, alleged connections to various empioyees in the Bush administration, and worst of all, questions surrounding his own conduct.

The General Accounting Office is ready to sue the Vice President in order to force the White House to release the names of industry executives who advised him on national energy policy last spring unless the information is provided by the end of next week. This symptom of the Enron virus comes at a time when the Bush administration is already feverish from scrutiny and criticism, which the Democrats have heaped upon it for its affairs with this deceitful company.

On April 17, 2001, Cheney conferred with Kenneth L. Lay, the now unemployed Enron chairman, during the policy's planning stages, in addition to his staff members meeting with Enron executives on numerous occasions. The corporation donated millions of dollars to the Republican Party in support of the Bush-Cheney ticket in 2000.

What were the consequences of these mysterious consultations? What we have here is an energy plan that requested more oil and gas drilling, a revival of the nuclear power program and a recommendation for cooperation with the Indian government to maximize its domestic oil and gas production, which would surely assist Enron in its $2.9 billion power plant project in that country. According to the New York Times, Representative Henry A. Waxman (D-Calif.) commented that the proposal on India "benefited Enron by formally enlisting two cabinet secretaries in Enron's conflict with the Indian government."

Unless the White House formally releases the names and other details about those secret meetings to the General Accounting Office, we are left to pure speculation and assumption that those conversations led to deliberate policy influence on the part of Enron and compliance by the Bush administration.

This veil of secrecy implies that White House officials have something of a destructive nature to hide. Whatever the true nature of this information, it will become more damaging upon disclosure to the President and his advisors if withheld from the public for a long time.

Unfortunately, they are clinging to the argument that the identities of the task force participants should be concealed to protect their privacy and preserve the abilities of future task forces to persuade people to cooperate. In other words, the presidency wishes to operate without the glaring eyes of the media or the stinging criticism of the public, but this notion of presidential silence lacks precedent.

In fact, during the first years of the Clinton administration, the accounting office requested, at the insistence of Republicans, a list of participants in the meetings that former First Lady Hillary Rodham Clinton held on national health care policy after the White House initially refused to divulge such information. Eventually, the Clinton administration complied.

The main issue is not whether the Bush administration favored Enron in the formation of national policy after being funneled millions of dollars in campaign contributions but whether executive officials should be allowed to function in secrecy.

If the Bush White House insists on operating in the dark, the only means by which the American citizens will learn of national policy decisions will be through approved disclosures or scandals dug up by the press. Without knowledge of every government action taken on their behalf, voters will be unable to make educated decisions every November. Instead, they will be guessing as to which candidate or party truly considered their needs and desires when drafting and implementing policy positions.

The Enron disease—glorious prosperity and success, followed by a sharp decline into sickness and death—will ultimately infect the Bush administration, all in the name of keeping disastrous secrets.

No need for campaign finance reform

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

Between 1999 and 2001, Enron, Inc. gave exactly $0 to the presidential campaign of George W. Bush. It gave the same amount to every single member of the U.S. Congress (decades-old federal law prohibits direct contributions from corporations to federal candidates).

Corporations can, however, contribute soft money to political parties. And according the Federal Election Commission, the Republican Party and its associated committees collected $249,861,645 in soft money in the 2000 election cycle. $1,671,555 of that—a whopping 0.67 percent—came from Enron. That's right—Enron, Inc. was responsible for roughly two-thirds of one percent of Republican "income" in the last election cycle.

But we're incessantly told that Enron had "ties" to the Bush White House, and now there's an Enron scandal. So what happened? Seems like nobody knows all of the details, but this much is clear: apparently some higher-ups at Enron saw that the company was headed for bankruptcy and put in a call to two Cabinet officials, (Secretaries O'Neill and Evans) seeking help. By all accounts, this request was denied. Enron paid for its shady business practices and it went under about a month later. So much for the idea that the Republican Party is, or ever was, in Enron's pocket.

When campaign finance reform advocates are selling their goods they usually tell a story that goes something like this: some "big business" "pours" "millions of dollars" "into the coffers" of congressional candidates faced with "ever-increasing costs" of running for office. When the candidate gets elected, he is then indebted to that donor. The contributor gets special access to the policymaking process and sympathetic votes in exchange for continued financial support.

The big news—the part that the Post ignores—is that despite its contributions to Republican causes, GOP bigshots didn't give Enron the help it wanted.

But the Enron situation can also be reduced to a short story, and it goes a little something like this. A "big business" "poured" "million of dollars" "into the coffers" of a national committee, exercising its constitutional right to support a political outfit offering ideas that the corporation likes. Sympathetic candidates were elected and felt absolutely no sense of indebtedness towards that donor. The big business got itself into financial trouble; such bad trouble that it could not get itself out. It asked its powerful friends for help. Those friends refused, largely because they believe in the principle of free markets.

How does this story—the real story—justify the renewed push for campaign finance reform? The Jan. 11 Washington Post carried this headline: "Enron asked for help from Cabinet officials." So what? The First Amendment guarantees Enron officials that right. The big news—the part that the Post ignores—is that despite its contributions to Republican causes, GOP bigshots didn't give Enron the help it wanted.

One could say that "Enron" is a story of corporate greed and crooked accounting. One could say that it's a story of disgraceful business models, sketchy document shredding, and criminal collusion on the part of private-sector employees. One could even say, in the words of Peggy Noonan, that certain Enron executives deserve criminal charges and a "big Texas whippin'."

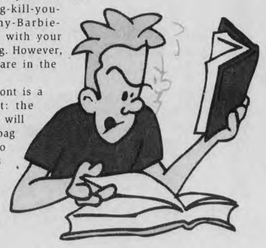
But one cannot say that the unfolding Enron story is an illustration of the need for campaign finance "reform," especially the hyper-regulatory Shays-Meehan bill that the House will soon consider as a result of this mess. Increased regulation of political speech, including Shays-Meehan's soft money ban and limits on television advertising, is bad enough policy as it is. The worst part, though, is that we are poised to head down that dangerous road for all the wrong reasons—to cleanse ourselves of scandals that never existed and sever over those money trails that proved to lead nowhere.

Making room for roommates: the ups and downs of sharing space

By John Siwicki
Staff Writer

Heated confrontations can come in many forms. Everyone has had his or her own personal squabble. The curfew debate with the parents has always been an issue. And everyone has had the "I-am-going-kill-you-for-breaking-my-Barbie-doll" argument with your "favorite" sibling. However, those disputes are in the past.

In the forefront is a new combatant: the roommate. They will devour the last bag of Extreme Nacho Cheese Doritos without hesitation or consideration. What about when the prized eagle nest chair cushion is discovered in a neighboring room, kidnapped from its rightful owner? And how about the pile of your roommate's dirty clothes that gradually impedes the personal space of your bed, your desk and your Chris Isaak CD box set? As a result, tensions mount and the dorm can transform into a collegiate war-zone. The disputes are minutes in stature—come on, who can't buy another bag of Doritos? Invasion of privacy, respect and understanding are underlying concerns of the small battles. However, the arguments are all a part of co-existing with your roomie and the all-encompassing learning experience.



Sure, college is about education. Why else would someone pay $32,000 to attend a University in the middle of Pennsylvania? The University's reputation as a prestigious and scholarly institution draws in a thousand students a year in search of an outstanding learning experience. Their expectations are met as a quality education is delivered in the typical curricular form and then surpassed in the social arena as students of diverse geographic and cultural backgrounds convene in dormitories across campus. The drawback: friction is a distinct possibility. Roommates will bicker like married couples for hours on end.

Turn that music down. Keep the lights off. Where did my Ramen Noodles go? What happened to my Anna Kournikova poster? We have all had these discussions before, but that's the beauty of the situation.

Turn that music down. Keep the lights off. Where did my Ramen Noodles go? What happened to my Anna Kournikova poster? We have all had these discussions before, but that's the beauty of the situation. We are all in the same boat and it almost always works out. The music is turned to level 14 instead of 25. The lights go off at midnight on Tuesdays because your roomie has a dreaded 8 a.m. The middle ground is sought and the art of compromise bears its fruits. We begin to understand the differences between people. We interact. We listen. We argue. And we learn.

Did you know St. Mary's, Pa. was home to America's largest ceramic cow? I didn't know that either. Speaking from the upstate New York perspective, have you ever met someone who has never seen snow? Or how about someone who actually gets more snow than you?

The point: Living with peers 24 hours a day, seven days a week certainly reveals the idiosyncrasies of your buddies. No longer do you think the world revolves around your hometown. New ideas and customs are shared. The process is certainly an eye-opening journey. You notice they can be moody, hilarious, intellectual and annoying at any given moment of any given day. The emotional roller-coaster ride is simply another part of the college experience. Arguments make the relationships stronger, respect enhances the living environment and compromise brings us all together. The best part; It always ends the same way. The disputes will be discarded in the name of camaraderie. We will ascend the mountain of laundry, cross the valley of forgotten popcorn kernels and together sit in our respective eagle nest chairs reflecting on the amazing tennis accomplishments of Anna Kournikova and the world renowned ceramic cow.

BUSINESS & POLITICS

President Bush inspires nation in address

By Michael Gorman

Courtesy of Reuters

President George W. Bush stands in front of Vice President Dick Cheney and Speaker of the House Dennis Hastert during his first State of the Union address on Tuesday to lay out his goals for the future.

On Tuesday night, President George W. Bush delivered his first official State of the Union address to a joint session of Congress. As with most State of the Unions, Bush's speech was full of lofty rhetoric and far-reaching goals for the coming year in America.

The speech focused largely on the issue of national security with Bush discussing both the war on terror and homeland defense. Bush spent the first part of his speech describing the accomplishments of the nation in the five months after the attack, specifically focusing on the liberation of Afghanistan and capture of Al-Qaeda members. Despite the powerful language, the President did not sugar-coat the recent status of the country and its war. In what was probably the darkest moment of the speech, Bush listed some of the materials found in the caves of Afghanistan for the first time. He spoke of detailed plans of American infrastructure including power plants and water facilities as well as diagrams of national monuments, major cities and plans for making chemical weapons.

While the campaign in Afghanistan has demolished that country's ability to train terrorists, Bush noted that tens of thousands had already been trained, and now spread throughout the world, waiting to strike. The President then took the time to point out that Afghanistan is merely the beginning of the war rather than the end. "While the most visible military action is in Afghanistan, America is acting elsewhere." Bush specifically mentioned that the American military is now spreading the war to the Philippines, Bosnia and the coastal waters of Africa.

When Bush turned his attention to the defense of the homeland, he focused on the role to be played by all Americans. He praised the courage and alertness of the flight attendants who subdued accused shoe bomber Richard Reid, and said, "America will continue to depend on the eyes and ears of alert citizens," when combating terrorism. In an initiative to former President Kennedy's creation of the Peace Corps, Bush announced the creation of the Freedom Corps. The new organization would fall under the direction of homeland defense, and would include training volunteers to help their cities prepare for and respond to terrorist attacks. Bush also stated that he wanted to double the membership of the Peace Corps to help spread America's message around the world.

After complementing Congress on their bipartisan handling of the war on terror, Bush segued into domestic economic policy. The President was very blunt about the fact that the government would run a deficit, but quickly pointed out that the price of freedom is never too high. The President also pointed out that these deficits would remain manageable so long as Congress was able to restrain new spending. When discussing domestic policy, Bush focused on unemployment benefits, prescription drug coverage for Medicare, a patients bill of rights, teacher training and new funding for early education programs. Many of these issues are typically strong points for the Democratic Party, possibly signaling that the President is more willing to compromise on domestic policy initiatives. However, Bush made clear that he was not willing to compromise on tax policy, stating, "... when those checks arrived in the mail, most Americans thought tax relief was just about right."

Noticeably absent from the President's address were two of the most contentious issues for the administration, Enron and the detainees at Guantanamo Bay. Bush did address the need for reforming the nation's laws regarding 401(k) plans, but stopped short of directly mentioning Enron and the upcoming court battle between the GAO and the White House.

Bush also opened the possibility for a new front in America's war, putting the regimes of North Korea, Iran and Iraq on notice saying, "States like these, and their terrorist allies, constitute an axis of evil, arming to threaten the peace of the world ... In any of these cases, the price of indifference would be catastrophic." While it is somewhat unusual for a President to be so blunt regarding foreign policy in a State of the Union address, Fox News analysts explained that this was not merely a speech to the nation, but rather, it was a speech to the world. The speech was carried on the Arab television station Al-Jazeera, and Bush was clearly intent on sending a message to those who would wish harm on America.

In closing, Bush declared to the nation, "Steadfast in our purpose, we now press on. We have known freedom's price. We have shown freedom's power. And in this great conflict, my fellow Americans, we will see freedom's victory."

U.S. Forces storm Afghan hospital

Special Forces took part in a daring raid to flush out the remaining Al-Qaeda forces in Kandahar hospital.

By Charles Mitchell
Senior Writer

The last pocket of known resistance in the Afghan city of Kandahar was wiped out Monday, according to The Washington Post. As Afghan government spokesman Khalid Pashtun put it, "They are all dead. They fought to the last drop of their blood."

"They" were six Arab Al-Qaeda fighters who were holed up in a Kandahar hospital for almost two months. Most likely from Saudi Arabia, Algeria and Yemen, they had been brought to the hospital with 13 other Arabs after being wounded in the fighting between the Taliban, U.S. and Afghan forces. When it became apparent that Kandahar was about to fall, the fighters grabbed explosives and threatened to blow themselves up if any Westerner came near.

A seven-week standoff then ensued, during which some of the men escaped, several were captured and another blew himself up with a grenade following a failed Jan. 8 escape attempt.

Several weeks ago, Afghan officials ordered the hospital administration to stop supplying food to the six remaining men. That attempt to starve the men out, which supposedly was the U.S. Special Forces' idea, resulted in a Red Cross protest and reports of civilians, doctors, and even Afghan guards sneaking food to the Arabs.

The standoff ended Monday, following an assault that had been planned for a week. At 3:40 a.m., U.S. and Afghan troops surrounded the hospital and ordered the Arabs to surrender, promising that they would not be harmed. Pistol fire was the Arabs' answer to that demand.

After withdrawing for several hours, the troops reiterated the demand for surrender, and it was again rejected. Afghan police officer Hayat Mohammed described the effort: "We are trying to arrest them alive. If we wanted to kill them, we could do it in 15 minutes."

At first, a fire truck pumped water into the building, in an attempt to flood the Arabs out. When that proved unsuccessful, the U.S. and Afghan troops launched what The Washington Post deemed "an intense, 45-minute barrage of gunfire and grenades." The Arabs fought back "fiercely," in the words of U.S. Army Maj. Chris Miller. By 1:45 p.m., however, they were all dead, one of the six having killed himself with a grenade.

Miller called the Afghan troops "real heroes," and he and the Pentagon said that they were there to assist the Afghans and play a supporting role. Other observers have said that the U.S. troops trained the Afghans and issued orders. Also, that U.S. sharpshooters who were posted outside the hospital played a major role.

During the final assault, the attacking forces stormed the hospital room-by-room, throwing concussion grenades and spraying gunfire.

Five Afghans were wounded, but no American casualties were reported.

Kandahar, in southern Afghanistan, was the spiritual center of the toppled Taliban militia, which used to rule most of Afghanistan. So, it is significant that all resistance there has now been eliminated. Other groups of Al-Qaeda and Taliban fighters are said to be operating in the surrounding countryside.

Camp X-Ray starts international controversy

By Amir Sadachiani
Staff Writer

When is a war prisoner not a prisoner of war (POW)? When the United States brings Taliban detainees to Guantanamo Bay, Cuba. "It's not going to be a country club," Secretary of Defense, Donald Rumsfeld told Time Magazine, referring to the new military detention camp, named Camp X-Ray, where 158 suspected terrorists are being held in small, open-air cells. The facility has been called Camp X-Ray since the early 1990s when it housed Haitian refugees.

The detainees began arriving in Cuba on Jan. 11. Individual identities have yet to be released by the U.S. government. Authorities are in the process of interrogating them, hoping to gain intelligence that will aid in the war on terrorism.

There has been some controversy over the conditions under which the detainees are being kept. According to the Associated Press, they are being kept in open-air eight foot by eight foot cells, with walls of chain-link fence set on a concrete slab and covered by a corrugated roof. Each detainee has been given a thin mattress, two towels and a white sheet. The captives are clad in bright orange jump suits and are shackled when they are outside their cell. If they leave their cells, it is only done with two armed guards. They get to shower about twice a week.

Military officials are currently working on making life more comfortable for the detainees. They are now being allowed to grow back their beards and long hair, which they were forced to shave upon being captured in Afghanistan due to health concerns. A Muslim cleric has been brought in as chaplain and to regularly announce the call to prayer five times a day. The detainees pray facing Mecca, but always under the watchful eye of U.S. snipers.

Although the detainees represent 25 countries, 100 of them are from Saudi Arabia. The United States has refused demands by other governments and human rights groups to declare the detainees POWs.

According to the Associated Press, the Bush administration considers the captured fighters to be "unlawful combatants" and "detainees" rather than prisoners of war, because they don't represent a recognized government and their method of terror violates internationally accepted laws of warfare. This distinction is significant because under the Geneva Conventions written after World War II, a POW has certain legal rights that would govern the U.S. military's interrogations of the detainees and require they be released when the hostilities in Afghanistan are over.

Although several nations have spoken out against the United States for not giving POW status to the detainees, the United States does not intend to change its current plans.

America: Land of the free?

By Matthew Hinson
Senior Writer

Bucknellian Commentary

For more than four months now, Democrats and Republicans have worked together in a strange fulfillment of President George W. Bush's desire to bring bipartisanship "back" to government. (When it was ever first there, I do not know.) On all issues both sides seem willing to compromise, though not surrender, their positions. Though the people have given the President a better than 80 percent approval rating, are confident in their Congress and optimistic about their future and that of the nation, we must ask the question: Is such unity a good thing?

Tuesday night, Bush outlined in his first State of the Union address his war and domestic strategies for the coming year. He warned nations who harbor or sponsor terrorism that they will be given a chance to rid themselves of such activities, but, if they do not, the United States will do the job for them. He also said he would like, with Congressional help, to increase military spending, strengthen homeland security, make businesses more accountable for their actions and continue to honor his tax cut. In addition, Bush asked Americans to donate their time, in the spirit of community seen directly after the terrorist attacks in September, announcing the creation of the U.S.A. Freedom Corps, a service organization under the umbrella of homeland security, in which people would agree to be available to serve their community with their special talents during times of distress. Bush also pledged to double the size of the Peace Corps, as well as strengthen Americorps, a domestic version of the Peace Corps created by former president Bill Clinton.

Senator Richard Gephardt (D-MO) gave the response to the State of the Union address. While backing Bush fully on the 'War on Terror,' Gephardt called for a domestic focus on the unemployed, corporate accountability to employees (as not seen in the case of recently failed energy giant Enron Corp.), campaign finance reform, an increased minimum wage, prescription drug Medicare benefit and tax deductibility for some college or worker training expenses.

For all the rhetoric, there was not much difference in the two platforms. Both called for increased military spending, corporate accountability and service to country. While on the surface it seems that cooperation is a good thing, this basic agreement between the parties could be dangerous. Bush is following almost to the letter what he said he would do in his campaign promises to increase spending for the military (including a large pay raise) and increase volunteerism and personal responsibility amongst citizens, while still increasing the size and scope of government, which is an ... interesting ... combination of goals. Undoubtedly, in the "spirit of cooperation" Democrats will go along with these proposals. Now understanding that the American public overwhelmingly supports current policies initiated by Bush, Congress realizes that it may do whatever it wishes so long as it is able to do as Bush does and tie issues into the war, no matter the true relevance.

Where was mention of the prisoners at Guantanamo Bay and in Afghanistan? What of new airline security procedures and the double danger that occurs with profiling as well as searching people's luggage? What happened to the Fourth Amendment? Somehow, searching through people's luggage looking for knives and tweezers seems unreasonable, even in the name of "national security."

What happened to the United States being the defender of liberty and individual freedom? No longer do we hear criticisms from our government about Russian treatment of Chechens, or Chinese treatment of Falun Gong members or about any other strong-arm tactics anywhere. Recently, the Russian government shut down one of the last independent media houses in Russia but where was the cry about free press? In the spirit of cooperation, we allow other nations to do as they will provided they back us on the issue of terrorism. Will the same ills be allowed to befall Americans, following behind their wonderful loving government, whose only concern is their safety from "terrorism?" First come closed-door military tribunals for foreigners (POWs, combat detainees, terrorists, call them what you will) and restricted freedoms in air travel, what next? How far does antiterrorism go? Will we surrender free speech (terrorist threats) free press (already managed by a half-dozen corporations), free assembly (a large crowd could draw attacks), as well as freedom to have privacy, an implicit right granted in the Third and Fourth amendments. Will we go the route of Britain and Israel installing cameras everywhere and posting soldiers on street corners?

In conducting a war on terrorism and ensuring the safety of Americans in their own homes, the Congress and President must be careful not to take away the reasons Americans want their homes defended: that we have stood as one of the freest nations ever to grace the earth; that we are, and can continue to be, a beacon of light to the world, provided we are free enough to do so, and secure in our freedoms.

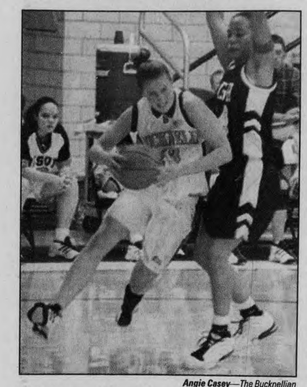
Women's b-ball still holds first place tie

After a strong victory over Lehigh on Sat., the Bison fell to Holy Cross after being outscored 42-24 in the second half



Angie Casey—The Bucknellian

Molly Creamer '03 contributed 16 points and 14 assists to the Bison victory over Lehigh on Saturday.

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

Lehigh has enjoyed playing at Davis Gym over the past couple of years. Each instance has been a big game and the Mountain Hawks have left Lewisburg victorious the past two years.

The setting was similar this year as Lehigh entered Saturday's game tied with the Orange and Blue for first place in the Patriot League. Fortunately for the Bison the final outcome was different as senior tri-captain Vicki Quimby led all scorers with a season-high 27 points on 12 of 16 shooting from the floor to lead her squad to a 71-63 victory. With the victory the Bison claim first place outright in the Patriot League with a record of 5-1.

"The team was very calm on Saturday. We knew the inside game, both offensively and defensively were going to be critical. I thought the defensive effort by our post players was great," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said.

The home team opened the contest with six straight points to take the early lead. Lehigh countered by rattling off five straight points to get within one. Bucknell responded with a 10-2 run to take a 16-7 lead with 13:47 left in the half. Lehigh battled back, scoring 10 unanswered points to take their first lead of the game, 17-16. After battling back and forth throughout the remainder of the half the Orange and Blue went on an 8-0 run to end the half and entered the locker room with a 33-26 advantage.

Lehigh started well in the beginning of the second half, cutting the deficit to five, but the Bison countered with a 10-0 run over the next four minutes to go up by 15, 47-32. Lehigh did not go away, getting within three, 62-59, at the 2:51 mark.

A minute later Molly Creamer '03 hit three free throws to push her team's lead to seven, which sealed the eight-point win for the Orange and Blue. Creamer registered her second double-double of the season, scoring 16 and dishing out a career-high 14 assists. That mark ties the school record for assists in a single game. Kate Franks '03 had a superb shooting night, going six of eight from the floor in scoring 14.

Team of the Week

"All games in this League are going to go down to the wire. I had faith and confidence in the experience of my team down the stretch," Fedorjaka said.

The Bison suffered a hard setback when Tri-Captain Rebekah May '02 went down late in the second half with a fractured ankle. She is expected to be out for four to six weeks.

"As a coaching staff we are certainly disappointed about the loss of Rebekah but every team faces adversity. This team has great strength and Rebekah is already in good spirits. She is putting the team first as I knew she would and I have confidence that others on the team will step up and fill her spot for us," Fedorjaka said.

"Vicki had a great performance and really did a great job along with Kate Rounsley '02 guarding Ann Tierney in the post. I thought Molly's 14 assists were phenomenal as a mark itself but also in the fact that Lehigh was guarding her so tough and doing everything they could to prevent her from getting a good look at the basket. It was great that she beat them with her passing," Fedorjaka said.

"The win was a team effort, no doubt. We stuck to the game plan of holding their interior scorers to low digits and containing their guards. Vicki did a great job of nailing her shots and Molly was awesome at finding her teammates," Rounsley said.

"Monique Leblanc '02 was big on the boards for us and Kate Franks had an outstanding game and has been really shooting the ball well this year," Fedorjaka said.

The Lehigh victory got the Bison back on the winning track after suffering their first league loss of the season this past Wednesday night on the road against Colgate. The 84-81 defeat ended the squad's six-game winning streak.

The game was close during the first part of the opening frame but the Red Raiders would explode to take a 15-point lead, 38-23 with 5:28 left in the half. The Orange and Blue tried to cut into the deficit and got it to 11, 50-39 at halftime.

The Bison continued to catch-up as the second half started and closed within three, 58-55, at the 14-minute mark. Colgate fired back with ten unanswered points to push their lead to 13, 68-55, at the 11:07 mark.

The Orange and Blue hung in there, outscoring the host squad 13-2 over a three-minute stretch to get within two, 74-72, with 2:42 to play. With only 13 ticks left on the clock, Rounsley made a lay-up to put her team only down by three, 78-75.

Colgate would go on to have a good night from the foul line and extended their lead to 84-78. Franks hit a three-pointer at the buzzer to make it a three-point loss. Creamer led all players with 23 points and became the third player in school history to surpass the 1,400 point mark in her career. Desire Almind '04 and Rounsley added 12 for the Bison while Tri-Captain LeBlanc and Franks each had 11.

"Colgate is a good team that can put a lot of points up. The first half was uncharacteristic of our play to that point in the season. We came out on our heels and let them attack us," Fedorjaka said.

"We regrouped at halftime and I was proud of the way the kids fought back. The kids played smarter and stronger but we just didn't have enough," Fedorjaka said.

"The Colgate loss was very disappointing to us but our response in practice the next day was exceptional and prepared us well to rebound against Lehigh," Leblanc said.

The Orange and Blue begin the second round of Patriot League play this coming weekend as they travel to Easton, Pa. to square off against Lafayette.

"It is going to be a big game for them as they start the second round of League play and they are going to be hungry. We have to put our first round away and go in there with the mindset of having no letdowns. We have to get the job done," Fedorjaka said.

This past weekend was a busy one for the Bucknell indoor track and field team. While 40 of their top athletes traveled to Penn State for the National Invitational, the rest of the Bison squad hosted the Bison Open in Gerhard Fieldhouse.

"We wanted to give out elite athletes the chance to compete against high level, high caliber teams at Penn State. This gave the rest of the team a chance to compete at a high level [at Bucknell] against quality teams," Head Coach Kevin Donner said.

A select group of 20 women and 20 men traveled to State College this past weekend to participate in the annual Penn State National Open. This two day, non-scored meet gave the Bison an opportunity to prove that they could compete on the same level as bigger programs, including schools such as Georgetown, George Mason, Villanova and Penn State. In just two days, the Bucknell women's team had six individuals and one relay team break into the school's all-time top-10 lists, and one school record was broken. The men's team had three individuals and one relay team earn all-time honors.

Breaking her own school record and coming in sixth place, Stephanie Bango '02 earned a sixth-place finish in the 800 meter run with a time of 2:09.08. Her time was enough to meet the NCAA provisional standard. The relay team composed of Amy Calvo '05, Rehana Lanewala '05, LaTonya

Men's b-ball victory gives them three way first place tie in PL

By Pierre Hernando

The men's basketball team now owns a record of 8-11 (4-2) after garnering their second consecutive win with a victory over Lehigh (4-15, 1-5) this past Saturday at Davis Gym. The Bison have slowly been getting healthier and their improved game play is a good indication that pieces are falling into place.

Over the past 10 games, the Bison have gone 6-4 and now stand in a three-way tie for first place in the Patriot League along with rivals American and Navy.

A near-sellout crowd of 1,736 witnessed the Bison defeat Lehigh 69-50 with a 16-point, seven rebound performance from Bryan Bailey '02. The squad converted on 10-12 free throws in the final 1:43 to seal the win. The Bison led 56-48 with just over two minutes left to play before outscoring the Mountain Hawks 13-2 to provide the final margin.

Lehigh had trouble putting the ball in the basket and was limited to only 16 first half points.

Neither team started off well on the court, as only eight points combined were scored during the first nine minutes of the contest. The Bison got hot at the end of the first half, scoring the last nine points. The run included a three-pointer by Matt Quinn '03 and a fast-break dunk by Boakai Lalugba '03. The run allowed the team to lead at the half, 24-16.

The Mountain Hawks fought back early in the second half, primarily riding the hot hand of Matt Logie '03. Logie made three three-pointers to lead a 13-3 charge for Lehigh and a 29-27 lead. Logie led Lehigh in scoring, accounting for 13 of his team's total points.

The Bison fought back and got the lead for good. They sprung ahead after Brian Werner '03 and Mat Quinn '04 hit back-to-back three-pointers, giving the team a 45-37 advantage.

Dan Blankenship '03 had seven points in the Bison's victory over Lehigh on Sat.

Bailey started for the first time since coming back from an injury. He helped the team clinch the win by hitting 7 of 8 free-throws at the end of the game. As a squad, the Bison made 33 of 45 shots from the line.

The rebounding edge went to the Bison, as they out-rebounded Lehigh 42-34. Quinn grabbed a career-high seven boards.

Lalugba was limited to eight points due to fouls but did contribute with three steals in only 24 minutes. Werner finished with 15 points

Jen Perrin breaks gender barriers on wrestling squad

By Carmen Mauriello

With long, curly red hair, freckles and a slender build, you wouldn't expect Jen Perrin '05 to spend her free time twisting arms and ramming faces into the mat.

But you'd be wrong. The 18-year-old has been wrestling competitively since sixth grade, and she became the first female wrestler in Bucknell's history on Jan. 18 when she competed in the 125-pound match against Shippensburg University.

Perrin, of Somerset, Pa., followed her older brother Josh, currently a junior at Bucknell, into wrestling.

"We'd go to the wrestling tournaments to watch my brother, and I'd sit there," she said. "Basically I got bored watching, and one of the coaches one day saw that I was bored and suggested I try wrestling."

She went to a few practices and soon won a position in the 70-pound weight class, and in her first junior high match, she pinned her male competitor in only 34 seconds.

Perrin said her parents offered few objections to her non-traditional sport. "[My parents] thought it was odd that I wanted to wrestle," she said. "But they've always supported me in whatever I've done."

Perrin went on to register a 24-1 record her freshman year and a junior high championship and became a two-year varsity starter at Somerset High School, compiling a 10-8 mark her junior year. She also competed four times in the national women's championships in Ann Arbor, Mich., placing third her freshman year.

Also the first-ever female on her high school team, Perrin said it was easier to get acclimated by having her brother on the team. "It was kind of fun, because he always looked out for me," she said. "But my entire team grew up together, so we became really close."

Josh decided to attend the University after graduating and continue with wrestling. Last spring, when Jen graduated, she decided to follow her brother's choice of college; but with two bad shoulders,

Cecily Cairns Classic Corner

Looking back at Jim Piersall

In 1963, in the middle of a fruitless season, fading legend Duke Snider provided a rare moment of excitement for the lovably pathetic New York Mets when he belted out his 400th career home run. The press, generally accustomed to ignoring the dismal team, acknowledged the future Hall of Famer's milestone with no more than a tiny box in the corner of the sports page.

Jim Piersall, the team's boisterous center fielder, was one of the first to notice the lack of ink, and in his usual straightforward manner, was probably the first to mention it to Snider.

"You didn't get a lot of coverage for your 400th home run," Snider recalled Piersall telling him. "I'll tell you what– I've got 99. When I get my 100th, I'll get more ink than you got for your 400th." (ESPN Sportscentury)

In late June of that year, Piersall ripped a home run over the right field wall, the 100th of his career. Piersall watched the ball long enough to see it slip into the stands, then promptly did a 180, and launched himself on a trip around the bases–facing backwards–bouncing along to the uproar of the highly amused crowd, glancing over his shoulder to locate and step on each base.

True to Piersall's promise, the next day, The New York Times hit the stands with three pictures, a double headline and a lengthy article all emblazoned across the front of the sports page.

When asked about his bizarre baserunning antics, he explained, "That way I can see where I've been. I've always known where I'm going."

Illustration by Cecily Cairns

Yet Piersall was painfully aware of where he'd been, He didn't remember all of it, but he knew. Everybody knew.

In Piersall's era, mental illness existed under a stigma–any such condition was liable to cause disgrace, and generally merited eternal secrecy.

Society feared the irrational.

Piersall had no choice but to face that fear.

In 1952, the Boston Red Sox rookie woke up strapped to a bed, in a room he didn't recognize, surrounded by people he'd never seen before. They told him he had been sick and was now in the Westborough State Hospital. They told him it was August.

The last memory he could identify was from January, when he walked into the Sarasota-Terrace Hotel for spring training with his beloved Red Sox. He had no recollection of the months that had ensued.

He found out through the newspapers, through clippings and stories that his wife had saved for him. He read about how he had routinely verbally attacked umpires, how he constantly delayed games–mocking other players, compulsively barking orders at teammates, making animal sounds on the basepaths–and how he had burst into tears in the dugout, in plain view of everyone, when Lou Boudreau benched him for a game. He learned of how he had shot the home plate with a water pistol, imitated the pitchers while they warmed up and played catch with the scoreboard boy in the middle of a game.

He was told how his hellish season ended, when he was dragged, flailing and screaming, into the Westborough State Hospital, where he would be subjected to shock treatments and various medications.

When he came to in August, he didn't recognize the people he had met over that past year - his best friends, the coaches, the umpires, the doctors, and even his own children, were strangers. In contrast, everyone recognized him–he had undergone a full-fledged, gradual mental breakdown in the public's ruthless spotlight, which nobody could hide. The press had labeled him a hopeless wreck, regretfully reporting that his baseball career was over–his remarkable talent had gone to waste, they claimed.

It was assumed that even if he should become mentally sound enough to play baseball, his past had destroyed him. It would take an incomprehensible level of courage to face a public that had watched him crumble. Not to mention the umpires he had attacked and the players he had mocked.

But Piersall loved the game enough to make a bid at rejoining the Red Sox. Bold enough to place himself in the crosshairs of public scrutiny, he walked out of the Fenway tunnel again in 1953. His career, which was supposed to have perished in that institution in 1952, didn't end until 1967.

In 1954, he was selected to the All-Star team.

He did it again in 1956. He won two Gold Gloves en route to a spectacular .997 career fielding average in the outfield. By the time Piersall retired after a healthy 17 years in the Major Leagues, both Ted Williams and Casey Stengel had called him the greatest defensive outfielder they had ever seen.

His erratic behavior never did subside. Among his zany antics was an episode at Yankee Stadium that found him hiding behind the centerfield monuments, "talking" to Babe Ruth.

He was, in and of himself, a three-ring circus: in the outfield, he was an acrobat, climbing the foulpole, bouncing off the walls and leaping all over the field to snag fly balls and rob batters of home runs; in between the action, he was a clown, perfectly willing to ham it up for a crowd that came specifically to see his legendary eccentricity; and on the bad days, every once in a while, he was a human cannon, with a fuse that ignited at the slightest hint of flame.

Baseball fans never tiptoed around his condition. Some praised him for his fortitude; others taunted him for his misfortune. Piersall took it all in stride.

In 1955, he co-authored his autobiography Fear Strikes Out, sharing openly all the details of his horrifying mental disintegration. An indispensable breakthrough for the public image of mental illness, it was shockingly honest for the times. Whatever fears he had, he was never afraid to face the truth.

To claim that Piersall was never apprehensive about returning to the Majors would be inaccurate–he was petrified. For someone with a condition like his (later diagnosed as bipolar disorder), fear is a recurring demon. Piersall proved that it was a demon that could be defeated through tenacity and honesty.

He didn't have the offensive numbers to merit enshrinement into baseball's Hall of Fame, but half a century later, his name stands out in baseball history. What he defeated was more daunting than a 98-mph fastball, or a home run record or a line drive caroming off the green monster.

In the end, Piersall won a battle that almost anyone else would have been afraid to fight.

and was also the game's leading rebounder with eight boards. He also added two blocked shots. Ben Slater '04 came off the bench and hit all six of his foul shots, while also grabbing six rebounds. Also, Quinn totaled 12 points in the game on 4-5 shooting from the field.

The Bison went on the road to defeat Colgate 80-75 with a tremendous group effort. Lalugba scored a game-high 16 points and three other players scored in double figures. The win gave the team its seventh victory of the season and dropped Colgate's record to 9-8 (1-4). The Bison shot over 54 percent en route to their highest output of the 2001 campaign.

Jeremiah Bennett '04 drives down the lane against Lehigh.

In Bailey's return from a six-game absence, he hit 13 points.

A 20-7 run gave the team a 27-20 lead. The Bison hit 6 of 11 threes in the first half, the last one coming via Dan Blankenship '03 at the buzzer. The Orange and Blue led 37-30 at intermission.

The Bison enjoyed their largest lead at 14, thanks to Chris Rodgers '04, who hit his third three of the contest with 13:08 left in the game. Colgate fought back to within six points at 55-49 but a Rodgers lay-in and a Lalugba dunk increased the lead once again.

Head Coach Pat Flannery didn't like the fact that the squad was shooting just 50 percent from the foul line in league play heading into the game but liked what he saw against Colgate. The Bison hit 11 of 18 free throws over the last three minutes of the game to ensure the victory.

Pat Campolieta and Mark Linebaugh led the host with 14 points apiece. Campolieta also snagged a game-high 13 rebounds.

Along with Lalugba and Bailey, Rodgers and Blankenship also hit for double figures. Rodgers tied his career-high with 12 points while also tying for the game lead with four assists. Blankenship scored 14 points.

Bucknell	80
Colgate	75

Lalugba grabbed eight rebounds to lead the team and Werner had six boards.

The squad is slowly letting its presence be felt in the Patriot League. Key pieces are now in place as the team looks to turn the season completely around.

The inside-out combination of Lalugba and Bailey is now back for the stretch run and is proving to be a tough match-up for the opposition.

Werner, Blankenship and Quinn have been steady throughout the year, and Rodgers and Slater have been strong off the bench. Jack Namvou '04 has been getting some minutes and is playing well.

Flannery's squad has two games scheduled for the upcoming week - one at Lafayette on Feb. 2 and a home game versus Navy on Feb. 6.

McSwain '02 and Bango ran the fourth best time in University history and placed fourth out of 12 schools in the 1600 meter relay event, with a time of 3:51.54. Along with school recognition that they gained, this time also qualified them for ECACs.

Other highlights from the weekend include those made by Tolulope Fayanjuola '05, Kelly McConnell '02 and Theresa Dennis '03. Fayanjuola took 10th place in the long jump, recording the ninth best mark in Bucknell history with a leap of 17'10 1/4". McConnell ran the sixth best time in University history and placed 11th in the 1,000 meter run in 2:57.77. In the 5000 meter run, Dennis earned fourth place overall and ran an ECAC qualifying time.

On the men's side, Eric Furst had the highest finish of the day with his third-place finish in a close 1000 meter race. His time of 2:26.48 breaks into the seventh slot on the Bucknell all-time list. The relay team of Furst, Matt Nini '05, Ryan Newberger '05 and Noel Powell '04 placed 11th in the 1600 meter relay with a time of 3:19.42, the second best time in University history, just 0.56 seconds behind the school record.

Other individual highlights from the Penn State meet include performances by Greg Costello '03, Lou Palma '03 and Newburger. Costello finished seventh overall in the 3000 meter race with a time of 8:18.14, meeting the IC4A standard. Palma earned tenth place in the mile with a time of 4:15.49, and Newberger placed 11th in the 200 meter run, meeting IC4A standards with a time of 22:12.17.

"This meet was designed for performances, and I think that we came out with some really great ones," Donner said.

While part of the team was off competing at Penn State, the rest of the Bucknell Track and Field team was hard at work defending their home turf. The Bison Open consisted of 28 schools from five different states. There were over 1200 athletes in the Gerhard Fieldhouse this past weekend.

The Bison women accounted for four first place performances. Kim Zimbal '02 placed first in the long jump with a leap of 17'0. The distance medley relay team, comprised of Michelle Baylor '03, Kristin Kyzmir '02, Nicki Piper '03 and Jennifer Marsh '05 took first place with a time of 12:51.46.

Marsh also placed third in the mile with a time of 5:22.13. Robin Melling '04 and Andrea Nyce '02 took first and second place, respectively, in the women's triple jump. Maria Garcia '04, Liz Pendelton '05 and Erin Lee '04 swept the weight throw with distances of 48'8 1/4", 46'4 3/4" and 45'6 1/4", respectively.

For the men, Travis Etters '02 was the top performer of the day with his second place finish in the 3000 meter run with a time of 8:55'72. Kevin Walsh '04 earned a third place finish in the 1000 meter run with a time of 2:37.34. Matias Palaveio '03 took fourth place in the 800 meter run with a time of 1:59.67 and Augie Siciliano '05 who placed fourth overall in the weight throw.

"This past weekend was a tremendous one for both our men's and women's programs at both meets. Everyone is improving their marks," Donner said.

Most of the Bison squad reunites this weekend for a very competitive meet at Ohio State. There they will encounter competition such as Ohio State, Purdue, E. Michigan and Kent State.

"We are ready to show these schools what we are made of," Donner said.

SUPERBOWL XXXVI PREDICTIONS

Aaron DeRosa, Sports Editor

With a Super Bowl that promises to be both thick and chunky—mostly because I'll be visiting Taco Bell before hand and we all know what a Chalupa can do to your bowels—I still have to pick the Pats. If you want my reasons, read my column ... slackers.

Patriots

Scott Kloss, Senior Writer

With offensive firepower greater than some countries' militaries, the Rams will use this advantage to overwhelm and eventually wear down the Cinderella Pats. About the only think the Patriots can hope for is Mel Gibson's support!

Rams

Rob Schmicker, Senior Writer

The Rams offense still appears unstoppable and their defense will be hard to score on. But even with that in mind, I'm picking New England to win. Tom Brady (Drew Bledsoe) will take advantage of his time on the bench and steal Kurt Warner's Chunky Soup, propelling the Patriots to a stunning 31-28 win.

Patriots

Cecily Cairns, Sports Editor

Prior to week 13, Patriots' Head Coach Bill Belichick sat his team down and rolled a film clip of rags-to-riches racehorse Tiznow winning the Breeders Cup Classic as inspirational fodder. Why is this important? Because Tiznow always won the races that mattered most. Patriots win in a photo finish.

Patriots

Chris Perrella, Staff Writer

The Patriots went into Heinz Field as 11-point underdogs and came out with a win. The Rams won a hard fought game against the Eagles with the help of a few key turnovers. The only way New England can win is if they keep it close going into the half otherwise don't count on a second half comeback. Go Pats!

Swimmers bid farewell to Freas-Rooke

By Adam Yukelson
Staff Writer

How would you describe the final swim meet at Freas-Rooke pool? If you were Head Coach Jerry Foley, you would call it "electrifying." He will surely miss the ambience of the Bison's home pool, where the echoing thunder of the home crowd spelled doom for the Bison opponents.

Both the men and the women were undefeated at home this year. For Jackie Feinthel '05, the final meet in Freas-Rooke pool meant a pair of victories in the 1,000 free and the 200 fly. In the 1,000, she recorded™ a time of 10:30.19, which also meant a new Bucknell record, a record that will forever remain in the books at the now-retired pool.

Feinthel wasn't the only one rewriting the record books that Saturday; Darby Golino '03, Jamie Flick '05, Ashley Aiken '05 and Megan Freese '04 teamed up to take the 400 medley relay in 4:01.41, the 10th best time in school history.

The swimming and diving teams will begin their season in the brand new Recreation and Athletics Center next year. "I am elated about the new pool", Foley said, citing that although Freas-Rooke is a great place to hold a home meet, it is not very accommodating as far as practice facilities go.

In their final meet of the regular season, the Bison split with Lehigh. The men fell to 3-3 on the season with a 174-126 loss, while the women prevailed 159-139 to improve to 5-2.

The men's team grabbed six individual victories on the afternoon. Adam Freeman '05 was the Bison's lone double-winner, as he placed first in both diving events. Freeman posted a 254.25 in the one-meter diving and a 240.375 in the three-meter.

Other event winners for the men's team included Stelios Saffos '03, Peter Garvin '04, Stephen Schwanhausser '03 and Gonzalo Diaz '03. Saffos won the 100-breast in 59.60, and Garvin placed first in the 50 free in 21.69. Winning the 200 breast in 2:10.64 was Schwanhausser, and Diaz won the 500 free in 4:50.59.

Spotlight Team

The women were again paced by their relay teams–this time it was the combo of Freese, Flick, Aiken and Abby Weaver who ran away with first in a time of 1:51.19 in the 200 medley.

Next up for the Bison are the Patriot League championships, Feb. 14-16 in Annapolis, Md. As anyone involved in sports could attest to, setting goals and striving to achieve those goals is vital to a team's performance, and ultimately their success. "We want to do as well as possible," Foley said. "We expect to contend for a title on both sides."

For the women, Foley believes that they control their own destiny. As their record proves, they are a force to be reckoned with. Add on to that the lack of respect they received from their patriot league foes during the preseason and you can be sure that they are a team on a mission to prove they belong. On the men's side Foley is taking a little different approach.

His team has been plagued by injuries all year long, but the guys cannot afford to focus on what they are missing. "Our big guys need to step it up," Foley said. "Our two big guns are injured; guys will need to fill some voids that have been created due to injury."

With over two weeks to prepare for Patriots, both teams should be ready to go when the gun goes off on Feb. 14.

she didn't plan on joining him on the mat, instead planning to play tennis for the University.

But the team had an opening in the 125-pound weight class—her weight class in high school—and her brother began talking to Head Coach Tim Wittman about his sister's interest in the sport.

"If she has an interest, she should give it a shot," Wittman told Josh.

But in the fall, Perrin wavered about wrestling. "At first I wasn't sure if I was going to do it or not," she said. "It's so much harder [at this level] and a really big commitment. Especially doing two Division-I sports, I knew it would conflict. But both my coaches said they'd be flexible with it and deal with it ... I was just concerned about my shoulders, but I realized that if I didn't do it, I'd probably regret it."

So after winter break, she started practicing with the team. But since the team had been in training since September, Perrin's conditioning lagged well behind her teammates.

Still, after just two to three weeks of intensive practice, she was thrust into action against Shippensburg. She fought valiantly in the first round, but was pinned at the end of the second round. Perrin was pleased with her endurance and attributed the defeat more to nerves than to a major difference in skill.

Perrin said the tremendous fan support gave her a major boost for the match, as the tennis team, track team, her freshman hall and her parents filled the stands.

The next day she squared off again, this time taking her East Stroudsburg rival deep into the second round before being pinned. Wittman said her determination in the ring surprised him.

"She made it through a couple of periods in those two matches with guys cranking on her arms," he said. "But you didn't hear a peep out of her, she just kept on going."

This hard-nosed determination and strong work ethic have earned Perrin the respect of her teammates. "The team respects her because she's treated just the way we are, and she does all the things that we do in practice," Brock Hostetter '03 said. "If you're there day in and day out, you're going to get the respect."

Josh Perrin has always admired his sister's mental toughness. "I think her best skill is her mind," he said. "She doesn't give up for anything and is the toughest mental wrestler I've ever met. She's faced a lot of adversity wrestling with guys and was pretty good in high school and continues to improve."

Jen Perrin '05 intently studies her fellow grapplers.

He doesn't get too nervous to see his sister on the mat, because after being on a team with her for most of his career, it's old hat to him now. The only time he said his brotherly instinct kicks in is when he sees one of her opponents disrespecting her.

Jen said that her brother has been an invaluable help in conditioning her for this season. "He works with me, and if I want to work outside of practice, he'd be there," she said. "He'd do anything to help me out."

You would think that Perrin would also need help in the classroom, as her nightmarish practice schedule includes morning weightlifting, daily wrestling practices and frequent tennis sessions.

Once again, you'd be wrong. Perrin posted a 3.75 GPA in her first semester toward her Early Childhood and Elementary Education major.

"It can get tough because after practice you're so tired you don't want to do anything, but then you have to concentrate on work," she said. "But I had to do the same thing in high school, so it's just another level higher."

But Perrin's excitement about earning a spot on the Bison squad is dimmed by the fact that the wrestling program is scheduled to be eliminated after this season in order for the University to better comply with Title IX. She is left scratching her head, wondering why a law designed to enhance opportunities for female athletes is eliminating one for her.

"Title IX is a great idea," she said. "When they first started it, it did so much for girls in sports. But I think it's getting a little outdated and people are interpreting it differently and it's hurting so many sports.

"It's not supposed to cut teams. Especially now with wrestling, because it's the sport that I love and they're cutting it and they're like, 'But it's for your own good.'"

Still, Perrin is focusing on the rest of this season. Her shoulder injuries kept her out of last Sunday's Maryland meet, but she hopes to be in the line-up when the Bison return home on Feb. 10 to challenge Binghamton.

"I don't really have a record I want to achieve, I want to mainly just wrestle well," she said. "Because I know [my opponents] are going to be that much stronger and that much better, so I just want to wrestle well and hopefully get a few wins in there and help our team out."

Inside Sports

Molly Creamer, who leads the women's basketball team and the Patriot League in scoring at 21.9 ppg, is ranked sixth in the nation with her scoring average. The junior has tallied 373 points in 17 games played this season and is the third highest scoring junior in the country. She vaulted 22 spots in the national statistics after scoring 78 points in two games last week, including a school and Patriot League record 43-point performance against Army on February 16.

Andrea Nyce '02 reset her own school record in the pole vault on Saturday with a winning vault of 12'1", over one and half feet better than her nearest competitor. Her performance also helped the women's team place first among eight schools in the team standings.

Noel Powell '04 smashed the Bucknell indoor record in the long jump, winning the event with a leap of 24'9 3/4", over seven inches better than the previous record. Powell's jump also met the NCAA Provisional standard, and helped the Bison defeat seven other schools and capture the meet title.

We like sports

Investing in the Fan "Bank-and-Trust"

If this past week's football game has taught me anything, it's that it's not just Yankee fans who are absolute jerks with an intelligence span narrower than Calista Flockhart's waist. It applies to all sports and all teams everywhere.

However, I've decided to establish a system for future team-worshipping bliss. This is in direct response to the bitter Eagles fans who harangued the only Rams fan this past weekend for rejoicing in her team's victory. Apparently, when you are glad that your team has won, you are automatically labeled a frontrunner regardless of prior fan-dom.

But I reiterate that this is not a Philly-centric phenomenon. This occurs everywhere, so all you Eagle and Steeler lovin' freaks can sit back down. Brush your teeth, get an Altoid ... something.

So here is my system. Fan-dom should be based on the same principles as the stock market. We'll call it simply the Fan Affiliation Stock Exchange, or FASE. This way, when your fellow neighbors at the game start hurling condemnations and obscenities at you, you may reply in sassy indignation, "Boy, get out of my FASE!" or "FASE it, my team is just better than yours."

The way this system works is that when you first develop an interest in a sport you must buy your stock in a team. You could get a card stamped, tattoo, virgin sacrifice, decoder ring ... I don't care. Whether you buy a winning team or losing team, have regional recognition or hereditary hubris, because you like their uniforms or because the first baseman is a "dreamboat," it makes no difference.

The comeback "well I don't see your team in the playoffs, now do I?" is not a valid argument. Such a theory is as lame as James Buchanan sitting in the oval office waiting for Abe Lincoln to take his oath. Or maybe as lame as that joke.

Now obviously, the longer your stock stays with that team, the more value it accumulates. Some teams are perennial losers, i.e. any New England team and/or baseball team from Canada. Those stocks will be worth the most when they finally cash in.

Conversely, if you purchase stock in the Yankees a week before the World Series, you are buying high and can only lose out on the deal. Or in other words, your fan-stock is worth nothing and no one will respect you because you are a front-running trogladyte with a verdant ersatz affinity for the team in question and are subject to the susurrations of your mental superiors.

And those are the basics of FASE. Two more things about fans though. Everyone mark this down. In my uninformed years I used to do this as well, but I have learned the error of my ways and so I can impart a bit of knowledge.

First, as my friend was kind enough to point out, the excuse often used by people with the intellectual prowess of spore mold is "that team doesn't deserve to be in the Super Bowl" excuse. Of course they deserve to be there. No team makes it to the playoffs by accident, unless you play in the NBA where there are 29 teams and 26 find their way into the postseason, making the playoffs drag more than Joe Camel after intercourse.

Observation number two: when someone criticizes your team, the most facile and lackluster comeback I've ever heard is "well I don't see your team in the playoffs, now do I?" That is not a valid argument. Such a theory is as lame as James Buchanan sitting in the oval office waiting for Abe Lincoln to take his oath. Or maybe as lame as that joke.

With all this said, I feel that it is a safe time to buy some stock in the New England Patriots. I understand that they are going to the Super Bowl and this would be contradictory to the entire stock exchange system I have concocted in my diabolical laboratory.

However, as big an underdog as they are, I think I'm still buying stock relatively low here. This is by no means a long-term investment. I still have plenty of stock in the Buffalo Bills and New York Jets. It is not without merit to suggest that I've been affected by the economic downturn. But I digress.

I'm not a Patriots fan. I'm not a New Englander. I'm from New York, and no, New York is not a New England state despite the fact that "York" is an English city. I root for the Jets, the Mets, the Knicks, the Bills and surprisingly the Bulls.

So here it comes: the New England Patriots can and will win the Super Bowl. Laugh if you must, call it optimism, call it lunacy, call it "not understanding that the Patriots suck and the Rams don't," - it doesn't matter to me. I think they can do it. Be it Bledsoe or Brady, Belichek or Martz, asylum and me, I think they stand a shot. All I need to do is hope that a team from New England will finally have the chutzpa to win a game.

Playing the coaching game

With the Super Bowl less than a week away, one thing is for sure-no coach's job is safe. The same thing happens every year at this time: some NFL coaches lose their jobs while some NHL and NBA coaches struggle to survive the end of the season. It is an exact science and is on time every year.

This year has been the worst storm in recent history and frankly, I'm fed up. Every time a coach is fired, the words "underachievement" and "new direction" are always heard. There are a few things I still don't understand about the world of sports–how the Yankees keep winning every year; why former Georgia QB Eric Zeier is not a star in the NFL; and most importantly why coaches are entirely to blame for a team's success and/or failure.

Rob Schmicker

Let's use Tony Dungy, coach of the Tampa Bay Buccaneers, as an example. I don't understand why an incredible coach, someone who should be known as a savior, can be fired because his team hasn't made it to the Super Bowl. How many people remember the Tampa Bay Buccaneers before Tony Dungy took over as coach? The last Tampa Bay winning record in the Pre-Dungy period was in 1981.

In his six years as coach, Dungy has led the Bucs to four playoff appearances. The reason they cannot step up to the next level is not their coach—it's their players. Warren Sapp and their highly rated defense has a chip on its shoulder and their best offensive player feels it's his job to rip the rest of the unit after every game. Is it Dungy's responsibility to coach the team, or is it his responsibility to play peacemaker and be babysitter? They should get rid of the infectious players that are eating away at the team and not the coach.

Have no fear though–Dungy once again has a job. Having lost his job in Tampa, Dungy is the new coach in Indianapolis. The Colts, coming off a 5-11 season recently fired Head Coach Jim Mora, the most exciting post-game interview in the game. Mora, never afraid to speak his mind, was more than just a comic off the field- he was a great coach on the field. Out of all the NFL coaches, I think he understood his job the best. He knows it's not an easy job; he knows you can't hold back emotions; most importantly, he knows you have to win ball games.

It was winning ballgames he had problems with. Once again, it was not entirely his fault. The Colts offense is one of the best in the game, but they have no defense. As a coach, you are expected to work with what you are given, but when the personnel is not very good it's hard to make something positive out of it. Instead of blaming themselves, Colts management looked at Mora's postseason record (0-6) and his mid season feud with Peyton Manning as justification for his firing.

Elsewhere in the NFL, Washington fired Marty Shottenheimer, San Diego sacked Mike Reilly and Carolina dumped George Seifert. Schottenheimer was fired because he didn't want to give owner Daniel Snyder control over personnel decisions. Overlooked was Washington's 8-3 record down the stretch—Marty was gone after a year. He now replaces Mike Riley in San Diego who lost their last nine games, but still increased their win total by four from last year. As for Seifert, he shouldn't have ever gotten into his situation. He could have stayed retired with his all-time best winning percentage safely intact, but instead he came back to a dead-end situation. Carolina was going nowhere and now has a scapegoat in Seifert, saying he sucked all of the enthusiasm out of the organization.

The coaching carousel isn't only spinning in the NFL though. In the NBA, Chicago finally parted ways with Tim Floyd after a disastrous three years in which he went 49-190. They said he quit, but we all know that's not the only story. There is no doubt that Floyd lost motivation, but Chicago also wanted him out. They felt that the organization needed to go another direction. Floyd deserved better—he was a good coach with bad team. The Bulls management gave him nothing (and I mean nothing) to work with. Yes, they brought in young talent, but they had no veterans to help them learn on the court. GM Jerry Krause should be blamed for the horrible personnel moves that have helped sink the once mighty Bulls.

Declining personnel has also led to the firing of New Jersey Devils Coach Larry Robinson, one year after consecutive Stanley Cup Appearances. New Jersey has limped along all year and many blame Robinson for being too friendly and nice to the players. In reality, the Devils are losing for the following two reasons: 1. They failed to resign leading goal scorer Alexander Mogilny in the offseason. 2. They have had to deal with mental fatigue after two long trips to the Cup Finals.

The first is a personnel problem and the last is merely unavoidable for successful veteran teams. Neither seems to be Robinson's fault, but GM Lou Lamiorello thinks the Devils need a different type of coach. And this happened, ironically, only a week after Dallas fired their coach, Ken Hitchcock because the players were not responding to him anymore. Together the two had combined for two of the last three Stanley Cup Champions.

It's too bad that the world of sports has taken the "What Have You Done For Me Lately?" attitude. Success spoils even the humblest of men. In New Jersey we have been spoiled by the Devils dominance over the past seven years so much that we were calling for bloody murder after one down year. In Tampa, success has helped erase the demons of yesteryear when the orange clad Buccaneers lost 10 or more games for 11 straight years. Fans and management expect a Super Bowl victory, but only one team out of 31 can have that distinction. So much happens in one season and blaming the coaches is not fair. What's next? Pat Reilly is going to get fired too? Oh wait—that is not entirely out of the picture.

Bryan Bailey '02

Bouncing back from injuries that have kept him out of the starting lineup in the past, Bryan Bailey scored 16 points against division rival Lehigh

Bryan Bailey is this week's Athlete of the Week. Bailey, a 6-1 All-Patriot League guard on the men's basketball team, battled year-long knee injuries to lead Bucknell to a share of first place in the Patriot League. Bailey, otherwise known as Bailz, was placed in the starting lineup for the first time since Dec. 29 against Lehigh. In his first action of the season, he finished with 16 points, seven of which came in the last 1:43 minutes of play at the free throw line to seal Lehigh's fate.

"It was kind of frustrating, sitting out 10 games, especially my senior year. I was just glad to get back on the court and contribute in any way possible to win," Bailey said. "Right now I'm just trying to get myself back in shape and stay healthy for the rest of the season."

While the Bison haven't had the dominating season they had set out to accomplish (8-11 overall), they have pieced together a two game winning streak and are tied with Navy and American for first place in the league. The long awaited return of Bailey coupled with strengthening team chemistry make the squad a serious contender to take the crown.

"Early on in the season we went through some ups and downs, especially with the injuries we had. But as we are starting Patriot League play we seem to be playing well. Right now there is a lot of parity in the league and any team can beat anyone on any given day," Bailey said. "I think as we continue to gel, we will be a top team in the league. A big part of our success in league play has been our team defense."

'D-Fence' is what Bucknell fans have relied on in the early going. As such, the Bison's swarming defense has not allowed more than 78 points in a game all season, and they have allowed 70 or more only four times in 19 games. The Orange and Blue ranks second in the Patriot League in scoring defense (63.8) and field goal percentage defense (.411). The 'Big D' in the Bison's play reminds Bailey of his most memorable moment of the season thus far.

"My most memorable moment of this season would be when we played in the S. Florida tournament over Christmas break. Although we lost the first game to S. Florida by four, that was the hardest I've seen this team play," said Bailey. "It showed that we have a lot of heart and weren't going to back down to a Conference USA team."

Bailey understands the season is still young enough to accomplish many great things, both individually and for the team.

"Individual goals for me are to be First Team All-League, Patriot League Player of the Year," said Bailey. "I look to improve each and everyday that I play, working on different aspects of my game. As a team, our goals are to win the Patriot League and go to the NCAA tournament."

Off the court, Bailey is majoring in business management, and is an active member of Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity.

'You Don't Know Him: Eric Junge' former Bucknell pitcher in the minors

By Brian Klotz
Senior Writer

A surprising turn of events for Phillies fans came in the early days of November 2001. Starting pitcher Omar Daal had been traded, after a 13-7 season and a 4.46 ERA, for two minor league pitchers, Jesus Cordero and Eric Junge. A headline that appeared on the Phillies website advertising the trade soon after read: "You Don't Know Him: Eric Junge". Eric Junge is a virtual unknown to the sport of Major League Baseball, but not to Bucknell.

Eric Junge came to Bucknell in 1995 and quickly established a position for himself on the baseball team. He was given the job of closer, and head baseball coach Gene Depew saw good things from him early.

"Eric was very instrumental in our championship year in 1996," Depew said. "He helped us win a lot of very crucial games, and got the save in the championship game against Navy. He was a real contributor right from his freshman year."

Throughout the coming years, Junge was shifted from official closer, to the bullpen and eventually to the starting job. His stats after his senior year were not overly impressive—a 4-8 record and a 5.62 ERA—but he pitched his best at the end of the season, which was when it counted. "After his junior year, Eric became interested in a possible career in the Major Leagues," Depew said. "In his senior year he had an audience and the scouts saw him in the best part of his season."

Eric was very instrumental in out championship year in 1996. He helped us win a lot of very crucial games, and got the save in the championship game against Navy. He was a real contributor right from his freshman year.
—Gene Depew, head coach

Junge was drafted in the 11th round of the following year's draft by the Los Angeles Dodgers, and he found himself playing single A ball for a team in Yakima, Calif. the very next season.

Although only pitching to a 5-7 record and a 5.82 ERA, Junge was improving his form and pitching speed. The following year he played for another single A team in San Bernadino. He ended the season with an impressive 8-1 record and a 3.36 ERA. Success continued as Junge was moved up to AA baseball playing for a team named the Jacksonville Suns last year. He finished that season with a 10-11 record, a 3.46 ERA and his first professional shutout.

On Nov. 9, Junge got the call informing him of the trade to the Phillies. He will be playing next season in AAA baseball for Scranton/Wilkes-Barre where, ironically enough, he had lived only an hour from growing up.

Depew and Junge keep in touch fairly regularly, but Depew got a chance to see him in action at an alumni game in October of last year where Junge threw back-to-back 90 mile per hour fastballs. "He has a very smooth arm action and as a result, has good velocity," said Depew. "He has also really made progress in the area of accepting challenges, and has matured mentally to become a very strong competitor."

Many things need to happen for Junge to continue being successful, according to Depew, but he has great confidence in Junge and his present situation.

"You have to be in the right organization at the right time, have that mental approach to put it on the line, and most importantly stay healthy," Depew said. "He definitely has those things going for him with a ballclub that has already made an investment in him."

In 20 seasons, Depew has never had a player reach it to the Major Leagues but has had eight players play in professional baseball in the last twelve years. He likes Junge's chances to reach that final level.

"Eric has the approach where he is not afraid to go out and do what it takes to get it done," Depew said. "Eric is as close as anybody, and probably has the best shot at it."

Maryland Upends Bison Grapplers

The Bucknell Wrestling team fell short of a victory on Jan. 27, dropping their sixth match of the season to Maryland at Davis Gymnasium. The Bison, attempting to rebound from losses to both East Stroudsburg and Drexel, suffered on Sunday from two falls and two forfeits.

However, it was not the first time in which the Bison grapplers were forced to forfeit bouts. In the triangular match with East Stroudsburg and Drexel, the Bison endured a combined six forfeits.

Maryland	40

"Injuries have been the cause of our forfeits. Forfeiting, say, six points in a match is huge. Essentially, it is a 12-point swing because it is six points that we actually could have gained," Brian Falciglia '02 said.

"Getting guys like Brock back would really improve the moral of the team because we wouldn't be entering matches knowing that two bouts will be lost automatically. We would be approaching matches more positively than we already are."

The Terps (5-2) captured the first five bouts of the day, exploding to a 22-0 lead. In the opening two bouts, Bison Wrestlers Justin Hartrum '05 and Rocky Miller '02 came up short. Hartrum was the victim of a major 14-6 decision, falling to Adam James at 149 pounds. In the ensuing bout, Miller fell to John Antonelli by the score of 9-3 at 157 pounds.

"There are a lot of reasons why we didn't claim a victory on Sunday," Miller said. "Personally, I had the flu all week and wasn't as prepared as I usually am. It seems like we can't pull it all together in the sense that there seems to be a key injury or illness on a weekly basis. Depth is the biggest issue for us right now."

Maryland's first fall of the day occurred when Josh Weidman pinned Mike Saunders '03 in 1:28. Following a forfeit at 174, Brian Neuman '02 was defeated in a dogfight with Jason Stork 9-5, as Stork needed a final-minute takedown to pull away. Neuman was subject to a dual-meet loss for the first time of the season, after six wins.

Bucknell's sole victory of the afternoon was Falciglia's in an intense 197 pound match. The leader throughout the bout, Falciglia jumped to a 5-0 lead and ultimately was victorious by a score of 7-3. Falciglia stressed that Bucknell was not completely outmatched; rather the Wrestlers were not competing to their full potential at times.

"Some guys were simply outwrestled Sunday, however, Maryland has a lot of quality wrestlers," Falciglia said. "Our lineup is not 100 percent healthy right now so we have to focus on improving every day. When the conference tournament comes, it is a brand new season. The (regular season) match is a learning process."

The Bison have received a tremendous lift intensity-wise at practice from Brandon Green '03 as of late and are looking forward to his return to top form. The next match for the Bison will take place at Buffalo on Feb. 2nd.

BU After Dark 'a great success'

The joust was just one of the many activities at BU After Dark.

By Ryan Johngrass
Staff Writer

Activities and Campus Events (ACE) kicked off last weekend with the premier of an new alternative to the typical party scene, a program called "BU After Dark." The program was sponsored in part by the Late Night Programming Committee and Phi Kappa Psi and more than 1,000 students attended the event.

"This was the first time that BU After Dark was tried and we were very curious. From our standpoint and from that of the students we have talked to, it was a very great success. There may be some things we would change in the future and tweak a bit, but overall it was a success and we look to have it return in the future," said Carolyn Strickland, associate director of ACE.

BU After Dark was held in the Gerhard Fieldhouse from 11 p.m. to 3 a.m. last Saturday night. There were many activities and contests being held in order to keep students interested, including weight lifting, half-court shoot out, slam dunk, free throw and 3 vs. 3 basketball. Both the annex gym and the climbing wall were open all night. Special activities, such as laser tag and jousting, were also brought in for the event. In addition, there was free food and music during the entire program.

"It's went really well. The turnout was very good. I'm happy to see it went as well as it did," said Nick Yaichuk, '02 chairman of ACE. He added that he hopes the program will return in the near future.

The program gave a new dimension to the University and the way in which students view social life. BU After Dark was publicized widely around campus and seemed to effectively engage students in a non-alcoholic weekend alternative.

One in Four to help prevent rape and educate

By Meredith Atkinson
Features Editor

One in Four is an initiative designed to raise awareness of the prevalence of sexual assault on college campuses. Its name comes from the statistic that one out of every four women is the victim of rape or attempted rape.

Training for the program took place last weekend. Approximately 18 students, all women, volunteered to be trained to combat rape and the myths, misconceptions and stereotypes that perpetuate it.

Mary Snyder, program assistant at the Women's Resource Center, said that she will be trying to recruit men to facilitate the program and that it was very effective last year when she and Don Wirick, the sensitive crimes officer for Public Safety, worked together to organize the programs.

Everyone trained will, in turn, present at least two programs on campus this semester. Each program session will last about an hour and include a video, some statistics and a review of the University code of conduct. A large portion of each program, however, will be focused on discussion.

"A large portion of the discussion and presentation will be devoted to help everyone gain a better understanding of what it feels like to be a rape survivor, and how those who care about and love a rape survivor can help them in the most positive way possible," Snyder said.

Snyder added that each program "will be more interactive than simply a lecture on rape." The programs will be targeted at residential halls, sports teams, clubs, fraternities and sororities. One of the unique aspects of this program, as noted by Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, is that "it allows students to learn from other students."

One in Four came to the University last year and was initially only targeted at the male demographic. Last year, the goal was to help men understand more about a subject thought to only directly affect women. Both Kappa Delta Rho and Sigma Phi Epsilon attended the program last year.

"It's a really great program that finally deals explicitly with the threat of sexual assault on Bucknell's campus," said Sarah Wilson, '04, one of the student facilitators.

"It's beneficial for both men and women, because some of the statistics and information are astounding and most people know someone who has been affected by this type of violence. I joined the program because I want to educate Bucknell students about the prevalence of sexual assault on our campus, and teach people both how we can prevent it, and how to help if it does occur," Wilson added.

Ferraro echoed many of the same sentiments, adding that sexual assault is not simply the very violent and brutal act of rape, but that "sexual assault covers a spectrum from blatant to circumstantial; clearly someone who is heavily inebriated cannot give consent." He noted that the influence of alcohol and other substances are also factors adding, "ethics will be addressed during these programs."

While the program will be promoted to the Greek system, Ferraro emphasized that "sexual assault affects the whole campus and society, it is not just fraternity and sorority related. In fact, freshman women seem to be especially targeted." To that end, the One in Four program will be promoted to men and women, young and old alike, because as Snyder said, "rape hurts everyone."

Do Power Bars really give extra energy?

By Eric Grim
Staff Writer

Everyone has seen Power Bars. They are the Mylar-wrapped energy concoctions available almost everywhere, including the University's C-Store. They are offered in 11 flavors, ranging from chocolate-peanut butter to lemon crisp. Supposedly, the small serving will provide an athlete with extra energy to achieve maximum performance. The question is whether they do all that they claim.

According to the company website, www.PowerBar.com, Power Bars are "the number one energy bar: a low fat, highly nutritious bar specially formulated to deliver long lasting energy ... dedicated to helping athletes and active people achieve peak performance ... and has become the other 'fuel of choice' for athletes around the world."

Many health products, such as protein shakes, powders, and natural energy supplements, claim to include the same ingredients as Power Bars. Power Bars contain slow-release carbohydrates and 9-10 grams of protein, which the company claims provides for sustained energy in athletic activities.

"Simply put, carbohydrates are broken down in the body to become energy and protein helps muscles recover after a workout," Eric Steinbach '05, student athlete and biology major explains.

The Power Bar company states that their bars are far superior to candy bars and foods that deliver quick energy because of the nutrients added, however, Power Bars are not intended to be meals.

But there must be something to account for the fact that Power Bars have been successful since 1986 and are used by Olympic and professional athletes, as well as those on the high school and college level.

"They're a good source of energy, but they're not going to make you superhuman or run faster," Reece Pacheco '05, member of the University lacrosse team, and Power Bar user, said.

It seems that the general consensus is this: perhaps the science of these energy boosters does not amount to much more than a granola bar, but carbohydrates and protein will fuel an exercising body.

Spirit of a Community: The Photographs of Charles "Teenie" Harris opens

This photograph is one of 82 images in the Samek Art Gallery exhibit, which focuses on African-American life in the 20th century.

Jackie Robison, Duke Ellington and Martin Luther King, Jr. are just a few of the historical figures that were captured by the recently recognized photographer Charles "Teenie" Harris. Spirit of a Community: The Photographs of Charles "Teenie" Harris is the latest exhibition to open in the Samek Art Gallery. The exhibition, featuring 82 images that focus on African-American life in 20th-century Pittsburgh will be open until March 8. A truly beautiful exhibit, the show also holds significant historical meaning. Spirit of a Community is the first exhibition that preserves a quantity of Teenie's photos as fine art.

Cindy Peltier, operations manager at the Samek Art Gallery, explained that the gallery is in fact only the second venue in which the photos have appeared. Their appearance at the University is considered historical, as Teenie's work has not been shown often and is an important part of African-American history.

Teenie opened his own studio in the 1930s with a mere $300 (borrowed from his brother) and little experience. Learning as he went, Teenie exhibited great talent and soon became the most well known photographer in Pittsburgh's Hill district. He served the community by taking portraits and occasionally photographing weddings and parties.

The Pittsburgh Courier, the most influential African-American newspaper during its time, became interested in Teenie's work and hired him as a free-lance photographer. Later, it hired Teenie as a full time photojournalist during the World War II era.

A major issue that the paper addressed was the Double Victory Campaign. This campaign was directed towards African-Americans and encouraged them in their duties of patriotism as well as freedom fighting in the United States. Teenie's photos of servicemen often appeared next to articles advocating the support of the Double Victory Campaign.

Though he enjoyed a fair amount of success in Pittsburgh, Teenie barely survived in his later years, relying solely on his monthly Social Security check. When Teenie was 78 years old, a man cheated him out of the rights to his photos by promising tc pay Teenie royalties. When he didn't receive any money, he was forced to sue. Only two days after the complaint was filed, Teenie died, leaving his lawyers bound to a promise to secure the photographs and make them available to the public.

In April 2000, Teenie's collection of over 100,000 negatives was returned to the Harris family and the Spirit of a Community exhibition featuring his work was planned. His son stated, "I don't believe anyone loved Pittsburgh more than he did. He spent his entire life recreating his city in photographs with heartfelt love."

Teenie's black and white photography expresses a deep love of his subjects and the ideas that those subjects portray. The angle that Teenie chose to give all of his photos was one of equality that wasn't seen in the mainstream media. Teenie's exploration of the daily life of African-Americans resulted in photographs that emphasized community and the different components that bind a community together. Images include those of mother and child, the elderly, nightlife at jazz clubs, businesses on street corners and baseball games.

"He had a natural love for people, all people, but he put women and children on a pedestal because he believed they deserved special treatment," said Teenie's son, Charles Harris in the Westmoreland Museum of American Art Catalog of the exhibition. "This is why there are so many wonderful pictures of women and children in his collection ... Dad was the consummate gentleman. He insisted on holding doors for women and he demanded respect for them. He enjoyed photographing them in every phase of life."

Indeed, the portraits of women and children are very touching and are the most revealing of the spirit that Teenie wanted to express.

In addition to photographing ordinary community members, Teenie also captured visiting celebrities. The intersection of Wylie Avenue and Fullerton Street in Pittsburgh became known as the "crossroads of the world" during the boom of entertainment that rivaled the excitement in Harlem. During the boom, Teenie snapped shots of such jazz legends as Lena Horne, Duke Ellington, Dizzy Gillespie, Louis Armstrong and Bill 'Bojangles' Robinson. He frequented nightclubs such as the Crawford Grill and the Crystal in search of photo opportunities.

Heavily interested in the sports arena and a professional basketball and baseball player himself, Teenie immortalized Joe Louis (heavyweight boxing champion), Josh Gibson (the home run king of Negro baseball), Satchel Paige and Jackie Robinson on film. He documented Negro baseball closely until desegregation occurred in the 1950s with the institution of Major League Baseball.

In the political arena, Teenie had the opportunity to photograph President Kennedy, President Eisenhower, King and First Lady Eleanor Roosevelt. He portrayed these famous figures among the population and a large part of the photographs was the expressions of the people surrounding these figures.

The exhibition catalog cites University of Pittsburgh Associate Professor of History Larry Glasco as saying, "Teenie Harris' collection provides the most comprehensive visual record of any single African-American urban environment."

The intriguing photos are reminiscent of a Norman Rockwell style, centering on Americana life. The exhibit would definitely attract those interested in African-American history, as well as those fascinated by the American Dream focus.

Henry J. Simonds, the exhibition co-curator from Pittsburgh, will be giving a gallery lecture and tour of the photographs on Tuesday, Feb. 12 in the Samek Art Gallery on the third floor of the Langone Center. A reception is to follow.

Spirit of a Community is brought to the Samek Art Gallery by generous contributions from the Pennsylvania Council on the Arts and the Association for the Arts of Bucknell University.

Shanghai Quartet receives standing ovation

By Kang Tchou
Staff Writer

In the first Weis Center performance of the semester, the Shanghai Quartet opened with a display of classical era quartet repertoire.

Opening with Beethoven's String Quartet No. 11 in F minor, Op.95, subtitled "Serioso," from the great classical master, the quartet set a dynamic tone for the evening. "The performance remained true to the refined classical form at the heart of this wonderful piece," said Julia Woodard '05. "Yet the Quartet did not stop there. The synergy created by all four members of the quartet allowed the audience to glimpse the awe-inspiring creative prowess that not only created this composition but also set a stage for music well into the modern age."

String Quartet No. 11, was completed around 1810. This was a period in which the composer produced some of his most beloved works. Though not the most famous of his works, String Quartet No. 11 in F minor, Op. 95 is a prime example of the experimentation that Beethoven undertook with his compositions during this stage in his life. Along with complexity and novelty, this piece also places great emphasis on the skill and ability of the performers.

The innovative spirit of the late classical period remained into the modern era. Béla Bartók strove for innovation pushing dimensions of both the performers and the audience. His efforts freed music from the "tyrannical rule of the major and minor keys, leading eventually to a new conception of the chromatic scale, every tone of which came to be considered of equal value and could be used freely and independently," said Paul Wilson in his The Music of Béla Bartók.

This modern and lively piece certainly struck a chord with students at the University. Of the three quartets, the highlight was the Bartók. Although it is an extremely difficult piece to perform, the Shanghai Quartet did so brilliantly. They performed the 'Allegro' very sensitively, and the "Allegretto Pizzicato" showed off not just the skill of the quartet, but the beauty of Bartók.

> "Though the opening movement can be difficult to listen to if one isn't sure of what they are listening for, each member of the quartet mixed beautifully. I also thought that Nicholas Tzavaras was a truly exceptional cellist. He had a beautiful, rich tone that was never overdone. He served the music well."
> —Michael Bodnyk '05

"Though the opening movement can be difficult to listen to if one isn't sure of what they are listening for, each member of the quartet mixed beautifully. I also thought that Nicholas Tzavaras was a truly exceptional cellist. He had a beautiful, rich tone that was never overdone. He served the music well," said Michael Bodnyk '05.

After this representation of classical compositions from the modern era in music, Barry Hannigan, pianist and professor of music at the University, joined the Shanghai Quartet for a performance of Schumann's Piano Quintet in E-flat Major, Op. 44.

"Professor Hannigan did a wonderful job and it was a great piece to end a magnificent program," said Bodnyk.

The audience praised the quartet and Professor Hannigan with a standing ovation as the Weis Center filled with the echoes of applause.

Step Afrika impresses Weis Center crowd

By Campbell Gerrish
Staff Writer

This past week, the Greek-based African American step-dance group, Step Afrika, performed at the Weis Center and quickly became known to students as one of the best programs this campus has ever seen. In the midst of various other educational programs offered throughout the semester, many requiring the attendance of fraternities and sororities, Step Afrika was a "breath of fresh air," according to Brian Schmid '03, a member of Kappa Delta Rho.

"I understand why we have lots of programs about responsible drinking, drinking and driving, and so on, but programs like this, I think, are much more stimulating for the students," said Brad Carpenter '03. The high energy, humor and incredible skill of Step Afrika's performers made a deep impression on those who attended.

Comprised of four Howard University graduates—a graphics designer, an actress, a writer and the group's founder—and one graduate of the University of Maryland, now a teacher, Step Afrika performs all over the world. The group has traveled to four continents, educating students about African traditions, the origins of step-dance and what form it has taken today.

Brian Williams, the director of Step Afrika, explained that step-dance is a "polyrhythmic dance form created by African-American fraternities and sororities that began as a form of movement and self expression."

The performance began with a simulation of the "line process," which is the equivalent to "pledging" a fraternity/sorority in order to become a member of a step team. Contrasting humor and impeccably synchronized dances, Step Afrika wasted no time in seizing the crowd's attention.

The group went on to perform a number of dances. One dance that was particularly powerful included an exhibition of the origins of step from tribal Africa, in which their use of costumes and authentic instruments was very effective.

"The part with the hand drums was my favorite. The guy's style of drumming was great, and having some live percussion really helped the performance," said Dave Dubman '03.

In addition, the performers shocked their captive audience with stunning dances while entirely outfitted in brilliantly colored tribal African costumes. The colors, energy and astounding movement of Step Afrika were an evocative experience.

"I really thought the program was successful. There was great attendance and everyone enjoyed the program very much," said Dean of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker.

Not only did the crowd enjoy the experience, but the members of Step Afrika also relayed their thoughts to Baker and noted that they had never performed for such a packed house before. The group was impressed by the attendance and thrilled to have such an energetic audience. In considering the incredibly positive reception of Step Afrika, hopefully program organizers will look to find more dance and music related cultural programs to have here at the University.

Jewel's latest album, This Way, offers variety

By Kristi Johnston
Arts and Entertainment Editor

Jewel Kilcher, better known simply as Jewel, has been writing songs since she was 17 years old and her latest album, This Way, demonstrates her growth as both a singer and a songwriter. With its rich diversity of style and subject matter, Jewel's latest effort encompasses everything that she is capable of—it is a combination of graceful melodies, touching lyrics and beautiful vocals.

"I wanted to focus on the craft of performing and songwriting," Jewel said on her official website, www.jeweljk.com. "I've always been a live musician, and I wanted my voice to shine through. To me, relevance means staying honest about where you are. The most important thing to me is maintaining my authenticity."

Jewel's radio hit "Standing Still" is found on her new CD This Way.

The first single released from her album, "Standing Still" has already gained impressive radio time. Other tracks on the CD include "Everybody Needs Someone Sometime," "Break Me," the title song, "This Way" and "I Won't Walk Away." Although sometimes criticized for sounding similar, these songs are truly unique and reflect Jewel's stylistic and vocal range. The album also includes 2 bonus tracks, "Grey Matter" and "Sometimes It Be That Way."

When asked about the reasons for naming the album This Way, Jewel said on www.jeweljk.com that it was meant to allow listeners a glimpse into her way of thinking. "[It's] like a road sign, saying "take this road," and it will be a road through my head, so you can see the world like I do for one hour."

This Way is undoubtedly the most eclectic of Jewel's four albums to date. It combines slow, melodic ballads with energetic commentaries on the nature of life and love. Jewel has truly discovered the path to musical brilliance.

A Beautiful Mind reveals personal story

By Jessica Cortese
Staff Writer

Films that are based on true, personal stories are often more interesting than others and this is true of A Beautiful Mind. It is a touching and inspiring movie, depicting how John Forbes Nash, Jr. was able to make a name for himself as one of the greatest mathematicians of the 20th century and eventually winning the Nobel Prize while overcoming schizophrenia.

But that's where the similarities to Nash's real life end; the rest of the movie is as fictional as any other. The story starts when Nash is just a freshman in college, and students here at Bucknell can certainly relate to the pressure to achieve success during college. It is this pressure that leads to the onset of Nash's disease.

Though the film is artfully done, the pace is slow. So slow, in fact, that after the first hour and a half, I found myself contemplating how stunning Jennifer Connelly (Alicia Nash) was, rather than how her character could possibly have the heart to stay with a man who was plagued with mental problems and was a possible threat to their child. (Mr. and Mrs. Nash divorced in real life.)

Russell Crowe's performance as Nash was a nice change from his self-reliant-bordering-on-arrogant roles of the past, but something seemed off. Perhaps it was how bland he seemed next to the dazzling Connelly in their scenes together. There are some shocking moments of reality being stranger than fiction in this movie and those help even more than the acting to keep up the interest of the audience.

The previews did a nice job of not ruining any surprises, so I'm not going to ruin them now. Let's just say that the story of John Nash is an amazing one; the movie about the story is not quite so amazing.

Tuition increases by 8.7 percent

By Jason Rubinstein
Associate Editor

The University Board of Trustees and administration announced last week an eight percent increase in next year's comprehensive fee. The comprehensive fee will increase to $27,340 for tuition (an 8.7 percent increase from last year), $6,052 for room and board and $191 for the student activity fee. An average 7.3 percent increase in faculty and 4.5 percent increase in staff salaries have also been approved. University grants will also increase by eight percent to match the increase in the comprehensive fee.

In addition to funding salary increases and financial aid, the tuition increase will help to cover the operating costs of current and recent construction, such as the O'Leary Psychology and Geology Center and the New Residence Hall. Although the Capital Campaign was successful in raising a significant portion of construction costs, the funds have not yet been raised to pay for new building expenses such as maintenance, programming and heat. The Recreation and Athletics Center and O'Leary alone will place a $1.9 million strain on the budget.

"Donors have been generous about financial aid and certain building and other facilities," said Ben Marsh, professor of geography and environmental studies and member of the University Planning and Budget Committee (UPBC). "The additional capital costs are not attractive to donors and are not funded through the Capital Campaign."

> "We believe it is an absolute requirement that we increase the salaries of our faculty to a level competitive with our peer institutions.
> —Steffen Rogers, University president

Another significant portion of the increase will help pay faculty and staff salaries. All members of the faculty will be receiving salary increases, distributed by rank as recommended by UPBC.

"Except in times of economic crisis, all employees of all universities and colleges receive annual increases in salaries/wages," said Provost and Vice President for Academic Affairs Stephen Bowen, who is also a member of UPBC.

The salary increases will also allow the University to remain a competitive employer for faculty.

"We believe it is an absolute requirement that we increase the salaries of our faculty to a level competitive with our peer institutions," said University Presideit Steffen Rogers in an email to the campus community.

The list of peer institutions is based on schools that students are most likely to apply to in addition to the University. This group is similar to the University in size and mission, and directly competes for applicants. Some peers include Johns Hopkins, Cornell, Tufts, Lehigh and Villanova.

Several budget cuts were considered in determining the comprehensive fee increase. The University's operating budget has increased at a rate of two percent per year for the last 10 years, holding several costs down, such as department budgets.

"We have had to say 'no' to many requests for new staff positions that are badly needed, but which we cannot afford in the coming year," Bowen said. "For many years, departments have had to make do with

OHRL consolidates housing

University to compensate for lack of living space by adding fifth bed to Mods

By Sandi-Jo Galati

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

An additional roommate will be added to many dorm rooms as a result of renovations to Hunt Hall (above).

Since the announcement that Hunt Hall would be closed for renovations during the fall 2002 semester, student concern has heightened in speculation of how the University will compensate for the 147 beds that currently house the seven active sororities on campus.

After discovering some structural problems in Hunt Hall last fall, the University has prioritized the building as the next to be renovated. Construction will begin immediately after Commencement and continue through next semester with the projected completion scheduled for the beginning of the spring 2003 semester.

The beds lost during Hunt's renovation will be reallocated to various locations throughout the campus. The resulting effects of the loss in space have been distributed to include many of the facilities on campus, so that not one residence hall or class was forced to absorb the majority of the changes.

"We tried to make decisions based on square footage or type of residential space, such as amenities based," said Daniel Remley, assistant dean of students and director of Housing and Residential Life (OHRL).

OHRL determined that adding a fifth bed to each of the Mods in Bucknell West would be consistent with these goals.

The rationale behind this decision was largely based upon the additional unit that the Mods offer. If the decision was made to convert the single rooms in Swartz back to doubles, there would be no additional common space to compensate for the closer sleeping quarters.

BSBA majors to be admitted directly into management program

Admissions procedure set to begin next semester with incoming Class of 2006

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The management department, with offices in Taylor Hall (above), will be admitting members of the Class of 2006 directly into its program.

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

In an attempt to control the number of management majors and maintain the character of the University, the Management Department and the administration made the decision to have first-year students apply to the University as management majors.

According to Dean of Admissions Mark Davies, this change will not greatly affect the admissions process. The main change is that a student will receive an acceptance letter to the management program, rather than just an acceptance letter to the College of Arts and Sciences.

"This change will be more comforting to students who want to apply as business majors. It will be more encouraging because they will be in the program already. It is good decision from a marketing perspective," Davies said.

Members of the Class of 2005 will not have to declare a management major until November.

According to Associate Director of Admissions Carol Gadd, this system used to be in place in the '80s, but was changed to the current system because not enough students were dedicated to the major.

After stopping this individual, the officer took the student to his room at Kappa Delta Rho Fraternity for identification. While checking the ID, the officer noticed a University owned sign on the wall inside this room. It was determined that the student was under the age of 21 years and had consumed alcohol. The sign was confiscated and returned to the Public Safety office. Citations were issued.

UNAUTHORIZED ENTRY/TRESS PASSING—Public Safety responded to Sigma Phi Epsilon Fraternity for the report of an unknown male who had fled from the kitchen when approached by a house resident. Public Safety was unable to locate the car in a search of the area. Lewisburg Police Department (LPD) and East Buffalo Township Police Department were notified. Later in the evening, LPD requested Public Safety to assist with a vehicle incident involving the same car. The student operating the vehicle admitted to being involved in an argument with the female visitor who had been riding in his car. The visitor was located and stated that she had not been assaulted. LPD cited the male student for underage consumption and driving under the influence of alcohol.

The president of the house was interviewed and stated he authorized a party. University charges are pending.

INFORMATION/VEHICLE DAMAGE —A student reported to Public Safety that a steel rod extending from a parking block had torn some metal from her car when she attempted to exit the Trax parking lot. A work order was filed to repair the block and the student was advised to contact the University insurance representative to report the damage.

February 4, 2002

INFORMATION/MEDICAL TRANSPORT—UCC notified Public Safety that an ambulance had been dispatched for a student who had become unconscious when he got out of bed. Cardinal receives annual Rotary Ambassadorial Scholarship

Chris Styers
Staff Writer

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

Laura Cardinal '02 will use the Rotary Scholarship she received to continue her education in African studies.

More than 30,000 men and women from 100 countries have been awarded Rotary Ambassadorial Scholarships since 1947. Every year nearly 1,300 students in 70 countries serve in the Rotary program, making it the world's largest privately funded international scholarship program.

Last year approximately $26 million was given to students because of the Rotary belief that "the students who are Ambassadorial Scholars today will be tomorrow's community and world leaders."

Over the years, a substantial number of University students have been awarded Ambassadorial Scholarships through local Rotary District 7370. Every year a district committee is appointed to select an applicant who maintains a good academic record, demonstrates community service and exhibits the qualities of an international ambassador of good will.

This year the award has been granted to another University student, Laura Cardinal '02.

The fall semester of Cardinal's third year at the University was spent abroad in the nations of Namibia and South Africa. Through her African studies, Cardinal fell in love with the people and culture of those countries and realized she must one day return. The Rotary Scholarship, which she learned about before returning to the United States, provided that opportunity to return. When she did get back to the University, she contacted Foreign Language Programs RE Allan Grundstrom, who helped initiate the application process.

The application process is open to any junior or senior that is not a Rotarian's relative. Since the prestigious award can range anywhere from $13,000 to $25,000, the applicant must be able to fully demonstrate the purpose of the scholarship, which is to "further international understanding and friendly relations among people of different countries."

In order to become one of these "ambassadors of goodwill," Cardinal had to fill out a nearly 20-page application, submit three essays pertaining to how the scholarship would help her attain future goals in life and provide proof that she could adequately communicate in the region's language.

As a result of the scholarship, Cardinal will travel to the University of Dar-es-Salaam in Tanzania, where she will continue her studies in African development. As an ambassador she will not only be learning about African culture but she will be giving presentations on U.S. culture to Rotary groups and other organizations. From her experiences, Cardinal encourages any juniors or seniors who think they may be interested in pursuing a Rotary scholarship to do so.

The process of applying takes about 18 months and interested juniors and seniors should contact Grundstrom and visit the Rotary web page online at www.rotary.org.

University to limit management applicants in future

Future management applicants will be subject to different admissions procedures at Freas Hall (above) than applicants of other majors. The University will try to limit each class to 80 management majors.

Last year, 919 students applied to be management majors, 224 were accepted and 81 enrolled in the University.

According to Chair of the Management Department Nancy Weida, the target number of management majors for each incoming class will remain at approximately 80 students. The 80 includes both bachelor of science in business administration (BSBA) majors that the University offers: management and accounting.

Students will be allowed to switch into the management program after their first year, but there will not be an unlimited number of spots.

"We want students who know they want to be majors to work with us from the start, while allowing some other students to join the program after they have sampled some of our courses," Weida said.

Davies agrees that some students need more time to decide on their major.

"It's hard for many students to have a major determined during junior or senior year of high school. Students who know they want to be management majors will be encouraged and others who are not so sure will still have time to decide," Davies said.

According to Weida, there are approximately 180 management majors per class now and 120 is the target in a few years.

Besides controlling the number of management majors, this change will also affect the advising of the majors. Currently, every other bachelor of science student, except management majors, who enters the University is given an adviser as a first-year student. When this change is implemented, management majors will have advisers in the management department as first-year students.

Because management classes often fill up quickly, non-majors are often not able to take management classes. Weida believes that this change will allow more non-majors to be a part of the management department.

"We also want to be able to offer our courses to non-majors, something we haven't been able to do as often as we would like." Weida said.

Weida also anticipates that this change will improve all areas other University.

"This change will benefit Bucknell and give us more of an opportunity to interact with other programs on campus," Weida said.

Davies also believes that this change will improve the University as a whole.

"The Bucknell mission is that we strive to be excellent in all academic areas," Davies said.

Bucknell students or graduates. Funding can be denied if this is not the case."

Sadaghiani claims the clause, which convinced former IFC President Jared Gunther '02 as well as others in IFC and Panhel that House Party was closed to non-University individuals, was a misunderstanding.

In a campus-wide email sent last Monday, Sadaghiani stated, " BSG has no official position on House Party.and has had no say on whether it is open or closed to visitors. I am sorry for any confusion my statement may have caused the student body or BSG Congress members."

According to Baker, the House Party Committee will convene next week to discuss, among other things related to the April 5-7 weekend, whether friends of students will be prohibited from attending the event. Until that time, it is assumed the policy on House Party guests remains the same as it was last year—open to guests.

Baker did not want to speculate on issues regarding House Party that have yet to be decided, but indicated one compromise that may be reached entailed raising fees for University students to bring registered guests that weekend.

"If non-University individuals are permitted, there will be a significant change in policies regarding friends at House Party," Baker said. "The event is funded by student activity fees and it is inappropriate for non-University students to attend free when students pay for it."

Powell says Bush administration was serious about removing Hussein from power

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6—Despite a lack of support for U.S. military action against Iraq, Secretary of State Colin Powell on Wednesday stressed that the Bush administration was serious about removing Iraqi President Saddam Hussein from power. Powell said Wednesday that President George W. Bush is considering "a full range of options" to effect a regime change in Baghdad, but conceded that the United States may have to act alone.

Investigators close to solving Pearl kidnapping

KARACHI, Pakistan, Feb. 7—Pakistani investigators believe they are very close to solving the kidnapping of Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl and have identified a key suspect in the case as British Islamic militant Ahmad Omar Saeed Sheikh. Meanwhile, Pearl's wife issued a new appeal for his release. "This is an innocent man, with an innocent wife and an unborn son," she said.

Russian military chief hails arms cuts

MOSCOW, Feb. 6—A top Russian military official on Wednesday enthusiastically welcomed the U.S. government's willingness to codify proposed nuclear arms cuts and said the deal could be reached by the time President Bush visits Russia in May. Bush and Russian President Vladimir Putin last year pledged sharp reductions in the two nations' arsenals but did not agree on how to carry out the cutbacks. Bush said he preferred an informal arrangement, while Putin wanted the reductions to be incorporated in a formal agreement.

Ireland's top bank reels after fraud

Feb. 6—A Baltimore-based currency trader is suspected of defrauding Allied Irish Banks of $750 million, officials of Ireland's biggest company said Wednesday in an announcement that sent its shares tumbling on world markets. The suspected fraud at the bank's Baltimore-based subsidiary, Allfirst Bank, would be the biggest connected to a rogue trader since Singapore dealer Nick Leeson destroyed Britain's Barings Bank by piling up $1.4 billion in concealed losses in the mid-1990s. Allfirst CEO Susan Keating identified the trader as John Rusnak of Baltimore.

Landslides kill 30 in Indonesia

JAKARTA, Indonesia, Feb. 6—Floods and landslides triggered by torrential rain killed at least 30 people and left a dozen missing on the eastern end of Indonesia's Java Island, police said Wednesday. A series of flash floods hit the Situbondo and Bondowoso districts, about 450 miles east of Jakarta, police spokesman Lt. Col. Sad Harun said.

Saudis acknowledge most hijackers were citizens

RIYADH, Saudi Arabia, Feb. 6—Saudi Arabia acknowledged for the first time that 15 of the Sept. 11 suicide hijackers were Saudi citizens, but said Wednesday that the oil-rich kingdom bears no responsibility for their actions. Previously, Saudi Arabia had said the citizenship of 15 of the 19 hijackers was in doubt despite U.S. insistence they were Saudis. Interior Minister Prince Nayef also said he believed Osama bin Laden was the "tool" of others, rather than the mastermind of the terrorist attacks.

Blair discusses aid issues in Nigeria

ABUJU, Nigeria, Feb. 7—British Prime Minister Tony Blair went into talks Thursday with his Nigerian counterpart at the start of a tour aimed at relieving African poverty. It was Blair's first visit to Africa's most populous nation, a country rich in oil, but plagued by violence and poverty

Philippines says U.S. troops to stay put

MANILA, Philippines, Feb. 7—U.S. military advisers training Filipino soldiers against the Muslim extremist Abu Sayyaf group will remain at heavily guarded field camps with little chance of coming under fire, the government said Thursday. The issue of the Americans' role in the battle in the southern Philippines is a sensitive one and the statement by Chief of Staff General Diomedio Villanueva followed comments by a U.S. general that indicated the Americans believed they may get involved in some heavy fighting.

Availability of rooms during selection process goes online

"The mods were chosen because of additional living areas. In addition to the bedrooms, the mods have a kitchen, living room and a bathroom. If we were to re-dingle, that is all you'd have," Remley said. "The square footage per person will be tight but you have five people who will know each other and can influence how the total space will be affected."

The Mods will not be the only housing that will be affected. In Roberts, Larison and Harris Halls, large singles will be converted to doubles and large doubles will be converted to triples.

Katie Hays '03 lived in a double room in the front portion of Larison Hall during the 1999-2000 academic year. Last year, this room was converted to a single, and will now become a double once again.

"My double in Larison was easily large enough for my roommate and me; as a single, I think it would be, in fact, oddly big," Hays said.

Additionally, the triples in Smith Hall will be converted to quads.

"I found the room to be very spacious and comfortable to live in with two other people. However with the set-up of these rooms, there was very little privacy," said Sarah Meeker '04, a former Smith triple resident. "I think living with three other people right away might be a little intimidating for first year students."

The sororities housed in Hunt will be given seven suites in the north and south sides of the east wing of Vedder Hall. The eighth suite will be given to any upperclassman wishing to live there. Many of these doubles will also be converted to triple rooms.

The sororities will be permitted to move back to Hunt immediately upon completion of construction, at which point renovations will begin in the wing of Vedder when they vacate.

By following this plan, OHRL emphasized the benefit of room consolidations lasting only one year.

"We need cooperation and understanding of the students. For our renovation program we have only chosen one year to add overflow space," Remley said. "I think it is important that we didn't try to do this over a prolonged period of time."

Remley also stressed that despite the importance of the timeliness of the renovations, students' interests were always kept at the forefront of all decisions that were made.

"We needed to move forward with the decision. I don't know if there is a better solution but I think that there is a better solution but we selected a combination of where the spaces are located, the types of rooms we have chosen and we have regained some space, which will minimize or at least restrict the impact," Remley said.

In order to ease this transition, OHRL plans to equip rooms with a bunkable bed and other furniture.

OHRL will also offer two online services to make room selection easier for students. Accessible through the Banner Web, one of the services will show the floor plans of all of the residential buildings on campus. Students will have a better idea of where they would like their room to be located in relation to the other features of the building, such as lounges or computer labs.

The second service will allow students to check which rooms have already been selected, providing the lottery number, gender and class year of the student. Information about the occupancy and which gender must occupy the room will also be provided.

OHRL hopes that online access to information will simplify the process of room selection. Information sessions will be offered closer to the selection dates for students with questions about regular room selection or bock booking.

With the institution of these improvements, OHRL has turning its focus toward implementing feasible adjustments that best acclimatize students to next year's housing plan.

"We know housing to be important to our students so it is important to our office and the deans office and every office to see what we can do to facilitate their stay," Remley said.

Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

Students no longer have to view floor plans in Vedder Hall for room selection. A new addition to the Banner Web will allow them to check room availability from their computers.

increases in operations budgets that are well below the rate of inflation."

Some of the significant strains on the upcoming budget include health care expenses, which will increase anywhere from 13-20 percent in one year alone.

"We have experienced extraordinary increases which far outpace inflationary increases," said Vice President for Finance and Administration Jo-Anne Lema. "We are being warned that the cost for our other insurances, given the impact of Sept. 11, may increase anywhere from 25-50 percent."

The University does expect to see a decrease in utility costs because of its initial investment in its power plant and chiller plant.

Despite the 12 percent increase in comprehensive fee over the past two years, the University will remain competitive in the least expensive third of the top 50 liberal arts colleges, as reported by U.S. News & World Report.

"With the start of the strategic financial planning process five years ago, the board made a conscious decision to price University education in a competitive fashion, just a point or two above inflation in each of those years," Lema said.

The administration continues to feel that competitive tuition is important.

"It has been a long-standing tradition of the trustees to keep the cost of attending the University within reach of middle class students," Bowen said. "Given the quality of educational programs and the success of our graduates, you have to conclude the that the University is more efficiently managed then many similar institutions."

The comprehensive fee increase is unlikely to severely affect students with deep financial need.

"The Board was careful to assure that the increase would not decrease the ability of any student on financial aid to afford the University; increased aid will be available to most students who need it," Marsh said.

Rogers believes that the increase will continue to allow the University to provide the best education for students.

"We believe strongly that this increase is necessary to maintain and enhance the University's mission to combine the very best elements of a strong liberal arts college and a comprehensive university," Rogers said.

The Bucknellian Editorial

Is this substantial tuition increase the first of many?

Last week, University President Steffen Rogers announced that next year's tuition will be increased by approximately eight percent. Many University students and parents expected last year's increase of about five percent to be the last large increase for a while. However, this is clearly not the case. The question now is when will substantial tuition increases stop.

This tuition increase will give full-time professors a $10,000-plus raise, contribute to increased operating costs and help fund financial aid grants.

Increasing professors' salaries is extremely important, especially for the University to continue to attract and retain high caliber professors. If it is true that faculty are paid less than those at peer institutions, the University is undoubtedly doing the right thing. However, is it completely necessary to substantially increase the entire faculty's salaries in this one year? Possibly salary increases can be phased in over the next couple years just as downtown living is being phased out.

The question then becomes which kind of tuition increase is the least noticeable-one large increase followed by several smaller ones or continuous medium increases. Either way, it is unquestionably disruptive to increase tuition by such a large amount during one of the worst economic recessions our generation has seen.

Of course the economy is not predictable. The administration could not have planned for the current recession when planning new construction and expansion a decade ago. But what about slowing the rate of expansion? This is a fair request, as consumers in the United States in general are decreasing expenditures. It is possible that the University is doing its part to help recover the economy by increasing spending in the recession, however unlikely-this is normally left up to the government. Basically upcoming expenditures should be reconsidered with respect to the current economy.

The University is being generous by increasing financial aid in a proportionate amount to tuition. But what about those who do not currently receive financial aid? It is unlikely that the eight percent increase will make one eligible who currently is not, and even if it did, this would cancel out a tuition increase, because all additional funds would go directly into financial aid. Therefore, the tuition increase is like taxing the rich. Students who do not receive financial aid will have to pay the increased tuition whereas students who currently do receive financial aid may receive an increase in aid.

The Bucknellian is confident that the University will not lose a significant number of prospective students due to the increase. Students will continue to pay for the name of the school, but with a larger financial burden. The increase will no doubt help improve the school, but we must ask what will it be next year. If we were told last year's was high, and this year's is high, then we are all nervous for next year's.

Letters to the editor

Commencement speaker decision questioned

To the Editor:

I am writing in regard to the University's decision and the subsequent Bucknellian article announcing Kenneth Langone as the 2002 Commencement speaker.

One of the most important things that we have all learned this past year, in light of the tragedies, is to broaden our definitions of who we perceive to be a hero. He/She is not always the most powerful, the most famous or the wealthiest. And, in that vein, there are innumerable speakers in the world who could offer such words of wisdom to our graduates that would broaden our very definitions of prominence and success.

... for the school to use our graduation as the place to thank its donors is not only unfair to us but makes me, for one, reluctant to give back to an institution that chooses to put its own interests before its loyal seniors on their last day as University students.

A Commencement speaker should stand out because of the message and the foreign presence that he or she traditionally embodies for the graduating class. On a campus that is constantly trying to diversify its largely homogenous population, here is our chance to expose a huge percentage of our students, their families and the community to someone vastly different from one of our own, and, frankly, we are wasting the opportunity.

I understand that Langone has been an enormous benefactor of the University over the years, and, although I am sure this speech is an honor we have bestowed upon him out of respect for him as a person because he has much to offer, I have trouble believing that the underlying reasons for his nomination lie in something other than thanking him for his patronage. I am disappointed in the University for this decision.

Although other speakers may not be in the political interest of the University, for the school to use our graduation as the place to thank its donors is not only unfair to us but makes me, for one, reluctant to give back to an institution that chooses to put its own interests before its loyal seniors on their last day as University students.

Sincerely,
Brett Alcarese '02

Students do clean up Downtown

Panhel philanthropy chair responds to professor's letter

To the Editor:

I am always surprised at how little is known about the good things that the Greek organizations at the University accomplish.

In a previous letter to the editor, a faculty member urged students to "think globally, act locally" and clean up the streets of the Borough after parties.

What this faculty member, and presumably many others, may not realize is that the Greek system does exactly that. Every single Greek organization on campus takes several turns per semester cleaning up the areas surrounding 6th and 7th Streets.

Fraternity and sorority members can be seen in the early hours of Thursday, Saturday and Sunday mornings cleaning up the party trash from the night before.

The Greek system is dedicated to improving the quality of life on this campus and in the surrounding community. If you have any ideas for community service activities that could be done by the greek system, please contact me at jserafin@bucknell.edu. We are always looking for more ways to help out!

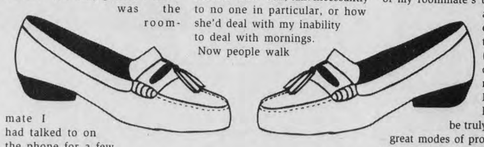
First year makes lasting impressions and memories

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

The day I was to return home for an extended stay over winter break, I sat in a friend's room down the hall. She looked at my scuffed up American Eagle loafers that I bought a week before I came to school and said, "I can remember when those shoes were all shiny and new." The odd thing is ... I can remember when I was all shiny and new too.

It seems like yesterday was Aug. 24, the day I first stepped onto campus as a student. But it is now over five months and a complete semester later and I, like my shoes, are scuffed up with millions of memories.

I look back to the Aug. 24 and am amazed at how much my life has changed since then. I stood alone in the middle of nowhere in Pennsylvania and set on a journey that would remain in my memory forever. The only person I knew was the roommate I had talked to on the phone for a few minutes. There was no one to share with how scared I was, so my shoes and I began to take advantage of the University one step at a time.



Our first challenge was the issue of a roommate. I remember the day I first met her—I was filled with so much anxiety of living with this stranger for an entire year. I questioned if I should act like my normal "odd" self, talk incessantly to no one in particular, or how she'd deal with my inability to deal with mornings.

Now people walk into our room and wonder about us. But, there is nothing like laying in bed staring at the ceiling in a state of insomnia at 2 a.m. and hearing in the darkness, "Roomie, I can't sleep!" And those talks that last until four are some of the best things college gives you.

The second test my shoes and I faced was trying to make friends. I was fortunate enough to meet some of my roommate's teammates and am now lucky enough to call them all friends (and even some of their roommates as well). My hallmates have proved to be truly amazing (and great modes of procrastination). I was certainly blessed with some of the best friends that the University could have given me.

The steps I had to take into the collegiate softball world proved to be quite hard. When I was accepted to the University, I became a big fan of the softball team, so now that I play for it, I am in amazement every time I go to practice with what I believe to be some of the finest athletes and teammates around.

With my devotion to softball, I was leaving behind my beloved sport of basketball, and to deal with such a loss, I attended every women's home game and consider myself a true fanatic. As a New Jersey native, and current University student, I am also so proud to say that I go to school with two of my state's best basketball players.

One evening this semester, I was walking home from the Campus Theatre and I looked around lit-up Market Street in Lewisburg and I smiled and thought to myself, "I can't wait for the next four years!" I just wonder what my shoes will look like then.

Should friends attend House Party?

By Maren Johnson
Opinions Editor

Just as the Beastie Boys once had to "fight for their right to party" it seems that students here at our University may have to do the same. As we are all aware, a proposal has been made to ban guests from attending this year's festivities on House Party Weekend. That got me thinking about House Parties past and how it appears that the University is infringing on the fun a little more each year. House Party is supposed to be a campus wide celebration where the fraternities open their doors and students can enjoy a weekend of bands, dancing and other events.

In the three and a half years I have been at this University I have seen an increasing crack down on alcohol consumption and University policies toward parties in general. Even the Borough of Lewisburg has jumped on the crack down bandwagon by instating the noise violation policy.

What I think the Borough and the University are forgetting is that this is college. Our campus is hardly a scene out of "Animal House." We should be allowed to have a good time and enjoy ourselves as college students. I am not advocating mass debauchery; merely that if given some leeway the University might be surprised at how students react. As far as Bucknell Student Government's (BSG) involvement in the crackdown, I think it is fair to say that while it is student government they do not always act in the interest of the campus majority.

Let's look at the history of increasing restrictions on House Party Weekend. Two years ago the University banned open containers. This policy, while enforced, created an uproar among campus women who feared that they would be targets for date rape drugs if they were not allowed to have covered mugs. The result was that most women—and that's about half the campus—were carrying around covered containers, which made the no covered container rule seem a little superfluous.

Last year, the wristband rule was enforced. The aim was to regulate admission into fraternities and identify under 21-year-olds from those of legal drinking age. Apparently, trying to check wristbands on the hordes of students trying to get into a fraternity house is not the most effective plan, and it's rumored that most fraternities simply looked the other way. Again, the University's attempt at regulation of House Party is foiled and another rule made ineffectual.

This year there is the rumor that some in BSG are seeking to prevent guests from attending House Party. Whether this is true or not, it seems that it would follow the pattern of adding another restriction to this particular weekend. In fact, if this pattern continues it seems as though there will be so many restrictions surrounding House Party that the event will eventually die out. Already this particular weekend is more regulated than any other weekend on campus when parties occur regularly. If we can have more freedom and more fun on any random weekend than we can on a weekend designated to having a good time than maybe we need to reevaluate the meaning of House Party

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

I don't care much for parties, and House Party Weekend has never really been my thing. But I do like economics, so let's talk economics.

Americans generally subscribe to the theory that prices determined by a free market will do a good job allocating goods and resources in an efficient and reasonably fair manner. There's no need for state intervention. Just let us do our thing, let businesses do theirs, and everyone will be happy.

Yet the market is not left entirely unsupervised. If left to their own devices, some producers would either ruthlessly eliminate the competition or collaborate with them to keep prices high. That's called monopoly, and monopolies usually hurt consumers. How do we keep this from happening? We have antitrust laws. The state intervenes in the market, but only for one very specific reason: to ensure that markets can work on their own in the long run. We allow a small measure of government interference at the margins to protect the fundamental principle of free, competitive markets. We break the rules of the game to preserve the game. It sounds weird, but that's how we do it and it usually works.

House Party Weekend may be thought of in a similar light. Bucknell Student Government is at least talking about putting yet another restriction on House Party, namely, that guests be prohibited from the campus for just that weekend, as a matter of safety. This proposal, taken with a few other recent policy changes, has some asking whether the rules regarding House Party have become too strict. I don't think they have.

House Party regulations are our antitrust laws; we give up a little to gain a lot. I don't think it unreasonable to say that, left completely to its own devices, the student body, in search of the perfect Party, might not, on its own, install all of the necessary safeguards for such a crazy time. A few people—Bucknellians or otherwise—might do dumb, unsafe stuff if given the chance, and they'd probably end up hurting somebody. Every such incident, then, would make the administration less and less likely to support the idea of any sort of House Party event.

Imagine what would happen if there were few or no House Party regulations and some underage student drank himself to death. Or what if there were a string of sexual assaults carried out by off-campus visitors. How much patience would the administration have for House Party then? Probably none. All that it would take to get rid of House Party Weekend for good would be one horrible incident.

If some of these newer rules, the ones that we see as inconvenient or even oppressive, increase the safety of the student body even a little bit, then they should be welcomed. Let the administration tinker at the edges of House Party all it wants; if those tweaks make House Party even just a little bit safer, then that increases the chances that the essence, the fundamental principle of House Party—a weekend of managed absurdity—may survive for future generations of Bucknellians to enjoy if they so choose.

Race-based detentions contradict American values

By Gretchen Schrock
Senior Writer

The American government is attempting to place a small butterfly bandaid on a painful, bloody wound. Not only is the recommended treatment failing to alleviate the injury, but is also causing greater harm to the patient. What problem is the United States vainly striving to cure and why is its proposed remedy not working?

In the aftermath of the horrific events of Sept. 11, our country was forced to deal with the growing issue of international terrorism. Our political leaders in Washington decided to embark on a war against the Taliban regime in Afghanistan in an effort to hunt down Osama bin Laden and punish the Afghan government for its involvement in harboring the Al-Qaeda terrorist network. As rescue workers cleaned up the devastation in New York and Washington, and our fellow citizens fought grief and an overwhelming sense of vulnerability, the nightly news broadcasted images of bombings and raids conducted by our heroic soldiers.

It is not the pictures of war and its disastrous effects that shock this columnist but instead the conscious actions of our government in the domestic sphere, which are reminiscent of an earlier era, one of World War II Japanese internment camps. Caught unaware in the widening wave of the post-Sept. 11 terrorism investigation, thousands of Muslim men have been arrested on immigration charges and detained for questioning, during which time they might be formally cleared of any connection to terrorist groups. Yet, hundreds of detainees remain in custody.

Most have simply overstayed their visas, which has never presented a serious problem to immigration officials in the past, despite its illegality. With approximately eight million illegal immigrants in the population, the immigration service undoubtedly lacked the resources to track down every violator. In addition, one could argue that the country desperately needed their cheap labor to fill minimum wage positions, which most Americans refuse to take.

Now, men of Middle Eastern and South Asian descent are the subjects of intense scrutiny, especially if they have ties to the Islamic faith. "Generally in the past, when immigration violations, like overstaying your visa or working without authorization were enforced, it was without detention. Usually no bond was required, and anyone who agreed to leave the country voluntarily was allowed to leave promptly. Now there is strict enforcement in a selective and discriminatory way against people from the Middle East who are denied bond and detained for lengthy periods, even after they've agreed to leave," commented Lucas Guttentag, director of the American Civil Liberties Union's Immigrants' Rights Project.

Is this a logical measure considering recent events or is this a return to racial profiling in the name of wartime security?

For example, according to the New York Times, an Egyptian who was lost in Newark flagged down a police officer to obtain directions. Instead of giving the requested directions, the officer asked for his immigration status. When the man showed the officer his passport, which indicated that he was illegally in the country, he was immediately arrested.

The issue is not whether he should have been arrested but whether he was unfairly targeted because of his ethnicity, nationality or religious affiliation. Would an immigrant with an expired German or British passport and ties to Judaism be arrested under the same circumstances? Could it not have been possible that this man was a newly naturalized citizen, thus explaining an obvious accent?

In a New York Times article, Janet Sabel, a lawyer with the Legal Aid Society's immigration project, was quoted saying, "The vast majority of the people who got picked up have zero involvement with any terrorism. My sense is that they are picked up because of their religious practices or the way they looked, and then they get cleared by the F.B.I."

Unfortunately, these governmental practices regarding immigrants testify to the fact that our country still is not color-blind. We suspect a person to have terrorist tendencies not by their words or actions but by their skin color, their facial features, their accent and where they worship. If this policy continues, the very foundation on which our country stands will become fractured.

A century ago, immigrant families came to these shores in the search of opportunity and happiness that were unavailable in their homelands. Our nation was not nearly as fragmented by religion or nationality as others because we accepted every person as a future contributor to the betterment of the United States. Will we deny this chance to every man of Middle Eastern descent because of the insane acts of some America-hating religious fanatics?

One Egyptian detainee, Mohamed Desouky, remarked, when interviewed by a New York Times journalist, "I don't know if I stand a chance to stay in this country or not. Mostly I want to know, if I leave, how long would it before I could come back?" Regrettably, it is not admiration or love for our country that matters, but one's religion and nationality.

BCEJ seeks responsible distribution of money

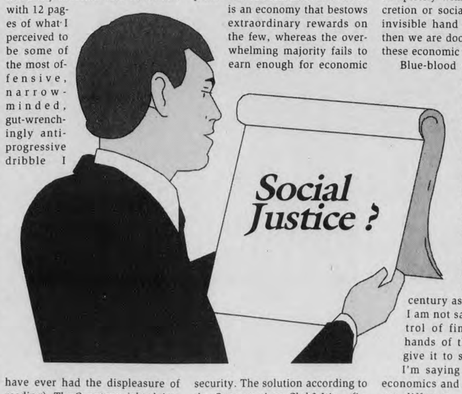
By Josh Fisher
Staff Writer

We're led by denial around this campus everyday, serving the heartless, mighty multinationals of style. But underneath this, the skyrocketing stock market and our general economic prosperity of recent years, lies a rarely acknowledged economy that is not working so well. Step out of "the Bubble" for a moment.

Let me introduce you to the Living Wage Campaign. The idea is simple: 40 percent of all our support staff workers—40 percent of the University "family," according to University President Steffen Rogers—make less than a self-sufficient standard wage—the wage needed for housing, nutrition, and other basic necessities. A group of highly committed individuals in the Bucknell Caucus for Economic Justice (BCEJ) wants to fix that.

The only obstacle is the responsible investment of the University's assets; look at where the money goes, and if you were around for the big fireworks display last year, you would know. "It's a fiscal impossibility," the big lie that you and I know so well.

In the recent issue of The Counterweight, the Conservatives Club prattled on about how this concept was "perhaps the most regressive campus policy proposal on the table today." With a staggering level of vanity, they accuse the BCEJ of defacing the campus with "ugly green signs" (although they defaced my mailbox last December with 12 pages of what I perceived to be some of the most offensive, narrow-minded, gut-wrenchingly anti-progressive dribble I have ever had the displeasure of reading). The Counterweight claims that raising the wages of workers earning an annual income well below poverty level would be unfair to those who have been at those jobs longer.



The fundamental unfairness, however, is that the wages are well below a living wage in the first place. The fundamental unfairness is an economy that bestows extraordinary rewards on the few, whereas the overwhelming majority fails to earn enough for economic security. The solution according to the Conservatives Club? It's a fiscal impossibility, so let's all try to ignore them.

The Counterweight asserts that economic justice exists entirely separate from social justice. If we continue to submit to the idea that such "economic justice" should only be dispensed from on high, completely without consumer discretion or social activism, by the invisible hand of market forces, then we are doomed to perpetuate these economic ills.

Blue-blood elitists have been practicing that for a century across the world. The BCEJ and Living Wage Campaign supporters seek representation in the administration, so that in the future funds might be more responsibly distributed.

This is an idea that Americans have been unfamiliar with for a century as well: democracy. I am not saying take all control of finance out of the hands of the consumer and give it to some Big Brother. I'm saying stop segregating economics and real life as if they are different, and start looking your University family in the eye the next time you buy food in the Bison.

Ashcroft censors art

By Daniel Morel
Staff Writer

Enron falls apart and leaves the economic future of many in shambles. People take notice. Thousands protest around the Waldorf-Astoria. People take notice. Bush proposes a defense budget of astronomic proportion. People take a bit of notice. But when our Attorney General decides to do a little redecorating, the media gives it two seconds of air time, and people go on, not caring what happened.

What I speak of is the "Spirit of Justice" and the "Majesty of Law"—two 12 foot tall statues which once stood behind the Attorney General's podium; now tucked away under a big blue curtain. It seems like a hard task to hide such large objects away from the public eye, but John Ashcroft and his goons managed to do so, amazingly under the guise of having "reasonable" intentions. What were his reasons? Well, it seems that Ashcroft has an aversion to being seen with partially nude, aluminum women (on a side note, this dislike lies up there with his hatred of calico cats; a recent visit to The Hague revealed his belief that calicos are a sign of the devil). What is wrong, after all, with covering a naked statue?

Many things are wrong with this. The entire Justice building was built as part of a Works Project Administration project, and the two art deco statues are reminders of art from that era. Hard work went into these statues.

They were meant to please the public. The curtains hanging in front of the statues, though being justified as more aesthetically pleasing, send a much more prudish message. Ashcroft is sending a message that he can take part in the censorship of our nation. This comes from the same man who claimed that to question our countries' actions was to side with terrorists who caused the horrible tragedy on Sept. 11.

This is a dangerous trend that cannot be allowed to continue. Right now, our government has only managed to cover up a questionable statue and told its citizens to watch their words, but where will it end?

There are other statues just as naked as the Spirit of Justice, and they have just as much a right to be viewed. When the leaders of our country begin taking the path of censoring the "fringe," it brings to mind leaders of past who glorified book burning. While the censorship in our country has not reached that level yet, where is the sense in letting someone who fears calicos tell us what is and is not proper for America?

Increased cost in 2002 Winter Olympics

Security at Salt Lake City will be lead by the Secret Service with the combined effort of over 11,000 peace keepers.

By Jim Leahy
Managing Editor

The 2002 Winter Olympics have come to the United States once again, taking residence in Salt Lake City. Besides the sporting events associated with the Games of the Olympiad, there will be a large focus on the security that the Secret Service will spearhead in light of the increased threat to U.S. soil. People forget, however, the huge amount of business the Olympics will bring to Salt Lake and the wrangling that went into just getting the Games in the first place.

Olympic events are today some of the most elaborate sports spectacles, with more than two weeks of events spread out over numerous venues. The entire area surrounding Salt Lake will see activity either through the new venues and stadiums or through tourists whom will invade the area starting on Friday.

Just getting the Olympics to Salt Lake was full of problems and scandal. The bribery scandal was one of the most widely reported scandals in the history of the Olympics. The International Olympic Committee (IOC) had millions of dollars in bribes dangled in front of them, helping them make their decision on where to have the games.

Then the security issue came about. There was always going to be some form of heightened security in and around Salt Lake for the Olympics because of what happened at the Olympic Park in Atlanta in 1996. Since Sept. 11, the Secret Service has taken over control of the massive security effort that will ring Salt Lake City. According to MSNBC.com, a General Accounting Office study estimated that the federal government will have spent over $342 million on the Games and add over $50 million more to cover the costs of increased security following Sept. 11. By the time the 17-day event comes to a close.

One of the more drastic security measures to be used at the games is the no-fly zone and its extensive nature. Starting on Thursday, all planes that are not part of the daily scheduled commercial service cannot fly directly to Salt Lake City, CBS Sportsline.com reports. Only after landing at one of four gateway airports in the surrounding states and submitting to a US Customs or National Guard search can a plane get access to Salt Lake. The no-fly zone extends to almost 45 miles outside the city.

MSNBC is reporting that there will be more than 11,000 federal agents, police and military personnel standing guard, armed with equipment to detect biological and chemical agents, Black Hawk helicopters standing ready, miles of concrete barriers and chain-link fence and x-ray scanners at the venues.

The cost to put on the Games has risen sharply since the summer Games in Atlanta, MSNBC says. In 1996, the government spent a total of $192 million even though over three times as many athletes competed in those games. Adding another $228 million in state and local funding thrown in to the $342 million the government is spending, taxpayers are paying $177,000 on each of the 3,500 athletes who will come to compete.

Those numbers do not even take into account the almost $1.1 billion in accelerated federal spending that MSNBC reports was necessary for a number of things. They included the improvement of Utah's highways and bridges, the construction of a light-rail transit system for Salt Lake and other public improvements that officials needed to complete in time for the Games.

MSNBC is also reporting that Utah even took one of its policies and changed it to bring more revenue to the state. Home to some of the most stringent liquor laws in the country, Utah is allowing a more free consumption of alcohol in hopes that sales from state owned and controlled liquor stores increase dramatically when the world comes to Salt Lake.

Watching television in the past month, viewers may have seen a more central place for Olympic-related commercials. The Olympics is a heavily commercialized business now and its television revenues have steadily risen with more air time devoted to selling products to viewers. In one instance, McDonalds has been showing ads touting its presence in Salt Lake as a place for good food.

The politics, and in some ways, the business of the Olympics have even carried over to the opening ceremony. CBS Sportsline.com reported that the American flag found at Ground Zero (and displayed at the Super Bowl) will be raised over the opening ceremonies and not carried as some would have hoped. However, CNN reported that the IOC would allow the flag to be carried into the stadium by "athletes and other heroes" and then raised as the official flag for the Olympics.

The Olympics, a display of the world's best athletic competition, will begin today in Salt Lake City. Standing right beside the citizens of the world will be the business community who hopes that while celebrating a gold medal win, those citizens will not forget to spend some money too.

John Walker denied bail

U.S. Magistrate Curtis Sewell denied Taliban fighter John Walker Lindh bail, because he was a flight risk and a danger to the community. Lindh will be arraigned on Monday in federal court.

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

American Taliban John Walker and his legal team were in court again on Wednesday trying to convince a federal magistrate to release Walker on bail before his trial. On Tuesday, a Grand Jury indicted Walker on 10 separate counts, up from the four previously suggested. According to CNN, defense attorney James Brosnahan tried to argue that Walker is "loyal-to the United States and to his family," and "he never fought with Al-Qaeda, never signed up for and never had anything to do with terrorism." However, U.S. Magistrate Curtis Sewell ruled against the plea stating that Walker was both a flight risk and a threat to the community. Brosnahan also took the opportunity to argue that Walker never fought against the United States, only the Northern Alliance.

Prosecutor Randy Bellows shot back "John Walker Lindh is a committed terrorist. He not only talked the talk, but he walked the walk, carrying hand grenades and firearms and referring to his Al-Qaeda brothers." Brosnahan told Fox News that he asked Attorney General John Ashcroft not to take out his frustrations on Walker, saying "In my view they have brought out the cannon to shoot the mouse."

According to Fox News, the government filed a motion against bail citing emails and letters that Walker had written during his time overseas. As part of the motion, the Justice Department cited a 1998 letter Walker sent to his mother claiming that the embassy bombings were more likely done by the American government than by Muslims. In other emails, Walker made references to the United States being the instigator of the Gulf War and that he was thankful President George W. Bush was not his president.

Fox News reports that the Grand Jury indictment of Walker described his role in Afghanistan in very harsh terms, saying that he conspired to "kill American citizens around the world," and also cited his time spent at terrorist camps in June and July of 2001.

Walker will be formally indicted on Monday, and his trial is expected to begin sometime this fall.

Search for kidnapped journalist continues

Pearl's captors, National Movement for the Restoration of Pakistani Sovereignty, claim not they will not release him until Taliban and Al-Qaeda prisoners are returned to Pakistan to stand trial.

Daniel Pearl, a reporter for the Wall Street Journal, was kidnapped two weeks ago in Karachi, Pakistan. Pearl was on his way to interview Muslim cleric Shiek Mubarak Ali Shah Gilani in Pakistan when he disappeared. Pearl's captors, who have made claims that he is a CIA or Mossad agent, have sent repeated emails stating that Pearl will be released alive only if the Taliban and Al-Qaeda prisoners held by America in Afghanistan and Guantanamo Bay, Cuba are returned to Pakistan to stand trial there, as opposed to being tried by America. The group calls itself the National Movement for the Restoration of Pakistani Sovereignty, a previously unknown group. On Wednesday, Pakistani officials told CNN that they arrested three men they believed to be involved in the kidnapping of the American journalist. The officials also claim that they have found the computer that the captors used to send emails.

Not long before his kidnapping, Pearl met with Jameel Yousuf, the head of a Pakistani organization created to combat kidnappings. The Pakistani government has been searching now for days to trace Pearl's whereabouts. Mukhtar Ahmed Sheikh, head of police in Karachi, has stated that the kidnappers are known, and that he believes Pearl to be alive. Sheikh would not share further details, stating that it might harm the investigation if he did so. The American FBI has joined the case, aiding Pakistani police in following all leads, which begin in Karachi, has been expanded to include all of Pakistan. Pearl's editor and wife have made impassioned pleas to the kidnappers, hoping that they will not follow up on their promises to kill Pearl if their demands are not met. Although expressing sympathy to Pearl's wife, the Bush administration has stated that the groups believed to have kidnapped Pearl are terrorist organizations, and as such are not entitled to negotiation.

which are few. According to CNN, it is believed that Sheikh Omar Saeed is the ringleader of the kidnappers, leading Pakistani officials to suspect two terrorist organizations, Harkat-ul-Mujahedeen and Jaish-e-Mohammed (JEM), of kidnapping Pearl. Both groups reportedly have ties to bin Laden, and operate primarily in the Indian controlled region of Kashmir. Indian officials told CNN that they have linked JEM to the shooting at the Indian parliament several weeks ago.

It has been difficult to trace Pearl, as hoax emails and telephone calls have been reported to police by people stating that they had Pearl, but who upon investigation did not. The investigation,

Ground zero flag will be used at Olympics

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

According to CNN, the International Olympic Committee (IOC) has decided to allow the tattered American flag found at Ground Zero to be carried into Rice-Eccles stadium during the opening ceremonies of this year's Olympics. This marks a reversal of a previous IOC ruling that said American athletes would not be allowed to march with the flag during the Opening Ceremonies.

USA Today, is reporting that the decision is the product of a compromise between the U.S. Olympic Committee (USOC) and the IOC. Although the tattered flag will not be carried in front of the delegation of American athletes, the banner will have a prominent role in the ceremonies Friday night. Robert Ctrvrtlik, an IOC athletes' representative told USA Today, "The solution we have reached is viewed as excellent by the USOC."

While the exact makeup of the honor guard that will escort the flag in Friday night's festivities has yet to be announced, Fox News has reported that it will consist of athletes, firemen, police officers and "other heroes." The flag will then be raised next to the Olympic flame as the national anthem is played. However, according to CNN, the fragile condition of the flag will prevent it from being flown above the stadium for more than several hours. Under Olympic rules, it is the honor of the host nation to play their national anthem and raise their flag over the stadium during the opening ceremonies of the games. IOC Director General Francois Carrard said in a press release, "We considered this the highest honor of respect - the hoisting of the Ground Zero flag as the official U.S. flag."

The Ground Zero flag, which was discovered by firefighters after being buried under rubble for three days, has also been raised over the World Series, the Super Bowl and numerous other events since Sept. 11.

The American flag found at ground zero that was displayed at the Super Bowl, will be raised over the opening ceremonies of the Olympics.

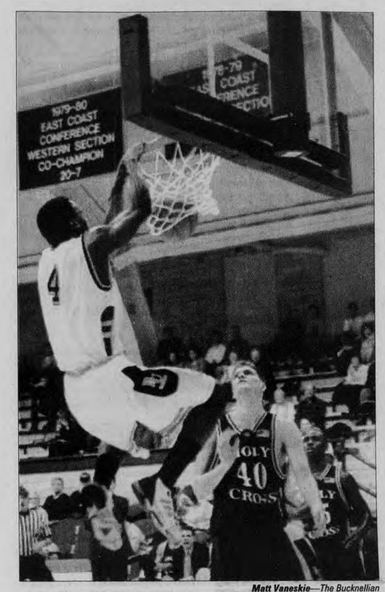
Bailey breaks 1,000 point mark

Bison PL record drops to 4-4 after two league losses



Matt Vaneskie—The Bucknellian

Boakai Lalugba '03 scored 13 points and tallied eight rebounds and one block in the Bison loss to Holy Cross last week.

A record setting night by Bryan Bailey '02 was somewhat offset by the Bison's second consecutive defeat, a 74-68 loss to Lafayette this past Saturday. The Bison (8-13, 4-4) saw the Leopards (11-10, 5-3) get hot in the second half as the host hit 60 percent of their shots in the second stanza. The win enabled the Leopards to avenge a 65-64 loss to the Bison on Jan. 9.

Lafayette	74

Bailey reached the 1,000 point mark for his career on a second-half three-pointer. He finished with 20 points to lead the Bison. Senior captain tied Patrick King '92 for 28th place on the all-time University scoring ranks. He is also only the 28th player in school history to hit the 1,000 mark.

Lafayette was led by the hot shooting of center Mick Kuberka, who hit 4-of-5 three-pointers en route to a career-best 21-point night. Justin DeBerry scored 15 points and Brian Burke had eight assists for Lafayette.

The first-half was a seesaw battle. The Bison employed tough defense on Lafayette's starting guards, evident in the Leopards' 3-of-18 shooting. The Bison hit five threes to hang around in a first-half that featured six lead-changes. The squad only hit two other two-point baskets. Guard Dan Blankenship '03 hit one of the five threes as he barely beat the buzzer to pull the Orange and Blue within 27-26 at intermission.

The game was tied for the last time at 47 when Chris Rodgers '04 hit a pair of foul shots for the Bison. The Leopards went ahead for good when Burke, their leading scorer for the season, drilled his only three-pointer of the contest with 9:52 remaining on the clock. The Bison have done an incredible job in containing Burke in their two meetings this year, holding him to five field goals in 23 attempts.

The squad crawled to 55-54 on Bailey's milestone three with just over seven minutes to play, but was quickly answered by a 7-0 Lafayette run. The run gave the Leopards their biggest margin of the game with 4:43 left to play.

The Bison pulled within two once again after Brian Werner '03 sank one of two free-throws, but the team couldn't quite get over the hump. Lafayette hit 10 free-throws in as many attempts in the final 45 seconds of the game to seal the victory in front of their home crowd.

Boakai Lalugba '03 scored 13 points and Blankenship added 12 points, four assists and one block for the Bison. Matt Quinn '03 hit two three-pointers and chipped in with eight total points. Werner grabbed nine rebounds to lead the Bison and Lalugba added eight boards.

The Bison hit 43 percent of their shots, while shooting 18 for 25 from the foul line.

The Leopards now hold an 83-45 all-time series lead against the Bison.

The Bison's defeat in the hands of Holy Cross last Wednesday at Davis Gym snapped their two game winning streak and dropped their record to 8-12, 4-3. Holy Cross pulled out a 73-65 win behind Tim Szatko's 22 points and 10 rebounds.

The win gave the visitors their tenth win of the season to go along with their 12 losses. Their league record improved to 4-3 and moved them into a tie with the Orange and Blue. Both teams fell a game behind league leading American.

Lalugba was tremendous in defeat, as he tallied a game-high 25 points on 12-of-15 shooting. Bailey added 15 points.

A 6-0 run by the Bison cut the Holy Cross lead to four at 64-60 with 1:55 left in the game. Lalugba's dunk capped the run, enabling the Bison to trim the deficit, which was as high as 12 earlier in the half.

Bucknell	65

The Crusaders hit nine out of 12 free-throws in the final 1:44 to grab the win.

The first half was much tighter than the second, as neither team led by more than five points. The Bison hit five three-pointers to counter Szatko and Nate Lufkin, who combined for 21 points in the opening half. Holy Cross led 34-33 at halftime.

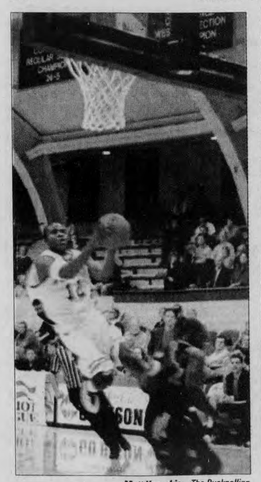
The Bison lost control of the game after a 15-4 Crusader run early in the second half. The lead reached double figures for the first time at 49-39 with 11:12 remaining.

Lalugba tried to keep the team in the game by scoring seven consecutive points to cut the deficit to six, 54-48. Holy Cross broke loose and increased their lead to 10 once again after Szatko hit a shot from the baseline.

Along with Szatko, three other Holy Cross players scored in double-figures. Ryan Serravalle was 6-of-9 from the field and 3-of-4 from downtown and finished with 17 points. Lufkin scored 13 points to go along with his eight boards. Jave Meade chipped in with 10 points for the Crusaders.

For the Bison, Werner added eight points in 28 minutes. Rodgers was solid once again, as he scored six points, dished off five dimes and added three steals. Bailey added six rebounds and three steals along with his point total.

The Orange and Blue will face Army next on Feb. 9 at West Point, then return home for a game against American at Davis Gym on Feb. 13.



Matt Vaneskie—The Bucknellian

Bryan Bailey '03 broke the 1000 point career mark with a 20 point effort against Holy Cross this past weekend.

Chris Rodgers '04 broke the deadlock with two foul shots before Holy Cross hit a three pointer to snap the pull ahead of the Bison for good against the Leopards.

The men and women's indoor track and field teams proved how capable they are on a national level as they traveled to Columbus, Ohio this past weekend for the Ohio State Invitational meet.

"Although it was an open meet, meaning that it was not scored, it gave us a chance to see some of the best teams in the Midwest; teams that Bucknell usually doesn't get the chance to see," Head Coach Kevin Donner said.

The meet yielded many noteworthy performances for the Bison, including four first-place finishes against tough competition such as Kentucky State, Ohio University, Eastern Michi-

Women's b-ball sinks Lafayette

The women's basketball team got back on track this past Saturday as they opened up the second round of Patriot League play.

Molly Creamer '03 etched her name in the history books again, scoring 31 points to move into second place on the school's all-time career scoring list and helped her team to a 79-67 victory. The Bison move to 6-2 in the League and retain a share of first place with Holy Cross and Lehigh.

The contest against the Leopards was a battle from the beginning as the Orange and Blue found themselves trailing 15-8 with 13:22 to play in the first half. The Bison answered with a 7-0 run to tie the game at the 10:57 mark.

Lafayette	67

Both squads exchanged leads back and forth the rest of the way until the Orange and Blue ended the half with an 8-1 run, capped by a three-pointer from Creamer at the buzzer to give the visitors a 38-32 halftime advantage. Creamer's three-pointer broke her own single season record for treys with 46.

"They played us tough in the first half. They changed defenses on us a lot and I think that slowed us down offensively," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said.

The Bison exploded out of the gates in the second half, taking a quick 10-point lead, 43-33, with only 1:29 gone in the half. Lafayette responded with an 8-2 run to get within four, 45-41, with 16:48 left.

The Orange and Blue countered with a 12-2 run to take a 14-point lead, 57-43 and their lead would not fall below double digits for the rest of the game. Bucknell was 24-26 from the stripe, including Creamer who was 9-9. Desire Almind '04 added 13 points and Tri-Captain Vicki Quimby '02 pulled down a game-high 12 rebounds.

"The team was poised at halftime and I thought we played very well and played confident in the second half. We came out strong and I thought we were pretty much in control of the game from the 15-minute mark," Fedorjaka said. "We have a lot of good shooters on this team. It is just a matter of focus and concentration. Free throws are big down the stretch for championship."

"Beating Lafayette was the right way to open up the second round of league play. We wanted to set the tone with them, and now move forward from there in a similar manner, controlling our own destiny from here on out," Tri-Captain Monique LeBlanc '02 said.

"Molly was strong that night and Kate [Rounsley '02] gave us some good minutes, making a three and Vicki was consistent on the glass like she always is," Fedorjaka said.

"Winning anytime on the road is hard and the Lafayette game went back and forth for the first half, so it was just nice to come out with a win. This was especially good after the loss to Cross," Kate Franks '03 said.

The win was good for a Bison team that had suffered a 76-55 defeat at the hands of Holy Cross a week ago in Davis Gym. This contest was close from the beginning as both teams fought hard to extend a lead. With a 7-0 run, the Crusaders had an 18-13 lead with just over nine minutes to play in the first half. The home team battled back to tie the score four more times in the half but could not grab the lead and trailed 34-31 at halftime.

Holy Cross	76

Five minutes into the second half, Holy Cross went on another run, scoring eight unanswered points to take a nine-point lead. The Orange and Blue responded again, cutting the lead to one, 51-50, with eight minutes left in the contest. It was all Crusaders from then on as they would go on to outscore the Bison 22-5 down the stretch while shooting 52 percent from the floor.

Creamer scored 20 for the Orange and Blue while Franks had 17 points, including five three pointers.

"Losing to Holy Cross was disappointing, just like any league loss. We are all fighting for the top spot right now, so every game is going to be a fight," LeBlanc said.

"We didn't play well down the stretch and we didn't shoot the ball well. It was hard for us to be successful against their zone when we had a tough shooting night and we didn't get it done in the paint either," Fedorjaka said.

The team was pleased with their victory over Lafayette in its implications for the rest of the season.

"The Lafayette win was a good start to the second half of league play. Right now we are focusing on each game one at a time and clinching the number one seed for the tournament. The Cross game was a disappointment, but it's a game that we'll learn from and use those experiences to our advantage the second time through," Rounsley said.

The Orange and Blue are back on the road as they travel to West Point to square off against Army this Saturday.

"It is going to be a physical battle and we need to be physically and mentally prepared. It is a pivotal game for us, being right before our last homestand. We are going to have to bring our A-game," Fedorjaka said.

Patriots-Rams measure up against the greats

The moment Adam Vinatieri's 48-yard field goal arched swiftly through the uprights at the Louisiana Superdome, headlines and game recaps began to assign it the distinction of being "the greatest Super Bowl ever." I first watched the Super Bowl in 1998, and including that year, this is the third time I've witnessed a game described with that superlative.

That is, three of the last five Super Bowls have been "the greatest Super Bowl ever." Although that seems to be merely a signature of the media's tendency towards hyperbole, it is probably better attributed to variation in personal preference.

That aside, Super Bowls XXXII, XXXIV and XXXVI all had one thing in common: they had hearts pounding right up to the finals moments of play. Generally speaking, games of this nature are most likely to merit consideration as "the greatest ever"–or perhaps more accurately, the most exciting ever.

In its 36-year history, the big game has had no shortage of thrills. Here is a brief look at some of the most enrapturing Super Bowls over the years:

Super Bowl V: Baltimore 16, Dallas 13. This is a fitting starting point, not only because it's in keeping with chronological order, but because Super Bowl V is a perfect illustration of the fact that excitement often has nothing to do with technical excellence. Widely considered the worst Super Bowl ever, it was loaded with an almost comical string of bloopers–in all, ten turnovers, six interceptions and even a blocked extra point. The inept offenses did contribute suspense to the contest, however. The score was knotted at 13-13 with five seconds left to go, until Colts' rookie kicker Jim O'Brien plunked the ball through the uprights for a 32-yard, game-winning field goal. Engaging? Yes. Inspirational? Hardly.

Super Bowl X: Pittsburgh 21, Dallas 17. Unlike Super Bowl V, the excitement in Super Bowl X was coupled with generally above-average performances. Yes, there were four interceptions. And interestingly enough, there was also a missed extra point. But there was also a spine-tingling performance by Lynn Swann, who reeled in four catches for a then-record 161 yards, including a 64-yard touchdown bomb. With 1:22 left in the game, Roger Staubach–who was John Elway before John Elway–piloted a valiant comeback attempt for his Cowboys. Staubach's mission came to an abrupt halt on the final play of the game as his desperate pass was picked off in the endzone, enabling the Steelers to win their second Super Bowl in a row.

Super Bowl XXIII: San Francisco 20, Cincinnati 16. With 3:20 left in the contest, the Bengals pulled ahead of the Niners by three, and then stranded Joe Montana and his troops on their own eight-yard line. Eleven plays and 92 yards later, Joe Cool dumped the winning score into the hands of John Taylor with 34 seconds left. Super Bowl XXIII not only sent adrenaline coursing through the veins of fans everywhere, it also pumped Joe Montana and Jerry Rice into the record books. Rice smashed Swann's receiving record with 215 yards, and Montana racked up 357 passing yards.

Super Bowl XXV: New York 20, Buffalo 19. It was the beginning of a legacy for the Buffalo Bills, and it wasn't exactly the legacy they wanted. The waning seconds of Super Bowl XXV provided football with its most defining image of agony, failure and defeat as kicker Scott Norwood hooked a 47-yard field goal attempt just slightly to the right of the standard.

The Giants monopolized control of the ball throughout the game with a record total possession of 40 minutes, 33 seconds. Still, with four seconds on the clock, victory seemed wide open for Buffalo. As it turned out, it needed to be open about five inches wider. After one of the most nail-biting finishes in recent years, the Giants squeaked away with a win; the Bills slunk away to a legacy of Super Bowl disaster.

Super Bowl XXXII: Denver 31, Green Bay 24. If there was any comfort for the Bills, it may have been that they had plenty of company in their misery. The historically hapless Denver Broncos were also 0-4 in the big game. John Elway was at the helm of three of those losses, earning himself a somewhat unjust reputation as a professional choke-artist–now he would get his ultimate chance at redemption.

The game had it all: both teams scoring on their opening drives, Terrell Davis–migraine headache and all–running for a Super Bowl-record three touchdowns, 37-year-old Elway lighting a fire beneath his squad with a courageous first-down dive. With 3:27 left, the teams were locked at 24-24, until Davis trotted into the endzone with 1:45 remaining. Favre launched a comeback, but Broncos' John Mobley knocked away his fourth-down pass with 32 seconds left. If the game itself wasn't enough to set hearts afire, the expression of sheer jubilation on Elway's face as the clock ran out should have done the trick.

Super Bowl XXXIV: St. Louis 23, Tennessee 16. One long yard was all that stood between the Titans and victory, but the endzone was simply out of Kevin Dyson's desperate reach as the clock ticked to zero. The Titans were the first team in Super Bowl history to erase a 16-point deficit, but in the end it just wasn't enough. Kurt Warner, a rags-to-riches, zero-to-hero success story, set a Super Bowl passing record with 414 yard, as he led his Rams to glory. In the end, it was out of his hands, and it was Mike Jones' timely tackle that stamped itself as the lasting image of Super Bowl XXXIV.

Super Bowl XXXVI: New England 20, St. Louis 17. Yes, this is one of the greatest Super Bowls ever. The greatest? Not necessarily–that's a distinction that only personal opinion can ultimately determine. Like Supcr Bowls V and XXV, it was decided by a last-second field goal. However, it was not marked by lousy quality of play like V, and unlike XXV, it was won by a field goal, not lost on account of a failed one. Like Super Bowl XXXII, Super Bowl XXXIV was won by a team that had never won a Championship before, and had made relatively pathetic showings in the past. It had sixth round draft pick Tom Brady, the youngest quarterback to win a Super Bowl, playing like a veteran, en route to the game's MVP honors.

And most importantly, Super Bowl XXXVI had the added charm of unabashed patriotism and team unity. As if it weren't convenient enough that New England had the moniker "Patriots," they added to that appeal by choosing to be introduced as a team, and acting like one all evening. They were a team with not only the right jersey colors, but also the right attitude.

I can't really say whether or not this was the greatest Super Bowl ever played, but I think it's fair to say that Super Bowl XXXVI stamped itself a unique place in history. As Winstar farms (who owned the race horse that allegedly helped inspire the squad) printed on a poster they made for the team about a week before the Super Bowl: here's to the Patriot in all of us.

Bison wrestlers fall to Buffalo

Buffalo captured the first five matches of the day, providing its wrestlers enough confidence to assemble a 34-8 victory over the Bison on Feb. 2 at Alumni Arena. Josh Perrin '03 and Brian Falciglia '02 recorded the only victories for the Bison, as Buffalo seized the remaining eight to improve their overall record to 4-6.

Falciglia improved his dual match record to an astounding 7-1 after defeating Kyle Cerminara in a tense 3-1 battle. The lone takedown in the bout proved to be enough for Falciglia to come out victorious. The win also provided a bit of silence to a 22-0 start by the Bulls.

Perrin, who has been triumphant in three of his last five bouts, capitalized on a technical fall at 133 pounds to claim his win. Buffalo's Brian Sebaaly was incontrovertibly outmatched by Perrin throughout, as Perrin jumped to a 19-4 lead after two periods before the match was halted. Perrin scored four takedowns and accumulated a total of five back points.

At this point I want to see my guys go out and fight the whole time, win or lose, giving it everything they have for a full seven minutes
—Tim Wittman, head coach

The closest match of the day occurred at 157 pounds, where Bison Co-Captain Rocky Miller '02 was the victim of a late reversal, which provided Dave Edwards with a 9-8 victory. Miller actually led the bout 6-2 after the second period, but couldn't quite seal the deal against Edwards.

"When he (Miller) had the kid 6-2 he went into a bit of a defensive mode," Bison Head Coach Tim Wittman said.

Wittman has not been pleased as of late with the outcome of matches, however is content with the fact that his wrestlers are giving it their all.

"At this point I want to see my guys go out and fight the whole time, win or lose, giving it everything they have for a full seven minutes," Wittman said.

According to Wittman, the Bison should not have a problem competing on Sunday in what will be both the final home match of the season, and the final home match ever for the University wrestling program.

"Being that last match at home for Wrestling, that in itself will help the guys give everything that they have," Wittman said. "We aren't going to train differently, we're just going to go out and work hard like we do every week. Sunday will be a sad day for the sport of wrestling everywhere."

Bucknell fell to 1-7 on the second and returns to action for their final home match on Sunday, hosting Binghamton.

Tennis squad ready to compete

By Caity Selleck
Staff Writer

The Bucknell women's tennis team has been working practicing hard in preparation for their first competition of the season, a tournament at the College of New Jersey. Their first official match against league competitor, Colgate, will follow next weekend.

In practice, the team has been working on a number of things including developing point strategies, consistency drills and foot speed drills. In addition to this, the squad has challenged the West Branch Raquet Club every weekend in informal play. They have also worked on a team lineup for their future matches.

Although many teams were able to practice outside last week, the tennis teams were not as fortunate. Tennis, unlike most sports, must be played under very specific weather conditions.

According to Coach Rebecca Helt, the ITA, or International Tennis Association stipulates that the temperature must be above 50 degrees Fahrenheit, and winds must be below 20 mph for a team to practice or compete outside.

This allowed for only one practice outside last week.

"These players hit the ball hard. Temperatures below 50 cause the strings in the racquets to become very hard, causing damaging shock to player's arms and, almost inevitably, the strings will break after a few hits," Helt said. "The wind conditions have a huge impact on the game of tennis because the balls are so light. In the distance a tennis ball would travel from baseline to baseline, any winds faster than 20 mph would simply blow the ball off the court."

"With all the conditioning and strength training we've been doing as well as hitting on the courts five days a week, by the end of February we should be in great form to compete
—Kristin Pugno '04

Also, as the team prepares for competition, the two players, Jill Wurzburg, '03, and Laura Maisel, '03, who were abroad last year, have returned to practice for the fall season.

"They were both greatly missed during last season. Their performance has been great at practice, and with them back in our lineup our depth has been considerably enhanced," Captain Kristin Inglis, '02 said.

The team is feeling confident in their play, and feels they will be prepared for both the important league match against Colgate and their tournament at The College of New Jersey after a few weeks of intense practicing.

"Our first match is against Colgate who is one of our toughest opponents in our league. With all the conditioning and strength training we've been doing as well as hitting on the courts five days a week, by the end of February we should be in great form to compete," Kristin Pugno, '04 said.

Jennifer Marsh '05 and LaTonya McSwain '02 were both among the top three finishers in their events. Marsh earned a second place finish in the 1,000 meter run with a time of 3:05.71 and McSwain placed third in the 800 meter run, with a time of 2:17.96.

McSwain, along with teammates Monique Boley '05, Amy Calvo '05 and Rehana Lanewala '05, finished second out of eleven teams in the 1,600 meter relay with a time of 3:55.87.

The men's team finished the meet with three individual victories overall. P.J. Ward '02 won the 1,000 meter run with a time of 2:30.60, while teammate Greg Costello '03 scored a victory in the 5,000 meter run in 14:40.63.

Noel Powell '04, who is ranked tenth in the nation and has already qualified provisionally for NCAA Championships, captured his fourth victory of the season in the long jump with a leap of 23'11". Other athletes to place among the top three in their events were Eric Furst '03 and Lou Palma '03. Furst finished third in the mile run with a time of 4:16.62, and Palma earned a second place finish in the 3,000 meter run with a time of 8:39.81.

"Our athletes really competed very admirably against those schools. We really fit in and now they know who Bucknell University is," Donner said. "The type of meet was good preparation for the Patriot League Championship. After these teams, Army and Navy don't seem as intimidating anymore."

Mike Tyson wants back in the ring

Commentary
Rob Schmicker

Mike Tyson is in the news again. But then again, when isn't he? Whether he is assaulting a reporter, hurling obscenities during interviews or beating the pulp out of an opponent, Iron Mike is always in the spotlight. This time, Tyson has the media buzzing after a press conference fight during which he bit Lennox Lewis in the thigh and assaulted some of his men. Those who have followed Tyson know that this is common hat for the one-time phenom. He has the talent to be a champion, but he is a nutcase. After serving prison time for rape, biting an opponent's ear and having his license suspended almost everywhere imaginable, you have to wonder why Mike is still around.

The fact remains that Tyson is still around because he is the biggest name in the sport of boxing. He can sell a fight–something Lewis can't do by himself. Lewis is the champion by default–there are simply no other decent fighters in the heavyweight division today. The sport is currently at an all-time low, with no one to carry it. There is no Evander Holyfield-Riddick Bowe feud, no Sugar Ray Leonard-Marvin Hagler-Tommy Spinks rivalry and there are certainly no individual figures like Muhammed Ali, Joe Frazier or George Foreman.

Tyson is still the closest thing we have to a great fighter. When we look at Tyson the fighter, we see pure talent. During his prime, Tyson was the man–he earned the nickname Iron Mike. Fans loved him and opponents feared him. In the ring he was unstoppable–no one could beat him.

Because of his talent in the ring, many people were still cheering for him even after his 1992 rape conviction that would send him to jail for a little under three years. I sadly watched the Sportscenter updates, hoping that Tyson would be set free to continue his boxing career. I remember thinking he was framed–that the Tyson I loved was not the animal he was portrayed to be. I was so in awe of him, that I didn't realize he was no longer a man.

After he was released from prison, he returned to the sport and wanted only one thing–a title shot. He destroyed his first two opponents before beating Frank Bruno for the WBC title in March 1996, but later that year Tyson would lose a unification bout against WBO/IBF champion Evander Holyfield. Things looked bad for Tyson's career as many said he was washed up- at the tender boxing age of 30.

When Tyson had another shot at Holyfield, things turned worse. After wining most of the bout, Tyson snapped and bit Holyfield's ear off. I'm sure everyone remembers the incident as it was all over the news. Tyson was portrayed as a psycho every time Holyfield told the story. Tyson complained that constant head butts by Holyfield caused him to snap, and most of us listened. Better yet, we ignored the real issue at hand because he was Iron Mike Tyson.

Clearly, the best days were behind him in the ring. Since the biting incident Tyson has only fought six times and yet still is considered the most dangerous boxer in his weight class. We are intrigued because of what he was able to do inside the ring 14 years ago. We believe that he still has it in him and is likely to knock the head off of any opponent. We believe that he is the man who can bring excitement back to the heavyweight division.

Like most athletes who have had run-ins with the law, Tyson's out-of-the-ring problems have been overlooked because of what he can do in the ring. It seems ignorant that we can simply overlook these personal problems because of the excitement that they bring into our lives daily. At the same time, we are not friends, neighbors or even relatives of major athletes. We will never hang out with them at the bar, we will never talk to them on the phone and we will never sit down and have dinner with them. So should we be concerned with their personal lives?

Few of us non-athletes will ever know our sports idols–and that is why they will remain our idols. We will remain in awe of their athletic talent and that is it. That is why Tyson can enter a shooting gallery and escape unharmed. We can overlook the numerous assault cases. We can put aside the fact that Tyson is a ticking time bomb waiting to explode at any moment. He may have some emotional and psychological problems, but he is a great athlete.

We are willing to see the good in Mike Tyson–isn't that good enough?

For this, the sport of boxing and its promoters are happy. As long as Tyson is making headlines, whether for winning a fight or knocking out someone in a bar, boxing will be in the spotlight. And as long as Tyson is around, greedy promoters will be able to reap the benefits of his highly publicized fights.

Will Tyson fight Lewis in the near future? I'm not sure. But he will fight Lewis sometime. He may not be able to have his license renewed for a while and he may need a few fights to get back in shape, but as long as he can draw a crowd, he will fight. Let's just hope that next time he doesn't blow his shot at a title by biting his opponent somewhere besides the thigh or ear.

Creamer 'awesome' on and off the court

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

Living in Morris County, N.J., I grew up not far from Molly Creamer, the women's basketball team's star point guard. When I first heard of her, I was in middle school. Because I was a high school basketball fanatic, I was at the center of high school basketball information. This section of the state was home to one of the best girls' teams in New Jersey and the one that Creamer was a part of, Mendham.

Mendham was a name that became synonymous with the word "awesome." Creamer also became a player and a name that I associated with this "awesome" Mendham team.

When I was accepted to Bucknell, I had an aspiration of one day running into Creamer and telling her what an amazing basketball player I think she is.

I figured it would never happen, but in my first semester I was in one of her classes. To my surprise, she approached me because I was wearing an old high school sweatshirt. She was unbelievably friendly, which made my day because to me, it felt as if I were meeting a celebrity. Even more amazing to me, when I pass her on campus, she acknowledges me with a friendly greeting.

It wasn't until Nov. 28 that I saw my first women's basketball game and watched Creamer play. She was not on her usual "awesome" Mendham team, yet that was still the word I chose to describe the way she played.

I have been to every single women's home game since (I am now what my friends call a Bucknell basketball fanatic) because something remarkable happens every time Creamer steps onto the court. When you look up Creamer in years to come, you will probably find her name on a dozen different lists. I wouldn't be surprised if hers is the first we see, but what these lists will never tell you, is what a true fan sees when they watch Creamer play.

Creamer is simply an unselfish player, always looking to teammates for support, rather than monopolizing the ball.

Angie Casey—The Bucknellian

Molly Creamer '03 is the women b-ball team's leading scorer.

Wednesday, Jan. 30, at half time of the men's basketball game, Creamer exhibited her reluctance towards being put in the spotlight. She was presented an award for her extraordinary accomplishments, and accepted it with unselfish pride.

I now realize that I no longer need Mendham to associate the word "awesome" with Creamer, because she alone is the definition.

Brian Falciglia '02

Brian Falciglia '02, our athlete of the week, demonstrates not only skill at his sport, but the ability to lead by example. Falciglia, a wrestler for the Bison, finished this past week with two hard fought victories and a great deal of respect from his fellow wrestlers.

Against Maryland, Falciglia was the University's lone winner in the 197-pound match. Initially, he surged to a 5-0 lead and held strong for a 7-3 win.

Following his outstanding performance vs. Maryland, Falciglia used his confidence and won his next match against Buffalo. There, Falciglia improved to 7-1 in dual matches with an exciting 3-1 win over Buffalo's Kyle Cerminara. The bout's only takedown was all Falciglia needed to produce the Bison's first victory after Buffalo had raced to a 22-0 lead.

During his solid season Falciglia has amassed a few memorable moments.

"I have two pretty memorable moments thus far—the home match versus Shippensburg when the stands were packed; largest crowd I've ever seen at a home match," said Falciglia. "The other time for me was when I beat Chris Jones of Drexel. He was ranked 16th in the nation at the time; that really boosted my confidence and made me believe more in myself."

Wrestling is not a typical team sport, as most people are accustomed to, but after speaking to Falciglia, it was easy to understand how each wrestler feeds off each other's energy. Falciglia realizes that he can't be in every match physically, but the encouragement and determination he shows for his teammates is contagious.

"This season is really tough to deal with on a team standpoint. I think we need to look at individual successes more so than team successes," said Falciglia. "Though we are a team, and we do support each other greatly, I think we concentrate more on our individual accomplishments and make sure we are the best individual wrestlers we can be."

Even though the Bison as a team have only managed a 1-7 record thus far, Falciglia has set lofty goals for himself and his teammates.

"Personally, I would like to see myself be nationally ranked before the conference tournament. Then, I would like to qualify for nationals. As a team, we want to see every person in the line-up do the best they can," Falciglia said.

Outside of his athletics, Falciglia concentrates on his double major in management and economics. He also is a member of Phi Gamma Delta.

Me like sports

By Aaron DeRosa

Analysts, Patriots and Madden, Oh my!

I'm not going to gloat or anything, so don't worry. I may have predicted the Patriots to win with emphatic "sink-or-swim" rhetoric, but apparently us Pats-backers were more numerous than Chris Farley's belly rolls.

Deciphering who amongst the country's sports analysts actually gave the Pats a fighting chance, as opposed to the well-wishers and those who yearn to be "that genius" who picked the victorious underdogs, is more prickly than a liberal feminist porcupine at a pro-life banquet hosted by spiky-haired hipster Sid Vicious circa 1978.

I think a fairly good rule of thumb for judging who was on which side would be the seven player litmus test. If you can name six starters on the team outside of Tom Brady and Ty Law, then you're probably a fan ... or more likely a well-informed geek who foregoes care of his personal hygiene in order to sit up late at night reading stat sheets and press releases to use in an article that no one will ever read on the inside pages of some student run newspaper for a small Pennsylvanian liberal arts college.

Anyway, after Adam Vinatieri, a man who splits more posts than national lumberjack phenom Penny Halverson, knocked in the game winning field goal, the Patriots and their stupefied supporters swarmed the field with the frenetic diligence of an insect colony servicing its queen. Such elation hasn't been felt in the New England football community since ... ever.

The Patriots, like their Boston brethren Bosox, are kings of futility, although Patriots promoters can always claim that it only took 40 years for their ring, whereas the Red Sox are at 83 and counting.

Bill Belichek is a defensive genius. He has no personality and is more in the way of an Arnold Schwarzenegger-Terminator type of coach than a Bill Parcells screaming-heart-attack kind of guy. His defensive schemes are so meticulously detailed and unpredictable that it's hard to imagine the intensity of study and preparation that went into a game like last Sunday's being stretched across a 17 week season.

Deciphering who amongst the country's sports analysts actually gave the Pats a fighting chance ... is more prickly than a liberal feminist porcupine at a pro-life banquet hosted by spiky-haired hipster Sid Vicious circa 1978.

The refreshing Mentadent Patriots are at the top of the pile now and we'll see next season if they can hold it. Their success is based on one philosophy and it's a successful one when executed properly–team dynamics. Throughout the season, the Pats defied individualization. They refused to be introduced onto the field separately, opting to take the field together as one.

Of all the major network sports–baseball, basketball, hockey, football–football is the most team oriented. Every player counts. There are 22 players out on the field at any given point and each one is vital to the success of the team. You don't need a high-stepping, self-righteous, endzone ballet artist like Terrell Owens to win a game. Those players can be singled out and disabled.

Those players are waiting for the snap on the line of scrimmage thinking "when I get the ball and score a touchdown, should I do the chicken dance or should I spin the ball and make it look like I'm warming my hands from it? Maybe I should just jump into the crowd and accept their praise. Decisions, decisions."

Then you have players like David Patten who scored the Patriots' only offensive touchdown who, a few years ago, was a tackle dummy on the New York Giants where he took more hits than Kurt Cobain. Yet there he was in the Super Bowl, playing like he was born to be there at that moment.

Will he be remembered? Probably not. Will Law's interception and touchdown return be replayed over and over again on ESPN Classic like some infernal Phillip Glass album? I wouldn't imagine so. I was there and I still had to look it up.

In all honesty, the person who will probably be remembered the most is John Madden. Now, last year I complained about Phil Simms' and Greg Gumbel's in-game analysis, but these guys were the Sonny to Madden's Cher.

John Madden is the most overrated football personality since John Madden. His inane drivel kept me up at night and I sweated more than he does walking from the fridge to the TV.

It's no wonder Pat Summerall retired this year. This is the eighth Super Bowl and 21st year that the duo had worked together. ESPN.com called Pat Summerall's commentary as "providing the short, steady stream to Madden's babbling brook." Babbling brook my hairy white buttocks. Listening to Madden is like going over a Niagara of stupidity in a barrel full of holes. This man makes the Congo River a la Joseph Conrad's Heart of Darkness look like Disneyland's "Tunnel of Love."

I'll make mention that Summerall is open to the idea of co-hosting with another partner or on another station. My one wish in life is that next year's Super Bowl has Madden announcing with Dennis Miller. I can just hear the conversation now:

Madden: "You see, he leapt up and caught that pass in mid air."

Miller: "Well of course he caught it in mid air. If he got the ball off the ground he wouldn't have caught anything, he'd just be picking up a ball."

Madden: "Don't talk back to me Dennis or I'll be on you like me on a cheeseburger."

An abroad perspective: a semester in London

By Michael Harakal
Contributing Writer

"I love your accent," the bartender at the club said. "What accent?" I thought. This was when it hit me: I am not in the United States anymore. It's an unsettling thought, especially in the first several days upon arriving in your new home. I had been in London once before for two days, but had only seen it by bus, on one of those cheesy group tours where it's primarily senior citizens—so much for adventure.

This time, however, was different. I was living in a two bedroom flat (apartment) with four other people—one Bucknellian, two Penn State students and my roommate, from the University of Indiana. The living situation was excellent and the centralized location was helpful for getting to and from many of the shopping, entertainment and historical areas. The simplicity of the city's public transit systems made exploring extremely easy and the 24-hour bus routes were a necessity for those late nights out on the town. My favorite social activities included attending the theatres of the west end, wandering through Camden Market on Saturday afternoons and examining priceless pieces of art and history in many of the city's museums, all of which were free.

The most culturally awakening experience was our trip to visit the family of one of my travel partners. Upon arrival in their tiny rural town outside Rome, we were graciously welcomed at the train station and quickly ushered to their home with our cumbersome backpacks. When we arrived at their home, we were cheerfully greeted by a crowd of extended family and friends and given a small tour of the property, which included an orange and kiwi orchard.

While the history of the city can be seen in its architecture, theatre and cultural traditions, London is also a very modern city. In the United States, the notion of "old" dates back to the 1700s. Abroad, however, "old" can date back multiple centuries. I remember having a pint one evening and seeing a plaque that described the establishment of the pub I was in—over 200 years before our country was founded. New additions to the city include the London Eye, the Millennium Dome and the Millennium Bridge; but the city manages to blend the old and new quite seamlessly.

One of the greatest benefits to living in London is the accessibility it has to the rest of Western Europe. Heathrow Airport, one of the world's busiest, is only 15 minutes by train from the center of the city and Gatwick Airport is about 25 minutes from the center. Because of the size and proximity of these airports, flights are surprisingly cheap and easy. Over the course of my time abroad I was able to visit 12 different countries.

During his semester in London, Michael Harakal visited numerous parts of the city, including Camden Market. Big Ben (above) is one of the most popular tourist attractions in the world.

For spring break I traveled by air and rail with three other University students through Greece, Italy, Switzerland, Germany, Austria and the Czech Republic, meeting both friends and family members of my travel partners on the way.

The most culturally awakening experience was our trip to visit the family of one of my travel partners. Upon arrival in their tiny rural town outside Rome, we were graciously welcomed at the train station and quickly ushered to their home with our cumbersome backpacks. When we arrived at their home, we were cheerfully greeted by a crowd of extended family and friends and given a small tour of the property, which included an orange and kiwi orchard. Nobody in the host family spoke a word of English, and none of us spoke any Italian. Even with the language barrier we were still able to communicate effectively and were treated to a first class Italian meal—atypical of what one would expect as "Italian" food (roast chicken, potatoes, mushrooms, olives and of course kiwis and oranges). After taking numerous photos and hearing stories about their lives, we trekked on to Rome, never forgetting the hospitality and vitality we experienced that evening.

As I neared the end of my four months in London, I started to reflect on the things I had done and seen, and what I had gained from the experience. More accurately, I think, I attempted to analyze the mistakes I made while traveling and exploring the city, which proved to be many of the most meaningful things I learned. It's a period of maturation and independence, and was the most memorable time in my life. Currently, I am looking for international business opportunities so that I can travel to Europe once again and I enthusiastically encourage anyone who is able to go abroad to do so.

The 'shock' of overcoming mental illness

An honest first-hand account of a student's battle to fulfill an education with the help of therapy and University staff

By Ed Reilly
Contributing Writer

I would like to begin by adapting a quote from Clifford Beers, the famous mental health activist of the early 20th century. In "A Mind That Found Itself," Clifford Beers said, "I am not telling the story of my life just to write (an article). I tell it because it seems my plain duty to do so. A narrow escape from death and a seemingly miraculous return to health after an apparently fatal illness are enough to make a man ask himself: For what purpose was my life spared?"

I never really felt sorry for myself. Often, I was scared and often overwhelmed, but I don't see these experiences as my darkest hour. I have a new appreciation for life and things many take for granted.

Soon after beginning my sophomore year at the University, I had to take a health withdraw, later attempted suicide, spent 52 in a mental hospital and ultimately, received Electric Shock Therapy, 'ECTs,' which saved my life.

I make it a point to share about the struggles I've had with as many people as I can. I feel there are still too many stigmas about mental illness in our society today, especially in my age group. As Clifford Beers said, "My decision to stand on my past and look the future in the face, has, I believe, contributed much to my own happiness, and, more than anything else, enabled my friends to view my past as I myself do." On numerous occasions, I have shared about my illness and been surprised to learn someone I had known for awhile also struggled from their own mental illness. There is great relief knowing someone else understands, but without me first sharing, I would have never known. I do not believe those suffering from mental illness are in any way weak. I believe true strength is facing your illness and seeking help.

In a matter of days after returning from my summer break in the beginning of my sophomore year, I began having trouble eating, sleeping and even forming the words for a sentence. The best thing I did at that point was going Psychological Services. I had contact with someone in the office on at least a daily basis. I took full advantage of the phone number they have for emergencies. I didn't quite categorize my situation as an "emergency," but it was clear to everyone, I needed help quickly. I soon began to have suicidal flashes, which were disturbing to me to say the least. I became paranoid and believed everyone on my hall knew the struggles I was having. I also signed a release to allow Psychological Services the right to speak to my parents and express the seriousness of the situation to them. As much as I fought to remain at the University, I finally saw the wisdom of coming home on a health withdraw.

I don't know if many students are aware of it, but the University has some very thoughtful policies in regard to students who cannot continue their studies for physical or mental illnesses. Those policies gave me the opportunity to receive the help I needed while also giving me the hope of a return to the University one day. A week after I returned home, I had my first of three hospitalizations. I was not responding to any medications and my condition was worsening as at times I was having moments of paralysis, which were very scary to me. After my second hospitalization and an attempt to hang myself, I was hospitalized a third and final time. Because I had not responded to any medications and because of the gravity of the situation, it was recommended to me that I have Electric Shock Therapy (ECTs).

A common side effect of ECT is short-term memory loss. Knowing this, I was told to make a list of things I wanted to remember before my first treatment and left it on my pillow. The list read: "My name is Ed Reilly. Your parents love you. God loves you." I attribute my being here today based on the ECT treatments I had and a lot of patience and love from my parents. I often spoke to my dad when my thoughts were too cluttered to make sense of alone. It was good to have someone to listen to me at all hours of the night and tell me things were really going to be ok. I remember my dad always saying, "We're going to get through this no matter what it takes."

A common side effect of Electric Shock Therapy is short-term memory loss. Knowing this, I was told to make a list of things I wanted to remember before my first treatment and left it on my pillow. The list read: 'My name is Ed Reilly. Your parents love you. God loves you.'

After my return to the University having been away for two years, I found the support I received commendable. Professors were incredibly understanding and most importantly, they were flexible. The deans also went out of their way to help me. My policy was to keep my professors and the deans informed, and this policy never hurt me.

Psychological Services also played a sounding board to my feelings both before and after my return. It is important to realize 40 percent of University students will at least once seek the help of Psychological Services. Hopefully, you'll never be as sick as I was, but I hope no one will hesitate to seek their help when they need it for whatever reason.

After sharing my difficulties, I often hear "Boy, that's just awful." I guess this is the understandable response, but this is not how I see it at all. I would like to say I responded like the bird did in D.H. Lawrence's poem "Self-Pity."

I never saw a wild thing
sorry for itself.
A small bird will drop frozen dead from a bough without ever having felt sorry for itself.

Now, I did not drop dead, but I got close. However, I never really felt sorry for myself. Often, I was scared and often overwhelmed, but I don't see these experiences as my darkest hour. I have a new appreciation for life and things many take for granted. My freshman year I had a 3.8 grade point average and felt pretty much unstoppable. Then I got knocked down by life, and I had to fight like hell to get back up. While I was in the hospital, my doctors were preparing my parents for the possibility that I might not survive. "Sometimes no matter what we do we lose them," my doctors told my parents. They also told my parents that people as sick as I was typically don't ever regain the functionality they once had. I am very thankful that I have.

Some ask me how I pulled through such difficulties. The question reminds me of an article I read in the Nov. 27 issue of the USA Today entitled "In recession, face brutal facts, thrive". Jim Collins, author of the recent book "Good to Great," wrote the article. The article describes the Stockdale Paradox, "a peculiar psychology show by those who emerge from tough times not just intact, but stronger." The paradox is named after Jim Stockdale, a POW in Vietnam.

When asked, "Who didn't make it out?" "Oh, that's easy," Stockdale said. "The optimists. Oh, they were the ones who said, 'We're going to be out by Christmas.' And Christmas would come, and Christmas would go. Then they'd say, 'We're going to be out by Easter.' And Easter would come, and Easter would go. And then Thanksgiving, and then it would be Christmas again. And they died of a broken heart." "This is a very important lesson. You must never confuse faith that you will prevail in the end-which you can never afford to lose-with the need for discipline to confront the most brutal facts of your current reality, whatever they might be."

I can really relate to what Stockdale says. During my illness, I had to face some very brutal facts about my reality, but I never lost hope of my goal to one day return to the University and finish my education. Whether I have emerged from tough times stronger than I was before is difficult to say, but the important point is that I did emerge and return to the University. It is my ultimate wish that my experiences will help someone who needs help seek it, or at least, help those that misunderstand mental illness consider another perspective.

Backpacking: exercise and exploration all in one

Washington is one of the numerous states across the country that has a wide variety of backpacking places.

By Nathan Ivanick
Staff Writer

Looking for a great way to get in shape, but hate the gym? So you don't like running either? Well, I have something better for you. It's called backpacking. Backpacking is a fantastic way to enjoy the outdoors and get fit. Better yet while, heading off the beaten path you can visit some of the most beautiful places in America, places without crowds and the pains of everyday life.

Picture this. You have been hiking since the morning. The noonday sun is beating down on you, and your backpack is getting heavier with every step. Just when you think you are going to drop from exhaustion, you round a corner, and stumble onto a beautiful aquamarine glacial lake with water as clear as a Caribbean beach. Better yet, you have it all to yourself. An icy dip in the lake is more refreshing than any swim in a pool.

After that, lunch is served on a warm rock with your toes dangling in the water. Lake trout dart about near your feet as they soak in the cold water. The best part is, you feel a tremendous feeling of accomplishment because you earned this experience! Does this sound too good to be true? Not at all, I did it just last summer.

That experience was in Washington State, but you can get fantastic hiking in just about every state in America. On the east coast alone you have the Appalachian, White, Catskill and Allegheny Mountains. In fact, there is terrific hiking within five hours of every major city on the east coast. Pennsylvania alone has a plethora of hiking trails. In the west, you have the Allegheny plateau with plenty of hiking. Only an hour away from University is the Pennsylvania Grand Canyon, which is some of the best hiking in the state.

If you are from out west, you have even more choices. The Rockies, Sierras and Olympic Range are but a few mountain ranges. Mount Rainier, in Washington State, gives you a chance to walk through meadows of wildflowers, herds of bighorn sheep and elk, and maybe even spot a cougar. The point is, wherever you are in America, there is somewhere where you can go explore and get a break from the ordinary.

Getting started is the hardest part of any hobby, but anything worth doing takes effort. First, make sure that hiking is something you enjoy. Take a hike at Ricketts Glen, and perhaps find a place to do an overnight somewhere. If it doesn't appeal to you, that's fine; backpacking is certainly not for everyone. You may find though that getting away from the crowds of people, getting some great views and seeing some wildlife is your thing.

The next thing to do is plan a short trip. I would recommend a short section of the Appalachian Trail. It offers some great views, while being well marked, and not too strenuous, except in New Hampshire and Maine.

Whatever trail you pick, make sure its well marked and at your level. You don't need expensive gear to have a good time either. An army backpack or a cheap camping backpack will hold all of what you need if you pack lightly. Don't worry about a stove either. If you are just going for an overnight, you can cook hotdogs over a campfire.

The Washington coastline is one of the many popular backpacking spots in the state.

As the duration of the trip you are planning increases however, more camping gear is necessary. When looking for tips on gear, or backpacking in general, pick up a copy of Backpacker Magazine. It is full of very helpful information for someone just getting started to someone planning on hiking the Appalachian Trail.

Love is in the air in Lewisburg

By Josie Cetta
Features Editor

Can you feel the love? Any Lewisburg resident surely can. Valentine's Day is known to bring out the love in all of us and the Lewisburg Business and Professional Association (LBPA) is no exception. For the entire month of February, the LBPA plans to pay for the tickets of individuals in violation with parking meter regulations.

The downtown promotion, called "Lewisburg Loves You," has been successful for two years now and plans to continue. Last year, LBPA paid for 37 parking tickets at an average cost of $50 each.

"Watching yourself get a parking ticket can be a very frustrating experience," said Grace Mahon, LBPA president. "This is something we can do to show appreciation for the people who come downtown."

Once the Lewisburg meter supervisor, whose last name ironically happens to be 'Valentine,' starts writing the ticket it must be issued without exception. However, because the LBPA has offered to pay for any violations instead of receiving a ticket, one will receive a card from Valentine saying that their ticket has been paid. That is, as long as Valentine is caught in the act of issuing the ticket by the owner of the vehicle. Valentine puts a sticker on the actual ticket and sends it to the LBPA.

The money being funded to pay for these tickets comes from the membership LBPA's of $150 per year for each business that joins. Other programs the LBPA has sponsored include the Victorian Christmas Parade, two free movies for children over the holidays, three annual sidewalk sales, an annual high school scholarship and other joint advertising promotions.

Overall, the "Lewisburg Loves You' program has generated much positive feedback, according to Linda Sterling, Director of the Downtown Partnership, who helped coordinate the program. Newspapers and TV stations as far away as Harrisburg have contributing in publicizing the program.

"We have gotten a lot of press coverage and the whole promotion makes people happier about being here. Ultimately, its all about making the atmosphere of downtown Lewisburg more welcoming," Sterling said.

The town of Lewisburg is doing their best to flip frowns upside down every time a Lewisburg resident receives a valentine instead of a ticket.

Ju Ju Chang inspires University students and faculty

By Rachel Gold
Staff Writer

Rushing out of her 2:30 meeting with Barbara Walters, Emmy Award winning ABC News journalist, Ju Ju Chang came to speak at the University. The lecture was held in the Langone Center forum from 7-9 p.m. on Thursday, the Jan. 31. Students may have recognized this New York based-correspondent from ABC's "20/20", "World News Tonight" with Peter Jennings and "Good Morning America."

Chang graduated with honors from Stanford University with a B.A. in political science and communications. At Stanford, she was awarded the Edwin Cotrell Political Science Prize.

Yu-Ling Huang—The Bucknellian

Ju Ju Chang talks with faculty and students after her speech. Chang spoke last Thursday about issues such as race.

Immediately entertaining the audience, Chang opened her discussion of the myth of Asian American's being considered "the Model Minority" by commenting on her "precious son." She began: "My son is a mix between a Korean and a Jew, so I haven't yet decided whether to refer to him as a Kuw or a Jewrian."

Chang explained that she has not given a speech since the Sept. 11 tragedy and went on to discuss the drastic change that has occurred in our lives as a result. From her New York apartment Chang watched the towers fall.

"I had been doing 'light' news before the tragedy and I wanted to do a story on the lives of the rescuers. After 9/11, America came together and showed a generosity of spirit which gave me hope in humanity," she said. "But there is a dark side, a lot of people got hurt in the aftermath. More people died from backlash violence than people died from anthrax. We in the media, and us as citizens in a multicultural world, need to bear in mind the suffering."

The audience listened intently as Chang spoke of the brave fire fighters and rescuers who lost their lives helping others. Chang continued the discussion by urging the audience to redefine their stereotypes.

"So, what about racial profiling? Is it OK to racial profile? Have you ever heard of driving while black? Well, after 9/11 it became flying while brown. Is this a problem?"
—Ju Ju Chang

"It's important that we don't look at Asians and make assumptions," Chang said. "We must stop ourselves from thinking there's an Asian, he must be good at math, or she's an Asian, I bet she plays the piano really well," Chang said.

"I'm Asian and I am terrible at math and science!" Chang explained that she grew up with a classic immigrant experience: "When you can speak English and your parents can't, you look at the world differently. Asian men are often immasculated, and I saw how the poor treatment impacted my father. He would talk to corporate business executives who wouldn't take him seriously because of his accent. The Asian spousal abuse rate is very high. But we're quiet about it; Asians don't like to discuss their dirty laundry," Chang explained. "There's a cloak of invisibility to Asian American History. I was always taught not to make a fuss."

Chang finished her discussion explaining urging us to redefine ourselves as Americans because the face of America is changing. "One out of every five Americans is an ethnic minority," Chang stated. "One out of every four Asian women marries a non-Asian."

Chang then opened up the forum for discussion and many responded to her questions. "So, what about racial profiling? Is it OK to racial profile? Have you ever heard of driving while black? Well, after 9/11 it became flying while brown. Is this a problem?" she asked.

One student from Bucknellian said, "I wrote an article for the Bucknellian about how I was racially profiled. The last time I flew I was stopped five times 'randomly' because of my appearance." Chung responded with sarcasm: "yeah, that's pretty random!"

Another student told a story about her personal experience with racial profiling. She explained: "I am an Asian American, but my features look more 'American' then 'Asian.' I distinctly remember Asians approaching my mother and asking her if she was my nanny. She would get offended and quickly respond, 'No! This is my daughter! I gave birth to her!"

Chang responded with sympathetic laughter: "Connie Chung told me almost that exact story the other day." Chang said, "Well Connie adopted a caucasian boy who is now three years old. She told me that when she took her son to Central Park people approached her and asked her if she was the nanny!" Chang explained that New York City is a whole other sociological landscape, but the racial profiling definitely persists.

An audience member questioned Chang about how she confronts issues of the media and the impact that "mainstream" media has on what is covered. Chang said, "It is a constant battle. I have to pick my battles though, I mean how many times can I quit my job?" She paused for a few seconds, laughed and said, "I can't say I haven't thought about it."

Issues, such as racism, class structure, and assimilation were also discussed. One man said, "The United Sates has a history of racial profiling. White men have the power." In response Chang shared another anecdote that disturbed the crowd.

She said, "When I was covering a story in California a truck driver, drove by me and yelled out his window 'go to hell!' I was angered and responded 'excuse me?'. He answered 'you people are taking all our jobs!' My camera man had to hold me back, I was like 'let me at him, let me at him.' The backlash is inevitable, if the power goes too far in one direction then people become enraged."

Chang finished the discussion by contending that the power structures in the United States are more egalitarian then anywhere else.

In response Chang explained, "I feel very safe in America ... except in airports!"

Over time, we can hope that the image of "the model minority" will melt away. It is difficult to always try to live up to the expectations and pressures of our parents.

Audience members commented on personal experiences of dealing with their Asian-American parents and some of the various stereotypes they have encountered. At around 9 p.m. Chang had to return to New York, but she left the audience in high spirits. "I hope our lives are filled with peace and happiness this year," Chang concluded.

Orchestre de Bretagne praises BU

Frederic Chiu leads renowned French orchestra as part of nationwide tour

By Nicolas Willett
Staff Writer

This past Friday, even from the balconies one could easily see how the first appearance of Frederic Chiu sent jolts through the backs of the members of the Orchestre de Bretagne and how the public woke from the twirling of Debussy's Petite Suite. Backs straightened, heads rose and eyes followed the relaxed Asian features of the man walking onto the stage of the Weis Center.

After saluting the audience, the man sat down at the piano and, seconds later, the air was filled with Saint-Saens's Piano Concerto No. 2 in G minor, Opus 22. As the man progressed through the three movements of the piece and the intensity of the rhythm increased, the talent of the piano virtuoso was revealed in all its beauty. Amidst the clapping of hands and the waving of bows that followed the end of the concerto, the man smiled calmly, shook the hand of conductor Stefan Sanderling and walked off stage.

Chiu, 36, has acquired a worldwide reputation in the sphere of music. Born and raised in Ithaca, N.Y., Chiu's family is originally from Beijing, China. In his mid-twenties, Chiu moved to Paris, France, where he began his career as a pianist. He spent the next twelve years in Paris, touring Europe and the rest of the world. Recently, he has come back to the United States for personal reasons.

When asked what he appreciated most about each of the countries he's toured, he answered that the United States was full of enthusiasm, while Europe was marked by elegance.

The time period of most of his performance pieces spreads over the late 19th century and the beginning years of the 20th, with a special taste for French and Russian pieces. Chiu is currently working on the fifth symphony of Prokofiev, a composer he greatly admires. He will be ready to perform it by 2003, just in time for the 50th anniversary of Prokofiev's death. Chiu is hoping that he will contribute to the popularization of his favorite composer.

Friday's performance was the eighth of 12 that Chiu and the Orchestre de Bretagne will be carrying out in the United States. The orchestra is in the midst of a road trip, starting in New York, and finishing its tour in a few days in Worcester, Mass.

This is the French orchestra's first time in the United States and its first visit to an American university. Its members were most impressed by the size and the quality of the concert hall, especially when told that the Weis Center belonged to a university of 3,000 students. They made many positive comments about the United States, especially the manner in which each of the presentations had been received.

"Markproject" presents modern take on gospel

Gospel show captivates audience with life-like, modern characters

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

Intervarsity Christian Fellowship (ICF) sponsored a theatrical showing of "Markproject" last Thursday evening in Vaughn Literature Auditorium. The two-man show sought to bring the gospel of Mark to life through fascinating monologues and clever verbal exchanges.

Working hard to captivate the audience, actors Daniel Jones and Alison Siewert presented an honest look into the lives of the characters involved in telling the gospel story.

Jones is a staff member of ICF at Franklin & Marshall College. He trained at the American Conservatory Theater in San Francisco, Calif. and has been a professional actor for several years.

Siewert is also on staff with ICF for the midatlantic region. She trains new staff members and is in the process of writing her second book.

"Markproject" is Siewert's brainchild. After teaching the book of Mark in a Bible study format for more than 15 years, Siewert wrote a few monologues for different characters portrayed in the gospel. She explained that Mark gave such a vivid and fun picture of Jesus that it sparked her creativity and led to the development of "Markproject."

"The best thing about being in the show is experiencing the characters as they come to life," Siewert said. "'Markproject' is more of Jesus than just flannel graphs that people see in Sunday school."

According to the program from the performance, "The gospels are old stories, and they're good stories. But often it seems like they're told from a distance, from gilt-edged Bibles by guys in robes with fancy voices. What would it be like to hear the people who were around Jesus, right there, face-to-face? What would it be like to hear them talk right to us? We can't get all the way there, but Mark, a first-century writer, worked really hard to help people get a clear picture of what was going on in and around Jesus and his crowd, and what it all meant. And it wasn't boring."

Jones and Siewert interacted with the audience by talking to them and relating the stories in modern vernacular. The stories represent the basics of life and aren't sugar coated to appease everyone.

Making the events personal, they added accents and movements reminiscent of characters that the audience already knew. Classic New York mafia and California hippy accents (among others) reached the audience and made them laugh. Laughter was inevitable as Siewert and Jones referred to the disciples when they fed 5,000 people as lunch ladies, or when Jones, playing Jesus, commanded the wind and waves to die down by saying, "Bad wind! Bad, bad wind! Simmer down now!"

In addition to laughter, they were also able to draw feelings of sympathy for the characters as they told the stories of Jesus healing them, raising their loved ones from the dead and taking little children onto His lap. A certain air of sadness enveloped the room when Jesus was ridiculed and then crucified. A chill passed through the room when Jones yelled the familiar, "Eloi, Eloi, lama sabachthani?" (My God, my God why have you forsaken me?).

"I haven't seen such a moving drama in a long time," said Charissa Reimer '05. "I thought that 'Markproject' was an incredibly well-done interpretation that brought out many of the key themes in Mark's gospel."

One beautiful element of the show was the presentation of the different ways that characters related personally to Jesus.

"It is wonderful, always, to view something that awakens your senses," said Eric Bundy '05. "The unique view of this wonderful presentation was enlightening. I learned so much."

Harry Potter is a magical experience

Daniel Radcliffe stars in the movie adaptation of the Harry Potter phenomenon.

When the Harry Potter craze began a couple of years ago, I didn't buy into it. The critics were "raving" and kids were "actually reading for fun" — it sounded a little too easy to me. I felt the books would only be a disappointment. I have to admit, I was wrong.

Now an obsessed fan, I find myself drawn to anything and everything related to Harry Potter—school folders, valentines, calendars and even action figures. It's a sickness—an addiction for which there is no antidote or patch. Author J. K. Rowling has created what is one of the best series of books I have ever read.

Still, not everyone has come to my realization. I hear murmurs of "it's a stupid fad" or "it will promote witchcraft in schools: our children will start worshipping Satan!" Unless their kids are out back with a cauldron and some eye of newt, I don't think people have to worry about it. If they want to monitor what their kids read, good for them. However, I think they're making a big mistake if they exclude the Harry Potter series from the realm of "appropriate" books. But why is Harry Potter so special?

Let's look at the main character of the book: an 11-year-old orphan forced to live with his abusive aunt and uncle and his brainless bully cousin. After finding out who he really is, Harry gets the chance to live a life completely different from that which he has known—as a wizard. He is catapulted from a world of living with horrible "Muggles" (non-magic humans) to a world of adventure and excitement. When he goes to Hogwarts Academy for Wizards, he gets his chance to make real friends and become a hero. Not too shabby. Oh, but there's more.

For instance, you have the game of Quidditch: an ingenious blend of many different sports played while flying high above the field on broomsticks. The author lures her readers into the scenes, taking the time to teach them the rules until they can see every move each player is making on the field. Once, I actually cheered out loud when I was reading a Quidditch scene (that was a little embarrassing).

A&E Commentary

Harry's friends, Hermione (pronounced "Her-MY-oh-knee") and Ron, add to the irresistible charm of the books. These characters make a perfect trio with Ron's constant wisecracks and clowning and Hermione's obsessive studying and "goody-two shoes" attitude. But don't be fooled; these characters are by no means one-dimensional. Harry is often caught in the middle of their squabbles, but when it comes down to it, his friends are as loyal as they come.

Other wonderfully-created characters include Hagrid, a huge but lovable pal and protector; Draco Malfoy, a classmate whose jealousy causes him to openly hate Harry and his friends; Dumbledore, the powerful head of Hogwarts and a much-appreciated ally; and Snape, a sour professor who holds a grudge against Harry.

Another reason to read Harry Potter is that Rowling is simply a superb writer. She provides twists and turns around every bend while describing a fantasy world that both baffles and dazzles the mind. Rowling creates a place where kids can go when they want to escape; where they can meet an ordinary kid who manages to accomplish extraordinary things. These books will make you laugh out loud and wish you were a wizard.

The movie "Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone" was well done and perfectly cast, but I recommend reading the book first. Although the adaptation is as close to perfect as anyone has a right to expect, the books are more satisfying.

Michael Dirda from The Washington Post Book World wrote, "Obviously, Harry Potter and the Sorcerer's Stone should make any modern 11-year-old a very happy reader." Let's be honest: these books would make any modern 40-year-old a very happy reader. But I warn you to read it at your own risk: once you pick it up, you won't be able to put it back down. You think I'm kidding? The book will be glued to your hands. I've seen it happen.

Super Bowl commercials lack character

By Kristi Johnston
Arts & Entertainment Editor

If you're like me, you don't just watch the Super Bowl for the football—the annual event is also famous for its elaborately expensive, yet often hilarious advertisements. This year, however, the game far exceeded the commercials in terms of excitement and star power.

The commercials for this year's Super Bowl were marked by contrast. From several funny Anheuser-Busch ads to the eloquent and moving tributes to the victims of Sept. 11, there was no distinguishable characteristic that all the commercials shared. This is a good thing, but there was also no one commercial that clearly stood out. What was most striking was the normalcy of the night's ads. Judging from the commercials, I never would have guessed that I was watching the Super Bowl.

Britney Spears' Pepsi Superbowl commercials were among the least popular in polls.

The much-anticipated Pepsi ads featuring Britney Spears were received in a slightly less enthusiastic manner. The commercials, in which Spears sang a selection of old Pepsi themes, were among the lowest-rated ads of the night, according to Yahoo.com.

Of course, there were a few amusing ads, even a few that could be called good. Anheuser-Busch's newest addition to the "How You Doin'?" bar scene was definitely a highlight. In it, an obvious newcomer to the bar was asked the usual greeting and responded with a drawn-out account of his travels thus far, complete with southern drawl and cowboy hat.

A&E Commentary

According to Yahoo, USA Today's annual post-Super Bowl commercial poll marked Anheuser-Busch as the winner. The top ad "featured a Bud Light-loving guy whose wife lures him with a bottle but quickly loses him to some slick satin sheets that send him flying out the bedroom window." In fact, four of the five most well received commercials were for Anheuser-Busch products.

While many reviewers have applauded this year's commercials for their humor and grace, I have to disagree. The Super Bowl is known to have hosted some of the best commercials ever broadcast, but this year was disappointing compared to years past. While comedy reigned and tributes were tastefully presented, the night as a whole was devoid of the standout entertainment we've come to expect from the Super Bbowl. Luckily, the drama that unfolded on the field was a welcome distraction from the monotony off the field.

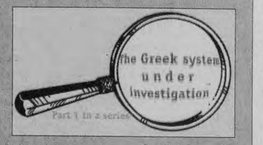
Three University fraternities approach critical juncture

Rush requirements may change to promote equality between houses

By Carmen Mauriello
Senior Writer

Three University fraternities, Sigma Alpha Mu, Kappa Sigma and Chi Phi, are intensely recruiting new members this spring in order to fill their houses for the 2002-2003 academic year. Their troubles stem from low participation in rush events they sponsored last fall, a problem Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker hopes to alleviate with his plan to reform the rush process.

Sigma Alpha Mu and Kappa Sigma are under the greatest strain in this housing crunch. Since they live in University-owned houses, they each are required to fill 80 percent of the house with members of their fraternity. If they fail to meet this requirement by March 1, the fraternity loses exclusive rights to the house, meaning the remaining rooms will be made available to the entire campus during room selection.



Both fraternities currently have fewer returning members than what would be needed to meet the 80 percent requirement. Sigma Alpha Mu currently has 12 returning members but needs to fill 18 beds and Kappa Sigma currently has 24 returning members, but needs to fill 29 beds.

But both fraternities' presidents are optimistic that they can recruit the necessary members. Sigma Alpha Mu President Tim Henry '03 said his fraternity is mainly recruiting friends of its fall pledge class members. Henry indicated the fraternity is talking with 10 to 15 potential candidates, from which he hopes to secure the six pledges needs to meet the requirement.

"It's going to be tight, but we've got a good group of brothers working on it and a good group of guys interested," Henry said. "I think we'll get the dominos to fall."

If the fraternity were to lose exclusive rights to the house, Henry said its recruiting power would be severely damaged—specifically since a residence assistant (RA) would likely be placed in the house and the fraternity may be denied from hosting social events in the house.

"It would put a big damper on the social aspects, which would hamper any further recruitment by the fraternity," Henry said.

Kappa Sigma President Dan Muchler '03 said his fraternity has also targeted friends of fall pledges. The candidates have been invited to the house for dinner and some will be joining the members on a paintball trip. From the seven to 10 candidates, he is "extreme-

Forum addresses race issues

Four-hour discussion sparked by Halloween party incident helps break barriers

By Andrew Burr
News Editor

Great steps were taken towards racial awareness and acceptance at a forum that convened Tuesday evening to address concerns of racial prejudice stemming from a recent incident. Although a large portion of the night was characterized by tension between African-American and Caucasian participants, the discussion ended on a much more reconciliatory note.

The forum, mediated by Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker and Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, assembled in response to a Halloween party last semester at which two Delta Upsilon (DU) fraternity members dressed as African-American tennis players Venus and Serena Williams. As part of their outfits, which included tennis skirts and nametags, the students used black paint to darken their faces, despite advice from the DU peer advisor recommending against the costumes.

Last December a photograph of the two students, taken the night of the Halloween party, was given to the dean's office by a student who took offense to the black face paint worn by the two students. After questioning several members of DU, Baker and Ferraro ascertained the source and date of the incident by identifying wristbands worn by the two individuals in the photograph. The individuals were notified of the situation and sent apology letters to the offended parties. The president of DU also wrote an apology letter on behalf of the entire fraternity.

Ultimately, I believe the process worked and I was remarkably pleased with the effort tonight. Everyone acted with honesty and charity.
—Richard Ferraro, dean of students

But in a petition submitted to Baker, Ferraro, Vice-President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock and members of DU, the apology letters were branded as "insufficient," and the University's response to the incident called "too lackadaisical." Additionally, the petition called for the individuals involved to "attend and present a written report of the Black History Alive event sponsored by the African-American Studies house," as well as for the DU fraternity to attend the Black History Alive and an educational workshop on 'black face.'

The term 'black face' originated around 1830, when white performers began dressing in stereotypical slave attire and painting their faces black to imitate African-Americans. The performers would entertain white audiences by exaggerating the features of African-Americans in song-and-dance routines. One of the first exclusively American forms of entertainment, the shows were popular for much of the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Today, 'black face' is symbolic of the racially insensitive characterizations of African-Americans.

Response to the Incident

Many participants at Tuesday's forum, which included numerous concerned African-Americans, the DU brotherhood and a number of other students and faculty members, echoed the sentiments of the petition by calling for stiffer sanctions against the two University alum connected to $750 million loss at Allfirst Financial, Inc.

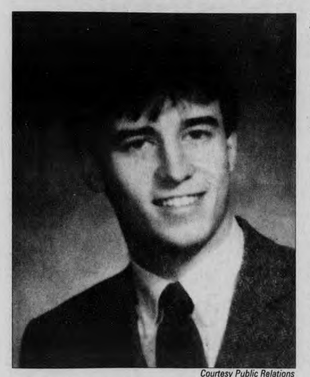
Bank says John Rusnak '86 began series of bad trades after Sept. 11 recession



Courtesy Public Relations

John Rusnak '86, shown here in a University yearbook photograph, is blamed for a $750 million loss resulting from fraudulent trades. Rusnak made the Dean's List twice at the University.

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

John Rusnak '86, a trader at Baltimore's Allfirst Financial Inc., allegedly lost $750 million during a series of fraudulent trades, according to The Baltimore Sun.

Allfirst officials told The Sun that Rusnak made bets that the Japanese yen would rise in value. However, according to the bank, when the value fell, Rusnak attempted to hide his trading losses.

Currently, Allied Irish Bank, the Dublin, Ireland-based parent company, is taking control of Allfirst. Eugene A. Ludwig, a former top U.S. banking regulator, took over the internal investigation.

Rusnak, who resides in a Baltimore suburb, majored in economics at the University and made the Dean's List twice. After graduating from the University, Rusnak began working at First Fidelity Bank in Philadelphia and in 1989 he worked for the foreign exchange division at Chemical Bank in New York. In 1993, Rusnak became a currency trader at the First National Bank, now known as Allfirst.

Professor of International Relations Stephen Stamos does not recall having Rusnak as a student, but he speculated about Rusnak's mistake.

"It appears that he made a mistake, got in way over his head, tried to get out, and things became worse and worse; he obviously knew what he was doing was wrong, but must have felt that he could get away with it and 'win' back the money he lost for the firm," Stamos said.

Brian Burr '75, a banker for 23 years and former senior vice-president at NationsBank, believes that better management at Allfirst might have helped avoid this situation.

"While the investigation is ongoing, it appears that there was a tremendous lack of internal control and oversight at Allfirst that could allow a loss of this magnitude to occur," Burr said.

Rusnak's recent actions also bring up the question of the teaching of ethics at the University.

"As for Bucknell, there is no real damage for us, but only opportunity, that is to remind ourselves how important it is that we make 'ethical' issues the centerpiece of our educational mission. For this we have [Rusnak] to thank. It is also a scary reminder that in this pressure packed world, all of us are only one bad decision away from a nightmare," Sta-

LGBT survey yields disappointing results

Campus deemed 'not supportive or welcoming' towards LGBT individuals

By Kristen Jancuk
Senior Writer

In conjunction with last spring's campus climate survey, a separate survey was conducted focusing on the campus climate for the Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender community (LGBT). Last week the results of this survey were summarized and are now available to the University on e-reserve.

"Despite efforts ... to create a more welcoming and accepting climate on campus for LGBT individuals, perceived attitudes toward LGBT individuals on campus remain discriminatory and prejudicial.
—LGBT Report

The University had some difficulty conducting the survey, since some members of the LGBT community are not "out" or prefer not to have their sexuality disclosed. Through the LGBT listserv and the Office of LGBT Awareness, approximately 150 individuals were contacted, 54 of which responded, including nine undergraduates, eight graduate students, eight faculty members, 13 staff members and 16 unidentified individuals. Males accounted for 56 percent of respondents and fe-

University students participate in 96-hour math problem

By Alyson Walker
Staff Writer

Last weekend nine University students were given 96 hours to solve a "real world problem" in the annual International Mathematics Contest in Modeling, sponsored by The Consortium for Mathematics and its Applications and the National Security Agency.

The participants were divided into three teams, each of which chose a problem they wished to tackle. The problems were assigned at 8 p.m. on Thursday, Feb. 9, and were due to be completed by Monday, Feb. 11 at 8 p.m.

Two of the three teams chose to tackle a problem involving wind and waterspray. The problem reads: "Your task is to devise an algorithm which uses data provided by the anemometer to adjust the waterflow from the fountain as the wind conditions change."

The team of Brian Weiss '02, Stephen Graham '02 and Stephen Gutierrez '03 approached it using concepts such as physics of flight, Euler's method of numerical iteration and other equations. Combining this and other research on the physical effects of wind on water, they used C++ programming to create a model.

After changing, editing and building upon different models, they established a relationship between the water and wind speed. They completed the project, as all teams must, by writing a paper that explains their results and conclusions.

"The contest was a good experience for me. Learning new things is good, as is bettering problem solving skills," Weiss said.

Gutierrez, who is pursuing a B.S. in both computer science and physics, has had experience with computer simulation in the past and considers it as a possible career.

"It's a lot of fun. I enjoy doing it," Gutierrez said.

The other team that worked on the wind and waterspray problem consisted of Tom Goodman '05, Alex Perkins '05 and Tabitha Peck '05. Both of these teams were sponsored by the physics department.

The mathematics department sponsored Rob Rhoades '05, Eric Bundy '05 and Craig Beal '05. They selected the other problem, which dealt with airline overbooking. They brainstormed, set up models, evaluated the models until they devised one which worked when tested by several different methods.

Rhoades was interested in the competition to get more mathematical experience, and asked Bundy and Beal to join him in this effort.

"People don't hear about these contests much. I wanted to spread the word and start more interest," Rhoades said.

Bundy and Rhoades described the weekend as intense, hard work, but worthwhile. They approximate that each individual in their group did 15-20 hours of work to complete the problem.

"It's different than a classroom. It's almost like a mental break from typical school work," Bundy said.

The team has high hopes to place well in the contest. Sixty percent of the groups will receive the successful participation award, the lowest of four levels. On average only ten to twelve teams will reach the highest level. The team feels that they stand a chance to receive an honorable mention, the award above successful participation.

"I hope we do well. There was a lot to get accomplished, and we did it—we worked well as a group. We'll probably do this next year as well and strive to place better than we do this year," Rhoades said.

Students may lose off-campus living option in future due to Vision 2010 and Borough rezoning efforts

Elimination of downtown student living in near future among University's goals

By Brad Clemens
Staff Writer

With University President Steffen Rogers' Vision 2010 initiative just beginning to take flight, details about the many revolutionary changes the plan is proposing are beginning to become public. Because the plan does not make any extreme changes to campus in the very near future, few, if any, students are considering the effects of the plan on them. What does need to be considered, though, are the changes that Vision 2010 will ultimately bring to the culture of campus.

While the primary focus of Vision 2010 is to provide for students what Rogers calls "the best undergraduate experience in the country," what many students do not realize is that part of achieving this plan requires moving all students onto campus by 2010.

"By 2010 or sooner, we will be asking all new students to live on campus for the full four years," Rogers said. "This is strictly a desire by the University and its purpose is to promote more of an on-campus community atmosphere."

But for many students, living off-campus is a privilege that is part of the school's culture.

"The life lessons you gain from living somewhere on your own is part of the Bucknell experience," Dan Gallo '02 said. "To take that living option away is to change a convention of the school."

While the administration insists that no part of Vision 2010 is set in stone, it seems that the concrete may be more set than it appears. "The trustees have been targeting this issue for sometime," Rogers said. "What remains to be decided is how the project will be funded."

Another issue to be considered is the future of the school's current downtown living area.

"We can't implement parts of the plan unless we have a second plan for what will become of [the school's downtown] neighborhood," Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock said.

While the fact remains that what Vision 2010 does to off-campus living remains to be seen, it seems that this issue, too, may already be resolved.

According to Lewisburg businessman and Wharton business school graduate Craig Bennett, the borough of Lewisburg already has plans to rezone the school's downtown area.

"In the near future, much of the school's downtown area that is now zoned residential will be rezoned as commercial," said Bennett. If Vision 2010 is implemented, much of what is now student downtown living may give way to small businesses and the opportunity to live off campus may be entirely lost.

While certain changes to the school's culture seem unclear at best, the administration agrees that student response to the proposed plans is necessary.

"We need to hear from students why they think this is a good or bad idea," Pollock said.

If students want to see off-campus living remain an option, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro proposes this precondition: that students living downtown practice responsibility and fairness to themselves and to their neighbors.

University Chaplain Ian Oliver also questions the University's instillation of ethics.

"I think we can ask ourselves, what is Bucknell doing, in its teaching and in its community life, to instill practical ethics, things like not stealing, not injuring, not wasting, in its own?" Oliver said.

"If we look at Bucknell's admissions practices, its employment practices, its own ethics, what lessons would we expect students to come away with—not in terms of the formal curriculum (do what I say, not what I do), but in terms of its informal curriculum—the way life at the institution really works?" Oliver added.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 13—The United States expects to give Afghanistan about $300 million in fiscal year 2003, on top of the $296 million it has pledged for this year, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said on Wednesday. The Bush administration's budget request for 2003 includes only $140 million for Afghanistan, but Powell said hat was just a preliminary figure prepared at short notice. Liberia calls for help in ending civil war

MONROVIA, Liberia, Feb. 11—Liberian police on Tuesday flung more suspected rebel agents into jail under a state of emergency officials said, as worried citizens of the capital city Monrovia rushed to banks to withdraw their savings said. The city, scene of bloody street fighting in a 1990s civil war, has been on edge since rebels struck just 22 miles from the capital last Thursday. Security forces have since driven the rebels back.

University to host women's conference

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

The Mid-Atlantic Women's Studies Association will hold its annual conference this Saturday at the University. The theme of the conference is "Locating Women's Studies." This theme aims to encompass all areas related to women's studies, including teaching, research and practice inside and outside the classroom.

"Each year the conference has a different theme and is held at a different educational institution. Bucknell is the proud sponsor of this year's conference," Assistant Professor of Women's Studies and Anthropology Professor Coralynn Davis said.

In preparation for the conference, the Mid-Atlantic Women's Studies Association asked for proposals in the form of papers, and panels to be submitted by Oct. 15, 2001.

The Mid-Atlantic Women's Studies Association is a professional organization of women's studies scholars and teachers in the mid-Atlantic region. The all day conference features 18 panel discussions divided into three sessions that will take place in the morning and afternoon with themes including challenges and opportunities posed by geographical locations, geographies of gender, community partnerships and women's resource centers.

Associate Professor of English Glynis Carr took the initiative to bring the conference to the University.

"She coordinated the planning committee, which consisted of members of the Bucknell's Women's and Gender Studies Program, Sociology and Anthropology Professor Elizabeth Crespo and myself. Everyone is excited," Davis said.

The conference is encouraging students as well as faculty and staff from the University and from other colleges to attend.

About 100 visitors from colleges and universities including Illinois State University, Princeton University and the University of Toronto will be in attendance.

The event will kick off with a keynote address by Carolyn Sachs, director of Women's Studies at The Pennsylvania State University on "Global Connections in Women's Studies: Why Place and Space Matter," and end with a dramatic performance written by Pat Bond, performed by actor Marjorie Conn and entitled "Lorena Hickok and Eleanor Roosevelt: A Love Story."

"A cohort of Women's and Gender Studies majors, members of Bucknell's women's issues organization for students, Sirens, and other Bucknell students have volunteered to help out with the conference," said Davis. " We are looking forward to this worthwhile event."

According to the LGBT Campus Climate Report, "The campus climate is not welcoming or supportive of LGBT individuals."

Thirty nine percent of respondents indicated that they had been harassed due to their sexuality during the last year, the most common form of harassment being derogatory comments. Other forms of harassment included verbal threats, pressure to conceal sexual orientation, written comments, graffiti and threats of physical violence. One respondent reported being physically assaulted.

Climate appears to vary depending on the individual's status in the University. While 88 percent of undergraduates reported being harassed, only 38 percent of faculty had been. Gay men were the most likely to be harassed. Eighty-one percent of respondents indicated that students were the source of harassment.

"Despite efforts, particularly in the past five years, to create a more welcoming and accepting climate on campus for LGBT individuals, perceived attitudes toward LGBT individuals on campus remain discriminatory and prejudicial," the report states.

More than half of respondents admitted to concealing their sexual orientation to avoid harassment and discrimination. Sixty-seven percent view the campus as homophobic. "Less than half of the respondents feel accepted in the classroom or in the workplace," the survey reported.

Robert Midkiff, associate dean of arts and sciences, prepared the summary of the survey and says he finds the results disappointing.

"We have work to do to make Bucknell an inclusive community," Midkiff said.

The survey respondents agree. Over half of them believe the University does not address issues relating to sexuality and gender identity. According to the summary "Resoondents advocated for more resources dedicated to LGBT issues, equity for domestic partners in tuition remission, more social programming and curriculum development."

In particular, the athletics department was cited as an area of the University that needs to provide greater acceptance and support to LGBT individuals.

Many respondents indicated that the Greek system "perpetuates homophobic attitudes and behaviors on campus" as well.

Before the publication of these results, Midkiff met with two LGBT groups on campus to discuss them. Those that attended the meetings felt that the results of the survey were accurate.

"I think some folks were relieved to see that they had been heard and that the broader Bucknell community would be made aware of their experiences," Midkiff said.

According to Midkiff, "Improving the climate will require education, but it will also require challenging behaviors."

He also advocates confronting friends or classmate who make offensive remarks, rather than ignoring them, and he emphasizes that challenging unacceptable behavior does not imply hostility, though it may be uncomfortable.

"Students can also help by openly communicating that they are accepting of those who are different from themselves," Midkiff said.

Contemporary Worship Service makes debut

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

Between 20 and 30 people were on hand for the revolutionary new Contemporary Worship Service, which held its first meeting last Sunday.

By Chris Styers
Staff Writer

The culmination of almost a year's worth of preparation appeared in the form of the University's first Contemporary Worship Service last Sunday at 8 p.m. in the Langone Center (LC) cave.

In the spring of 2001, the Rooke Chapel Congregation decided to survey its congregants and determine whether worship services were meeting their needs. The survey revealed students wanted to feel more like a family, and therefore wanted something less formal—not the traditional hymns, sermons and structures.

The Rooke Chapel Congregation decided there was a need to create a new worship service providing a more contemporary atmosphere. It would be a service open to all denominations, it would follow a non-traditional structure, yet would not be in competition with fellowship groups.

The Contemporary Worship Service would focus more on student involvement since the students were the ones suggesting change and they were the experts on what changes would work best for them. By making these changes the *Rooke Chapel Congregation hoped this service would fill the void that con*gregants felt was missing from the regular service.

Neal Lutz '03, Worship Coordinator for the Rooke Chapel Congregation, was instrumental in organizing the first service. He began preparation for this service in the fall of 2001 by sending an email inviting interested students to help establish various aspects of the service.

Lutz received a strong response and he and other volunteers began to establish the framework for a service still months away.

A theme of "Unity and Togetherness" was set for the first service. The message, music and activities would reflect the theme in whatever way the presenter felt best. Several students were asked to speak on the theme either through personal experience or through a verse.

The service also included scripture reading and a mixing activity where congregants were encouraged to meet one another and to express their feelings on the night's theme.

The most notable distinction from traditional services was the use of contemporary Christian music all throughout. Instead of traditional hymns and organ music the congregation sang accompanied by a guitar and conga.

Overall, Lutz felt that the service, attended by 20-30 people, was well received.

Elizabeth Kengeter '05 said the service was a "good time for all—a very friendly and worshipful atmosphere."

In future services congregants feel there should be more singing and more scripture. Another change that Lutz commented on was better efficiency of time. There were some slow moments of the service but he attributes most of them to this being the service's first run.

A date has not yet been set for the next service. Uncertain of the response in would generate, only one service had been planned, but the Rooke Chapel Congregation would like to see this continue to grow; especially due to the large response from the first service.

With LC renovations underway after spring break, it will be difficult to guarantee the LC cave as a continued meeting place, but that will not stop the continuation of this service.

"Getting all of this organized was frustrating at times but was very rewarding to see everything take shape. I'm glad people are so willing to come together for this service because I think it will satisfy an unmet need on campus," Lutz said.

IFC to review new rush requirements

ly confident" the fraternity will get the five necessary pledges.

"[The members] basically said that it's not an option to not have the house filled," Muchler said.

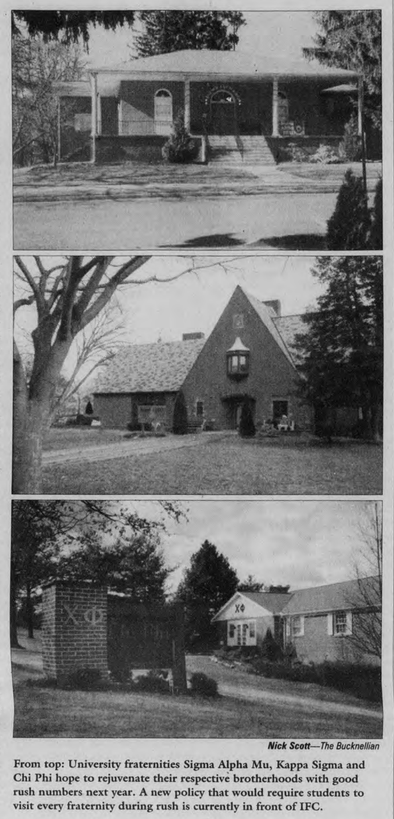
Chi Phi, with about 15 returning members, is well short of filling its 33 beds. But it doesn't have to worry about the 80 percent requirement since its house is not University owned. Still, President John Purcell '03 said the fraternity is recruiting heavily this spring for financial reasons.

The members rent their rooms from the fraternity's alumni association, which has set a goal of filling 28 beds in order to avoid financial losses. Also, Purcell said Chi Phi is in the process of selling its house to the University, a transaction he expects to be completed in the fall. He explained that the price the University offers for the house depends upon the amount of profit it expects to gain from it, so its price would be higher if there were more students living in it.

Purcell said the fraternity has hosted about ten candidates for events including a poker night and bowling, and he believes it can meet the 28-bed goal.

"I'm very confident that we'll come close to it if not go beyond it," he said. "We've already experienced some success with the rush program and we just started a few weeks ago."

All three fraternities had disappointing fall pledge classes. According to statistics provided by Baker, Kappa Sigma accepted 14 pledges, Sigma Alpha Mu accepted four and Chi Phi accepted two. The low pledge numbers directly correlate with low participation in the fraternities' rush events.



Nick Scott—The Bucknellian

From top: University fraternities Sigma Alpha Mu, Kappa Sigma and Chi Phi hope to rejuvenate their respective brotherhoods with good rush numbers next year. A new policy that would require students to visit every fraternity during rush is currently in front of IFC.

Only 15 candidates visited Sigma Alpha Mu during the first three days of rush and just 40 stopped at Chi Phi. Kappa Sigma hosted over 70 candidates, but Muchler said many had little interest in the fraternity but just came to meet the requirement of visiting at least one downhill fraternity. On the contrary, many uphill fraternities hosted over 100 candidates.

Baker recognizes that the disparity is a problem, and he has proposed a plan to the Interfraternity Council (IFC) to reform rush. The current plan requires rush participants to visit at least four fraternities during the first three days of rush, at least one of them being a downhill fraternity.

Baker's new plan would require participants to visit all 11 fraternity houses during the first three nights of rush. It would be much more structured than the current plan, as the participants would visit just the downhill fraternities on one night, then half of the uphill fraternities on another night and the remaining uphill fraternities on the last night.

All three presidents acknowledged that the plan was an improvement. Henry said it would greatly benefit fraternities with low rush participation, particularly downhill fraternities that often get bypassed because of location. He said it would also make the rush events less straining for the fraternities.

> "A lot of [rush candidates] make a mistake by putting all their eggs in one basket. Then when they don't get an invitation, they're embarrassed to reach out to other fraternities because they didn't visit them.
> —Roy Baker, director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs

"I think this plan would help all the fraternities—especially the downhill ones," Henry said. "By not having to run rush every night, we could focus on the one night we're hosting. The candidates would have to meet us and see what we're all about."

In addition to these two benefits, Baker believes the plan will also give rush candidates more options in choosing a fraternity—though he acknowledged it will require them to commit more time to rush.

"A lot of [rush candidates] make a mistake by putting all their eggs in one basket," Baker said. "But then when they don't get an invitation, they're embarrassed to reach out to other fraternities because they didn't visit them."

Baker said IFC is seriously considering the plan and expects them to deal with the rush format within the next 30 days.

'Black face' incident necessitates discussion

students. Ferraro justified the University's disciplinary response to the incident, which requires the two students to attend an educational program on 'black face' (the apology letters were not University sanctioned), by interpreting the intent of the students' actions, which he did not deem to be malicious.

"Although the incident clearly demonstrated poor judgment and poor taste, I do not believe the actions of the students were motivated by hatred," he said. "This is how we grow—we make mistakes and we learn from those mistakes."

Baker agreed with Ferraro's assessment, calling the incident "an honest mistake."

Ferraro and Baker also recognized that the mistake was likely caused by a lack of knowledge pertaining to 'black face,' and cited ignorance as a campus-wide problem.

"I believe African American students are familiar with the idea and connotations of 'black face,' but I believe many of our other students do not understand it as well," Ferraro said.

Educating the Campus

One of the periphery issues of the forum and a decision most participants agreed on was that the University must do more in the future to educate its students about racial sensitivity. Ferraro indicated in a campus-wide email that better efforts would be made to "inject a serious and sustained discussion of social issues (including race), into freshman/freshwoman studies."

But according to Associate Professor of English Glyne Griffith, whether or not the two individuals intended racial prejudice by painting their faces black is largely inconsequential.

"The response to the incident was misjudged. The notion that the impact of the students' actions is somehow diminished because they did not intend racial insult is a fallacy. Lack of intent does not necessarily ameliorate pain and suffering," he said. "The actions of the students were offensive to every person of African descent and individual of good conscience on campus. Sanctions, which are sometimes necessary, are about education as much as they are about compensating people for distress."

> "I want individuals and groups with such tendencies to know that my personal tolerance level for violations which are intended to belittle, embarrass, harass or intimidate other races, cultures, ethnic groups, religions or sexual orientations is zero and anyone committing such acts is placed in jeopardy of being asked to leave our community.
> *—University President Steffen Rogers

Class of 2004 Secretary-Treasurer Maggie Nadar disagreed with Griffith, calling stricter sanctions "only temporary fixes to the problem."

"We must realize that true corrections do not stem from sanctioning students. We need more forums, discussions, and informational sessions concerning the racial climate on campus," she said.

While the University has thus far refrained from mandating any serious consequences to the students, additional sanctions are pending.

"I will pass the concerns of the students [regarding sanctions] voiced at the forum to Charlie Pollock and President Rogers," Ferraro said.

Another matter brought up at the forum was the University's handling of publicity regarding the incident. Several forum participants voiced concerns that the University was attempting to "cover up" the incident and keep it as quiet as possible. Ferraro responded by stating that disciplinary measures are usually handled only between those parties involved in the issue.

"I had to balance the rights of the individual with the community's need for information," he said.

Ferraro also stated the administration was not "drawing parallels" between this incident and the extreme severity of recent mock Ku Klux Klan lynchings staged by fraternity members at Auburn, Louisville and Mississippi University.

Forum's Accomplishments

Called an "educational event" by Assistant Dean of Multicultural Affairs Eloiza Domingo, the forum lasted nearly four hours and generated intelligent dialogue among its participants, although the atmosphere surrounding much of the discussion was less than amiable. While not indicative of the evening as a whole, on more than one occasion Ferraro struggled to maintain control of the forum, his own voice drowned out by arguments among participants or resounding comments by students.

One recurring request from many audience members was for the two anonymous individuals involved in the incident to rise and address the forum. For well over three hours, those individuals remained silent, their identities known only to Baker, Ferraro and their fellow fraternity brothers. But just after 11:30 p.m., with less than half of the original forum audience still in attendance, Baker walked to the front and center of Rooke Auditorium, looked at the remaining DU brothers and issued a challenge. He challenged the two individuals, presumably still in the audience, to have enough courage and respect to stand up and accept responsibility for their actions.

Two individuals rose from their seats, acknowledged their involvement in the incident and walked to the front of the auditorium.

"I heard what the audience was saying during the forum, and I decided I needed to become the catalyst to challenge the two individuals to do the right thing," Baker said.

Each student issued another apology for his actions, but for the first time, the apologies came from the mouths of those accused, not from a piece of paper. All at once every remaining member at the forum—deans, professors and students—rose from their seats and gave the two students a standing ovation.

"When the two students stepped forward and apologized, it changed my entire perspective on Bucknell," former BSG Multicultural Chair Tricia Bushnell '04 said. "It was so good to see people working to change things—I have never seen people come together like this before."

Baker agreed, finding the moment difficult to express in words.

"You had to have been here and seen it for yourself," he said. "I felt the forum went extremely well. It provided students an opportunity to tell us how they felt, which helps us become better administrators."

Ferraro was also proud of what the forum accomplished, even though it was not always apparent that such a hopeful conclusion was possible.

"It was a very tough situation—people felt so strongly on both sides," he said. "Ultimately, I believe the process worked and I was remarkably pleased with the effort tonight. Everyone acted with honesty and charity."

Assistant Professor of Education Sue Ellen Henry, one of the few non-students who stayed until the end of the forum, called the event a "proud moment for education at the institution."

"Tonight made me proud to be a member of the campus community," she said.

Henry recognizes, however, that the progress forged at the forum cannot be allowed to stall.

"We must not close the issue now because we know who is responsible," she said. "We must continue to talk openly and ask questions. Tonight was a good starting point."

Effect on the Future

Prudent measures in the coming months and years at the University are especially important because although this is hopefully the final incident of such variety on campus, it was certainly not the first. An almost identical incident occurred here in 1988 when a group of Sigma Chi brothers painted their entire bodies black at a Halloween party and imitated the Harlem Globetrotters. Another member of the same fraternity painted his body black and imitated Bob Marley.

In light of the recent events, University President Steffen Rogers has pledged a zero-tolerance policy toward any type of prejudicial behavior within University gates. In a campus email Wednesday, he elaborated on his expectations: "I want individuals and groups with such tendencies to know that my personal tolerance level for violations which are intended to belittle, embarrass, harass or intimidate other races, cultures, ethnic groups, religions or sexual orientations is zero and anyone committing such acts is placed in jeopardy of being asked to leave our community."

In addition to policy alterations by the administration, Nadar believes that change at the University must begin with the students.

"We, as individuals, must re-evaluate the way in which we respond to the ingrained forms of racism that are key players in our daily lives," she said. "Whether it is a joke or an imitation of an accent, we must understand that it is our own responses that perpetuate the very racial structure we seek to eradicate."

Forum proves to be effective

On Tuesday night, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro and Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker hosted a "semi-open" forum in response to concern stemming from two students dressing as Serena and Venus Williams during a Halloween party. This successful forum provided the campus community with a chance to talk about its differences, say what was on its mind and most importantly, come together to make the best out of a bad situation.

The discussion lasted over three-and-a-half hours; this length of time was needed for people to communicate their thoughts honestly and effectively. During this forum, community members shared numerous points of view, and eventually, the discussion broke down existing barriers.

During the first three-and-a-half hours of the forum, the atmosphere was tense and intimidating. However, that all changed in one split second when the two students came forward to apologize. The students were given a standing ovation and the tone of comments immediately became inspirational, empathetic and understanding.

Apologizing in front of everyone may have not been the easiest thing for two second-semester seniors to do, but it was the appropriate measure to take. Although their apology cannot completely cover up for the mistake that they made, it certainly helped the situation itself and also fostered future improved relations at the University.

Perhaps one of the most important and influential moments of the evening was the incredible leadership of Ferraro and Baker. Ferraro served as a calming influence during heated discussion. He did not attempt to shy away from questions, but instead answered them honestly and thoroughly.

Baker also exemplified outstanding administration throughout the evening, especially when he challenged the two students to come forward. It was this challenge that changed the atmosphere of the forum and ultimately contributed to a starting point in fixing the problem.

We also commend the campus community for bringing this matter to the University's attention and made this forum a priority. As a result of their leadership, the campus community has learned a lifelong lesson.

Although this forum did not completely solve the problem, it was certainly a step in the right direction. After apologizing, the audience gave the students a standing ovation. Many community members expressed their reinstalled faith in the University.

The forum brought the campus community together and provided an opportunity for sharing and learning. The forum was an effective starting point in mending problems at the University, such as the one brought upon by the two students. Even though their actions were deemed offensive and inappropriate, the forum dealt with the matter in an effective manner.

Speaker encourages women to speak out at lecture

By Josh Fisher
Staff Writer

Last semester I was privileged to attend a workshop conducted by the prominent author and former bishop of Newark, N. J. John Shelby Spong. I personally was very excited to attend and to meet him as I had followed his work closely and read many of his books since I was a freshman in high school. He has greatly shaped much of what I think today about religion.

He had come to talk mostly about Christianity and to introduce a more progressive approach for understanding the Bible and the church. Having never attended a lecture by him, I was surprised to hear some of the guidelines he set forth before the question and answer session at the end. He said that the first question he answers must be from a female, and from that point on he will only answer questions going in a male to female order ending with a female. The reason he said he wanted to do this was that in 2,000 years of Christian history, female opinions have been discouraged from being voiced and he wanted to try make this one slight change in order to even the playing field.

At the time, I was a little perturbed by this because as a male, this put me at a disadvantage in this situation. After looking around, I already saw that the show of hands included only two questions from women and six from men, including myself. However, when the turn for a woman's question came up again seven women raised their hands whereas before they sat passively without questions.

I thought it was rather odd but it made me start to wonder further about why so many of these female individuals would choose not to voice their questions, while their male counterparts (without influence from the guidelines) would.

Now, we are all probably familiar with the idea that racism is no longer overt and as clear to see as it was in the past, but rather that it is mostly subconscious and can only be battled internally within the hearts of every individual. The same, of course, can be said about sexism, such as when people choose first to talk to a male at a party rather than the girl standing beside him. I think that it is easiest to spot in casual social situations when people are most off their guard. It is important to realize that this modern form of sexism is just as detrimental to giving women an equal voice as the more over past sexism, which once included making home economics a required course for all women in high school. At the time, when I attended that seminar I felt like things were unequal, but I realize now that they already were before I even walked into the room.

We cannot separate the past sexist experiences of women from the next social situations they encounter. Those women did not simply choose to wait until Spong invited their discussion, but rather they must have been influenced by previous sexist experiences in their past which had shaped them to not be as vocal as the men. Unfortunately this cannot simply disappear with one generation because the same sexism that makes them less vocal is so pervasive within society that it can only be battled by actively addressing the problem communally rather than waiting for individuals themselves to make their stand on a day to day basis.

Image outshines talent for pop princess

By Maren Johnson

I realize that with the constant threat of terrorism, the scandal that is Enron and an uncertain economy, there are far more relevant and important issues that I could be writing about, but quite frankly, I think it needs to be said. And what needs to be said is this: Britney Spears has got to go.

I don't know if it was the cross-promotional ads for her new movie and shampoo or the Super Bowl commercial bonanza that featured a multi-generational Spears, but I can honestly say that she has been far too overdone. It is high time that another pop princess—or better yet, a truly respectable teen idol—take over the realm of popular culture.

I will be the first to admit that when she first hit the scene Spears was cute, fun, and heralded in a nice little period in popular music. I'm not going to lie, I know all the words to "Baby One More Time," and I have dressed up as a sultry schoolgirl for theme parties, but that time has come and gone. And yet, she's still here, and it would seem she is more prevalent than ever.

My disappointment was grave upon seeing her on the cover of last month's Cosmopolitan: is she even old enough to be reading that magazine? What does she need sex tips for anyway; I thought she prided herself on being a virgin? And now it seems she has a coming-of-age movie that I'm figuring will run about 90 minutes or so. I would say that's about 89 minutes more than her talent will hold out for.

Quite frankly I think that we have stopped caring about her music in favor of worshipping her image. Let's face it, her music seems to have taken a back seat (though admittedly I'm not up on my MTV TRL countdown statistics) and her image is what keeps her going.

Quite frankly I think that we have stopped caring about her music in favor of worshipping her image. Let's face it, her music seems to have taken a back seat (though admittedly I'm not up on my MTV TRL countdown statistics) and her image is what keeps her going. She's on posters, she's in movies, she advertises shampoo and soda, she's gracing the cover of more magazines than anyone cares to read and the list goes on. The only reason I know she's still "making" music is because they play the song incessantly in the trailers for her movie.

She'll never top "Baby One More Time", and as much as she may delude herself she's never going to be Madonna. Eventually, if they haven't already, people will stop caring if she has fake boobs or is carrying Justin Timberlake's love child. While she may be a marketing dream, her appeal undoubtedly has a shelf life. If she's lucky, she can go the way of '80's teen queen Deborah (a.k.a Debbie) Gibson and find a lucrative career on the stage of Broadway.

Letters to the editor

Langone a good choice

To the Editor:

I am writing to address the opinions given by Brett Alcarese '02 her letter to the editor regarding the choice of Ken Langone as the 2002 commencement speaker.

In that letter, Ms. Alcarese expresses concern over "who could offer such words of wisdom to our graduates that would broaden our very definitions of prominence and success." Ms. Alcarese feels that a commencement speaker "should stand out because of the message and the foreign presence that he or she traditionally embodies for the graduating class." She feels that the university is "honoring" Mr. Langone for political reasons in that he has been a great benefactor of the University.

Ms. Alcarese could learn a thing or two from Ken Langone about "giving back," not only to one's institution but to many other causes and institutions as well. Had Ms. Alcarese done a little homework prior to writing her letter, she would have known that Ken Langone serves humanity in so many capacities it would take several issues of The Bucknellian to write about them.

Ken Langone is an outstanding example of what loyal and successful seniors at the University should strive for in "giving back!"

Sincerely,
Barbara F. Mynott '56

BCEJ overly critical

To the Editor:

I am starting to atrophy from banality. Each issue of The Bucknellian features an attempt by some Bucknell Caucus for Economic Justice (BCEJ) member to define the group's purpose. Josh Fisher argues that the BCEJ strives to achieve a "more responsible [equal?] distribution of funds." Readers of The Bucknellian are aware of the organization's motives and intentional incessant self-promotion is stale at this point.

The nature of the organization is laudable, as it sets out to accomplish "noble" objectives through the application of worldly ideals (economic fairness) to locality (The Bison). However, its zeal is undermined by its general lack of cogency.

I become further disheartened when I discover that many members of the BCEJ mock the efforts of The Conservatives Club. Rather than try to logically dismantle its particular arguments, some members offer slurs like, "anti-progressive," "drivel" or "narrow-minded." Both groups represent a student-established forum and both cultivate intellectual debate. Of course we're allowed to disagree with The Counterweight. But let's not say that it "defaces" our mailboxes, as Fisher feels. Where's the humanity here? Let's welcome a publication that challenges popular opinion. I'm not a member of the Conservatives Club because I don't wholly subscribe to its ideology, but I'll still take offense to ignorant, and consequently vacuous criticism of it.

Opinions

The beginning of the end for George W.

By Peter Hackeman
Opinions Editor

You might expect the following comment from a partisan Democrat: "Not since Richard Nixon stiffed the Congress during Watergate has a White House so openly and arrogantly defied Congress' investigative authority. Nor has any activity by the Bush administration more strongly suggested they are hiding incriminating information about their relationship with the now-moribund Enron, or other heavy-hitting campaign contributors from the energy business." Instead, they are the words of a Republican; and not just any Republican, a former White House counsel. John Dean, who would be considered an authority on the workings of Nixon's White House after serving in it, recently wrote these words in an article.

The previously over-hyped, baseless (at least politically) scandal over Enron now has the possibility to define George W. Bush's presidency on the domestic front. The last time a Bush was President, he had astronomically high approval ratings while the country focused on foreign affairs and war but faltered domestically and was soundly defeated in his reelection campaign. Former President Bush was vulnerable because he never refocused from multinational diplomacy to the affairs that mattered most to the American voters. Current President Bush and his spokespeople told us how they had learned from his father's mistake and would keep domestic issues a priority. While that concentration has occurred, illustrated by his State of the Union, Bush's administration has made two key domestic mistakes that seem destined to hurt Republicans in the 2002 election and Bush himself in 2004.

The most obvious of these mistakes is centered around Enron. Dean expanded on his earlier comments during an interview with Paula Zahn of CNN.

"What I do know and what's evident to me as somebody who's been there, done that, if you will, is the way this is being handled by the White House right now on requests for very simple and non detailed information. What the General Accounting Office (GAO) is asking for is not the unvarnished statements of anybody to the President or the Vice President. They're merely asking for who met with that committee and where they met and their names. It's not the content of the conversations even involved," Dean said.

Unfortunately for Bush and Vice President Dick Cheney, these facts nullify their main public opposition to the investigation, which is that the GAO is asking for information that will curtail future president's ability to get honest opinions from experts.

As if being compared to Nixon wasn't bad enough for Bush's image on domestic issues, Bush has created more serious campaign liabilities for himself and all Republican candidates. Bush's proposed budget for the next fiscal year has two made-for-TV-commercial mistakes.

You can almost imagine the Democratic commercials near election time showing Bush and Cheney meeting with former Enron officials while the tape of Dean's final comments plays in the background. "What this appears to me to be is the first step of a cover-up. This is the way you start it. You stall, you stall, you stall. You try to get something like this to go on until its no longer an issue. Certainly the way we did during Watergate was to try to stall everything, and this is a stalling action," Dean said.

As if being compared to Nixon wasn't bad enough for Bush's image on domestic issues, Bush has created more serious campaign liabilities for himself and all Republican candidates. Bush's proposed budget for the next fiscal year has two made-for-TV-commercial mistakes.

First he has proposed a budget deficit for the first time in five years. The $106 billion deficit is being blamed on the new war on terrorism. While the Democrats might be able to argue that Bush's defense budget is too inflated, they won't have to. As long as the average American voter can understand simple subtraction, Bush could be in trouble. This is because even when you add the entire increase in the defense budget, not just the new expenses related to the war, of $48 billion to cost of the new category of homeland security at $38 billion, they only equal $86 billion. Where did the other $20 billion go. One answer sure to be given is the tax cut that Bush personally championed so vehemently, which costs an average of $135 billion per year over 10 years.

Second, Bush blatantly broke one of his most strategically important campaign promises of 2000. For more presidential elections than many people can remember, Democrats have been able to use Social Security as an issue to gain the support of older Americans. Bush was able to mute the issue by convincing Americans that he was no more of a threat to their benefits and retirement security than Al Gore by promising not to take money from the Social Security surplus. Now his budget has done just that. I'm expecting the film from when Bush made this promise to be played on a commercial right next to his father's "No New Taxes" promise.

Right or wrong, today's national political ball game is played on a field of 30 second commercials and soundbites for the nightly news. Bush has given his potential opponents enough ammunition to blow holes in his Compassionate Conservative image, and he's only 13 months into his term.

Who's afraid of the "Vagina Monologues"?

By Josh Fisher
Staff Writer

Vaginas: almost one out of every two people has one. Look around, there might be one near you right now. Why are those seven letters, properly arranged, so taboo? Why am I writing about this word?

In 1997, playwright Eve Ensler penned "The Vagina Monologues," a 17 monologue play dealing with female sexuality and personal and interpersonal relationships with it. The play is based on over 200 interviews with girls and women of ages ranging from six to 70, who all reflected on this particular aspect of female anatomy. The play's world tour eventually led to the birth of "V-Day," one of America's foremost charities. The V-Day organization formed in 1998, dedicated to ending violence against women. Today, V-Day, the Feminist Majority Leadership Alliance, and such organizations as Men Stopping Rape host productions of the play around Valentine's Day to help aid V-Day's cause. Ensler's masterpiece attempts to dispel the shame associated with the word "vagina." As she attempts to liberate women and female sexuality, she is intelligent, creative and earthy all at once.

One thing is for sure: "The Vagina Monologues" will delight many and offend some. But why will so many people take offense to a mere word? Why have bookstores and Lewisburg shops censored this "dirty" word and not allowed advertisements to be posted in their windows? Well, quite frankly, double standards and misogyny in American culture run deeper than one would like to think, and this university is no exception.

I've always been a fan of F-words. I'm a feminist. And I'm frequently intrigued by how much effort we put into circumlocutions every day—how we dread certain words because society has deemed them taboo, because we are so afraid of what other people might think. But I choose to define feminism as "the policy, practice or advocacy of political, economic and social equality for women" (Webster's Dictionary). I practice feminism with my actions, my words and my thoughts.

Forms of gender discrimination issues plague the world—from the veils of women under the thumb of the Taliban in Afghanistan, to the subjugation of women into surprisingly strict socially prescribed roles in Japan and the objectification of women in American culture—even in our own little "microcosm" here at the University. Although gender issues worldwide, and even the definition of gender (yes, it's true), are a bit more complicated than I might let on, they are nevertheless important, and it is not hard to see this if you open up your mind. Women do a majority of the world's labor, own 20 percent of the world's wealth and one percent of the world's land. If you are not outraged, you are not paying attention—and you don't even have to be female.

We Americans like to think that we have come a long way since the 1920s, but is that so true? We live in a society where women are not fundamentally equal—society undermines, mistreats and sexually assaults them. Empowerment is one of the only alternatives for a woman to validate herself, speak her mind and break out of these socially prescribed roles. So if you feel uncomfortable with the word "vagina," I urge you to question "why?" If you feel attacked by feminism, it is most likely a counterattack. And I submit that if "The Vagina Monologues" makes you uncomfortable, it is most likely an internal unwillingness to listen to the play's message and a fear of its goals.

Campaign finance reform threatens money-based system

By Gretchen Schrock
Senior Writer

A fierce wind is blowing, threatening to topple a house constructed of dollar bills with one strong gust. Meanwhile, a worried group of legislators are vainly attempting to protect their delicate monument from this bitter air in order to prevent their own demise into political nothingness. The origin of this mighty storm is not from the frozen tundra of Siberia or the snowy mountains of Canada, but from a meager bill that continues to frighten every legislator on Capitol Hill by expounding the virtues of campaign finance reform.

The first chill came from the Senate passage of a broad campaign finance reform bill sponsored by Senators John McCain (R-Ariz.) and Russell D. Feingold (D-Wis.), in which large soft money contributions to political parties from business, unions and the wealthy were finally banned. Unfortunately, for those legislators who depend on money, not substantive platforms and demonstrated qualifications, to win public office, the House of Representatives is poised to vote on a similar campaign finance reform measure this week.

Thus, the Republican and Democratic parties are racing to secure their positions in future elections through furious fundraising, despite an informal fund-raising moratorium after the attacks of Sept. 11. In fact, this fund-raising intensity has reached record levels, surpassing by 50 percent the last comparable year, 1999, in which there was no federal election. Officials at both political parties report that their year-end assessments for 2001 will show that they acquired approximately $151 million in contributions, most of which were in the large, unlimited form of soft money. This soft money is supposedly used for generic party-building activities. The Republicans were the winners of the 2001 fund-raising marathon with $87.8 million in their pockets, while the Democrats appropriated a mere $63.1 million.

Why has this frenetic solicitation of funds overwhelmed our nation's capital? The fear of the unknown, the fear that once the house of dollar bills falls and blows away that there will be nothing with which to build another one. Without large financial support, the parties are thoroughly convinced that they will be unable to win the seats necessary in the 2002 Congressional elections in order to assume control of both the House and the Senate.

Resulting from this fear of legal change and the threat of political loss, the parties are desperately fighting for every dollar. Even the drive for smaller, more regulated donations known as hard money, which allow individuals to contribute to the elections of specific candidates or the national party committees, has increased, after realizing that they may have to rely more heavily on such donations in the future. According to a New York Times article, James M. Jordan, the executive director of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee said, "Obviously we've made contingency plans, and we're making every effort to boost our hard-money fund-raising ability. But there's been no break whatsoever in our soft-money fund-raising efforts."

As the country watches the legislators on Capitol Hill scramble for new and intricate ways to save their precious construction, all this columnist sees is hypocrites.

The probable House passage of its version of the campaign finance reform bill is scaring the Republicans to insane proportions, leaving one to believe that their house of dollar bills is even more delicate and precious than that of the Democrats. Representative Roy Blunt (R-Mo.) hinted on Sunday's "Meet the Press" that his party might try to amend the bill in order to place more stringent limits on money in politics than contained in the current proposal. Their twisted logic centers around the ability to persuade their constituents that they are making a sincere effort to clean up the dirty politics of Washington, in addition to the simultaneous conscious killing of the bill by amending it to the point of political repulsion. Here is another instance of the futile protection of the house of money from its imminent crashing to the earth.

As the country watches the legislators on Capitol Hill scramble for new and intricate ways to save their precious construction, all this columnist sees is hypocrites. They assure the wary American citizens that they are devoted to the task of campaign finance reform, while somewhat secretly filling their treasure chests with large amounts of loot by the method which they supposedly want to abolish. Their words support this reform bill, but their actions remain in opposition to its inherent beliefs, such as the need for equal representation of every constituency, regardless of its financial background. What facet, if any, of our representatives should we trust? Where do their real interests lie? The truth will reveal itself if the house of dollars is swept away by the menacing wind of reform.

United States investigates CIA missile strikes

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

Over a week after a CIA missile strike on a group of three men in eastern Afghanistan; the U.S. military has yet to identify the victims. A CIA unmanned drone carried out the attack, which took place in the Zawar-Killi region of Afghanistan. The group consisted of three men clothed in white robes, with one exceptionally tall man.

There is some uncertainty about who exactly was responsible for planning the strike. While it is said that a CIA Predator drone with Hellfire missiles was used, there was some confusion within the Pentagon about who exactly was involved in planning the mission.

Admiral John Stufflebeem told reporters at a press conference, "This was a case where Central Command was not actively participating or coordinated with this particular strike." However, in a Pentagon briefing later in the week, Chairman of the Joint Chiefs Richard Myers said, "There were lots of discussions among Central Command and other folks on the target, and it was concluded that it was a valid target and it was struck." In fact, Myers never actually mentioned the CIA by name.

Despite the insistence of the military that the victims were members of Al-Qaeda, members of a local village told The Washington Post that the victims were villagers looking for scrap metal from the war. In response to the report, Victoria Clarke, chief spokeswoman for the Pentagon told CNN, "We haven't seen or heard anything that leads us to believe that it was anything other than what we thought the target was." It also came out that the Pentagon and the CIA work closely together on almost everything in regards to the Afghan campaign. However, it was also said that the CIA sometimes has different objectives and carries them out without informing the Pentagon.

An Air Force Predator, under the control of the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA), fired a Hellfire missile on supposed Al-Qaeda members around the Zawar Kili region of eastern Afghanistan.

After the attack, the 101st Airborne was called in to inspect the site for forensic evidence. Fifty soldiers were ferried to the mountainous site by helicopter to search for signs of exactly who was killed in the attack. According to Fox News, the CIA is certain that the men were members of Al-Qaeda, and at least one of them was a leader. While the agency has no reason to believe Osama bin Laden was among the victims, they are not ruling anything out at the moment.

Once on site, the team of soldiers found small pieces of flesh and bone. However, officials said that the biological material would have to be tested for the DNA since all of the material was largely unrecognizable. Unfortunately, the DNA information will only be useful to the government if they already have bin Laden's DNA on file. The soldiers also found other hard evidence suggesting the victims were members of the terrorist organizations.

While the exact identities of the victims remain unknown, Admiral John Stufflebeem told Fox News: "These were not innocents." Stufflebeem reported that the soldiers had found ammunition, an empty box for a handheld radio and documents written in English. These documents included credit card applications, as well as commercial airline schedules.

Nevertheless, Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld has asked for a full investigation into the matter. Rumsfeld has also ordered an investigation into the matter of Afghans being taken prisoner who were not members of Al-Qaeda.

Enron executives invoke the Fifth Amendment in Congressional hearings

After being subpoenaed to appear before the Senate Commerce Committee on Tuesday, Former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay invoked his Fifth Amendment right against self-

By Amir Sadaghiani
Staff Writer

As congressional leaders are having a hard time believing that Enron Corporation's former chief executive Jeffrey K. Skilling was unaware of financial problems at his company when he left four months before it collapsed, many top senior Enron executives are invoking their Fifth Amendment right against self-incrimination.

Former Enron Chairman Kenneth Lay made his long-awaited appearance before Congress on Tuesday, but declined to testify about the energy giant's collapse amid dubious business dealings and questionable accounting practices. Once mentioned as a possible energy secretary for President George W. Bush's administration, Lay was forced to listen to 90 minutes of statements by members of the Senate Commerce Committee, who accused him of presiding over a financial sham.

Some of the harshest criticism came from Republicans, whose party was the biggest beneficiary of Enron's numerous political donations over the years to lawmakers of all kinds. "I'd say you were a carnival barker, except that wouldn't be fair to carnival barkers—a carny will at least tell you up front that he's running a shell game," Senator Peter Fitzgerald (R-Ill.) said.

Senate Committee Chairman Ernest Hollings (D-S.C.) said he hoped the Enron saga would lead to campaign finance reform and referred to Lay by a nickname used by Bush in better times. "There's no better example than Kenny-boy of cash-and-carry government," Hollings said.

According to Reuters, Lay told the packed hearing, "I come here today with a profound sadness about what has happened to Enron, its current and former employees, retirees and other stakeholders," before declaring that his legal counsel had advised him against testifying.

Once the seventh largest company in the United States, Enron's rapid decline to the biggest U.S. bankruptcy filing ever on Dec. 2, 2001 has cost thousands their jobs and wiped out billions of dollars in shareholder equity. Millions of investors lost money and thousands of current and former Enron employees lost the great bulk of their retirement savings, when the company collapsed.

According to CBS News, an Enron-sponsored investigation released over two weeks ago blamed senior management for failing to provide proper supervision over a complex web of partnerships that helped the company hide debt and post unrealistic profit figures.

Lay was not the first Enron executive to exercise his Fifth Amendment right. According to Reuters, two former and two current Enron employees declined to speak before a House Energy and Commerce subcommittee last week. And a fired senior partner at Arthur Anderson, Enron's auditor, took the Fifth last month.

Currently, there are 10 congressional committees probing the Enron debacle, in addition to the U.S. Justice Department and the Securities and Exchange Commission.

Academics justify current war on terrorism

By Nathan Blagrove
Business & Politics Editor

Over 48 academics from prominent universities and think tanks from around the nation have signed a statement in support of the war on terrorism.

According to Fox News, the letter calls the war "just," using principles that are commonly accepted by diplomats and statesmen. According to one of the signers, Amitai Etzioni, the members felt the need to remind Americans what the war is about. There is some worry that support is beginning to wane for the war effort.

Referring to those who kill in the name of God, the letter claims that they are a "clear and present danger to all people of good will everywhere in the world, not just in the United States."

People who kill in the name of God are a "clear and present danger to all people of good will everywhere in the world."

The scholars have based the letter on the principles set up by St. Augustine in the fourth century for what can be considered a just war. This has become a point of contention with the letter since many other academics do not accept the principles of St. Augustine for the justification of war.

The letter calls heavily upon other historical writings such as the Declaration of Independence as well as the works of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Abraham Lincoln. The letter, according to the signatories, is simply a justification for the current war, and not necessarily a validation for expanding the war beyond the borders of Afghanistan.

European Union encourages creation of Palestinian state

By Kim Spigelmire
Staff Writer

In a clear break with US policy, key leaders in the European Union (EU) have expressed support for the creation of a Palestinian state. In the past few weeks, Europe has solidified its position on how the conflict in the Middle East should be resolved. Their position includes a strong dose of criticism for President George W. Bush's foreign policy. High ranking European officials, including Josep Pique, the president of the European Union, and Chris Patten, the E.U.'s external relations commissioner, have expressed their disappointment in the United States' lack of involvement in resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. The unilateralist foreign policy trend made apparent in Bush's State of the Union address provoked both anger and concern among the European leaders. In an interview with The Guardian, Patten stated, "However mighty you are, even if you're the greatest superpower in the world, you cannot do it all on your own."

In the face of the United States' seeming disinterest in resolving the conflict, the EU has taken a lead. This week, leaders from the Organization of the Islamic Conference and the E.U. are meeting in Istanbul to discuss ways in which the two regions can cooperate to their mutual benefit. The conference will include representatives from 71 states. Ministers from both Iran and Iraq will attend.

The Palestinian flag flies in front of the destroyed home of the Palestinian Broadcasting Corp.

The E.U. is seeking to strengthen its economic and security relationships with the Middle East. Iran is becoming a major trading partner and is moving towards more formalized ties with the EU. These ties may create a conflict of interests as the United States turns the war on terrorism towards the "axis of evil" states outlined in Bush's State of the Union address. The United States' hawkish attitude towards the Middle East has alienated many supporters within Europe. France's Foreign Minister Herbert Vendrine characterized the U.S. focus on terrorism as a "simplistic" approach to foreign policy. Like many Europeans, Vendrine called for an examination of the root causes of terrorist activities. He condemned the United States' support of Ariel Sharon's oppressive control of Palestinian territory.

The creation of a Palestinian state is one of the key issues to be discussed during the two-day convention. Earlier this week, Vedrine proposed a plan through which a Palestinian state would be created, recognized by Israel and admitted to the United Nations. The plan places EU goals squarely at odds with those of the United States, which favors the slower development of a peace plan that would not necessarily entail Palestinian statehood.

In the past months the E.U. has made increasingly strong statements concerning the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. A statement by the General Affairs Council endorses Yasser Arafat as leader of the Palestinian Authority and calls for Israel to "withdraw its military forces and stop the extra-judicial executions, lift the closures and all the restrictions imposed on the Palestinian people and its leadership and freeze the settlements." The statement calls for action by the E.U., United States and Russian Federation to work towards achieving peace in the Middle East. Israel's destruction of E.U. funded development projects, aimed to improve the Palestinian living conditions, is becoming a major focus of criticism. In a Feb. 5 speech, Patten criticized the Israeli government for the destruction of Palestinian infrastructure and called for Israel to "stop destroying the fabric of the Palestinian community." Patten calls "two viable, peaceful and prosperous States living side by side" the fundamental goal of the Middle East peace process.

Bison 'boys of summer' ready to play

By Meghann Chipko
Staff Writer

The 2002 spring season is looking good for the Bison baseball team. Not only are they riding in off an amazing 2001 season, they are deep in promising pitchers and hope to use their rock solid defense to win games. Last season, the Bison won the Patriot League Championship, traveled to the NCAA regional tournament and set many school records, including tying the number of victories in a single season.

Though the team greatly misses its nine seniors, and has to fill seven of the eight starting positions lost by graduating seniors, Head Coach Gene Depew is not worried. With 21 seasons under his belt at the University and 350 victories within his tenure, the team's momentum is too strong to just fade this season.

"We have had favorable weather that has allowed us to get more outdoor preparation then we have ever been able to have in previous seasons. We have practiced out on the field some, as well as on the turf, and the teams looks really good," Depew said.

This season the team starts out with some competitive teams.

"We always try to schedule some of our biggest games early. Teams like University of Virginia (UVA), Georgia Southern ... Indiana, Illinois and Penn State should get us some good quality experiences before the Patriot League opens up," Depew said. "We are optimistic for this weekend; we have pretty much all our starting line up to replace from last season, but the guys are ready to play."

The Bison's season opener is this weekend against UVA. Many of the players are optimistic about the game and the upcoming season.

"Preseason has gone real well, all the guys are working real hard and we are really looking forward to opening up this weekend at UVA," catcher Austin Berret '05 said.

Many think that the team's defense and pitching squad this year look very strong. Although Chris Lackett '02 is recovering from a summer surgery and Kevin Miller '04 has been practicing through a sore arm, both are recovering nicely.

Depew's starting rotation will most likely consist of Lackett, Miller, Zach Allen '03, R.J. Grant '03, Kevin Burns '03 and Sean Magee '02. During the 2001 season, Lackett went 6-3, was awarded All-Patriot League Second Team honors and was second in the league in the number of batters he struck out. Miller had an impressive second half of the 2001 season, and will move into the teams pitching rotation this season. Allen, a right-hander, stepped up big in the Patriot League Tournament last season when the team defeated Navy.

Larry Scheetz '02, a 2001 All-Patriot League Second Team short stop selection who broke the University record for assists in a season last spring, will provide solid defense for the Bison. Gregg Farmery '02, who, in the bullpen, set a new school record with seven saves in 2001 and was selected All-Patriot League First Team as a relief pitcher for the second year in a row, will help the close out games.

At bat, slugger Ben Stoll '04 should stand out this season; in 2001 he batted a .381 average in

Lalugba leads Bison to second place PL tie

By Pierre Hernando
Staff Writer

The men's basketball team now sits in a three-way tie with Holy Cross and Lafayette for second place in the Patriot League after garnering a 65-62 victory over host Army (10-13, 4-6) this past Saturday. The win was the second consecutive victory for the Bison (10-13, 6-4).

The Orange and Blue never trailed in the contest, which featured a game-high 25 points from Boakai Lalugba '03. Army was lethargic in the first half as they shot a miserable 27.6 percent from the field.

The Bison led 29-18 at the half, but saw their lead dwindle as the second half got underway. The Black Nights tied the game for the first time at 35, after starting the second half on a 17-6 run. The run was capped by a 30-foot three-pointer from Army's J.P. Spatola.

Captain Bryan Bailey '02 drilled a three-pointer of his own at the 14:30 mark and the Bison had the lead for the following 12 minutes. At the 2:18 mark of the second half, Army's Charles Woodruff finished off another short run by hitting a lay-up and tying the game at 60. Woodruff totaled 24 points in the game.

The tie was broken when Lalugba put back a Brian Werner '03 miss with just over a minute left in regulation. Werner stole the ball in the backcourt on Army's next possession and was fouled from behind on a breakaway attempt. Werner sank 1-2 foul shots and increased the team's lead to 63-60.

The Black Nights scored to cut the deficit once again, but quickly fouled Bailey on the inbounds pass. The All-League guard sank both foul-shots to open the lead to three once again.

Chris Spatola of Army missed two long three-point attempts at the end, which would have forced the game into overtime. Spatola currently leads all Patriot League players in scoring and three-pointers made.

10 of Bailey's 23 points came in the first half. His point total enabled him to move up even higher on the University's scoring ranks. He is now 21st on the all-time scoring list with 1,045 points. In the process, Bailey passed Sekou Hamer '96, Mark Atkinson '87 and Gordon Mboya '97.

The squad out-rebounded Army 36-33 while shooting 41.2 percent from the field.

Along with his 25 points, Lalugba garnered eight rebounds while hitting 7-9 from the foul-line. Bailey showed his all-around ability once again, adding a career-high nine boards, handing out three dimes and getting one steal. Werner grabbed six rebounds and had two steals. Dan Blankenship '03 provided some help on offense by nailing two three-pointers and finishing with eight points.

Dan Blankenship '03 had eight points and three steals in the Bison victory over Navy.

The win allowed the Bison to be the first team to win 100 regular season Patriot League games. The squad is a league best 100-49 overall.

The win over Army was preceded by a 76-56 blowout over visiting Navy (9-15, 4-5) last Wednesday night at Davis gym. The squad never trailed during the game, as they handed the Midshipmen their third straight defeat. The win gave the Orange

Creamer, Quimby lead Bison against Army in Annapolis

The women's basketball team went 2-0 this past week as they topped two of the nation's military academies. With the victories, the Bison move to 8-2 in the Patriot League and remain tied for first place with Holy Cross.

The Orange and Blue were in West Point, N.Y. this past Saturday, squaring off against the U.S. Military Academy. Five Bison players reached double figures, including Molly Creamer '03, who led all scorers with 19 points in the Orange and Blue's 82-64 victory. The visitors took the lead from the opening tip, but only held small advantages throughout most of the first half. Then, the Bison exploded on a 15-6 run, fueled by six points from Kate Franks '03, to take their largest lead of the game, 34-19, with 3:28 remaining in the half. The Orange and Blue woula enter the locker rooms at halftime with a 38-25 lead.

The Bison extended their lead in the second half, going up by as much as 20 points with just over 11 minutes left. Army countered by outscoring their opponents 12-1 over a four-minute span to cut their deficit to nine, 58-49, with 7:21 to play. The cadets would not go away, battling to pull within six, 68-62, with four minutes remaining in the contest. In the end, the Orange and Blue were too much as they scored the final 12 points of the game en route to the win.

The Bison shot an impressive 54 percent from the floor and improved their overall record to 15-8, reaching that number of victories for the third consecutive year. Desire Almind '04 had 18 points for the Orange and Blue and Tri-Captain Vicki Quimby '02 added 16. Kate Rounsley '02 scored 11 points and Franks had 10.

"It was one of our best performances to date. I was very happy with the team's intensity from the beginning. They were very active defensively and contested every shot," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said. "Also, we showed poise when our lead was cut to six. We showed more than we have in past games."

"Desire had her best defensive performance since she started playing here. Molly [Creamer] had good floor play and had 11 assists. Kristin Valdner ['04] really helped us a lot in the first half when Vicki [Quimby] and Kate Rounsley were in foul trouble. She has become great at knowing her role and has really played within herself," Fedorjaka said.

Last Wednesday, the Bison welcomed the Naval Academy to Davis Gym for their second encounter in League play. The hosts fell behind early, but fought back to gain the come-from-behind 83-71 victory. Creamer led all scorers again, this time pouring in 32 points, including shooting a perfect 14-14 from the free throw line.

"Navy has a tough and talented ballclub. We knew it was going to be a pivotal game and that we had to match their physical play," Fedorjaka said.

The opening half was very close, with three lead changes and 10 ties. With the game knotted at 30 and four minutes remaining in the half, the Midshipmen went on an 11-6 run to end the half and take a 41-36 lead into the locker room. Navy quickly increased its lead to nine, 49-40, with 16 minutes left. While the Orange and Blue cut the lead to seven numerous times, they still found themselves down 53-46 four minutes later.

The Bison finally responded, going on a 7-0 run to tie the contest at 53. Navy did not back down, fighting to retake the lead, 61-57, with nine and a half minutes to play. Bucknell proceeded to put the game away, exploding on a 20-0 run over six minutes to take a 77-61 lead with three and a half minutes left.

"In the first half Navy was tougher and more physical. They took it to us offensively and defensively we were not doing it," Fedorjaka said. "We were much more intense in the second half and took it to them."

After being out-rebounded 24-12 in the first half, the Orange and Blue battled back on the boards, finishing the game with a 36-35 edge in that category. Rounsley had 18 for the Bison, and was joined in double figures by Tri-Captain Monique LeBlanc '02, who had 10 and Almind, who scored 11. Quimby hauled down 12 rebounds to move into third place on the University's all-time career rebounds list with 847.

An Olympic "Miracle on Ice"

Sportswriters are generally plagued by a tendency towards melodrama. We love to refer to games as "battles," athletes as "gladiators" and every upset or improbable finish as a "miracle." I'll begrudgingly admit that the battles and gladiators are a bit of a stretch, but the miracles–they happen all the time in the world of sports.

Just ask the men who lit the Olympic flame in Salt Lake City last Friday.

It was about 22 years ago that Mike Eruzione and his teammates lit a flame in the hearts of Americans everywhere. Or to phrase it less melodramatically, it was 22 years ago that they stalwartly held off the Russian hockey team to secure a victory in the most miraculous–yes, miraculous–sporting event in recent history.

Courtesy of Reuters

Mike Eruzione asked his teammates from the 1980 U.S. Olympic hockey team to help him light the cauldron in Salt Lake City.

The 1980 U.S. Olympic hockey team didn't exactly leave opponents cowering on the bench. It was a squad composed of upstart college amateurs, boasting an average age just over 20. Squaring up against the Soviet Union in the semifinals of the Olympic games, the U.S. team simply looked pitiful.

The Soviets, who had pounded the American team 10-3 in an exhibition game two weeks earlier, were the classic Goliath to the United States' David. In the decades prior to 1980, they were virtually untouchable. They hadn't lost a single Olympic contest since 1968, and the last time they conceded the gold was 1960.

They were the best hockey players in their nation, carefully selected and highly experienced in world competition. They were hand-picked athletic machines, whose skills had been honed since preschool. The general line of thinking among everyone else involved in the chase for gold was that it was really a chase for silver and that the International Olympic Committee might as well pass out the gold medals to the Russians before the tournament even started.

And if they had to vote a team mostly likely to pull off the upset, it certainly would not have been the ragtag U.S. squad. The thought was almost laughable. It was like Secretariat versus an unpedigreed farm nag, a stock car versus a golf cart. The only people who weren't shaking in their skates were the men of the U.S. team themselves. Maybe they knew that even Secretariat could be outgutted.

It was a miracle in anfl of itself that the United States managed to scratch their way through the first two periods of play with only a one-point deficit. For a team that was supposed to be blown off the ice, that 3-2 score was an act of pure fortitude.

As the final 20 minutes approached, it became apparent that the unthinkable could unfold right there in Lake Placid. Amazingly, the scrappy American team had all the momentum–Mark Johnson launched a shot eight minutes and 39 seconds into the period, tying the score at three.

Just 81 seconds later, Eruzione, the 25-year-old team captain, flicked a wrist shot past Soviet goalie Vladimir Myshkin, and the rest, to employ another journalistic cliché, is history.

For the next ten daunting minutes, the underdogs stymied the world's greatest hockey team. The Russians bore down harder in the last five minutes and still the amateurs refused to back down.

And suddenly the clock was squeaking out its final seconds, with the steadfast Americans still clinging to that 4-3 lead. Those five seconds, it would turn out, probably meant more to our nation than any sporting event to date.

Al Michaels ecstatically bellowed out the most appropriate and timely soundbite in sports history, frantically spewing out the question, "Do you believe in miracles?!" And of course, answering himself with an emphatic, "Yes!"

All 20 U.S. players poured out onto the ice, sticks in the air, in just as much disbelief as the rest of the world. But it was more than just a bunch of college kids doing the ihevitable–it transcended the game. Harrowed by the Cold War and confusion, the nation really needed a reason to believe in miracles. That game in 1980 gave them one.

It's difficult to summarize the Miracle on Ice, as it would come to be known, without regressing to what looks like sentimental blather, as I have just done. The truth is, I don't think it's plausible or appropriate to do it any other way.

Because when sportswriters describe that game, all of the clichés they use–all of the melodramatic phrases and claims of profundity that we would normal attribute to hyperbole–well, they're all simply the dead-on truth. And that is a miracle itself.

ly want to do that," Green said.

The Bison's predicament after the first four bouts was not promising, as Binghamton jumped out to a 14-0 advantage, which included major decisions from Joe Priuitere at 149 pounds and Ron Foster at 165 pounds. However, although Rocky Miller '02 proceeded to lose 14-7, he prevented a major decision with a last second escape from Binghamton's Beau Bruno, which ultimately could have changed the match's final outcome.

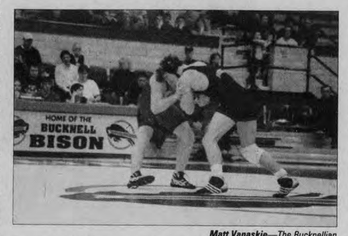
"I knew what kind of situation that I was in," Miller said. "There could have definitely been a tendency to bag the match when he (Bruno) got the last takedown, but I knew that I could save the team a point. You never know what can happen. If you are the eighth or ninth guy to wrestle, it is easy to realize how big a point may be, but I was still aware in the second match how valuable a point could have been. I think my experience helped a lot because if it were my first or second year, I may have given in."

Brian Neuman '02 got the Bison rolling with a tough 4-3 win over Jeff McAveney at 184 pounds, and Binghamton was forced to forfeit at 197, closing the gap to 14-9. This was not the first instance this season in which Neuman had been called upon to weather the storm.

"I think it's a role that was given to me at the beginning of the year when I was elected as a co-captain," said Neuman. "I have had to accept the role of keeping things on track throughout the season as a captain. Going out there and giving it my best is all that I can do. It is one of my duties as a captain."

Brian Falciglia '02, normally a 197-pounder, wrestled as a heavyweight, but came up a bit short, 5-3, against the larger Craig Tefft. Then a double forfeit at 125 pounds and a Bearcat forfeit at 133 pounds made it 23-21 heading into the final bout.

Green needed just 45 seconds to score his first takedown, which set the tone for the bout. He rode a total of three takedowns and also three back points to explode to a 9-2 lead at the conclusion of the first period. He then proceeded to another takedown and a reversal over the final two periods to solidify the Bison's second victory of the season.



Matt Vanaskie—The Bucknellian

In team's last home match ever and the last match ever in Davis Gym, the Bison barely edged Binghamton.

"I just tried to keep the pressure at the least that I could," Green said. "It was just another match to me. That's the mentality that I had to have. I think we were frustrated from losing the first four bouts, but it was good to know that we were going to get the 12 points from the forfeits. So I knew the match would be closer when I wrestled."

Forfeiting is a frustration not unfamiliar to the Bison; the team has suffered forfeits more often than they have been on the receiving end of the automatic victory.

"It was poetic justice for us in a sense. We wrestled Franklin and Marshall earlier in the season and we lost to them because we had to forfeit 3 or 4 bouts, so we don't feel badly at all taking these forfeits," Green said.

Despite Bucknell's dramatic win of the match, the biggest story of the day even stretches beyond this. With the exception of the seniors, the remainder of the squad will never wrestle again at home. Josh Perrin, a junior, has been robbed of his senior wrestling season.

"I am extremely disappointed because I came here to wrestle for four years and I got shorted," Perrin said. "It has been a big part of my life for as long as I can remember. To have it taken away was definitely unexpected, but at least I can finish my career with some of the guys that I have looked up to for the last few years."

Although Perrin is more affected by the elimination of the team because he has one more year of eligibility, Neuman also feels strongly enough about the issue to comment on it, even with his senior status.

"It is sad to look at the younger guys who work so hard," Neuman said. "Throughout the years to come it would also be nice to be able to come back and see some wrestling, which will not happen."

The team knows that the current season is not over, however. The Bison will leave their emotions from the past weekend's match at Davis behind, and will take their momentum into Millersville on Saturday at 11 a.m.

up our perimeter game," Fedorjaka said.

"In our two wins over the academies, I think we showed a lot of character. They always play us tough, but we won both games with authority and composure, as we withstood runs by each team. Those games are already out of our minds, and we have our sights on the next game," LeBlanc said. "We closed out the second round of league play with a tough schedule, but we are looking forward to it. It is up to us to set ourselves up for a good tournament seed."

For her efforts this past week, Creamer was named Patriot League player of the week for the second consecutive week and the fifth time in six weeks. She leads the league in scoring with a 25.8 points-per-game average, as well as in assists, averaging seven a contest.

"Molly is having a phenomenal year. She is very passionate about the game and loves to win. She is all about team but has improved this year at stepping up and taking more shots in a game if we need her to," Fedorjaka said. "She has gotten better each year and that is a testament to how hard she works in the off-season."

The Orange and Blue welcome Colgate to Davis Gym this Saturday for a 1:00 p.m. tip-off in what will be the last regular season home game for the senior class, which has the chance to leave the school as the all-time winningest class in the history of the program. The Bison look to avenge an earlier loss to the Red Raiders this season.

"I know we are all excited for the game. It is going to be a big game for our kids," Fedorjaka said. "It is going to be a special day as well, as it will be our last regular season home game for our seniors."

21 at-bats. Already, the Bison have impressed their opponents; they are ranked third in the Patriot League going into the season by Collegiate Baseball's preseason poll conducted by coaches. Gregg Farmery '02 has been named the Patriot League Preseason Pitcher of the Year and Lackett and Allen were named "Other Players to Watch" by Collegiate Baseball.

One concern for the team is the loss of nine seniors from last season's roster. Fortunately, many are hopeful that the transition will go smoothly. Many of the players stepping up this season into infield and outfield positions have seen time and have experience from past seasons. In the infield, the Bison will feature four first-time starters in 2002.

Although the Bison lost a pair of solid catchers to graduation, four talented first-year players are competing for the starting position. Austin Barrett '05, Matt Belmont '05, Phil Bunting '05 and Greg Ekimoff '05, all have potential to fill this important spot. Players like Pete Wolf '04, Jon Campagna '04 and Chris Cippolloni '04 also look strong defensively.

The Bison expect to make another run at the Patriot League title this season. Navy will be the team's most competitive opponent, while teams like Holy Cross and Lehigh could come on strong this season and give the Bison a run for their money.

Though the loss of nine seniors has led many to question this year's team's ability, the pitching is deep, the defense looks great and the determination is strong.

and Blue their ninth victory of the year.

The Bison benefited from the hot hand of point guard Chris Rodgers '04, who hit 8-of-9 from the field and 4-of-4 from behind the three-point line en route to a career-best 23 points. Rodgers also added three assists, three rebounds and one steal.

The bench combined with Rodgers to score 41 of the 76 points.

The lead hit double-figures at 26-16 after Chris Niesz '05 drilled a three-pointer. Prior to that basket, the team used a 12-4 run to snap a 9-9 tie. That tie proved to be the only tie of the ball game.

The Bison put the game away for good after Jehiel Lewis of Navy hit a three-pointer of his own. Bailey and Niesz went back-to-back from downtown as the Orange and Blue extended their lead to 41-23. The two threes were part of a 15-4 scoring run for the Bison.

For almost the first 14 minutes of the second half, the Midshipmen could only scrape for two field goals as they saw the host stretch the lead to as many as 28 points on four different occasions.

The Bison shot a blistering 58.7 percent from the field and hit 8-of-15 from three-point territory. The squad hit 61.5 percent of their shots in the first half! The Bison also outworked Navy on the glass, 37-31.

The team's defensive intensity was evident, as the visitors shot a lackluster 36.8 percent from the field. Navy also shot under 50 percent from the foul-line, going nine for 20.

Werner had a huge game for the Bison, scoring 16 points on 6-10 shooting from the field and 4-of-5 from the foul-line. He also snatched 10 boards. Bailey scored 15 points and handed out four assists. Ben Slater '04 had a career-high 11 points while grabbing seven rebounds. Niesz totaled six points on the two three-pointers.

Tennis squad ranked fifth in PL

By Caity Selleck
Staff Writer

The University's women's tennis team is ranked fifth in the Patriot League as of Feb. 5, two places behind their first league competitor of the season, Colgate. The Bison continue to work hard in preparation for the upcoming contest on Sat., Feb. 23.

Patriot League rankings are done by the coaches in the league, but coaches are not allowed to vote for their own teams. Each team is awarded a certain number of points by each coach, depending on where they feel that team will end up at the end of the season, with a certain number of points awarded for each place.

Although the team was relatively happy with this fifth place rank, they feel that they can do better than expected this year.

"I think that our team has the potential and ability to take first in the Patriot League this year. We are very strong and have a lot of depth making us very competitive in the league," Jill Wurzburg '03 said. "We have been working very hard this off-season, which I think will really pay off."

The team also has a handful of promising rookies this year, with a very strong first-year class adding to the team's depth and strength.

"We have three very promising freshmen that will bring a lot to the lineup this year," Kristin Inglis '02 said. "In particular, Nada Curcic '05, Ashley Diers '05 and Tanya Sichko '05 will bring a lot of depth to our lineup."

The team has been preparing for their match against Colgate next weekend. Although in the past, matches at Colgate have been played in their carpeted field house, this year the team will be playing on a neutral, hard-floor court.

"It is a new Patriot [League] rule that all league matches must be played on hard surface courts so that no team has an advantage," Wurzburg said.

The lineup for the match has yet to be determined, though Head Coach Rebecca Helt will probably know by the end of the week.

"The lineup for the Colgate match should be announced next week, but that lineup will probably change again," Helt said. "Sometimes it takes a few weeks into the season to determine your strongest lineup."

With graduation of team's all-time winningest class, the Bison lacrosse team looks to continue their success this season

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

Preseason scrimmages have led the Bison to believe that they can repeat as Patriot League Champions, and maybe even out-do what was one of the greatest seasons in University history. Last year's season brought the Bison to the forefront of men's lacrosse in the nation with huge victories over traditional powerhouses North Carolina, Hobart and Penn State, earning them their first ever NCAA berth.

Courtesy of Athletic Communications

Captain Kevin Smithies '02 will lead the Bison defense this year.

While the Bison have graduated the all-time winningest class in team history, they believe they have what it takes to take their program to an even higher level.

"We lost five very strong players, but we've made good progress in the fall, and we feel like we're starting to come together as a team," head coach Sid Jamieson said.

Under the direction of Jamieson, who won the Patriot League Coach of the Year honor last season, the Bison have earned the rights to a preseason ranking of 19. With the recent surge of the program, teams who rarely come to the University like Harvard, Penn and Maryland are now on the Bison's home schedule and looking to test the legitimacy of the new contenders.

For this reason, Jamieson has made the preseason matches just as challenging. The squad faced Towson, a final four team in last year's NCAA tournament, and will play Virginia this Sunday.

While the Bison came out on the losing end to Towson 14-11, they are confident that things will only improve from here.

"We've shown a lot of maturity through the past couple weeks," Wes Fetchet '04 said. "We're gelling and growing during this preseason and the outlook is good."

Fetchet's offensive play won him the Patriot League Rookie of the Year honor last season. He'll be joined again this year by attacker Dennis Geraghty '03 who had the most goals on the team last year with 39, putting him sixth on the University's all-time single season record books and 12th overall in the nation. Kelly Hogue '03, who was third on the team in overall points, will also return for the Bison offense.

But it's the defense that has brought the program to where it is right now. "We believe that we win all of our games on defense," Jamieson said. "Our objective going into every game is to hold our opponent to under 10 goals, and if we do that we think we can beat anyone."

Leading the defense will be co-captain and preseason All-American honorable mention Kevin Smithies '02. Smithies was a big reason why the Bison were so successful last year, leading the team to a seventh place ranking in the nation in scoring defense. Backing up the defense will be goalie Justin Sussman '03 who came into the net halfway through the season last year, and was seventh in the nation in save percentage. His efforts have also earned him an honorable mention for All-American status.

"This season we're a much more offensively potent team than we have been in the past," Smithies said. "So that means that if our defense can come together, we'll be really solid."

The Bison will be tested against seven top 25 teams in the nation, which makes their preseason preparation all that more important.

"We're always looking to win, and it's a big confidence booster if we can do it before the season starts, especially against these top teams like Virginia," Fetchet said.

The loss to Towson doesn't discourage the Bison who know that their young team will have to play together in order to gel and compete.

> "We've shown a lot of maturity through the past couple weeks, we're gelling and growing during this preseason and the outlook is good.
> —Wes Fetchet '04

"We need continual improvement in areas that we didn't do as well as we would have liked to, and I think we can do that," Jamieson said.

The Bison will play their first five games at home in a critical stretch against top ranked opponents. This year's games will be played in the football stadium on the turf that was recently put in. The Bison see the change as beneficial for their team.

"I have mixed emotions about the field change just because we've never played a game on it, but I know that it's definitely for the best for our program," Jamieson said.

The ultimate objective for this season is to repeat as Patriot League Champions. The Bison are preseason favorites, but Army and Hobart are also strong contenders who have rich traditions and spots in the national preseason top 25 poll.

"It's our number one goal," Smithies said. "I don't see why we can't repeat as Champions."

Me like sports

By Aaron DeRosa

Sportsmanship is overrated

I don't understand what's so special about sportsmanship. I mean, what is sportsmanship if not subconscious gloating dolled up in a lace teddy like my weekend attire? Everyone knows that if you're a good sportsman all you're really doing is rubbing it someone else's face just how much better you are then they are.

Without the whining, without the flagrant acts of malice and unwitty banter sputtering from your parched, cracking lips, you have no choice but to be branded a good sport. And with that title comes responsibility, a 14 letter word that no self-aggrandizing athlete wants to hear.

Being a good sportsman is like stumbling into the "friend zone" with some great person who you had romantic aspirations for; damned if you know how you got there and double-damned if you know how to get out.

Sportsmen are all the same. They have this smug air about them, this jua du vive, like they think they're better than us because they can spell jua du vive right on the first try. Or second try for that matter. Leave me alone, it's French, look it up. Sportsmen have that forced, and sometimes not-so-forced, smirk across their face. This heavy, sweating, festering stench of superiority that painfully exudes from their pores like the plot of a "Beverly Hills 90210" episode.

Playing a game of intramural basketball, I was lucky enough to witness the best part about athletic competition; that snot-nosed, simpering weenie with his thumb up his butt (which could be why he couldn't sink a shot) who calls fouls to serve the "proper outcome" of a game. These types are everywhere. They look like you and me. They could be reading this article over your shoulder right now ... in fact, why don't you give a quick elbow jab to whoever's standing next to you right now ... go on, it'll be fun. These are the types who call every suggestion of "unfairness" against your team, but then have no qualms with jumping on your back to swat at the ball like some infernal simian with turrets syndrome shouting "GIMME!" at the top of his lungs. Easy Poncho ... relax ... have a pop-tart ... cigarette ... something.

> ...Athletic competition does not function without the constant sportsman-whiner paradigm. Without such a system in place, games would go smoothly, athletes would enjoy themselves, my complexion would clear up, Kobe Bryant would no longer be allowed on television, water would cease to flow, hell's smoldering fires would fizzle and Saint Valentine would not be the wretchedly abhorred meddler he has become.

Now these fouls wouldn't be half as upsetting if they didn't affect me, as is so often the case in life. After a beautifully clean and well-executed block, I was passed the ball where I ran the length of the court and sunk an uncontested layup. Unfortunately, the ball was called back because one of their players felt that he was fouled, a ludicrous claim. Again, this wouldn't upset me if not for the fact that I score about as often as New England teams win championships—pun intended.

But it was okay, because athletic competition does not function without the constant sportsman-whiner paradigm. Without such a system in place, games would go smoothly, athletes would enjoy themselves, my complexion would clear up, Kobe Bryant would no longer be allowed on television, water would cease to flow, hell's smoldering fires would fizzle and Saint Valentine would not be the wretchedly abhorred meddler he has become. My team were good sports, and as such, we knew that we were better than our opponents and thus there was no need to whine. Rather we kept playing with the smug indignation of Stephen Hawking talking to a know-it-all high school physics teacher.

At the end of the game when we shook hands, the other team refused to look us in the eyes, as if they'd suffered a horrible embarrassment. To be perfectly honest, they did ... I scored on them. Rest assured, within an hour after the game I had emailed my mommy and daddy and told them what happened. Even though I didn't get credit for it, it was a moral victory from the 5'7" lightweight from Eastchester, N.Y. They were proud of me and gave me two gold stars.

Now one would hope that this sort of behavior would dissipate the older one got, or the more specialized one became, but actually the opposite is true. As you reach the upper echelons of athletic achievement, i.e. the Olympics, the level of competition increases, and thus, so does the level of obstinate sniveling.

I think, therefore, that we should be instituting an entirely new sport to the world athletic community. It will have wide appeal because it will allow armchair quarterbacks and backseat drivers alike to voice their opinions. Basically it's a Competitive Obnoxious Whining competition, or COW. We'll get all these COW competitors to go head to head in a sumo-wrestling fashion. The uniforms will be loincloths so that these people can be de-gendered and seen for the insufferable leaches suckling on the veins of athletic integrity that they are.

Of course, that's just my opinion, I could be wrong.

Former Olympic glory dwindling

COMMENTARY

Rob Schmicker

Growing up, I thought the Olympics were awesome. I enjoyed being able to stay up on a school night just to watch an athlete from a country that I knew nothing about win a gold medal. I was inspired not only to learn more about the athletes, but the countries that competed in the Olympics as well. But over the years, my love for the Olympics has slowly decreased. I'm not sure if I can blame it solely on any single factor. I just find the Olympics to be a) too commercialized b) too political c) boring and hard to watch.

I can remember a time when carrying the Olympic torch was an honor. When a person is fortunate enough to carry the torch on its way across the country, local TV crews in thousands of small towns gladly cover the newsworthy story. It's a big deal to the common man, but apparently not everyone has the same enthusiasm.

Take for instance, five-time Olympic gold medal speed skater Eric Heiden. Heiden was asked to take part in the torch lighting ceremony, but he declined since he would not be the one to actually light the cauldron. This is what the Olympics have become–everyone wants the spotlight and their name on the product. Not only is there cutthroat competition for who gets to light the torch, but there is cutthroat competition in trying to get the torch in the first place. Recent scandals have rocked the Olympic bidding process as allegations of bribery and other misdoings have tarnished the Olympic name. Bidding for the Olympics has become as dirty as American politics. We know there is something wrong with the voting system, but we are unwilling to change it.

But can you blame countries that are willing to do anything and everything to bring the Olympics back to their homeland? Sure, it may be unethical, but the benefits heavily outweigh the costs. The Olympics are big business and that is exactly what they bring.

While Salt Lake City may have had to shell out millions of dollars to prepare for the Olympics, it will be well worth it. The local economy will flourish and the region will receive tons of publicity. In 1994, Lillehamer served as the perfect ambassador for Norway, showing millions of people around the world how beautiful a country it is. The same goes for Nagano, Japan (1998) and Sydney, Australia (2000)—the exposure they received is without rival.

Salt Lake City is in line for the same publicity and exposure as past Olympic Games, but I am a little skeptical on whether this is good for our country. After the attacks on Sept. 11 it seems almost fitting that Olympic Games, known for their motto of worldwide peace, be held in the United States. We have all been recovering since the attacks, and this may actually serve as another rallying point for Americans of all walks of life. We can show that our lives have gone on–that the terrorists have not shaken our fundamental notions of life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. We have moved on, but we have not forgotten and we intend to show the world our strength.

This thinking was shown in the Opening Ceremonies, which started with the entrance of the Ground Zero American Flag and ended with chants of "USA! USA!" as the 1980 Olympic gold medal, "Miracle on Ice" Hockey team lit the cauldron. In between, there was the parade of nations followed by a show that gave tribute to the American frontier, Native Americans and the victims of the Sept. 11 attacks. While it was very beautiful and moving, I had to wonder if we were going about things correctly.

First off, it seems wrong to parade our Native Americans in front of millions of people, making it seem as if everything is perfect, when in fact we have been savage to them since our arrival on this continent some six centuries ago. It feels as if we are giving the rest of the world an untrue representation of our country, as Native Americans are unjustly no longer a big part of our image and culture.

Taking the focus off of the Native Americans, I feel the ceremony might in fact have been too patriotic. In the past the host nation put on a show to display what their country was all about, but it took a back seat to the parade of nations, in which all competing countries were the focus. This year, it seemed as if it was the Olympics of the United States, rather than of the world. We sent a strong message that terrorism would come to an end, but it may have been a little too strong.

Instead of a simple show that others could be proud of, we had a ceremony that made us proud and happy. We paraded our flag around as if our recovery and commitment to end terrorism was the main focus of the Salt Lake City Olympics.

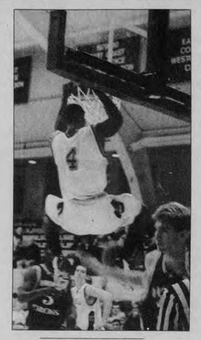
It could be just another act to make terrorists despise the United States even more. We have been unprepared for the worst in the past and I can't help wondering if this could lead to more animosity. But I do feel safe knowing the precautions that the United States is taking at the Olympics.

The United States has implemented a $310 million dollar security plan for the games and is determined to stop any possible incidents before they begin. This way, the world's athletes can feel safe in search of their dream.

It's hard to tell if the Salt Lake City Games will be a success or not, but there is much potential. A sense of security, unity, sportsmanship and love for one another during these games will once again bring the Olympics back into the spotlight.

Athlete of the Week

By Scott Kloss



Boakai Lalugba

Boakai Lalugba '03 is this week's athlete of the week. Lalugba, a 6'6" forward on the men's basketball team, scored a game-high 25 points and sank the go-ahead basket with 1:22 remaining to carry the Bison to a 65-62 victory over Army last Saturday. The win pulls the Orange and Blue into a three-way tie with Lafayette and Holy Cross for second place in the Patriot League.

The Bison (10-13, 6-4 Patriot League) let an 11-point halftime lead slip away but used solid defense and clutch free-throw shooting in the final minute to secure their third road victory of the season. "B.T," as Lalugba is known, scored 16 of his 25 points in the second half to secure the victory.

"I think my teammates gave me the ball more. I had a disappointing game against Navy the game before and I just felt like I had to step it up and be ready to play," Lalugba said.

Lalugba, who is known for his thundering slam dunks and clutch three-point shooting, is proud of his team's work ethic and wants to take it to the next level.

"We are really gelling well especially since Bailey is healthy now. We have the ability to win the Patriot League tournament and win it all, but only if we keep working hard and giving it our all every game and every practice. Our goal is to be the best team we can possibly be and to go to the NCAA tournament," Lalugba said. "My individual goals are to help my team win ball games by doing whatever is necessary. I think I was kind of robbed last year when I didn't make any All-Patriot league selections, so this year that has inspired me to basically go out there and let the league know and opposing coaches that I am real this year," Lalugba says.

Lalugba has done nothing short of dominate. Just as the Olympics have demonstrated to us the best the world has to offer, Lalugba has stepped up to lead the Bison within striking distance of a first place finish in the Patriot League. Lalugba has avoided the injury bug that has hampered the Bison, playing in all 23 games this season while averaging 15.3 points-per-game. In times of hardship he looks towards his mother and Michael Jordan, his two biggest inspirations.

Off the court, Lalugba is a business management major and is pursuing a minor in marketing, hoping to land an advertising job. In his spare time he enjoys video games and being with his friends.

Senior Bryan Bailey a strong leader

By Brian Klotz
Senior Writer

Although the highlight of senior Bryan Bailey's University basketball career came in a 74-68 loss to Lafayette, no one doubts the magnitude of the accomplishment. Feb. 2 marked the day that Bailey scored his 1,000th point, joining a list of only 27 other players in University basketball history to surpass the number.

Still, Bailey looks back on the days when he was a first-year player and didn't even know if he would play. "Reaching 1,000 points was definitely the farthest thing from my mind when I came in as a freshman," Bailey said. "I was coming into the gym and saying to myself, 'I don't even care if I sit the bench, I just want to be on the team and go to the NCAA tournament."

Bailey considered his first appearance on the University courts to be as a walk-on, but Head Coach Pat Flannery didn't see it that way.

"We definitely knew who he was and wanted him to be a part of our program," Flannery said. "When he came to Bucknell, we knew he wanted to play basketball. How good he would be and what level he was going to play at was the question."

As it turns out, Bailey got his beginnings in the sport at the age of six when he went to the park with his father and brother. As he grew up in Long Island, N.Y., he found himself becoming involved in numerous sports such as track and football, but all throughout middle and high school, basketball was primary.

Even after graduating from South Side High School and being recruited for, to his surprise, football, Bailey knew his basketball future was more important.

"I wanted to continue playing basketball in college, but I wasn't being recruited anywhere," Bailey said. "I had to go out and promote myself and get schools to look at me."

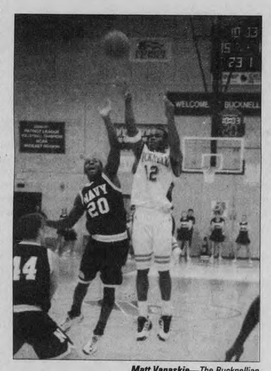
After checking out Boston and Brown, Bailey settled on Bucknell after a positive visit to the school.

"I came here in April of my senior year and had a good time," Bailey said. "The atmosphere of the campus was warm and friendly, and I felt like I could come here and play for them."

Bailey's steady improvement from an average of 1.8 points per game since first joining the team to the nearly 16.1 that he is averaging this season are keys to the team's success. But Bryan's personal success is rooted in his approach to practice.

"I think most of his ability to score is due to his individual work ethic," teammate Boakai Lalugba '03 said. "He's in the gym forever, working hard."

"When your best player is your hardest worker, you have something special," Flannery said. "He is also very gifted as an athlete and I think he has made himself into a very complete player."



Matt Vanaskie—The Bucknellian

Guard Bryan Bailey '02 has been plagued by injuries but still managed to break the 1,000 point mark last week.

Along with his athletic ability on the court, Bailey has established himself as a strong student. Majoring in management, Bailey has made the Dean's list the past two semesters.

"We get a lot of support from the coaches and the administration," said Bailey. "Being on the team teaches us good time management skills and how to balance school and sports."

The past two seasons have shown the team how good of a scorer Bailey can be. However, it's not just his offense that earned him a spot on the All-Patriot League team last year and as a candidate for All-Conference Player of the Year this season. His defensive game is something that Bailey regards very highly, and with a total of 47 steals last season, it's easy to see why.

"I'd say the strongest part of my game is probably my defense," Bailey said. "From when I came in as a freshman, I had to do it well. I take great pride in it."

As team captain the past two seasons, Bailey has been a leader of the team, but not necessarily a vocal one. Teammate Dave Cohen '03 believes that goes along with his other strengths.

"In my mind, his most significant attribute is his ability to lead by example on the court," Cohen said. "He has definitely been a mentor to many of us because of his tremendous athletic talent and knack for the game I haven't seen many other people have."

Bailey thinks that only good things for the team can come from his recent achievement of 1,000 points.

"I personally think that only something positive can come from it," Bailey said. "To see a guy walk on and score 1,000 points might inspire someone to raise his personal goals or work a little harder."

With the season nearing a close, look for the ball to be in Bailey's hands.

"He's our go-to guy," Lalugba said. "We have the best chance of winning when the ball is in his hands."

"From my perspective, I feel that he is the best player in the league," Flannery said. "If there is someone better than him, I'd like to see who. I wouldn't trade Bryan for anybody."

Track team competes in last home meet

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer

This past weekend, the Bison track and field team competed in their last indoor home meet of the season. While a select group of athletes traveled to New York to compete in the Armory Collegiate Invitational, the remainder of the squad made the most of their last home meet, the Bucknell Winter Classic. The two meets provided the final preparation races before the Patriot League Championships.

"Overall, we used this home competition as a tune up for the conference championship. I thought that we came out of the meet looking very good for the conference meet this upcoming weekend," Head Coach Kevin Donner said.

The women's team tallied five first-place finishes overall, three individual victories and two relay victories. Picking up her third win of the season, Maria Garcia '04 took first place in the weight throw with a toss of 48-3 1/2.

Jennifer Marsh '05 ran away with the 1,000-meter event with a time of 3:03.61, while teammate Michelle Baylor '03 took second place. Theresa Dennis '03 and Becki Marshall '02 finished the mile in third and fourth place, respectively. Monique Boley '05 placed first in the 500-meter dash with a time of 1:18.23, the eighth best time in the University's history.

The distance medley team consisting of Marshall, Kristin Kyzmir '02, Kelly Raffety '05 and Kristen Ferrell '02 won the event with a time of 12:38.83. The second relay victory for the Bison came from the 4x400-meter relay team comprised of Boley, Nicki Piper '03, Kiley MacDonald '05 and Rehana Lanewala '05, who combined for a time of 3:59.94.

> "[Army] is the indoor meet that we have been aiming for all season. We feel as though we are ready to contend for the championships on both the men and women's sides"
> —Kevin Donner, head coach

One of the high points of the meet for the men's squad was the first place finish by Matias Palavecino '03 in the 1,000-meter run with a time of 2:33.94. In addition to Palavecino's victory, Adam Kaufman '03 contributed to the success with a second place finish in the 35 lb. weight throw. Wes Reinhardt '04 took third in the mile with a time of 4:22.19. Matt Solomon '03 finished second in the 200-meter dash with a season best time of 22.87 and Cotie Strong placed third in the 500-meter dash, clocking in at 1:06.61.

While their teammates were hard at work in central Pennsylvania, a select few were making their marks in New York at the Armory Collegiate Invitational. This meet is a high-caliber national-level meet, where teams try to qualify for the higher scale meets. One of the highlights of the meet was the fifth place finish of Kelly McConnell '02 in the University mile with an astounding time of 4:55.74.

This time was enough to qualify her for the ECAC Championship and earn her the second fastest time in University history. LaTonya McSwain '02 finished in first place and raced her personal best in the University 800-meter run with a time of 2:16.15. Stephanie Bango '02 came in second in the 800-meter run with a time of 2:09.31, while teammate Amy Calvo '05 earned ninth place in the 400-meter dash with a time of 57.73, the fourth fastest mark in Bucknell history.

For the men, the top performance came from Noel Powell '04 who placed second in the long jump with a leap of 23-9 and came in fifth in the 200-meter dash with a time of 22.05, the second fastest time that the University has ever produced.

Ryan Newberger '05 placed 18th in the 400-meter dash with a time of 49.80, his seasonal best and the fifth fastest in Bison history.

The distance medley came in fifth in the University division with a time of 10:03.78. The team was comprised of P.J. Ward '02, Newberger, Eric Furst '03 and Aaron Hanlon '04.

The Bison travel to Army this Saturday for the Patriot League Championships.

"This is the indoor meet that we have been aiming for all season. We feel as though we are ready to contend for the championships on both the men and women's sides," Donner said. "The top competition will come from the two military academies. Looking at all the of the times and performances, it looks like the league is the toughest that it has ever been, but we are up for the challenge."

TOYOTA
Celica—
The Inside Story
On the outside, it's easy to see that Celica is race-track inspired. But the real excitement is on the inside...under the hood. Take the Celica GT-S...Toyota worked with Yamaha to build a 180 HP engine redlined at 7800 RPM...equipped it with Variable Valve Timing with intelligence...a computer that constantly monitors and retunes your engine for maximum performance...a cam with two sets of lobes to provide two ranges of valve lift and duration for more usable horsepower. There's direct ignition for greater reliability... iridium-tipped spark plugs for reduced maintenance...a stainless steel exhaust manifold...a water-cooled oil cooler. And mated with Toyota's 4-speed electronically-controlled automatic "Sportshift", you get transmission shift switches on the steering wheel...just like Formula 1 race cars. Sweet.

An abroad perspective: a Semester at Sea

By Liz Wilmarth
Contributing Writer

We all knew what the song was once they started singing it, it was one of those songs that you heard almost every day. As I watched these five strangers singing "Happy Birthday" to a young girl in Japanese, I was astounded at how much I could comprehend about this situation, without being able to speak their language. My friend and I ran out of the bar and down to the corner store to purchase some sort of gift, and had to make do with a bag of cookies. We rushed back into the tiny establishment and presented our offering to the birthday girl. She giggled and graciously accepted. Soon she came over and brought my four friends and I slices of her birthday cake, bowing constantly in thanks. We then swapped addresses and took pictures of each other, all apparently thrilled at the interaction, although we exchanged no words.

This is just one story I have from my time on Semester at Sea, the program I did while I was abroad last semester. I lived on a ship that circumnavigated the globe, stopping in nine ports over 100 days. While on the ship, I took classes such as World Religion, World Cultures and Society, Women's Health in the third world and Marine Biology. I traveled to Japan, Hong Kong, Beijing, Vietnam, Singapore, India, The Seychelles, South Africa, Brazil and Cuba. Classes on the ship were to prepare us for time in port, and that was where most of my stories came from.

A woman named Sovia whose restaurant we ate at for five days invited me to a Moon Festival celebration in Vietnam. She explained the holiday as their form of Thanksgiving, and said we were her daughters for the evening. I shared a comical moment with many Chinese tourists on the Great Wall of China, when I dropped my water bottle down a large sloping section of the walkway, and had to chase after it. I attended Buddhist Temples and Shinto Shrines. I rode in rickshaws and bargained with shopkeepers at markets in China, India and Brazil. I listened to Fidel Castro speak about relations between Cuba and America. I saw Ghandi's tomb, and the footsteps outlining the walk he took on the last day of his life. I stood in Hiroshima on Sept 15 and looked at the lone building left standing after we had dropped the atomic bomb. I had Sushi in Japan, wine from a South African vineyard, Cuba cigars in Havana and actual Indian and Chinese food, which are nothing like the Indian or Chinese food you could get here.

Semester at Sea is a program designed so that students from all over the country can use the world as their campus. Many criticize the program for not being academically challenging enough, but as for me, I learned more on this voyage then I have in any other class in my life. The difference between what you learn in Semester at Sea and what you learn in the classroom is the way that the information is presented to you. You learn about a subject, and before you know it, you are there, actually experiencing it. The first port my ship stopped at was Japan. For the first two weeks on the ship we had learned about Japanese culture, and how they were a communal society, meaning they cared more for the group than the individual. We were told that there were jobs set up explicitly to make people happier, such as a McDonalds worker whose sole job is to bow to customers as they enter the store. This sliver of information might have escaped me, but as we pulled into the Port of Kobe there was a band playing to greet us, and at each edge of the band were two ladies dressed in pink, who were simply waving. It took us about half an hour to pull the ship in and dock, and those ladies just kept on waving, because that was their job, and they took pleasure in having this societal role. Seeing that cemented the concept of a communal society in my mind.

Another example, I must have learned hundreds of times over the past 20 years that the farther away you get from the equator, the larger the discrepancy in day and night can be, but on the equator there is always 12 hours of each. Until last semester I could never remember which was which. But now, I will never forget how cold it was on the top deck of the ship during sunset at 9:30 p.m. in the Arctic Circle. Or that when I was on the equator and would get out of class at 5 p.m. it was already pitch black. This is the defining characteristic of Semester at Sea. No matter which classes you take, you will observe what you learn, and you won't be able to forget it after that.

People ask me if it was difficult living on a ship for three months, or if the accommodations were comfortable, or if the food was good. All I can say is that the ship becomes your home, you don't notice the accommodations and if you are complaining about the food on this voyage you need to put things into the larger perspective. I can now say that I have been around the world, I navigated myself around countries where I couldn't speak a lick of the language. I have a greater understanding of world issues, cultural differences and multiple religious practices. These are skills that could not have been taught in a classroom.

The administration told us that when returned home we would feel like fish out of water, and it's true. Returning to America, things don't look the same as they did before I left. This voyage gave me the ability to see the world through new eyes. When our journey was over, many of us discussed how we would even begin to explain what we had experienced during our time abroad. One of my friends put it this way, which I think is the best way to sum it up: "Have you ever caught yourself in a moment and thought, 'wow, I can't believe this is my life. I can't believe I am doing this. What have I done in my life that got me to this point right now where I am seeing and hearing and smelling and touching and tasting this?' That is how you feel practically every minute of your voyage on Semester at Sea." There is so much out there, so much more than imaginable without travel. I couldn't more highly recommend this program, and I think I am safe in saying that my shipmates agree with me.

University high-tech with Blackboard

By Morgan J. Lloyd
Staff Writer

As many students are aware, professors are increasingly using Bucknell's Blackboard website (www.bb.bucknell.edu). Although this website is not brand new, its popularity has peaked this year. Blackboard allows professors to post a syllabus, assignments and announcements; students can check their assignments and even submit them through the site. In addition, group discussions may take place in a virtual classroom or on a discussion board. Although, Blackboard is a convenient and logical way to submit assignments and to keep up with technology, several drawbacks exist.

Commentary

First of all, it is necessary to check Blackboard on a regular basis to see if new assignments or announcements have been posted. This is not a difficult task, but when a professor does not inform his class of a new posting, it becomes easy to miss an announcement. On the other hand, if a professor emails a class with notification of a posting, this process seems completely redundant, as the professor could have included the announcement in the email.

Students living off-campus with limited internet access have fewer opportunities to check assignments. For example, if a change is made to a student's syllabus in the evening, he may not know to check Blackboard in time for the class the next morning. Even if the student has a paper copy of his syllabus, it is rendered useless because the online version has changed.

A remarkable and controversial aspect of Blackboard is group discussions. It is possible to work on a group project without ever having a group meeting! Group members can use the virtual classroom and converse in real time, as long as each member is on a computer at the same time. There is also a group discussion board where group members post messages for each other on a specified page at their leisure. Either way, projects can now be discussed and work divided online from the comfort of a dorm room. Therefore, the actual presentation is the very first time the group ever meets.

When a grade is given for a group project, a professor expects a clean and well-practiced presentation. Students who "wing it," therefore, take a big risk. Clearly, a group can still meet before a presentation in addition to discussing a project on Blackboard, but in some cases the assignment requires students to do all preparation online. Therefore, time is wasted doing both.

Technology is supposed to bring people closer to each other while saving time and needless effort. The aforementioned aspects of Blackboard seem to isolate students while causing them needless extra work.

Girls 'scout' scientific opportunities

By Meredith Atkinson
Features Editor

Last Saturday, more than 300 Girl Scouts filled the Olin Science building to participate in one of Circle K's most popular service projects called "The Bucknell Connection." The project is designed to teach young girls between the ages of eight and 11 about science and the opportunities for women that are now available in the field.

Professor of Biology Karen Knisely was the keynote speaker for the opening ceremony. She captivated the girls by teaching some interesting scientific facts and also by telling them about her career and how she became what she is today.

She explained that life does not always go exactly as planned. "Sometimes what you think you want to do doesn't work out and new avenues open up to you," she said.

She encouraged the girls to "follow your dreams as long as they last" but always be aware of reality.

Knisely also explained that as a result of the distinct roles of women and men in society in the past "women face special problems in society, however, there is no reason why girls shouldn't have careers today because jobs require intelligence, not physical strength."

The girls were visibly interested in all of the topics covered by Knisely, and showed their interest by asking many questions. Knisely said that it was her first year speaking at this event and that she appreciated the very attentive audience.

In addition to the opening ceremony, which every girl attended, there were several hands-on labs set up throughout Olin. University students, members of Alpha Phi Omega service fraternity and members of Circle K from Penn State all volunteered at each section.

Lisa Spagnola '02, projects chair for Circle K, said "the students are awesome with the girls." The lab workshops set up for the girls ranged from friction to water tension to optical illusions and were given clever names, such as "water tricks," "what you see is," "rock, paper, scissor," "here's the rub" and "science is KEWL."

"It's fun to communicate with different ages, it teaches them a lot and teaches you a lot through interaction," Amy Jewell '02, a Circle K volunteer and biochemistry major, said.

"The program is well organized and there is always a great variety of projects for the girls," Jeremy Tobin, an official from Circle K at Penn State, said.

"This event is a major success every year, and this year we have a record number of girls. The girls are from Northumberland, Snyder and Union County," said Suzanne Harrison, co-chair of the event.

Harrison said that this is the ninth year for this event and that it has become more popular each time. The event also helps Girl Scouts to earn their science and technology badges. Professor of Management Tammy Hiller was among the many Girl Scout troup leaders. She said that the program "shows girls how many things they can do with science."

American icon visits the University

By Kelly Korecky
Staff Writer

Since 1959, she has not aged, nor gained a pound. She is blamed for eating disorders, silicone breast implants and obsessive collections. She may be only 11.5 inches tall, but her influence on America is immense. She is none other than Barbie, an American phenomenon, and she has come to life at the University.

Last Friday, the life-size Barbie made her debut in the Langone Center Cave during an exhibition coordinated by the Women's Resource Center (WRC). After Courtney Spohn, a WRC student employee, completed the data research necessary for Barbie's construction, Craft Center Coordinator Gretchen Hughes and the members of the WRC staff began the year-long production of this fragile icon. Using calibers from the engineering department, Barbie's proportions were measured and then blown up to human size. Despite the durability of the Mattel Barbies, which withstand anything from buzz cuts to teeth-marks from pet dogs, the life-size Barbie is much more delicate. Hughes and WRC student employees Jessica Friedman '02, Phillip Jones '02, Ann Lee '02 and Han Thurain '04 created Barbie from a wooden frame and then covered her with layers of plaster of paris. Jones said Barbie's construction has taken over a year because she is so fragile and has broken several times. Debra Wilson, WRC employee, outfitted Barbie in a super-tight black top and mini-skirt, which was specially made for Barbie's extremely disproportionate frame.

Courtesy of the Women's Resource Center

Director of the Women's Resource Center Janice Butler shows the life-size Barbie. The life-size Barbie was made to teach students that Barbie's body is implausable.

According to Director of the Women's Resource Center Janice Butler, the goal of the project was to promote the idea that "it's alright not to look like Barbie because she's not a real person." If she were, she would be five feet, eight inches tall, 110 pounds and have to walk on all fours due to her impossible proportions of a 38 inch bust, an 18-inch waist and 33-inch hips. Her size two shoes would also make strutting down the catwalk a bit difficult as well. Not only would mobility be problematic, but Barbie's neck would be too thin to even hold her head up straight. She is not exactly runway material.

Friedman, who was instrumental in the construction of Barbie and planning of the debut event, explained that the project is designed "to generate awareness of the American cultural icons that we use to define standards of beauty. Barbie dolls are so widespread and such a huge influence on young girls, yet they are also much more subtle than commercial and magazine ads."

As a 1.9 billion dollar-per-year industry, Barbie's image invades the houses of hundreds of thousands of American children. The kind of impact Barbie may have on young girls' and boys' conceptions about body image is highly problematic for our contemporary society where fashion models, Weight Watchers, and eating disorders are glaring images in the media and models today weigh 23 percent less than the average woman, as opposed to 20 years ago, when they weighed 8 percent less.

According to Butler, the project is especially significant for college women because "there is a lot of pressure to look a certain way and it is important to remind them that bodies come in all shapes and sizes." The visual impact of the real-life Barbie demonstrates the absurdity of that idealized body type.

Surprise and incredulity characterized the reactions of both female and male students attending the event. Jones commented that students were "very surprised at how different she looks when blown up to life-size. People were most fascinated with her waist and her bust size." Jones added that many individuals actually put their hand on her waist because even upon seeing the model, the obscene smallness of her waist was inconceivable.

Keeley Patterson '04, whose sorority attended the event, said the program was "very meaningful, especially for women." Patterson, who still has her childhood Barbie collection, said she never realized that Barbie is "such a subconscious influence on young girls." While playing with the doll as a child, she explains that an "immediate image of beauty is imposed on us."

According to Friedman, the Barbie project was important for the University community.

"Nothing like this had been done on our campus before. I think it was also an interesting way to get many of the women on campus to think about the role that this doll played in their lives when they were young and to think about other influences that our culture has on the 'ideal' body image," Friedman said.

BJ's Steak and Rib House: Not only for meat-lovers

By Molly Koenig
Staff Writer

You certainly do not need a menu to know about BJ's Steak and Rib House specialties are steak and ribs. Their meats may be a little heavy for some, or unappetizing for vegetarians, but BJ's also offers a decent variety of soups, salads, sandwiches and seafood. They do not have a children's menu, but the their sandwiches and burgers will satisfy most kids' cravings.

Being a meat lover myself, and hearing nothing but compliments about BJ's, it has always been one of my top choices when going out to eat. But due to the difficulty of getting reservations, or simply finding a restaurant a little closer to campus, I didn't make it to BJ's until last weekend.

You can find a BJ's in both Danville and Selinsgrove, each being at least a solid 20-minute drive from campus. Inside there is a bar and several different seating rooms with many tables for both smaller parties, as well as for larger groups. The restaurant offers a lively atmosphere, but at times can get noisy due to the large size of the rooms. Not a place conducive to in-depth conversations. BJ's also offers take-out, available Monday through Sunday from 11 a.m. to 4 p.m., so if you don't feel like sitting in the lowly lit, noisy rooms, you can take your food elsewhere.

As for their specialty steaks, the trick is their dry aging process, which gives their steaks a complex and intense aroma. There is everything from a 20-ounce dry-aged Porterhouse to a smaller half-pound filet mignon. Steak entre prices range from $16.50 to $28.

Besides the featured hickory smoked babyback ribs, there are a few other rib combinations and sampler meals to choose from. For those who are looking for the best of both worlds, there are a variety of fish and meat combinations as well. Each entre comes with a choice of two traditional sides, making sure you don't leave the restaurant feeling anything less than "stuffed."

Everyone can find something on the dessert menu that is accompanied by a comprehensive list of coffees. But you might want to consider splitting whichever dessert you choose with a friend since the portion you'll receive is enough to feed at least three people.

As for presentation—not stellar, but if you're going to BJ's, presentation usually isn't a top consideration. The servers are attentive, never leaving your water glass empty and meals are served quickly, especially considering all the grilling and cooking required.

Reservations are highly recommended if you're going for dinner, especially if it's on the weekend. It gets extremely crowded in the tiny waiting area, so you'll have a much shorter and more pleasant wait if they're expecting you.

Overall I'd give BJ's an eight out of ten. You can splurge if you'd like, but you can also find a good number of choices for under $10, which is always a plus for us ever-broke college students.

Packwood's new director brings experience and enthusiasm

By Katie Zachry
Senior Writer

"It's important for any community to have a cultural base," Sara Finney Kelley, the new director of the Packwood House Museum of Lewisburg, said. As the new director for less than two weeks, Kelley already knows the importance of history.

Growing up in northern Virginia, Kelley was fortunate to visit the Smithsonian a number of times a year.

"I've always been interested in history," she said. "History is the evidence of the people who used to be here. It shows how they lived and what they did, and I find that very fascinating."

Kelley received her undergraduate degree in History from the University of Virginia. After working in Washington, D.C., she went to the University of Delaware where she studied American History and received a certificate in Museum Studies. A year later, she moved to Pennsylvania where she worked for Lehigh County Historical Society for over two years. She then went on to become the first full-time employee at the Centre County Historical Society, where she remained there for six years as the Historic Site Administrator.

"I was responsible for exhibits, programs, collections and a variety of other tasks. I did a little of everything," Kelley said.

At the Packwood House, Kelley does a little bit of everything and more. As one of the museum's three paid workers, Kelley supervises the staff and spends a lot of time working with the museum's board to develop long-term goals.

"The Board is very active," she said. "The museum heavily relies on the help and support of volunteers, many of whom are board members."

Kelley came to the museum with a number of goals in mind for the next few years. One of these is to increase people's awareness of the museum and what it has to offer.

"The Executive Committee and I have been talking about increasing the visibility of the museum throughout all of central Pennsylvania. The in-house collections are spectacular. There is such a variety of Pennsylvania craftsmanship and art that people don't realize is here," Kelley said.

> "It's like a huge yard sale, and we'll have everything from antique furniture to books and old computers.
> —Sara Kelley, director of Packwood House Museum

Despite the Packwood House's historical importance to Lewisburg, many University students are not familiar with the museum. Located at 15 North Water St., this building is one of the oldest log-built structures of its kind, dating back to the late 18th century. In 1936, Edith Fetherston, a University graduate, and her husband bought the house, with the hope to later open it as a public mansion. Today, the three-story building with 27 rooms is home to an impressive collection of 18th through 20th century Pennsylvanian artifacts. Tours of the house and exhibitions are offered Tuesday through Saturday.

According to Kelley, this reality will soon change. Another one of her goals is to create an internship program whereby history and art history majors can get academic credit for working at the museum.

"It's important for students to realize there is life beyond campus, and I would like to see more of an opportunity for practical experience involving students from the area schools and universities," Kelley added.

Kelley is also interested in establishing and maintaining a close partnership with downtown Lewisburg. She hopes these relations will help increase both financial support and the number of volunteers.

"She loves to be connected with the community," David Kelley, assistant professor of Electrical Engineering at the University, said.

"This type of position not only provides opportunities for lots of community contact, it requires it. Sara will thoroughly enjoy immersing herself in the town's activities."

One of the museum's upcoming activities is the Attic Tag Sale. Starting March 5 and running for two weeks, Packwood's tour center will be filled with miscellaneous items from people's attics.

"It's like a huge yard sale, and we'll have everything from antique furniture to books and old computers," Kelley said.

"Town-gown relations are very important, and I think Packwood House can be a part of that. Lewisburg has got a wonderful history, and the town has been around longer than most people think. Downtown has done a great job of keeping its historic district historic."

Renowned dancer teaches BDC

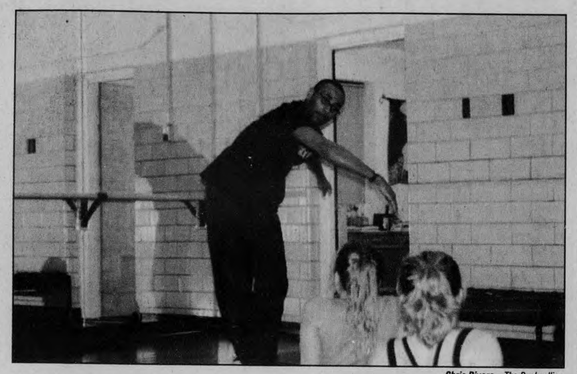
By Andrew Clugston
Senior Writer

On the eve of Black History Month, the Department of Theater and Dance hosted Andre Tyson, former principle dancer and company teacher for the Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater and presently a member of the dance faculty at the University of Wisconsin-Milwaukee.

Perhaps at the pinnacle of Tyson's merits is his career with the Alvin Ailey Dance Company, a household name within the dance world. The company is considered one of America's most acclaimed cultural ambassadors, dedicated to the preservation of unique black cultural expression and the enrichment of the American modern dance heritage.

While at the University, Tyson taught various dance classes, replacing some ballet and modern with floor barre and Pilates exercises (both styles of movement which encompass relaxing, therapeutic and cardiovascular properties that aid in developing a strong, versatile dancer). Tyson also trained eight members of the Bucknell Dance Company (BDC) in developing the commission piece entitled "Running w/ Scissors" over a week of intensive rehearsals.

The work, based largely upon modern dance technique (Horton) with classical lines, is set to a unique fusion of techno and new age music by the group Enigma. "'Running w/ Scissors' is all about deviating from norms, about living on the edge, accepting, if not embracing risks ... as opposed to not running with scissors, as social conventions might suggest," Tyson said.



Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

Andre Tyson, company teacher for the Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater, demonstrates for University dancers as part of the commission piece, "Running w/ Scissors," to be performed in April.

Attesting to the dynamism and intensity of the Ailey school, the commission piece is a challenge to all who are in it. "It is extremely aerobic," said dancer Steph Turi '02. "We go from floor to air and back again in seconds, constantly."

Grueling as it may be, Professor Er-Dong Hu, director of dance, supports the rigor provided by instructors such as Tyson. "Bringing in this high standard of professionalism is very good for the company and hopefully we can look forward to more artists like Tyson," Hu said.

The BDC will perform Tyson's "Running w/ Scissors," as well as other works of varied choreography on April 26 and 27 at 8:30 p.m. in the Weis Center.

Campus celebrates Chinese New Year

By Kang Tchou
Staff Writer

Every year over one billion people around the world stop working and partake in a 15-day celebration called Chinese New Year. According to the lunar calendar, this celebration lasts from the first day of the new moon until the first day of full moon. Each year, the Chinese Cultural Association (CCA) brings a part of this festivity to the University with its Chinese New Year celebration.

This year, the celebration commenced with a martial arts demonstration. Karate, having originated in India and spread from China to Japan, provided a dramatic opening. The crowd was amazed by the agility and fluidity of motion demonstrated by members of the University's Shotokan Karate Club.

The excitement continued as members of the Bucknell Dance Company dazzled the crowd as they performed samples of Chinese dances choreographed by Er-Dong Hu, associate professor of dance and director of the dance company at the University. After the audience's applause subsided, members of the dance company offered guests the opportunity to try the dances themselves. Numerous children from the local community embraced the opportunity to try their hand at dancing with Chinese ribbons and fans.

Yu-Ling Huang—The Bucknellian

Students performed traditional dances in the Chinese New Year celebration. The celebration took place in Larison Dining Hall.

The guests listened with intense concentration as James Pusey, associate professor of East Asian studies, taught the audience rudimentary facts concerning the Chinese language. After mastering a day's worth of Chinese, the audience was treated to a delightful performance of the music of the er hu played by Chia-Ching Chang. The er hu is a two-stringed instrument traditional to Chinese culture. The entertainment portion of the festival concluded with the singing of traditional Chinese melodies.

Between events, visitors had the opportunity to sample authentic Chinese cuisine made by both members of CCA and other event supporters. The lines grew long as soon as the food was brought out and served by members of CCA, who were dressed in traditional Chinese costumes. Many of the guests made return trips for food after visiting the various display booths set up in Larison Dining Hall. Rivaling the food stands in popularity was a booth manned by Chang where people could have their names written in Chinese calligraphy.

"Things like the food, the Chinese clothing, Professor Pusey teaching Chinese and the er hu that Mr. Chang was playing ... let people know what exists in other cultures," said Wynee Wong '04. "Events like these allow members of the University and the public to do things together. Many parents have adopted children from Asia. This gives them a chance to celebrate a holiday that [they normally wouldn't observe]."

Many members of the faculty and staff also attended the event. High praises were offered to CCA for the spectacular event.

"It was clear that the students who planned and carried out the program took great pride in Chinese customs and culture," said Thomas Rich, professor of mechanical engineering. "To learn about other cultures broadens one's perspective and gives fuller meaning to life. I talked to several American students in attendance. They all enjoyed the programs and the food. For many, it was a new glimpse into what seems to be a faraway land and people. A big 'thank you' is deserved by all of those who organized and carried out the activities."

Janet Jackson brings concert to area

By Kristi Johnston
A&E Editor

Janet Jackson performed on Feb.8 at the First Union Arena in Wilkes-Barre, Pa. as part of her nationwide All for You concert tour. The concert was widely accepted as one of the most impressive to hit the area in recent years.

From the moment Jackson descended onto the stage from a moveable podium dressed in pure white, it was evident that she possessed a stage presence rivaled by few in today's music industry. Followed in similar fashion by her dancers, the stage was set for an evening of high-energy and enthusiastic performances.

With the number of hits that Jackson has recorded over the years, it would seem nearly impossible to fit them all into a two-hour performance. However, Jackson rose to the challenge, singing not only her well-known classics, but also introducing several new songs from her All for You album.

Hip-hop sensation Ginuwine opened the show for Jackson. He, too, was accompanied by three dynamic dancers. Ginuwine's performance was marked by impressive dance numbers, as well as his latest hit, "Differences," which is currently receiving a lot of radio time. He also managed to fit pieces of his most well-known song, "Pony," into several different numbers on stage.

After this notable opening, Jackson herself took the stage to the welcome of a packed and excited arena crowd. Opening with three lesser-known numbers, she then took the audience through a variety of her most well-liked and famous hits. Included in this long list were crowd favorites "Again," "What Have You Done for Me Lately," "Miss You Much," "Escapade," "Runaway" and an extraordinary closing of "Rhythm Nation." She also included a variety of hits from her latest effort, such as "All for You" and "Son of a Gun," a variation of Carly Simon's "You're So Vain," performed on the album with the original artist.

Jackson's performance would not have been nearly as exciting without the aid of her eight dancers, five band members and two back-up singers. The dancers, in particular, took center stage on several occasions, transforming it into unique and mesmerizing scenery. It was a pleasant surprise to see such creativity on the tour of such a timeless artist.

When Jackson exited the stage, the crowd demanded an encore. Jackson delivered, performing "Doesn't Really Matter" and finishing with "Together Again." She also took the time to individually introduce all of her supporting cast.

Jackson has become an international sensation over the past decade and her concert in the area proved why. Her performance was filled with energy and animation. She also delivered a personal touch (she even pronounced Wilkes-Barre correctly) that made her concert truly unforgettable.

"Monte Cristo" actors shine

Jim Caviezel and Dagmara Dominczyk star in "The Count of Monte Cristo," based on the classic novel by Alexandre Dumas.

By Nicolas Willett
Staff Writer

"The Count of Monte Cristo" is undoubtedly the best "everything" movie since "Mask of Zorro." Based on the classic novel by Alexandre Dumas, "The Count of Monte Cristo" combines action, romance and humor.

The story is set in early 19th century France during the exile of Napoleon Bonaparte (Alex Norton). Edmond Dantes (Jim Caviezel) and his best friend Fernand Mondego (Guy Pearce) find themselves pulled into a political conspiracy. As a result, Edmond ends up in jail for over 10 years. While in prison, his fiancee, Mercedes (Dagmara Dominczyk), marries Fernand.

The plot thickens when Edmond escapes from prison and returns to avenge his name and win back his love. Jacopo (Luiz Guzman) adds an element of comedy to the dramatic adventure.

Caviezel, Pearce and Dominczyk give beautiful performances, perhaps the best of their careers. Relatively unknown, these actors convince the audience of their dynamic characters without relying upon the power of their names. Dominczyk and Henry Cavil (who plays her son) especially dazzle the audience with captivating good looks and brilliant acting.

Themes of love, loyalty and revenge surface within the film, creating an intriguing plot. Directed by Kevin Reynolds, the cinematography also enhances the overall quality of this remarkable movie. With cinematic characteristics that appeal to everyone, "The Count of Monte Cristo" deserves to be seen.

"Fat Men in Skirts" shocks crowds

By Campbell Gerrish
Staff Writer

This past weekend, Senior Misty Trezona and her troupe of actors brought something new and different to the Harvey Powers Theatre stage. Riddled with warnings of sexual content, foul language and somewhat disturbing themes. The advertisements for "Fat Men in Skirts" attracted big crowds both nights it played. Despite dense social commentary and outlandish presentation, Trezona's senior directorial project was a huge success.

Many did not know what to expect from the curiously titled production, and for those people the question was never answered. Trezona expressed that she was "really scared about how 'Fat Men in Skirts' would be received on the University campus."

The main themes included cannibalism and incest. Don Porter '02 said that the show "bordered on insanity and challenged me mentally ... beyond the superficial there was deep meaning about humanity. I've never seen acting taken to such limits."

The insanity and mental challenges Porter spoke of related to a myriad of obscure moments in the play, such as when Phyllis (played by Elizabeth Cizmar '03) asks her son Bishop (played by Adam Hargus '03) to cut off the arm of a dead nun for food after being stranded on a desert island. This scene was the audience's introduction to the bizarre world of playwright Nicky Silver. Trezona asserted that Silver "wanted people to think about what society considers normal and what happens to people when taken out of society."

As the first act continued, the audience watched Bishop transform from a slightly disabled, stuttering child into a flesh-eating maniac, preaching about the sexual practices of monkeys. Later on, he ambled around the stage snacking on the carcass of a deceased infant. Images like this were difficult for some audience members to digest. "People had problems with the shock value of Nicky Silver," said Trezona. "Some felt that he just put those moments in simply for that shock value and that they really were not effective for the script."

However, Trezona went on to say that she believes those morbid parts are included as commentary on contemporary society. Silver sensationalizes the more disturbing moments in order to mirror how the news and media today sensationalize the same type of material.

The audience didn't know whether to laugh or to be silent during the more unsettling scenes. These consisted of watching Phyllis and Bishop, mother and son, making love; Bishop murdering his father's mistress (played by Liisa Britt '04) and eating a sandwich of her flesh; Phyllis cackling maniacally as Bishop murders his father (played by Tim Wojton '03). Audience members giggled in nervous laughter at the sights, some sat terrified and silent and others just simply stared in awe.

"You know it's a good play when an audience doesn't quite know whether to laugh or be quiet," said Trezona's father, who attended the show.

Even with the shocking content, the play's actors gave amazing performances. "Despite the bizarre nature of the plot, the actors' performances were unaffected, which made the plot more believable for me," said Matt DelGiudice '03.

The crew of four was flawless in its execution of an intense, complicated script, and with Trezona's direction, the actors' impeccable talent made "Fat Men in Skirts" a triumph for all those involved.

"This was definitely the hardest play I've ever worked on," said Trezona. "I picked this work of Nicky Silver's because I knew it was going to be hard and wanted my senior project to be something really rewarding."

Fraternities move toward BYOB system

By Carmen Mauriello
Senior Writer

The next time you open your mailbox and find an invitation to a fraternity party, look closely and you will see BYOB spelled out. Yes, fraternity parties at the University are supposed to be BYOB (bring-your-own-beer), in accordance with the policies of the fraternities' national organizations.

But due to lax enforcement, fraternities here have always ignored this rule, until now. The national organizations have placed increasing pressure on University chapters to convert to a BYOB system to decrease their liability, with Lambda Chi Alpha and Kappa Delta Rho (KDR) already on probation with their nationals for failure to comply.

In addition, the Interfraternity Council (IFC) created a trial period for BYOB between Feb. 9 and March 2 at all fraternity parties. Still, many administrators and Greeks have serious concerns about BYOB and are looking into alternatives, like instituting a third-party vendor to supply alcohol at parties.

What is BYOB?

The BYOB policy gives of-age students the option to bring beer—IFC set the maximum at six cans—to fraternity parties. Fraternity members take the beer at the door and the student gets an equal amount of tickets that he or she can redeem throughout the night for beer. This is a major switch from the current practice of University fraternities, where the fraternity purchases and distributes the beer itself.

The central issue is who is supplying the beer, and thus who is taking the major liability for injuries and incidents that result from its consumption. Currently, the fraternity supplies the beer and thus assumes major liability; with BYOB, the student supplies the beer and it would be less likely for the fraternity to be found liable for an incident at a party.

National fraternity organizations have BYOB in their bylaws to decrease liability, and with the large number of lawsuits they have been slapped with in recent years, they are increasing pressure on their chapters to comply with BYOB.

Why don't our fraternities comply with it?

Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker said the University has always encouraged its fraternities to follow the guidelines of their national organizations, which include BYOB, but he acknowledged that University fraternities have not complied with the BYOB policy in the past.

Baker explained that the rule was ignored because of lax enforcement. BYOB is not required by the University's risk management policy, so the burden of enforcement falls on the national organizations, which are based elsewhere and thus cannot monitor chapters closely.

The Concert Committee announced that Busta Rhymes will perform at the University's Gerhard Fieldhouse on Friday, April 19. Busta Rhymes's newest album Genesis currently sits at number 19 on Billboard's Top R&B/Hip-Hop Album list.

"He's a huge name and to bring him to the school is a huge deal," Co-Chair of the Concert Committee Christina Guevara '04 said.

According to Guevara, the Concert Committee conducted surveys at the Activities Fair and concluded students were looking for different types of music, such as hip-hop.

"I'm excited because it's a big change at Bucknell. The Concert Committee has been looking to do something a little different," Guevara said.

According to Concert Committee Chair Jackie Flicker '02, Busta Rhymes has been very successful at other schools.

"The Concert Committee is really excited because we're bringing the type of music that the student body wants," Flicker said.

Assistant Dean of Students and Director of Campus Activities and Programs Kari Conrad is also excited about the Busta Rhymes concert.

"I'm really pleased that the Committee landed such a great act for their spring concert. As both Jackie and Christina indicated, the Committee is very excited to bring a different genre of music to Bucknell," Conrad said. "While they still have a lot to do, they have worked very hard and pulled together as a committee to get this show. April 19 should be a great time in the Gerhard Fieldhouse."

The first single off of Genesis is "Break Ya Neck," which Grammy winner Dr. Dre produced.

Bostwick Cafeteria to close in March

Dining options spread around campus during five-month caf renovations

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

The Bostwick Cafeteria will be closed for renovations from March 9 until mid-August.

According to Tim Tenon, general manager of University Dining Services, there have not been any major changes to the Cafeteria since the Langone Center was built 31 years ago. Although the decor has been altered several times, there are mechanical devices that are not working properly and efficiently.

"We've done minor facelifts over the years, but we haven't addressed major areas of concern with the facilities that create problems," Tenon said.

One of the major changes is that the walls between the serving area and seating area will be knocked down. The blue walls in the serving area will be converted to beige tile with three different colored tiles for accents. Maple, cherry and mahogany cabinets will be at the food stations. New tile and carpet will also be installed.

The cooking equipment will be moved from the kitchen to the serving area so students can see what is cooked. Also, the food will be served directly from the oven.

"The changes will provide a more visually pleasing appearance and allow us to create a fresher, better quality product for our customers," Tenon said.

Numerous alterations will also be apparent in the eating area. The brick columns in the seating area will be reduced to approximately a quarter of their current size to provide a better sight line. The current wood ceiling in the center will be raised approximately two feet. The lighting will have the ability to be 10 times brighter than it is now.

According to Tenon, he is currently working with ISR and Telecommunications to install computer jacks in various locations and the possibility of wireless connections. There will also be a new microphone and new stereo system.

During the renovation, students will have numerous eating options. The Terrace Room, second floor LC rooms, the Refectory, the Center Room and Larison Dining Hall will be open for every meal. Walls Lounge will be open sometimes.

According to Tenon, many food stations from the Cafeteria will be in the LC locations and Larison. Larison will be adapted to keep the a la carte option, but will also have an all-you-can-eat option. The Terrace Room will serve Cafeteria food, as well as its usual food, and will be open longer than the Cafeteria was.

Food will still be cooked in the

Jacqueline Stiefel, an involved member of both the Lewisburg and University community, passed away on Feb. 8 due to a long-term illness. She died at Riverwoods in Lewisburg, where she had been a resident patient since November 2001. She was 77 years old.

Stiefel and her husband Harold '49 owned the Campus Theatre on Market Street, and were advisors for the Sigma Alpha Mu fraternity for over 40 years.

Stiefel's father and brothers built the Campus Theatre in 1941, and Stiefel became owner of the theater when her husband died in 1988. She maintained the Campus Theatre until its sale to Eric Faden in June 2001.

Stiefel also opened an art gallery called the Art Pod in 1970 alongside Renee Mahon, according to a March 2001 issue of Bucknell World. The subsequent success of the Art Pod led to the creation of the Rag Paddlar, a shop located next to the Campus Theatre that featured Stiefel's clothing, art, crafts and jewelry.

Stiefel was also very active in voluteerism in Lewisburg. She co-chaired the Victorian Holiday Parade, established the Lewisburg House Tour and was a founder of the Merchants Council. She was also a member of the University sends four students to regional championships

By Sandi-Jo Galati

Four University students participated in the College Bowl regional championships at the University of Pittsburgh last weekend, placing fourth among teams from Pennsylvania, Washington, D.C., Maryland, Virginia and West Virginia. The first-place finisher of the regional competition, the University of Pittsburgh, will advance to the national competition in Manhattan, Kan.

College Bowl, know by participants and fans as "The Varsity Sport of the Mind," is sponsored by the Association of College Unions International. Questions vary, including conventional subjects such as math, history or science and also non-traditional topics such as sports and pop culture.

"It certainly is not book knowledge that wins a College Bowl competition," said Christopher Rivera '02, a member of the regional team. "The competition is well-suited for those who know a lot of seemingly useless facts."

In a campus-wide tournament in November, 14 teams of University students competed for the chance to represent the University at the regional competition. Under the direction of Ruth Burnham, dean of students and Devon Barnhart '02, these teams competed in a double elimination tournament from which the top five scorers were selected as the all-stars that would become the regional team.

"In a small way, College Bowl is a 'bridge' between academics and the extracurricular," Burnham said. "It gives students a completely different activity to participate in, and it reaches out to students for their skills and knowledge and rewards them for it."

Rivera, Joseph P. Cherubim '02, Adam Vidoni '04, Louis Blau '03 and Andrew T. Van Schooneveld '02 although unable to attend, were those high scorers who were rewarded by their performance at the competition and chosen to represent the University at the regional competition.

After the first day of regional competition, Rivera, Cherubim, Vidoni and Blau defeated their first three competitors, one of which was the University of Pittsburgh. These victories gave the team the confidence they needed to finish the second day of round robin competition in first place with a record of 9-1, losing only to George Washington in the final round.

"We were all very pleased with our selves coming out of the round-robin portion," Vidoni said. "Being ranked first going into the play-offs was as good as winning the whole competition."

In the final elimination tournament, the University lost to Johns Hopkins University, a team that they had beaten in the round robin competition, and again to George Washington University to finish in fourth place.

Cherubim received special recognition from at the regional competition, distinguishing himself as the third highest individual scorer.

"Joe was a machine," Rivera said. He was answering questions after only hearing three or four words of the question."

Unlike the University, many of the other teams present have trivia clubs on campus that practice every week.

Burnham supports students at the University in launching similar College Bowl or trivia clubs that would enable more students to participate in the College Bowl, while giving them an opportunity to practice for the regional competition.

"I'd like to encourage the participants and many more students to be involved with College Bowl." Burnham said. "There's nothing to stop a College Bowl club from forming and holding ongoing intramural or extramural competitions during the rest of the school year."

Despite the fact that regionals marked their first competition together, Rivera felt that the team members complemented one another well.

"We were very proud of our performance considering we had never competed as a team before," Rivera said. "I think we made a good team."

Dining Services is considering removing the pool tables and adding cafe tables to the LC Mall to ease overcrowding.

kitchen next to the Cafeteria, but the Refectory and Larison kitchens will be used as well.

Meal credit will not be offered in the Bison on the weekends because of the limited space and availability. According to Tenon, cafe-type tables might be placed in the LC Mall and the pool tables might be removed for additional seating.

"We are so confined with space and equipment availability in the Bison; we can't do any more food lines than we are doing now," Tenon said.

Although Dining Services is working hard to make the transition as easy as possible, some students have expressed concern.

"I am certainly excited about the Cafeteria renovations, but I wish students were more informed about the changes that will be made. I hope that the renovations create a brighter atmosphere for students to dine," Lindsay Dills '03 said. "I am, however, concerned about how Dining Services will accommodate students in other eating facilities since the Botswick Cafeteria is the main dining location for many students on campus."

Students have shown worries regarding their meal plans, saying that if they had been informed about the renovations, they would have chosen the declining option as opposed to a block plan.

"We have always planned to provide meal plan options in an all-you-can-eat environment," Tenon said.

Although the changes might create some inconveniences in the beginning, Tenon is confident that they will not last long.

"There will be some minor inconveniences to start, but students will be pleased with the menu variety and they will really like the final results," Tenon said.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro also expects the results to be worthwhile.

'I think the inconvenience until August will all be repaid with interest in the end. A cafeteria that tends to look like a finished basement will become a modern and attractive eatery," Ferraro said.

According to Tenon, other options were considered before deciding to close the Cafeteria during the school year. One option was to do the work over two summers, which would have cost more and, therefore, the renovation would have to be scaled down.

"Although the University considered making the renovations a two-year process, it was a much more costly idea which could not be met by their budget. The new facility will be brighter, more spacious and will offer greater food variety to the students," Bucknell Student Government Campus Activities and Programs Subcommittee member Katie Michaels '04 said.

> "The changes will provide a more visually pleasing appearance and allow us to create a fresher, better quality product for our customers.
> —Tim Tenon, GM of Dining Services

According to Tenon, emails, signs and a web page will be used to inform students about menu options, hours of operation and the progress of the renovation.

"We are working hard with other departments to keep the inconveniences to a minimum. We certainly welcome comments, concerns and suggestions that students might have," Tenon said.

Town and Gown Committee, the Holiday Décor Committee, the Lewisburg Business and Professional Association and a Union County Veterans 4th of July Parade Committee, from which she received the community service medal in December 2001.

Gary Sojka, professor of biology and a friend of Mr. Stiefel, said that Stiefel contributed greatly to the University and community by heading the Holiday Decor Committee, having charity matinees at the Campus Theatre and working for causes such as Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition and hospice. He said she also regularly attended cultural events on campus.

"She befriended countless students, faculty and staff over the years and was a true pillar of the community and a positive force in town-gown relations," Sojka said.

Eric Faden, professor of English, bought the Campus Theatre from Stiefel last year. Although he admits he didn't know her well as a person, he says he knows her through the purchase of the Campus Theatre.

"I know more about Mrs. Stiefel via the legacy she left behind—the Campus Theatre," Faden said. "When I took over the Theatre, I began to understand how much she did for the community and how central the Theatre is for downtown Lewisburg."

Faden said he wishes to take care of the theatre and put in as much work as Stiefel.

"She really deserves to be commended for preserving the theatre as much as she did," Faden said. "It would have been so much easier for her to level the building and make it a parking lot. I hope I can continue the work she started in terms of supporting charities and using the theatre for community events."

Stiefel is survived by her two daughters, Eileen Stiefel-Buckwalter of Wayne, Pa., and Beth E. Stiefel-Itoh of Baltimore, Md.

CIA warns of Afghan civil war

Feb. 21—As British peace-keepers came under fire for a second time in Kabul, the Central Intelligence Agency has warned in a classified analysis that Afghanistan could descend into civil war due to fierce competition for power among rival warlords. Evidence is already emerging of rifts among forces that drove the Taliban from power last year, including sharp differences within the interim government over the motive for the stabbing death of a minister last week.

Sharon to address nation

JERUSALEM, Feb. 21—After the most sustained burst of violence in 17 months of conflict between Israel and the Palestinians, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon prepared Thursday to tell a weary Israeli public about his plan to bring peace to a region in the midst of an undeclared war. According to one Israeli newspaper, Sharon may abandon his long-standing demand for "seven days of quiet" ahead of any peace talks.

Elliott '03 attends Rock the Vote in D.C.

Student also sits in on televised discussion with Secretary of State Colin Powell

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

Tom Elliott '03 participated in Rock the Vote's 9/11 Youth Summit in Washington D.C. last weekend. While he was there, he was one of few people permitted to be present in a studio with Secretary of State Colin Powell.

The notorious leftist organization invited 50 young leaders ages 15-22 from across the country to the summit to allow young people to share their opinions related to national policy concerns, focusing on how such policies may have been impacted by the events of Sept. 11.

The conference attempted to provide a greater understanding of young people's policy concerns and create an opportunity for young people's opinions and ideas to contribute to the broader public debate regarding the nation's policy concerns. Although the organization primarily invites politically liberal students, this year they invited Elliott to share a much more conservative opinion.

"Rock the Vote invited me with the intention of sparking some debate among the progressive students. The other students seemed similar to me, even though I was the only conservative out of 50 students, which I didn't keep to myself," Elliott said. "I didn't convert any of them to conservatism, but I do think they became more partial to Republican views."

Being the minority political opinion, Elliott says he found it difficult to spawn the controversy he intended to incite.

"Unfortunately, among all the progressives I didn't generate the controversy I was planning. A lot of my views and responses were completely different since the majority of students were much more progressive," Elliott said. "I was more in favor of being proactive in response to situations, such as writing to a newspaper. The left wing students favored protests and other action groups."

With strong political views, Elliott founded the University's Conservatives Club last semester to counter leftist teachings on campus and provide an instrument to voice conservative political principles that he feels are neglected in academia.

"The club discusses everything and anything, although emphasis is placed on free people, free markets and freedom from government intrusion. The club also puts out a regular newsletter, The Counterweight," Elliott said.

In addition to the forum, Elliott was selected to participate in a dialogue with Powell, who was the centerpiece of a recent 90-minute MTV discussion, entitled "Be Heard: An MTV Global Discussion with Colin Powell." The broadcast featured youths participating in a question and answers series from six other cities—Sao Paulo, Milan, Cairo, Moscow, New Delhi and London.

"Secretary Powell was very interested in talking with all the kids and an interesting person in general. He is obviously very intelligent and a good leader. I thought he answered all the questions well, but was surprised, as were other conservatives, in response to one of the questions about AIDS," Elliott said.

In his response, Powell advocated the use of condoms to prevent the spread of AIDS, causing controversy by setting himself apart from President George W. Bush's views on sex education. Powell's views also angered some of the president's closest supporters on the political right.

"I did not get to ask him a question, but if I could have, I would have asked him what he felt regarding the current threat Iraq poses to us, and if he felt an alternate outcome of the Persian Gulf conflict would have made any difference," Elliott said. "The question was intended to put him on the spot to see if he regretted 'not finishing the job' the last time, since he was George Bush Sr.'s Chief of Staff."

The conference built on four policy-agenda areas: economic stimulus, race relations, freedom of expression and foreign policy. Additionally, elected officials from both sides of the isle spoke about their policy specialties, including Congressman Adam Putnam who was sworn in at age 26 as the youngest member of the 107th Congress.

Rock the Vote was founded in 1990 by members of the recording industry in response to a wave of attacks on freedom of speech and artistic expression. The founders' goal was to mobilize young people to respond to First Amendment issues.

Since that time, Rock the Vote has become a leading political organization in the minds of young people. The organization fosters a better understanding of political ideas and processes and provides concrete ways for youth to instigate change in their communities.

Another reason why the current system, by which fraternities supply their own alcohol at parties, was allowed to continue was because the administration was not very keen on BYOB.

"BYOB is logistically a nightmare," Baker said, citing the large number of fraternity members needed to administer the policy. "We're not sure if we want students walking around campus on any given Friday or Saturday night carrying alcohol."

Why is compliance coming now?

The University has been forced to consider BYOB due to the pressure of national fraternity organizations. Both Lambda and KDR were placed on probation by their national organizations this fall for failing to comply with BYOB, and both have had their probation continued through the spring. On Feb. 5, a Lambda national representative attended an IFC meeting and told the fraternity presidents that he would be advising their national organizations that they were not complying with the BYOB policy.

In response to this pressure, the IFC voted Feb. 9 to require all fraternity parties to comply with the BYOB policy until March 2, at which time the policy will be re-evaluated. Several fraternities are hosting BYOB events during the period, including Sigma Chi last Saturday, Phi Kappa Psi this coming Saturday and Lambda on March 2.

What are its merits?

The biggest benefit of BYOB is a decreased liability for the fraternity chapter and its national organization, and thus a decreased chance they could be found liable for an incident or injury. Another benefit is that the fraternities will save a lot of money, as students will pay for the beer they bring instead of the fraternity.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro explained that BYOB, if followed correctly, would also lead to much more moderate drinking, as students would only be able to bring six beers to fraternity parties. Ferraro elaborated that this moderation would decrease the likelihood of common side effects of heavy drinking, which include fights, sexual assaults and property damage.

According to Ferarro, this risk reduction would likely decrease the regulations on the fraternities.

"When there's a risk reduction, people pay much less attention," Ferraro said. "It would give [the fraternities] more freedom."

... and drawbacks?

The biggest problem of BYOB is its complex logistics. The policy requires more fraternity members to enforce it than at a traditional University fraternity party—Sigma Chi had 12 members working at all times during its BYOB event last Saturday. There is also a problem with distributing the beer. Fraternities are not required by national guidelines to give a student the same brand of beer he or she brought, so a person who brought Yuengling may get a Schaeffer back.

Another logistical problem is that six-packs are not sold in Pennsylvania, so students would have to buy at least 12 cans. Without six-packs, students would have to carry loose beer around campus.

Many administrators are not comfortable with students carrying alcohol around campus. Though it is legal for of-age students to carry closed container of alcohol around campus, Ferraro pointed to several problem situations that could spring up if students must bring alcohol to fraternities in order to drink.

First, a student may decide to open a beer while walking to a fraternity party; if found with an open container, the student would be subject to a heavy fine. Second, if a student went to a fraternity party, but was not invited inside, he or she may begin drinking on the fraternity's lawn.

Baker said another drawback might be an increase in underage drinking in the residence halls and at downtown parties. Since it will be more difficult for underage students to get beer at fraternity parties because of the limited supply and new segregated consumption area guidelines, Baker said many underage students may choose to go elsewhere to drink. (According to Baker, segregated consumption areas are a new policy that came into effect this semester under the Plan for Prominence. It states that the only place beer can be consumed at a fraternity party is a separate, 21-and-over area—not on the dance floor.)

Mixed reviews at Sigma Chi

Not only was Sigma Chi's BYOB party last Saturday the first of its kind at the University, it was also the first time a fraternity charged admission for a party. But Sigma Chi President R.J. Grant '03 said the party, co-sponsored by Phi Gamma Delta, had more bad points than good.

The attendance was down from a typical Sigma Chi party by about 100 people, according to Grant. He believes that upperclassmen constituted a significant portion of this drop, as evidenced by the drop in the number of students signing up for wristbands.

Another major problem was non-members leaving the party in the basement and rummaging the entire house for alcohol. Grant said that this was a problem both at last Saturday's party and a party earlier this semester where the fraternity strictly enforced segregated consumption areas. He said non-members congregated in the living room, hallways, upstairs and in members' rooms. Grant said Sigma Chi had to station members throughout the house in order to prevent this from happening.

Nick Scott—The Bucknellian

The first campus BYOB party debuted last weekend at Sigma Chi Fraternity (above) to mixed reviews.

The increased monitoring as well as the more complex enforcement procedures of BYOB parties required Sigma Chi to increase the number of members it had working the party. Throughout the night, this required most of the fraternity members to sacrifice at least an hour to work the party, something Grant said was it difficult to ask the upperclassmen to do.

On the up side, Grant noted that there were no fights or major incidents at either the BYOB party or the earlier segregated consumption party. He said that since he was pledging the fraternity in the fall of 2000, fights had frequently marred its parties; he attributed the decrease in incidents to people drinking moderately as a result of the new policies.

Grant believes the reduced liability of BYOB makes it a viable policy.

"Overall, it's definitely possible to run a BYOB party," Grant said. "If it can protect the Greek system and my fraternity from trouble, it should be looked at closely."

As far as the $2 admission that Sigma Chi charged, Grant believes it went over fairly well. The fraternity collected about $150, which will be donated to Sigma Alpha Epsilon's philanthropy cause, Students Against Multiple Sclerosis. One problem is that Grant said the number of students who attended did not match up with the amount collected, so some students must not have been charged.

Will we actually comply?

All this talk of BYOB means nothing if fraternities do not comply with the policy. Remember that BYOB has long been a policy of the fraternities' national organizations, but they have ignored it. Why would it be any different now?

For one, the enforcement is getting much bigger teeth. Baker stated that the lax enforcement by the nationals had allowed the chapters to disregard BYOB in the past. But now the nationals are stepping up their enforcement, as evidenced by the fact that national representatives came to campus and discovered that Lambda and KDR were not complying with BYOB.

With Lambda's representative saying he plans to advise the other fraternities' nationals that they are not complying with BYOB, maybe more fraternities are in store for a visit from nationals? This is a strong incentive to switch to BYOB.

Second, Baker hopes a spirit of brotherhood between the fraternities will lead them to incorporate BYOB in order to help Lambda and KDR out of their crises. He encouraged the other fraternity presidents to do so at an IFC meeting on Feb. 5.

"In light of the pressure placed on the chapters of Lambda Chi and Kappa Delta Rho, I encouraged all fraternities to obey BYOB to support these two particular fraternities," Baker said.

Third, the University also has stepped up its efforts to encourage BYOB. In addition to speaking at the IFC meeting on Feb. 5 in favor of BYOB, Baker recently echoed the same thinking in an email to all fraternity members. He explained that some of the initial concerns about BYOB are becoming less ominous.

"The more and more we talk [about BYOB], the fewer the problems we encounter," Baker said.

On the other hand, Baker said a major roadblock to the policy being incorporated is the ignorance of rank-and-file fraternity members. While most fraternity officers understand the issue of liability, Baker said many members do not understand the huge risks they are exposing themselves to by supplying beer at their parties.

Baker said that many presidents have told him their attempts to explain BYOB and its liability benefits to their fraternities have been disrupted by members who do not understand the liability issue.

The third-party vendor option

The option for supplying alcohol that many University administrators favor is not the traditional fraternity-supplied system or BYOB, it is the third-party vendor system. This system would bring in a third-party vendor to supply alcohol to of-age individuals at a fraternity party.

Administrators are specifically looking into the University's Dining Services as a third-party vendor at fraternities. Dining Services has a liquor license, but not one that enables it to sell alcohol to individuals. In order for it to supply beer at fraternity parties, the fraternity would have to pay Dining Services a fee for the alcohol and the service and Dining Services would distribute the alcohol to of-age students at the party for free.

Ferraro prefers this option because it would diminish underage drinking at fraternity parties. He explained that having a third-party vendor takes the "burden off the individual." Ferraro said that instead of the beer being distributed by a student, who is more likely to serve underage friends, a stranger, who would be less likely to serve underage students, is distributing it.

Though third-party vendors are deemed acceptable in the nationals' bylaws, this specific arrangement with Dining Services may still violate the nationals' policies. The central issue revolves around who is buying the beer. With a system where the fraternities are paying Dining Services a fee for the alcohol and service, the fraternities are still essentially buying the alcohol. A third-party vendor arrangement where the individuals bought the alcohol directly from the vendor would be in accord with the guidelines.

Still, administrators are looking closely at an arrangement with dining services. Baker said Dining Services appears to be willing to serve the role, but the important matters of the legality of the arrangement in regards to liquor license laws, its compliance with the nationals' guidelines and agreeing on a price remain to be settled.

The bottom line

Fraternity parties will likely undergo a major transformation. Whether it's BYOB, a third-party vendor or a tightening of segregated consumption areas, there is going to be a change.

The new system will make it extremely difficult for underage students to drink heavily at fraternities and consequently, students may begin looking elsewhere to party. This translates into decreased attendance for fraternity parties, something Sigma Chi found true in the BYOB party it held.

But it bodes well for the fraternities' liabilities. Fewer people and more moderate drinking equate to fewer incidents and fights. Even if something were to happen at a party, the fraternity would be less likely to be found liable because it did not supply the alcohol.

This may no longer be an issue of what the fraternities want to do, but rather what they must do. Fraternities clearly want to maintain the current system—it has been around for years and makes them a popular social option. But they may have to switch to a BYOB or third-party vendor system in order to avoid sanctions from their nationals, even if it means sacrificing popularity.

BYOB could decrease liability of fraternities

At the Feb. 9 Interfraternity Council meeting, representatives voted that all fraternity parties from now until March 2 will have to abide by the bring-your-own-beer (BYOB) policy. After this date, the policy will be reevaluated. This policy will alleviate liability issues, but could create numerous problems.

On the up side, without a BYOB policy, if a problematic incident occurs at a fraternity, a person might try to sue the fraternity, the University and the national fraternity. However, the national risk management guidelines state that all fraternity parties must be BYOB. Therefore, if a person tries to sue the national fraternity, it can say that the fraternity should have been following the BYOB policy.

If a fraternity follows the BYOB policy, it will be less likely to be found liable for incidents because students would bring beer and the fraternity would not be supplying it. This policy would not only be cheaper for the fraternity, but it would also decrease its liability.

Although the main reason for instituting a BYOB policy is a liability issue, it has the potential of creating numerous problems. First, Public Safety would have to carefully monitor students walking around campus—not only for safety reasons, but also to check if students carrying beer are of legal drinking age. Although it is perfectly legal for of-age students to carry around closed containers of alcohol, they might open a container while walking to a party. This would also force Public Safety to monitor students more closely.

Under the BYOB policy, students who are of legal drinking age may bring up to six cans of beers to a fraternity party. This is difficult because six packs are not sold in Pennsylvania. Therefore, students will have to carry six loose cans of beer to a party, which poses potential dangers.

Also, the BYOB policy might cause the number of fraternity parties to decrease because they would be difficult to administer. If this occurs, the number of parties downtown will most likely increase. More activity downtown would lead to more $1,000 noise violation fines, Lewisburg Police Department crackdowns and complaints from residents. Although liability would be shifted to individual students living downtown, this scenario would be far worse for the University overall.

The most logical solution is to have a third-party vendor distribute beer at parties. The third-party vendor option is deemed legal by the national bylaws. This option would decrease liability and most likely decrease underage drinking. A third-party vendor would be less likely to serve alcohol to an underage student.

In conclusion, BYOB will decrease liability, but it will also be difficult for fraternities to follow. It comes at a time when fraternities are already struggling to meet new risk management policies, such as a segregated drinking area. It will be interesting to see how the next few weeks will go—will students actually bring their own beer or will they expect to still be served by the fraternities as in the past?

Living wage: good intentions overpowered by frailties

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

The trustees have recently approved an increase for the cost of tuition from $31,000 something to $33,000 something, derailing from the once-standard indexing with inflation. Is the University's educational experience really worth 33 grand? I certainly don't think so.

The Bucknell Caucus for Economic Justice (BCEJ) would like the school to spend more money—to alleviate those who supposedly need "social justice," which they equate unequivocally to getting an artificial raise. I believe this school, like a government, should be run on as tight of a budget as possible in the interest of those who finance it—the students (I mean parents). The school should pay decent and fair wages, but it is not their job to finance what the BCEJ considers necessary to support an adult and a child for their low-skilled jobs. The University is neither a charity, a welfare office or a socialist government. This is an expensive proposal, and a controversial one as well. That being said, it shouldn't come at the hands of a majority who oppose it.

The BCEJ wants to help the small guy, the laborer, and coincidentally, so do I. They believe in regulating living standards and don't have faith in the competitive marketplace; they don't have faith that the unhappy workers would relocate to higher paying jobs if they wanted higher paying jobs.

Naturally, the vast majority (if not all) of the campaign's endorsers are not exactly your free-market zealots who tattoo themselves with their favorite Adam Smith quotes. I don't say this out of speculation; I say this because I know.

Winston Churchill in describing free market capitalism: "the unequal sharing of plenty." Very truthful, it provides great rewards, and yes, it does enable some people to become rich while also failing to place the uninspired on an escalator to prosperity—or for that matter, provide universal equality. Churchill on this socialist desire for such equality: "the equal sharing of misery."

Proponents of lofty living wages and lofty minimum wage hikes usually find this to be a more fair and responsible approach to bringing up someone's quality of life. An unregulated free-market system will create an incurable static class structure; making bottom-dwellers immovably entrenched in the depths of destitution.

I disagree. I feel that such a system provides all the essential components necessary to enable one to pursue their individual happiness. Let's take a look of how well living wages work in the first place.

The Employment Policies Institute (EPI) is a nonprofit research organization dedicated to studying public policy issues; in particular, issues that affect entry-level employment such as the living wage and the minimum wage. They are nonpartisan and independent economists conduct all research. This organization surveyed 336 labor economists and produced some interesting opinions on the debate.

The most fundamental problem with the campaign is that it will undoubtedly create job losses. The survey indicated that over three-quarters of the respondents felt that the higher the proposed level of the living wage, the more likely employment losses will result.

When asked which was best in assisting the needs of poor families (either a living wage, Earned Income Tax Credit or general welfare grants), the majority indicated the tax credits were the best option. Only seven percent felt that a living wage ordinance was an efficient way to address such needs. Sixty-nine percent felt it wasn't efficient at all.

A plurality of the respondents felt that such a mandate would lead to increased poverty rates, 26 percent felt it wouldn't make a difference.

The institute also studied California, where an increase in the minimum wage was adopted. An economic analysis was then produced to learn its effects. There were two general downsides to the project: the cost and its efficiency. The cost was enormous and fell almost entirely on the private sector as well as the income-earners themselves. Two-hundred and thirty million dollars was lost in annual California worker income, while $790 million more was required per year in labor costs. This was spurned entirely from the seemingly meager minimum raise increase of $5.15 to $5.75. This seemingly meager increase produced 25,000 lost job opportunities.

A formula was created to attempt to calculate how such living wage ordinances or minimum raise increases would affect jobs. To do this, they did two things. First, they measured the fractional wage gain due to the potential minimum wage increase per each effected worker and then averaged the sample. Second, the estimated fractional wage gain is used in the formula to calculate the employment loss by creating an elasticity figure for lowest-wage increases versus number of jobs. The estimate of labor demand elasticity was negative 0.22. This means that a 10 percent increase in wages results in a 2.2 percent decrease in jobs.

The Catalyst states that implementation of a living wage here at the University—a figure they have pegged at $9 an hour—would cost the school $500,000. The administration disagreed and felt that in order to avoid wage compression they would have to raise other employees' incomes as well, a total figure they estimated to be at $4 to $5 million. That seems a little high to me, so let's use the BCEJ's figure and give them the benefit of the doubt.

There are 230 employees working below this figure. The majority of the people working below this wage earn $6.75 per hour. This means that such a raise for these income-earners would be equivalent to a 13 percent raise. If you were to use the EPI's negative 0.22 elasticity figure, one would realize after some quick math that implementing such a policy would come at the hands of seven job losses (a little less than three percent of the workforce.) I don't know where these cuts would come from, but I know that they simply can't come from most places, as they are already understaffed. If the school were to hire more workers to keep up with enrollment, for better efficiency, or simply to make the school better by adding something, it would be next to impossible to do with a living wage in place.

Other EPI research shows that nationwide, more than 70 percent of workers with wages below $7.50 live in households with income lines well above the poverty line for a family of four. When such a living wage proposal was considered in Chicago, it would have meant 8,400 workers would have seen a raise that would have cost the city tens of millions. One thousand three hundred would lose their jobs and probably fall into poverty and next to no one would rise from poverty. The Chicago City Council canned the idea upon presentation of these facts.

These facts make the living wage a damning economic policy riddled with frailties; which seems curious since so many who should have a good grasp of economics, endorse it. I am all for assisting those who don't make a lot, but through policies that make sense. This doesn't—and it would come out of your parents' pocketbooks.

Letter to the editor

Incident appropriately handled

To the Editor:

I would like to condone the administration's actions in handling the October incident in which two students dressed up in black face, although I wish they had handled the issue sooner. As it seems obvious to me that the students were simply ignorant of the racist implications of their actions, I am really relieved that the University opted not to slap sanctions on the students, but to instead educate the students via a public forum about the history of black face.

I venture to guess that many other students were also not aware of this once accepted form of racism and stereotypical portrayal of black people. It is safe to say that vaudeville and minstrel shows are a dead "art," and perhaps not everyone in our generation has seen Al Jolson get down on his knee in black face and bawl out "Mammy." However, whether people know it or not, it remains a highly offensive act, and we must educate one another to insure that we understand a very important yet embarrassing aspect of American history. I applaud the administration and students for using education as opposed to censure as a means to alleviate social ills and ignorance within our campus.

Education cures ignorance

By Ryan Gee
Staff Writer

As we probably all know by now, two students used black face as part of their Venus and Serena Williams costumes on Halloween. This has caused numerous repercussions, among the multicultural community and the campus as a whole. I don't think anyone would say that these students dressed up like that out of malice; that is more a question of individual ignorance on an extremely racist issue. There is a larger and more important matter at hand, though, and that is the reaction around campus to the revelation of these events. Frankly, the response has been disappointing and discouraging, if not downright frightening.

One problem is exactly what allowed this incident to happen: ignorance about the issue of black face and what it means to the history of African Americans. After finding out about the incident, many students don't see the problem. They think it was just a costume and a joke; unaware of the shame and humiliation that whites imposed upon blacks with the use of black face years ago.

Can we blame these people for not knowing the history of black face and why it is so wrong? No, of course not. Nobody knows everything that might offend someone else. But what we must realize is that nothing like this is ever a "joke." Before you brush it off as just another Halloween costume, put yourself in the shoes of those who were offended and realize that is was not just a costume. It was an insult, however inadvertently, to the entire black community.

The best course of action would be to prevent these kinds of things from ever happening, which leads to the second problem: education. How can we avoid hurting other people if we don't know what would be deemed "harmful"? This isn't something that is solved easily, and it may be beyond the grasp of a group of college students. This is a task that society as a whole must undertake by exposing children to different cultures and ethnicities so they become more aware and understanding of the countless different kinds of people around the world. By beginning at a young age, perhaps we can prevent future generations from adopting the same prejudices and discriminatory practices we have been plagued with.

So what can we, as college students, do? The semi-open forum that was held the other day was a start, but it is just that: a start. It happens far too often with problems like these that we slap a band-aid on the wound and declare it healed, when it is obviously not. The energy generated by this forum must not be extinguished, and instead must intensify and expand, until everyone on campus is ready and willing to do all they can to eradicate any signs of racial or cultural prejudice from the University.

Sometimes it's the big things, like holding more open forums to discuss the issues, that can help; sometimes it's just the small things, like maybe sidestepping the self-imposed segregation in the cafeteria for once and sitting with people you normally don't eat with, that can do the trick. Whatever it is, it is imperative that each and every one of us keeps these things in mind. When we forget or ignore our problems, they will only fester and grow until one day they'll blow up in all our faces.

LOCKING HORNS

Is the University really a "family"?

By Alisa Karlsons
Staff Writer

I cannot deny that the University should do more in diversifying our community. In this year and in years past, we have also seen opinions and beliefs clash, questioning our solidarity and understanding of other peoples, cultures and races. Importantly, however, our campus community continues to learn and grow from these experiences, clearly indicating that the University has been, and will continue to be, a strong and accepting community.

While some may argue about the negative aspects of being locked in the "bubble," this bubble has arguably kept our community unified and supportive. Due to the University's comparably small size and remote location, we have an advantage of being in close contact with one another.

Students rarely leave campus for the weekend. Dorms are only walking distance apart. Professors and students regularly interact outside of the classroom and professors are available for guidance, help and even friendship. As a result, students and the faculty importantly respect and support one another. These types of relationships illustrate that the notions of mutual respect and support lie at the heart of our community.

To name a few, we see solidarity and support at basketball games when fans overcrowd the gym. We see solidarity in times of disaster, such as the events of Sept. 11 or the flood of 1999. We see solidarity in one of the campus's largest organizations, the Greek system. Clearly, the student body, the faculty and the administration have more often than not, been there for one another by helping, sharing and giving support. In all these instances, the University has never been a stronger or more supportive community.

Perhaps you are thinking that when it comes to more controversial issues, such as racial, sexual, religious or cultural awareness, our community often fails to do its best by not placing these issues at the forefront of our agenda. However, why then did so many convene so late into the night at last week's racial awareness forum? Why were all the seats in the Harvey Powers Theater taken on Saturday's last showing of "The Vagina Monologues"? The answer is that we do care. Listing what we have or have not accomplished in terms of diversifying is meaningless. The central issue here is that we do want to embrace all cultures and backgrounds and importantly, want to work at bringing about greater awareness on these issues. Last week's forum, the apologies stated and University President Steffen Roger's response sent out via email, particularly indicate our solid commitment to building a family willing to listen, learn and accept everyone equally and with respect.

Unfortunately, we cannot control all acts or beliefs of bias. One would hope, however, that a true community or family would teach those less experienced with diversity about respect, awareness and support for one another. In this respect, the University has clearly taken the right steps in building an accepting community. As a liberal arts institution, the University's primary goal is to broaden ways of thinking and understanding.

We have numerous campus organizations and events adding to our educational experience. We have guest lecturers, the Global Colleges and visiting professors from abroad. More importantly, through these vehicles the campus is discussing these issues, indicating our awareness, support and potential for greater growth.

Could someone please define a family for me? The term seems to thrown around so loosely, especially in any advertisements about the University or official statements made by our president. I noticed that in the letter sent out by University President Steffen Rogers on Feb. 13, in which he addresses general cases of violations against the diversity of our family, he maintains that despite these violations overall we are still "caring and embrace diverse cultures, backgrounds and even opinions." I ask my question about family because it seems that my definition is different from Rogers and most persons here in the campus. In my family, I would like to say that for the most part we try to prevent problems with each other before they happen and if there is conflict we all talk to one another. In one sense, I can see a similarity, at the campus everyone (in a semi-open forum) was invited (though not notified) to discuss their feelings on the black face issue (three months after the fact). In this way, the campus does resemble my family, as we both talk about problems we have within our families. Nevertheless, I would like to ask what the University does to prevent these problems from happening in the first place.

In my family we are all tied intrinsically to one another. When something happens to one of us we are all affected, therefore there is reason for us to actively consider and respect each others feelings. On the campus, however, this is not the case. Even in our forum, meant to enlighten us all about black face, and what happened on this campus, the only active decisions made by its representatives Associate Dean of Students Roy Baker and Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, were to protect the anonymity of the students who painted their faces. This was an admirable decision, and I applaud them on preventing any type of severe castigation or scarlet letter that might have resulted. Even more admirable was the fact that these students spoke up about it in order to personally apologize. This display was honorable and courageous because they could have remained to sit comfortably in anonymity content with letters of apology that though addressed to the campus were never made public.

No active decisions were made by anyone however, to protect the minority students who attend this university and who are physically threatened by this gross physical mockery targeted at all Africans. Instead the forum was a reaction to feelings by students. It seems to say more about the students who attended (after having attended, I personally feel closer to many other students) rather than a change in the campus. Still, our family has clear rifts as three days after the forum right in front of the 7th Street House, we had another incident of a violation against our diversity.

The conclusion I draw from this is that although we address our problems at the campus, we do not prevent them, and this is because unlike a family, we are not intrinsically linked to each of our members. If the perpetrators of the 7th Street incident attended the forum, maybe it would never have happened. However, this could neither have been prevented nor encouraged since we couldn't force every student to attend a semi-open forum. The University, however, did not try to actively promote some type of cultural sensitivity plan after the black face incident (an active solution to a violation against diversity) which might have prevented it.

Play nice, keep your allies

Unilateralism threatens future security

By Gretchen Schrock
Senior Writer

Everything you need to know in life you learned in kindergarten. For example, making and keeping friends. Unfortunately, for the United States, it appears that the Bush administration has forgotten those valuable lessons of compromise as it ponders the next phase of the war on terrorism.

The White House is considering launching a pre-emptive attack on Iraq and other regimes within the "axis of evil," with or without the consent or support of its foreign allies, in order to eliminate the possibility of those countries supplying nuclear, biological or chemical weapons to potential terrorists. This staunch unilateralism is sending the European community, in addition to Canada, China, Russia and South Korea, all of which remain firmly opposed to expanding the war on terrorism, into screaming tantrums.

It is understandable why these states are quite annoyed with the rhetoric that is flowing from the Oval Office. The members of the anti-terror coalition signed up to battle the Taliban and Al Qaeda, and "Iraq is not on this list," as Vladimir V. Putin of Russia pointed out to the New York Times. In addition, the inclusion of North Korea as a conspiring villain in the "axis of evil" threatens to undercut years of meticulous diplomacy aimed at persuading it out of armed isolationism with economic incentives, something that South Korea is seeking to accomplish. Furthermore, the Bush administration is assuming a position that places America first and everyone else second.

Is not the basis of friendship and cooperation the recognition of the needs and desires of others before one's own? Instead, Vice President Dick Cheney fails to notice this necessity when he said, as quoted by the New York Times, "America has friends and allies in this cause, but only we can lead it. Only we can rally the world in a task of complexity against an enemy so elusive and so resourceful. The United States and only the United States can see this effort through to victory." Thus, it is perceived that the White House is treating the coalition partners like "satellites," which the German Foreign Minister Joschka Fischer, suggested this week.

Without significant involvement of the other major global powers in the decision-making process, the American government will definitely lose the trust and assistance of some of its dearest friends, undermining the strong solidarity formed after the events of Sept. 11. The world of international politics can easily become quite dark and ominous without steadfast companions by one's side.

Most importantly, the determination of some countries as inherently "evil" and the necessary eradication of this wickedness are overly simplistic. President George W. Bush and his advisors have not recognized the political, historical, social and economic intricacies that surround the current situation of these countries. There are numerous complicated reasons for the present governmental structures and their internal acceptance that must be dealt with before our government begins any type of military campaign. Christopher Patten, the European Union's foreign affairs minister, accused the President of taking an "absolutist" approach to the world, which is obviously correct.

Culturally speaking, Americans are inclined to view individuals, societies, ideas or objects as either good or bad, with no possibility of being both at the same time. As a result of such an approach, the American government is ignoring the complex web of history and labeling certain countries that oppose the central beliefs of the United States as simply "evil."

If the Bush administration is adamant on continuing this unilateralist path of international policy, it risks increasing the intense anti-Americanism that was an underlying cause of the World Trade Center and Pentagon attacks. Defeating potential terrorism does not only involve victorious military feats but also successful diplomatic measures.

Throwing bombs around the school yard will not win friends and stop bullies from picking on the weak and the unsuspecting. The American government must unite with its fellow playmates in world diplomacy and devise a team strategy for beating the so-called playground tormentors within the confines of international law. Otherwise, as the Canadians have warned, the next phase of the war "will go nowhere."

Senators tout silly accomplishments

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

Ever cruise a Congressional website? It's great fun. No, seriously, it is. Or maybe that's just me, because I'm a dork.

Either way, I work hard so you don't have to. You know how politicians tend to speak in fuzzy, general terms so as to avoid offending anyone? Member's websites take this art form to another level. People who complain about silly, shameless self-promotion in professional athletes these days should put down their beer nuts and take a look at professional politicians. They're in a class by themselves. Check out these few examples of your tax dollars at work.

Senator Jim Jeffords (I-Vt.) website trumpets his work on behalf of animals and Senate passage of his Rhino and Tiger Labeling Act. Senator Tim Hutchinson (R-Ark.) recently introduced the Elder Fall Prevention Act of 2002. It is expected to pass, after which seniors from coast to coast will not fall down anymore. Senator John Breaux (D-La.) has introduced legislation to recognize March as National Colorectal Awareness Month (undoubtedly its passage will eradicate colon disorders from the face of the earth).

Representative Dennis Kucinich (D-Ohio), chair of the House Progressive Caucus, proudly introduced legislation to establish a Department of Peace. Isn't it nice to know that campaign finance reform will free politicians from spending hours on the phone so they can fight for the issues that matter to you?

There are a hundred more examples, but you get the point. So which is scarier—the idea that lawmakers spend their days fighting for such causes or the idea that maybe they don't, and that you and I pay their staffers to tell the world that they do?

There's your silly; now for the shameless. Members' websites spend a great deal of time telling us what they are for and against, and what they've done about it lately. I'll save you some time: it usually involves passing a law.

Check out Senator Barbara Boxer's (D-Calif.) courageous endorsement of safe drinking water: Boxer continues to build on her successful efforts to protect children by ensuring that every major environmental law sets standards to protect children. She succeeded in that protection in the Safe Drinking Water Act, now law. Let's get this straight: she's for clean drinking water, and she's for kids. Got it. No wonder she wins elections. But she's not the worst offender by any means. Senator John Edwards (D-N.C.) bravely proclaims, doctors and patients, not HMOs, should make critical medical decisions.

Or this: Breaux has been a champion of recreational boating since his first election and strongly supports the U.S. Coast Guard.

Or this: Senator Susan Collins (R-Maine) says that gaps in homeland security need to be identified, prioritized, and filled.

So bold. So daring. So obvious.

Senators love to tell us what they are for and how much money they're willing to spend on it. What is usually lacking is an explanation of principle; of exactly how their legislation will get us there and why their solutions are better. That, and any hint of protest from the American people that they, as a self-governing people, deserve better explanations of what their officials are doing.

The websites themselves, I suppose, are immaterial, and they only matter if they are indicative of some larger principle. I see a few possibilities: one, that even though we're are supposed to be self-governing, public policies have become so numerous and so complex that their details have become inaccessible to the average person. Two, that they haven't, and politicians only think policies have because they see us as sheep whose support can be garnered by pushing empty but noble-sounding laws. Or three, that no one is paying enough attention to object when Washington just might be overreaching, as it is with bills like the Elder Fall Prevention Act of 2002.

For a republican democracy, these are reassuring choices for sure.

"A Room With a View" a good start

By Jessica Morris
Staff Writer

In an effort to explore our culture's obsession with body image, educators of the Women's Resource Center put together an exhibit properly called "A Room With a View," currently located in Arches Lounge on the third floor of the LC. At the exhibit, students are encouraged to listen to recorded messages, observe images and share personal thoughts.

As a woman, I felt that this exhibit was a step in the right direction, but is it working? Going through the exhibit I found that I became more aware of how body image affects and distorts young females' views of their own bodies. However, I still wondered what is it here at the University that makes being thin so important.

A statement that was written by an anonymous University student states, "Why is it that when I am at Bucknell I look too fat, but when I go home I look too dangerously thin?" This question of body image on our campus hounded me throughout my day, and I decided that it would be a good idea to go have a bacon cheeseburger in the Bison since I was hungry. As I was ordering my food I noticed many females gave me the evil eye when I ordered extra bacon. They looked disgusted, and that they thought ordering extra anything was considered the plague. I thought that this was supposed to be the resilient group since they were also eating in the Bison and not the Terrace Room, or maybe I was just over the top with my order.

As my day went on, I decided to go workout at the weight room. However, I did more waiting instead of working out. Every Stairmaster machine was taken and there seemed to be no sign of anyone getting off anytime soon. By observing the vigorous exercising that some very precariously thin women of our campus were engaging in, I soon realized even more that there is a very serious obsession on our campus with being thin. I go to the weight room three times a week and stay an average of two hours, but I notice that there are some women who are there before me and are still working out after I'm done.

I also wonder when exercise becomes too much exercise? Sometimes I miss a day and come in on the next day and the same people are there day-in and day-out. I'm sure that Student Health Services and Community Health Promotions would tell you that exercising more than three hours each day is excessive for non-athletes, and not eating properly for anyone is very dangerous.

I think "A Room With a View" is a very good start in bringing campus awareness about eating disorders; the cold hard facts about anorexia and bulimia need to be told, but I don't think it is reaching the people who need it the most. I think it should focus as much attention on excessive exercising as much as it does on eating disorders. The people that are going to this exhibit are the ones who are open to the information that is given; people with eating disorders I feel are not open to any information that hints to the fact that they have a problem.

In some ways this exhibit was a success, and in some ways it still needs work. The Women's Resource Center is currently working and striving toward bringing these types of issues to the people and not relying on the people looking for information on their own.

President Bush visits Asia to improve U.S. relations

By Matthew Hinson
Senior Writer

President George W. Bush, in his second visit to Asia, will travel to Japan, South Korea and China, hoping to engage these countries in a wide range of issues. In Japan, Bush spoke with the country's parliament, the Diet, preaching a shared vision "for the future of the Asia-Pacific region as a fellowship of free Pacific nations," a much toned down statement from the saber-rattling of the past few months. Bush also reiterated America's commitment to peace in the region. Bush told the Japanese leaders that the United States will "deter aggression against the Republic of Korea."

Bush also caused a brief sell-off of the Japanese currency, the Yen, when he misspoke after a meeting with the Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi. The Prime Minister and Bush discussed the problem of deflation facing Japan. However, at a press conference Bush stated that they had discussed "devaluation" in regards to the Yen. Rumors of devaluation have been swarming around the Yen for weeks, and Bush's misstatement caused a run on the Yen that ended when his remarks were quickly clarified. Slowly, what Bush has meant about the "axis of evil" of North Korea, Iran and Iraq is coming out — what appears to be a combination between threats of military force with the promise of open dialogue if these nations so wish.

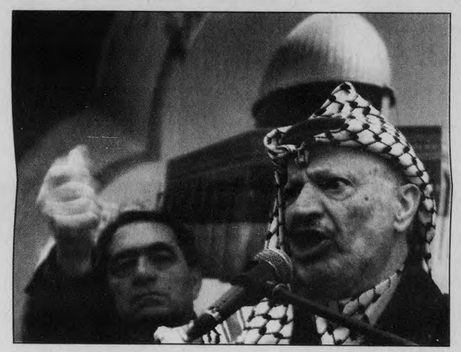
President Bush toured Camp Bonifas in the Korean Peninsula's demilitarized zone, between North and South Korea. The DMZ is one the most heavily fortified borders in the world.

On Thursday and Friday, Bush visited South Korea. Protesters were out in force in the streets of Seoul, holding up banners decrying America as the real evil, not the three nations Bush has blacklisted. Bush spoke with the Korean leadership and with American troops stationed along the border between the Koreas, reciting much of the same language as was said in Japan. The president also spoke of the usefulness of a missile defense system to protect America and her allies from aggression, clearly implying that North Korea is capable and willing to mount such an attack. Bush's hardline stance is offensive to many South Koreans who have seen their President Kim Dae-jung proceed on a "sunshine" policy with regards to engaging North Korea. This policy calls for open dialogue in hopes of opening up the North, with a possible eventual end of the reunification of the two countries. In opposition to this lies the Bush administration, which has nearly eliminated talks with the Communist nation of 22 million.

In China, the president hopes to work with the leadership there to curb Chinese arms sales to "rogue" states. In preparation, China has hinted that it will release some political prisoners in honor of Bush's visit. Other issues of discussion include cooperation against terrorism, programs on AIDS and the environment and economic relations between the two states. This rapport comes as a turnaround in relations, which had sunk to a new low this past spring, when a Chinese fighter plane and a U.S. reconnaissance plane collided, killing the fighter pilot, and losing to the United States both a plane and the secrecy of the high-tech EP-3 surveillance aircraft. The visit to China will wrap up Bush's Asian tour late this Friday.

The friendly spirit surrounding the visit reflects a remarkable turnaround in relations between two countries that less than a year ago were locked in a hostile standoff over the collision of a U.S. reconnaissance plane and a Chinese fighter jet. Now, the two seem intent on building on shared economic interests and opposing terrorism.

Militant attack on Israeli checkpoint leads to massive response by Israeli forces



Courtesy of Reuters

On Wednesday, Israeli forces attacked Yasser Arafat's Gaza offices in response to the latest attacks by the Palestinians on an Israeli checkpoint.

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

After one of the deadliest weeks in recent memory in the Middle East, Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and his Security Cabinet has approved "a new type of response" according to CNN.

The approval came shortly after another attack by Palestinian gunman killed six Israeli solders at a checkpoint near Ramallah on Tuesday. Al Aqsa Brigades, a Fatah-affiliated militia, has claimed responsibility for the attacks, and claims that the militants watched the checkpoint for quite some time before the attacks.

According to Fox News, the gunmen approached on foot like laborers returning home. Upon arriving at the checkpoint, they removed their weapons and killed three soldiers at the checkpoint after which they entered Israeli sleeping quarters and killed three soldiers in their beds. Although such missions are typically considered suicide missions, the militants survived the attacks and escaped.

On Wednesday, Israel began a massive attack from the land, air and sea against various Palestinian positions including the headquarters of Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat. The attacks, which included F-16 fighter planes and helicopter gun-ships, destroyed several buildings, and left 16 Palestinians dead. Twelve Palestinian policemen were among the dead.

According to CNN, Arafat remained defiant on Wednesday, saying that Palestinians would continue to fight until all Israeli forces and Jewish settlers leave the West Bank and Gaza and "the Palestinian flag flies over Jerusalem." Arafat has been held under virtual house arrest for several weeks in Ramallah, and was uninjured in the attacks.

For Sharon, pressure is now mounting to do something about the rising death toll from Palestinian attackers. The checkpoint attack was one of the deadliest attacks against Israeli positions since the violence began in September 2000.

According to Fox News, Israeli President Moshe Katsav said, "It's clear that the strategy that we've had until now can't continue." While Sharon did not immediately disclose what the new action might entail, one of his aides told reporters that Israeli forces would switch their focus from large-scale operations to smaller raids. These smaller, commando style raids are designed to keep the terrorists off balance.

CNN reported that while Sharon does not want to lead Israel into a war, one of his aides said, "We have taken the gloves off." There is also a possibility that Israeli forces will tighten their siege on the compound of Arafat, cutting him off from foreign dignitaries.

Fox News is also reporting that the attack on the Israeli checkpoint could mark a shift in the tactics of Palestinian militants. Rather than focusing on targets inside of Israel, they plan to focus on targets in the West Bank and Gaza. They hope that shifting their focus out of Israel will give them more credibility in the international community. However, there have been numerous attacks inside of Israel in recent months, and it is not clear if all of the militant groups support the change in tactics.

There are some signs that the recent attacks in the West Bank and Gaza are having their intended effect. According to CNN, 200 Israeli Defense Force (IDF) officers signed a letter refusing to serve in the occupied territories, and an organization including 1,000 retired IDF generals and colonels called for Israeli forces to be redeployed to the Israeli border.

The group also called for the creation of a Palestinian state within the currently occupied territories of the West Bank and Gaza. Similarly, Fox News is reporting that Israeli military commentators are beginning to criticize the IDF's performance in recent months. In a recent newspaper column, commentator Alex Fishman wrote "In the killing fields of the intefadeh [Arabic for Palestinian uprising], Israeli soldiers have gone from being the hunters to being hunted. Sitting ducks."

British peacekeepers fire on Afghan civilians

British troops on constant patrol to enforce the curfew in Afghanistan are apart of the immense peacekeeping force present in the region.

By Jim Leahy
Managing Editor

Almost six months have passed since Sept. 11 and we are well into the Western war on terrorism that has so far focused on Afghanistan. Success is widely reported here in this country and we have been trumpeting the ability of our forces, along with others from nations around the world, to unseat the Taliban.

Despite this success, there have been many previously unreported failures that have come to light in recent weeks, both during the bombing raids and in policing the new peace that exists, if only tenuously, in Afghanistan.

Recently, a story came across news wires about an incident involving British paratroopers in Kabul. CNN reported that the paratroopers fired on a car carrying a man and woman, killing the man and injuring the woman, who was pregnant. The car was out after the curfew and the paratroopers saw something wrong and fired.

MSNBC said that the troopers fired 60 shots at the truck as it sped towards the hospital. The woman was hit several times, but survived and was able to give birth to her child.

After an investigation, local law enforcement found no provocation for the attack. Local commander Basir Salangei told CNN that there was no wrongdoing on the part of the civilians and that the peacekeepers were at fault. CNN also reported that the International Security Assistance Force (ISAF) was claiming that its forces encountered fire before firing themselves. They added that the troopers were being sent home as part of a normal procedure that was not related to the attack.

The Washington Pose has been reporting about other attacks on targets throughout Afghanistan that have defied explanation on who was killed and why they were killed. There have been differing stories about why a particular place was really targeted and why the United States did not know what it was targeting.

The Washington Post reported that the intelligence coming from the ground in Afghanistan from both the CIA and other armed forces personnel has been unreliable from the start. Working with spotters on the ground in Afghanistan, pilots in the air have been working to hit targets that the spotters designate as important. The Post went on to say that the pilots were sometimes weary about their targets and that at times, they have hit the wrong targets.

MSNBC's reports have been more specific, detailing places where mistaken attacks have occurred and where civilians have died. US officials are saying that they did make mistakes in an effort to get rid of terrorism and the Taliban government that was harboring Osama Bin Laden's Al-Queda network.

In the town of Khakriz, almost 70 civilians died during a sustained, intense bombing raid. Local officials claim that Taliban forces were in the town early in the day of the bombing. They were moving around, meeting and hiding out. However, they were able to leave before U.S. bombs dropped on the village. As a result, the civilians were in the crosshairs and they perished in large numbers.

Another report of mistaken identity occurred in Sanjiri. A Nov. 29 air strike killed about a dozen people in a house in town. The owner of the house survived the attacks and claimed that he was just having his relatives over to visit when the bombing began. U.S. officials claim that intelligence reported that a group of Taliban officials had been meeting in the house, but left before the bombs exploded.

Another town in Southern Afghanistan, Shawalikot, was the scene of the an egregious error that almost killed Afghanistan's new leader, Hamed Karzai. A bomb intended for Taliban positions missed its target killing 19 Afghans and three Americans. Karzai was hit in the face by flying debris and survived narrowly. The attack killed as many as 35 other civilians too.

The war on terrorism in Afghanistan has been largely successful thus far. However, it has not been without its problems. Peacekeepers and U.S. bombing have killed civilians, causing U.S. officials to look at their practices.

Track and field squad still the best in the Patriot League

Cecily Cairns—The Bucknellian

The women's track and field team obliterated their opponents, pulling in their fourth Patriot League Championship trophy in five years.

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

For the fourth time in five years, the women's indoor track and field team captured the Patriot League Championship, beating runner-up Army by over 40 points. The men's team also made a solid showing, but was overwhelmed by a strong Army team that has now won nine straight championships.

The spectacular finish was the catalyst for Head Coach Kevin Donner being named the Patriot League Women's Indoor Track and Field Coach of the Year after leading his team past two opponents.

"Our team's very excited," Donner said. "We went into the meet expecting it to be very close because Navy has a very strong team, and Army was the host. But our girls are very tough, hard-nosed gamers who like to get out there and win."

Stephanie Bango '02 was the leader for the Bison, earning two individual medals in the meet. She won the gold medal for the 800-meter run with a time of 2:12.06, and took the silver in the 400-meter dash, finishing in 56.89 seconds. Her 400-meter time qualified her for the ECAC Championships, and was the second-fastest time in University history. Bango also anchored the winning 1,600-meter and 3,200-meter relays for the second year in a row.

"To bring back the championship, especially my senior year, is an amazing way to wrap up the indoor season," Bango said. "I think I can speak for my teammates when I say that this victory was one of the most intense and memorable wins that we have shared. We literally went up to Army and took over—it was awesome."

The Bison also got some help from the underclassmen as Rehana Lanewala '05 captured two medals. In the 200-meter dash, she earned the gold with a time of 25.72 and in the 400-meter dash, she finished third behind Bango with a time of 57.59.

"Rehana had an incredible weekend," Donner said. "We really admire her for being able to come in as a freshman and compete in that kind of a pressure-packed environment."

Several Bison earned silver medals, including Amy Calvo '05, Kelly McConnell '02, LaTonya McSwain '02, Chris Crowe '02, Samantha Klotz '02 and Kim Zimbal '02. In addition to their individual performances, McConnell, Calvo and McSwain—along with Bango—ran on the winning 3,200-meter relay team.

On the men's side, Greg Costello '03 and Noel Powell '04 were elemental in the team's second place finish. In the first day of the meet, Costello took the silver medal in the 5,000-meter run with a time of 14:41.66, narrowly losing a hard-fought battle to gold medalist Frank Malpigli of American. Costello avenged his second-place finish in dramatic fashion as he gutted his way to victory in a pulsating stretch drive against American's Matt Seymour the next day in the 3,000-meter run. He finished with a time of 8:24.40, just 0.12 seconds ahead of Seymour.

Team of the Week

Powell's leap of 24-1 3/4 was the first gold medal that the Bison earned, and it set the pace for the rest of the meet.

"Powell and Costello are two of our best athletes who are always consistent," Donner said. "I can always rely on them to get things done."

The final events proved to be critical, as the Bison men were almost tied with Lehigh. They were able to finish up the tournament with a pair of bronze medals to take second place overall. Aaron Hanlon '04 placed third in the 800-meter run with a time of 1:55.90, while P.J. Ward '02 took third in the 1,000-meter run in 2:28.13, his best time of the year.

"I wanted to run really aggressively, and I was very pleased with my results," Ward said.

While the men aren't completely satisfied with the second place finish, Donner knows that his athletes put in their best effort, and the team be disappointed with the finish.

"There were times in the meet when we struggled, but I was proud with how we finished. The second place result was probably the best we could've done," Donner said.

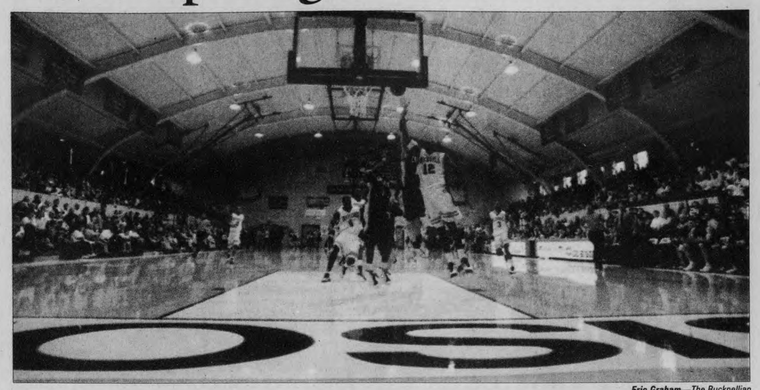
Cecily Cairns—The Bucknellian

Greg Costello '03 battles for the lead in the 5,000-meter run, en route to a close second-place finish.

Next up for both teams are the ECAC Championships on March 2 and 3, where over 100 teams on the East coast send their best individuals to compete. The men and women's teams have a number of competitors who are eligible.

"We've got a lot of athletes who will be able to compete and score points for us, and it'll be a great opportunity to see if we improve some of our marks and compete on a more national level," Donner said.

Bison top Colgate in emotional win



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Bryan Bailey '02 scored 24 points and pulled down a career-best 12 rebounds to lead the Bison in the final PL match to be played in Davis Gym.

By Pierre Hernando
Staff Writer

Bryan Bailey '02 capped off a great career by leading the Bison (11-14, 7-5) to a 68-57 drubbing over Colgate (15-10, 6-6) in front of a capacity crowd of 1,800 at Davis Gym. The win kept the team in a third-place tie with Lafayette in the league standings. Senior day was also the last Patriot League regular-season game ever to be played at the facility.

"It was great to have the seniors play their last home game with so much enthusiasm and perform well. We beat a good team that was on a roll," said head coach Pat Flannery.

Dan Blankenship '03 tallied 15 points and a career-high seven rebounds against Colgate.

Bailey scored 24 points on a combination of drives to the basket and jump shots. He also snatched a career-best 12 rebounds.

"I felt that my teammates really started looking for me in the second half of the game," Bailey said. "We had good spacing on offense that opened up room for penetration. It was hard for Colgate to just help on our inside people because we started driving the ball."

Colgate	57

The Raiders opened the game with a 6-2 lead before seeing the Bison come back and take the lead at 8-6. The Bison held the lead for the rest of the half and led 32-26 at intermission after Chris Rodgers '04 drilled a three at the buzzer.

The visitors started off quick in the second half, as they outscored the Bison 12-3 over the first seven minutes to take a 38-35 lead. The Bison rallied, however, with 11 unanswered points as part of a 19-5 run which gave them a 54-43 lead with just over eight minutes left to play. Bailey and Matt Quinn '03 finished off the decisive run with back-to-back three-pointers. Bailey scored 10 during that span.

"That run was big for us because we came out flat in the second half and gave Colgate the lead. But we remained focused and patient on the offensive end, getting what we wanted. This combined with solid team defense helped to secure a victory," Bailey said.

"All we needed was to settle down and play as a team. We wanted it so bad that we rushed our shots," Flannery added.

Colgate tried to claw their way back and got to within seven points on two different occasions before Dan Blankenship '03 increased the lead to 63-53 with a three-pointer as the shot clock expired.

The Bison did a good job in keeping Pat Campolieta, Colgate's leading scorer and rebounder, from making an impact. Campolieta picked up his fourth foul with just over nine minutes left to play and scored only two points the rest of the way. Although he did manage six steals, Campolieta only scored 10 points. Howard Blue and Mark Linebaugh were the impact players for the Raiders, as they scored 16 and 15 points, respectively.

Bailey scored at least 20 points for the third straight game and logged his first career double-double. The All-Patriot League guard finished 8-15 from the field and 7-11 from the foul line. He also recorded three steals in helping Davis Gym close with a victory.

"It felt great. I just go out and try to play hard every time I step on the floor," the senior captain said. "Davis has had great tradition of winning. The fan support for the games has been great during my time here and in previous years. For this reason, Davis has been an excellent place to play."

Blankenship finished with 15 points and a career-high seven boards.

"They are our captains for a reason. They stepped up and put us on a roll. Good players do that," Flannery said of his starting backcourt.

Peter Santos '02, the only other senior on the squad, was honored before the game along with Bailey. Santos started the game and logged two points and two rebounds.

"It was great to be honored in front of a home crowd. After an introduction like that, I just wanted to go out and play well and bring home a victory," Bailey said. "Every time we go out, we want to win. Since this was the last Patriot League game in Davis and the last game in Davis for Peter and myself, getting a win was important."

The Bison women's swimming and diving team broke 10 University records on their way to a second place finish in the Patriot League Championships. The men's team fought hard and grabbed fourth in the League behind Lehigh, American and Army.

For the women, it was a surprising finish as they were picked to finish fourth in the League. The team's improvement throughout the season earned Bison Head Coach Jerry Foley the Female Coach of the Year award.

"It's always nice to be recognized by your peers," Foley said. "I'm glad they recognized the accomplishments of our athletes."

The women's team started the tournament like they wanted, holding the lead after the first day of competition. Meghan Freese '04 earned the first gold medal for the Bison, winning the 50 free in 24.10, the second best time in school history.

Daniela Faas '04 also swam for a second best time in University history with a time of 5:01.15 in the 500 free, which won her the silver medal.

"I'm really happy with the way I finished the season," Faas said. "Everyone did their best to make it great."

CECILY CAIRNS CLASSIC CORNER

The luckiest man on earth

Before last Saturday, the nation of Australia had never won a gold medal in the Winter Olympics. So one would imagine that Aussies everywhere swelled with pride when their unheard of speedskater Steven Bradybury stood on the podium with a gold medal draped around his neck.

After all, he'd done what no Australian had ever done before, and tradition suggests that such groundbreakers ought to be heroes. But if there was any chance of Bradbury being regarded in such a way, it was drowned immediately after he crossed the line—even before that—by an influx of jeers, spite and cries of injustice that poured out of the stands at Salt Lake City. A fluke, they claimed—it happened by default. They screamed for a re-race, a "fair" contest.

The truth is, Bradbury's victory in the 1,000-meter short-track race was a bit unorthodox. In fact, it was really one of the most unusual triumphs in the history of sport. The 28-year-old Australian had foiled inevitability not once, not twice, but three times in an astounding turn of events that ended with him cruising across the line, all alone, while the favorites lay strewn about on the ice behind him.

He had been in dead last. He didn't touch any of them—they just crashed down before him, and, as luck would have it, he just plugged along past the carnage without getting caught in the trainwreck.

So maybe he was the luckiest man in the history of the Olympics—the luckiest man on the face of the earth. But quirky as fate was that night, the circumstances don't tarnish his place in history. Victory-by-default is a concept that has kept sports fans up in arms since the dawn of organized sport.

In 1927, it was boxing's Gene Tunney and "the long count"—a controversy that will probably linger forever in the corridors of unresolved bickering. In his celebrated rematch with boxing legend Jack Dempsey, Tunney thudded to the floor in round seven after a series of punches from his foe. A knockout victory for Dempsey looked certain, who had retreated to the nearest corner as timekeeper Paul Beeler began the count.

Luckily for Tunney, Dempsey had neglected to follow an explicit rule—the fighter scoring the knockdown had to retreat to a neutral corner before the official count could start. So referee Dave Barry didn't start his count until he had shoved a flustered Dempsey into the farthest corner—five seconds into Beeler's count. Tunney dragged himself to his feet as the count reached nine—14 seconds after he had fallen—and went on to win the fight, capitalizing tremendously on Dempsey's blunder of the mind.

More recently, and perhaps more controversially, it was the 1990 University of Colorado football squad who were smiled upon by fate, but frowned upon by critics of justice. In an Oct. 6 match-up with Missouri, the future National Champions trailed 31-27 in the final minute. After plowing to the one-yard line on two plays, the Buffaloes took their last timeout. The officials, apparently also taking a timeout, forgot to change the down marker.

When Eric Bieniemy was halted on the next play, Colorado faced a third down instead of a fourth. Quarterback Charley Johnson spiked the ball to stop the clock, and then used the fifth down to stagger into the endzone for a 33-31 victory. Missouri fans went berserk, demanding that Colorado do "the right thing" and concede victory to the Tigers. The Buffaloes, however, wouldn't budge.

Luck isn't a luxury reserved for humans, apparently. If there's any sporting event that compares almost perfectly with Bradbury's stunning upset, it would have to be the 1967 Grand National. Tunney and the Buffaloes were aided by the mistakes of other mortals, but the '67 National—like last week's short-track fiasco—must have been a work of divine intervention. In a race loaded with champions, the clumsy Foinavon was assigned odds of 100-1 and like Bradbury, he didn't surprise anyone early in the race.

As Foinavon was lethargically bringing up the rear, the frontrunners approached one of eight remaining fences. In a gruesome turn of events, a mass pileup of horses and jockeys ensued. Every horse in the race refused, crashed or shied away from the fence—that is, everyone but Foinavon. The longshot just tiptoed around the carnage, popped over the fence and thumped along on his way to a thoroughly improbable victory.

Steven Bradbury of Australia made it across the finish line unscathed, despite the disaster that left all of his competitors iced.

Critics are quick to discredit athletes like Bradbury—the Foinavons of sports history, because victory as a product of luck, for some reason, is almost a sin. They wanted the Buffaloes to "give back" their "stolen" victory, as they do with Bradbury. Somehow, because he wasn't the media darling, because he didn't have the appropriate level of charm, we've decided that Bradbury isn't the right man to own the gold medal

But luck is a finicky creature, more-so than we tend to realize. In 1994, Bradbury came startlingly close to dying on the track when he suffered a slit down his leg that required 111 stitches. In 2000, he broke his neck and was restricted to a halo brace for over a month.

Before we criticize, before we step forth and make statements about what falls within the almighty boundaries of justice, we ought to reconsider what exactly makes the right athlete or the right team.

Maybe Bradbury wasn't as undeserving as we labeled him. Maybe he wasn't just bizarrely fortunate after all.

Not "lucky," just due.

Women's water polo prepped to play

By Barb Morgan
Senior Writer

Practices starting at 6 a.m every Tuesday and Thursday, doubles both Saturdays and Sundays when there is not a tournament to play in ... sound a little intense? That's exactly how one could describe the upcoming season for the Bison women's water polo team.

Heading into its fourth year at a varsity level the women's team is looking to improve upon its 18-13 record from last year and also hopes to contend for the Eastern Championship title.

In order to achieve this, the athletes spent many hours in the pool and weight room on their own in the fall and have been doing doubles every weekend since the start of this semester, coupled with doubles twice during the week.

This hard work ethic is testament to how far the team thinks they can go and how much effort they are willing to put in to succeed.

"This is the hardest working team that I have coached since arriving back at Bucknell. Much of that is due to the work ethic instilled by our two captains, Brooke Rea ['02] and Adrienne Schober ['02] Both are top players on the squad and not only bring different individual skills to the team but also incredible leadership qualities," Head Coach John Zeigler said.

Rea and Schober are two key returners for the Blue and Orange. Rea will be the primary offensive hole set for the Bison while Schober will be vital as a driver leading the team's counterattack.

The arrival of six new first-year students, four of whom are challenging for starting positions, will provide some depth to the team that allots for a larger rotation of players in the games.

"Freshmen Meg Blitzer, Cody Keffer, Meg Blitzer, Eileen Ketterer and Katie Hartigan are names you will become accustomed to hearing in our statistics immediately this season. The addition of such a strong first-year squad makes us a deep one for the first time in our program's history," Zeigler said.

The players are looking forward to applying their hard work to the upcoming games.

"Right now, I am the most excited I've ever been about an upcoming season in my third year with this team. We have more depth than in past years, with the addition of six incredible freshmen and many of our key players returning," Rea said.

Other upperclassmen who will contribute greatly include Lindsay Chesterfield '03 who returns in her second season as the starting goalkeeper and should be the foundation for a strong Bison defense. Katie Stahler '03 looks to shake off some injuries and return as a third year starter for the Bison, primarily in her role as a two-meter defender. Kelly Hofstetter '04 should once again be a strong all-around player with strong shooting and aggressive defense skills. Meredith Stevens '02 serves multiple roles for the team both as a solid defensive player and a back-up goalkeeper. Daniela Faas '04 jumps right back in the pool after finishing her swim season to help fuel the counterattack.

The Bison start their season this weekend traveling to Princeton, where they will face three top-20 teams: Princeton (#15), Michigan (#14) and UMass (#20), as well as Slippery Rock over the course of two days.

"I am excited to see how we play against some of the top teams in the country this weekend, and even though wins will not be easy, if we show up, give them a good game and keep our level of play strong and clean for four quarters, it will be a great start to our season," Rea said.

The conditioning of the team should play a vital role in its success. Water polo is a game that requires a lot of skill and even more stamina.

"We have already made significant progress throughout our rigorous preseason, and we appear to be in better shape than ever as we enter our first tournament at Princeton this weekend. Although there are a lot of new faces on our team this season, it has been remarkable how well we are coming together and the chemistry that is already apparent during practice," Adrienne Schober '02 said.

If a season's success is based on commitment, intensity and effort, it can certainly be said that the Bison women's water polo team is well on its way to having a season without limits.

Bison make great start behind solid first-year performers

The Bucknell men's tennis squad made a strong showing in Garden City, N.Y. this past weekend against The College of New Jersey (TCNJ). The TCNJ Invitational showcased singles and doubles action between Bucknell, TCNJ and Villanova.

With a tennis squad that is comprised of six freshmen, one junior and one senior, they were tabbed to fall into sixth place in the Patriot League. But led by Joe Menezes '05, Leland Tien '05, Gerald DiChiara '05, Paul Bohlander '05, and Todd Jacobs '03, they hit TCNJ hard with five of six victories in singles competition and two of three doubles matches.

"We've been working very hard in practice and I think that our depth is going to be our greatest asset this year," DiChiara said.

DiChiara led all Bison players, winning all four of his matches, including the only two Bucknell victories over Villanova. DiChiara's second match against Villanova was a doubles match where he picked up help from Dave Eckelberg '05.

DiChiara's collegiate record improved to a 6-1 in singles and a 4-1 in doubles.

"In the preseason, I wasn't playing that well," DiChiara said. "But I started to concentrate more and I've gotten a lot of my confidence back. It's all about mental toughness."

"We've gotten off to a great start," Todd Jacobs '03 said. "It was good that we had a tournament this early in the season so that some of the new players can adjust to our system."

The Bison travel to St. Francis for their next match on Feb. 28.

"I think we stand a good chance [against St. Francis]" Jacobs said. "We played them well in the fall and beat them last year, so I expect to win."

Foley earns Female Coach of the Year behind strong swim performances

tions of the entire meet. The two joined Rebecca Dolan '03 and Jackie Feinthel '05 in shattering the University's all-time record in the 800 free relay. Their time of 7:41.16 shaved nearly seven seconds off the former record, and earned them a silver medal.

The Bison weren't done breaking school records as Darby Golino '03, Jamie Flick '05, Ashley Aiken '05 and Meghan Freese '04 teamed up to win the 200 medley relay, earning the bronze and finishing just 0.18 seconds behind winner Navy with a time of 1:47.58.

Flick reset her own school record in the 100 breast while taking home the silver with a time of 1:05.55, and Golino picked up a silver in the 100 back with a time of 58.67.

In the final day of competition the women picked up one gold and three silver medals to ensure second place in the League.

Once again, it was a record-breaking day as Faas shaved more than 12 seconds off the former University record in the 1,650 free with a time of 17:13.27.

"It was great to swim that well in that event and break the school record at the end of the season," she said.

Winning silver medals for the Bison were Golino in the 200 back, Freese in the 100 free and Flick in the 200 breast.

"Words can't describe how happy we are with the way the women swam," Foley said. "We went in there and lit it up, and I'm really proud of them."

> "Words can't describe how happy we are with the way the women swam. We went in there and lit it up, and I'm really proud of them."
> —Jerry Foley, head coach

For the men's side Stephen Schwanhausser '03 got things started the first day in the 200 IM with a time of 2:55.11, earning him the bronze in the event. Coming in just 0.03 seconds behind him was teammate Jack Sheehan '04.

In the second day of competition it was once again Schwanhausser and Sheehan leading the Bison efforts. Schwanhausser placed fifth in the 100 breast with a time of 57.53, and Sheehan took the silver in the 400 IM. His time of 4:05.17 was good enough to break what was a long-standing University record.

"I was very pleased with my performance," Sheehan said. "It was nice to break the record and get my name on the board."

The Bison also placed seventh and eighth in the 100 breast event. Stellios Saffos '03 took seventh with a time of 58.29, the second fastest in school history. Michael Guskey '03 finished eighth in 59.01.

In the final day of the meet, Schwanhausser capped off an impressive outing by breaking yet another school record with a time of 2:03.30 in the 200 breast. The time was good for a fourth place finish that helped the Bison finish the meet strongly.

Despite not being able to meet their original goal of winning the Patriot League Championship, the men aren't disappointed with their efforts.

"We would've liked to have finished in the top three, but we were pleased with our performance because we put a lot of points on the board," Sheehan said.

Foley sees the weekend as a success for both teams, who swam as well as they could have.

"The men were equal to the task of the women, but just didn't have the same depth," he said. "They still broke many personal records, and the whole weekend was an adrenaline rush for both teams."

The teams will continue their season from Feb. 28 to March 2 at the ECAC Championships at the University of Pittsburgh.

"We have a lot of momentum now, everyone's so excited and no one wants the season to end," Foley said. "Things are looking optimistic for ECACs."

"Records were made to be broken" is a common phrase. The women's basketball team did just that in its dominating 96-69 victory over Colgate this past Saturday at Davis Gym. The Bison broke a school record for points in a half with 59 in the opening stanza, and with the mark tied a Patriot League record. The Orange and Blue also shot a blistering 66 percent from the floor in the contest to eclipse another school record.

The Colgate matchup also marked the last regular season home game for the squad's senior class. Tri-Captains Vicki Quimby '02, Monique LeBlanc '02 and Rebekah May '02, along with Kate Rounsley '02, Maribel Castillo '02 and Kate Florence '02 will leave Bucknell as the program's all-time winningest class.

"The Colgate game was a great victory, not only because of the win, but the fact that we played as an entire team, all 15 of us, and had fun out there. That's what it's all about, and it was great to win that one for the seniors, seeing they have done so much for all of us," Molly Creamer '03 said.

"The seniors are our best friends, family and teammates; I am so happy that we could get such a great victory to add to the year and to close out their regular season home game career," Kristin Valdner '04 said.

The Bison were on fire from the opening tip, hitting their first 10 shots. With just over 15 minutes to play in the first half, the Orange and Blue found themselves up one, 17-16. They then ignited on a 7-0 run during the next two minutes to take a 24-16 lead.

The Red Raiders would answer with a three-pointer to cut its deficit to five with 13 minutes left but that is the closest they would get the rest of the game. At the 11:20 mark the Bison stepped up their defense and held their opponents scoreless over the next five minutes. During that span the home team built a 41-21 lead and would enter the locker rooms with its largest advantage of the half, 59-32.

The Orange and Blue would extend its lead to as large as 34 in the second half. Colgate fought back at the very end, outscoring the Bison 10-4 on the way to the final score. Creamer led all players with 29 points and 12 assists. The junior point guard had a points-assist double-double by halftime.

Quimby was 9-11 from the floor, scoring 19 points and Rounsley added 13. LeBlanc led all players with eight rebounds. The victory improves the Orange and Blue to 17-8 overall and 9-2 in the Patriot League and maintains their share of a first place tie with Holy Cross.

"I was very nervous about senior day, but the underclassmen did such an excellent job and I am so grateful to be a senior on this team. I will miss all the girls so very much and they all will hold a very special place in my heart forever," Quimby said.

"Senior night was perfect, I couldn't have asked for a better way to end my career, thanks to my awesome teammates," Rounsley said.

The Bison kept the scoreboard operator busy again with their 90-79 home victory over American last week. The Orange and Blue fell behind early, trailing 11-4 after the first four minutes. Three minutes later, the home team had only cut its deficit to 19-13, but over the next minute of play tied the contest thanks to a 6-0 run. The two teams battled back and forth over the next eight minutes and were knotted at 29 for the sixth tie of the half. The Bison then exploded on a 13-5 run to go up by eight, 42-34. The Eagles would get within four, 48-44, by halftime.

The Orange and Blue shot 65 percent from the floor in the second stanza and would extend its lead to as much as 15, but American was able to stay in the contest by taking advantage of 27 Bison turnovers. The Eagles got within eight but the Orange and Blue scored five of the game's last seven points en route to victory. Creamer led all scorers again with 32 points and Quimby pulled down a career-high 17 rebounds along with scoring 21 points. Desire Almind '03 and LeBlanc each contributed eight points for the Bison.

"We were glad to beat American at home, forcefully as we did. They are very athletic and scrappy, but we wanted to stick to our game plan and be composed and in control. I think we executed that pretty well," LeBlanc said.

The Orange and Blue travel to Lehigh this Saturday to square off against the Mountain Hawks in a 1 p.m. tip-off in their final regular season Patriot League game.

"Bryan is a special player, but he's also a special person. You get players that you talk about long after they are gone. He will be one of them. His desire to excel in the game has always been something I valued since I met him," Flannery said.

The squad shot 43 percent from the field as they beat Colgate for the eighth time in nine tries.

The win over Colgate was preceded with a tough loss against league-leading American. The Bison failed to tie the Eagles for first place after being defeated 78-67 at Davis Gym. The Orange and Blue dropped their record to 10-14, 6-5 while the Eagles improved theirs to 14-10, 8-3.

"We did not adjust to their big kids inside. They took us out behind the wood shed and beat us up. We sure would like another shot at them," Flannery said.

Bailey led the Bison with a team-high 23 points and a game-high nine rebounds. Boakai Lalugba '03 added 20 points.

The visitors led the Bison 40-26 after a 21-9 run to close the first-half. It was 19-17 at one point before American outscored the hosts 17-4 over a 7:20 span to increase their lead to 36-21.

The Eagles led by as many as 23 points at 60-37 with 11:29 left in the game. The closest the Bison got was nine points after a 16-2 run that was capped by a Lalugba fastbreak dunk. The crowd was into it, but a 7-2 run by American answered the call and increased the Bison's deficit at 14, 69-55.

American's Patrick Doctor had a tremendous game, scoring a game and career-high 31 points, 19 of which came in the opening half. Steven Miles chipped in with 14 points and 8 rebounds.

The Orange and Blue grabbed 15 offensive rebounds as a group as they out-rebounded the opposition 27-26. The team also shot 47 percent from the field.

Rodgers scored eight points on 3-4 shooting from the field. He finished with two three-pointers. Blankenship and Ben Slater '04 added six points apiece for the Bison.

The Bison has one game in the upcoming week, as they travel to Bethlehem, Pa. on Feb. 24 to take on Lehigh. That game will close off the regular season before the Bison compete in the Patriot League tournament.

Why we do it

The locker room still wreaked of sweaty laundry and stale deodorant. The steam from the showers filtered down into the coach's office and hung like an albatross around the packed locker room. The air was heavy on the lungs, keeping our breaths short and thick as the coach read the role call.

It was a gym class like any other at an all-male Catholic high school. The geeks sat in a corner, hustling to shed their uniforms for the more comfortable gym apparel so that they wouldn't be singled out any more than necessary. They discuss comic books and television shows. On the other side of the room, the jocks sit on top of the lockers comparing their muscles with their friends, sharing stories of girls they'd "hooked up with" and deciphering the complexities of the word "synergy" now emblazoned on all their athletic shirts.

You could tell the hierarchical status of athletes from the class's reaction to their names being read on the role. If you got a pat on the back or a few scattered claps, you were among the elite athletic talents. Conversely, if you received snickers and derisive comments about your legs resembling that of a Thanksgiving main course, you were most decidedly not among the "in-crowd."

Chance was a member of the latter group. Although not the worst in the class, he wasn't what one would consider "conventionally good." He was always picked second to last next to this bigger "geek," Sean. But unlike Sean, Chance cared about his placement in the hierarchy. He yearned for social mobility, although if he had used that term he probably would have ensured that he would never make another friend for the rest of his life.

In this particular gym class, the sport of choice was arena football—the first arena football game of the year. The teams were picked by captains and Sean was picked last ... Chance, second to last. Chance loved football. He'd been studying it for a year or so, watching games, contemplating strategies, learning to throw a perfect spiral. This year he stepped onto the gym floor that day with a renewed vigor. An optimism about his success. Today he was going to show them that "he got game."

The first game he went unnoticed, No one covered him and no one threw to him, but he wasn't dismayed. He was a little slower than usual because his hip was aching for some reason. In spite of the nagging pain, the next game he went up to the quarterback, one of the athletic elites, and said "listen, they're not covering me at all. If you need an open man for a dump pass or something, I'm just sitting there." The jock smiled a friendly, condescending smile and thanked Chance for the advice. Chance ran back to his spot on the line.

The next play, the jock, in trouble after his five-Mississippi's expired, bulleted the ball towards Chance's side of the field. No one was covering Chance and no one expected him to catch the ball. The jock had thrown it away, rather than throw it to Chance, but he caught it and ran a quarter of the gym floor.

The jock learned his lesson but the defense hadn't and still refused to cover Chance. The jock started hitting Chance for deeper and deeper passes. All told, Chance had about eight catches and three touchdowns before the other defenses decided to cover him. The coverage forced him to speed up his game. The harder he ran, the more his hip began pounding under his skin.

Chance wasn't satisfied though. He sucked in the congratulations that his teammates gave him like a dry sponge. His confidence grew and he demanded more from himself to not only surpass the expectations of his second-to-last pick, but to obliterate them. To create a new bar. To out-jock the jocks at their own game. He was driven. He was instilled with something greater than anything he even thought to contemplate.

With gym class almost done and the game on the line, Chance needed to make it stick. He didn't want to be picked last anymore. He wanted to make them remember that he didn't just have a lucky day. When the opposing quarterback challenged him by rocketing a pass towards his man, Chance had his storybook ending. He leapt like no white man had ever jumped before and snatched the ball from the air for the first interception of the game.

Everyone was stunned and they just watched as he landed on the ground, and for a split second no one moved. Chance went first, darting up the sideline with an uncanny speed. The fastest man on the other team, a track runner no less, sprinted to cut off his path to the end zone but was unsuccessful. Chance raced down the length of the court, his hip throbbing more than ever but with more than just an opponent in hot pursuit. With his opponent's arms flailing with disgruntled conviction in the background, Chance crossed the end zone.

As he stepped over the line, it happened. He hadn't tripped, he hadn't been touched, he simply kept running and it just snapped. Chance didn't fall or scream. He ran through it and collapsed on the bleachers like he was exhausted. He doubled over in pain as his hip did the screaming for him. His teammates called him back to the game with smiles on their faces but Chance just said he was too tired. It wasn't until the coach came over and congratulated him that he was asked what was wrong. All Chance could say was that he couldn't move his left leg.

An ambulance was called and he was taken off the court on a gurney. Chance held back his tears that the glorious day where he finally proved himself to his peers had been robbed of him. The game went on and the team found another way to win. Over the weeks to come, his weakness would be magnified, both internally and externally. He'd bear the crutches to remind everyone that he couldn't handle the pressures of a gym class.

He was later told that the muscle that attached to the protruding portion of his hip had snapped the bone off. Chance was scolded for not slowing down when his hip started aching to begin with, rather than intensify his resolve. In two weeks, the remaining muscles would compensate for the loss of the one muscle and the loose bone would dissolve in the body making surgery unnecessary.

Chance was a fast healer though and he was off the crutches within a week and stopped limping after three. The next gym class he was able to play in, he was picked dead last. Even Sean was picked before him. His name was snickered at during role call and he never got the ball again ... not on purpose anyways.

His social life continued on the same as it had before that football game, but much changed in Chance's perception of society and the drive to succeed after that. A lot of things changed for Chance after that day. Although his athletic intensity diminished for a while in backlash, it flared up again and remains that way.

When I play sports now, I know that I'm buying into a gender stereotype; I understand that I have nothing to prove to anyone but myself; I know the needless sacrifices we make for glory, respect, honor and pride. But my intensity is just as strong as it was that day I broke my hip. And sometimes I can feel the remaining muscles get caught on the unnatural edge when I walk or exercise or if I'm just tossing the football around with my cousin. But I'd take another one for the team in a heartbeat, and I'd do it all again if I thought I could have gotten one more touchdown ... or one less snicker at role call.

Sports

Selection committees and the death of innocence

COMMENTARY

Rob Schmicker

On the field, sports are pure. Athletes compete because they love the game and they want to win. Most of the time, winning and losing is clear-cut—one person will win and one will lose. In soccer and hockey, whoever scores more goals wins. In football and basketball, who ever scores more points wins. In track and auto racing, only the fastest will win.

The outcome should be as simple as that—but often it is not because in some sports, the winners and losers are determined in purely subjective ways. We have seen numerous examples of this in the sporting world over the past few years with the most obvious culprit being college football's Bowl Championship Series (BCS).

Before even delving into the BCS, it should be noted that college football is influenced from the very start of the season in August. So much attention is paid to the preseason top-25, that fans, coaches and writers believe they know who the best teams are before the season even begins. For the rest of the season, the early favorites will be given favorable votes while upstarts will often be overlooked.

When the end of the season comes, the BCS is then used to determine the top two teams. Instead of letting the athletes determine the winner, a computer "scientifically" declares who are the best two teams. Enriched with the various newspaper polls, a strength of schedule factor and computer ratings done by the average sports nerd, the BCS is in no way objective. The athletes are not determining their fate, for it rests in the hands of others.

In college basketball, 65 teams make the NCAA tournament. While 32 gain automatic births, the remaining are left sweating it out on Selection Sunday. Normally, there are at least 15 teams competing for the last seven spots. Those teams that do not make it automatically have their fate decided by a committee of officials. This "elite" group looks at every factor imaginable before making its decision, but you still have to wonder sometimes. Everyone can't be happy all the time, but some of the choices just don't make sense.

Subjectively determining who plays for the championship is purely collegiate. The difference between professional and collegiate sports is parity. Unlike, collegiate sports, professional teams are all within the same skill level. Every collegiate conference is of a different skill level—a 17-8 squad from the Patriot League is in no way comparable to a 17-8 team from the Big East. It is extremely difficult for the selection committee to choose a team from a mid-level conference over a team from one of the power conferences. For instance, should Detroit (23-4) be selected over Wisconsin (16-11) (assuming neither wins their conference tournament) even though they play in a less competitive conference? If the NCAA wants only the best teams involved in the championship process they must find a better system. While corruption isn't prevalent in the current system, biases are more than commonplace. Officials have biases regarding who the best teams are, when in fact they may just be sorely overrated.

In sports that rely on judges, such as gymnastics, boxing and figure skating, corruption occasionally occurs. What a judge believes is ideal or perfect determines who wins–and it is different for everyone. In order to receive different opinions on who the winner is while underminding any biases, several judges are normally used. Still, one judge can make a difference. The recent attention given to the subjectivity of certain sports is an obvious result of "Skategate." Everyone knows the story of how the Canadian pair of Jamie Sale and David Pelletier were robbed of figure skating gold after a perfect skate. Word spread after the competition that the French judge had been persuaded to vote for the Russian pair of Elena Berezhnaya and Anton Sikharulidze. Duel golds were eventually given out, but not without cries of conspiracy.

What can be done? Virtually nothing, since the sport of figure skating depends on the judges. In the 1980s, Olympic athletes had to beware of the infamous East German judge, who was always accused of giving high scores only to other East German athletes. Nothing was done, even though everyone knew it was going on. If we get rid of judges then how can one judge a sport like figure skating? Whoever falls over the least wins? The only way to help the situation is to get better judges. The IOC needs to find moral judges whose decisions it can stand behind. Constant undermining of the officials isn't helping the situation. It would be great to get rid of judges, but it just can't be done.

Figure skating isn't the only area where judges have been caught in a controversy. Boxing has had its share, most recently with the Oscar de la Hoya-Felix Trinidad fight of 1999. De la Hoya dominated rounds 1-9, but was out punched in rounds 10, 11 and 12. Even though he had won nine of twelve rounds, he ended up on the short side of a unanimous decision. The camp cried "foul" but the decision was final. Trinidad was great in the final rounds, but not good enough to persuade the judges that he won the fight. De la Hoya's image as a pretty boy definitely played a big role in the decision since the judges had a preconceived image of what kind of person he was, rather than what kind of fighter.

The underlying point is that sports should be objective. Some sports may require judges, but they cause many problems. Baseball players have been complaining about umpires for years, but the umpires are not intentionally making bad calls. They have a working relationship with the players and don't want any hard feelings. Unlike figure skating judges that have no personal ties with the athletes, baseball umpires have a reason to care about their calls. Figure skating judges are given the task of determining who wins, but how are we to know if their intentions are true or not? Until we are able to do away with corrupt judges and computer systems–things that take the athlete's fate out of their hands and into others–sports will never be completely innocent again.

Athlete of the Week

By Scott Kloss

Stephanie Bango '02

Bango medaled in the 800-meter run and the 400-meter dash, as well as anchoring two winning relays.

Stephanie Bango '02, our athlete of the week, captured our hearts with a breathtaking performance at the women's indoor track and field Patriot League Championships at the United States Military Academy last weekend. Bango won the gold in the 800-meter run (2:12.06) and took the silver in the 400-meter dash in an ECAC-qualifying time of 56.89. That blazing time is also the second-fastest in University history. In addition to her individual performances, she anchored both the winning 1,600 and 3,200-meter relay teams for the second year in a row.

"When competing in meets as grueling as the league meet, when nothing is held back, I always rely on perseverance, determination, and tons of Gatorade. I believe my performances were expected because I have been running fairly consistent with my times all season. I was honestly surprised that I had enough left in me to PR in my final split of the 4x4 (55.5) after having run three races prior to that," Bango said.

The strain of running multiple events in such a high-intensity meet can have its toll on an athlete, but Bango knows how to handle such situations.

"I find that when exhaustion is a factor, I first focus on what needs to be accomplished before I step on the track and then once I am on the track the support from my teammates always carries me through, " Bango said.

When the meet comes down to the last event, Bango doesn't shy away from the pressure, but rather, enjoys the challenge.

"My favorite event is the 4x4 relay. Besides being the last event of the day, it is usually one of the most unpredictable and exciting races to run in, let alone watch," Bango said. "Specifically, this past weekend at the league meet, we were confident in winning the team championship upon entering the last race of the day and because of this, winning this relay was more about pride than actually needing the points."

The Bison women's team amassed a total of 210.5, over 40 points ahead of second place Army. The ladies won their fourth Patriot League Championship in the last five years.

"Bringing home the Cup after losing it to Navy last year was definitely the best way our team could have ended the season. Famous for his 'beat Army' attire, I am confident in saying that Coach Gulden would have been proud," Bango said.

Driven by a strong sense of pride and equipped with athletic skills comparable to the Kennedy's political persuasion power, Bango continues to develop her strong work ethic.

"My individual goal from the time I started racing is to never walk away from a race knowing that I still had something left in me. If there is still something left in me, then I didn't race," Bango said. "My individual goal for this particular year is to break 2:09 in the half (800-meter run) and move myself up on the NCAA performance list."

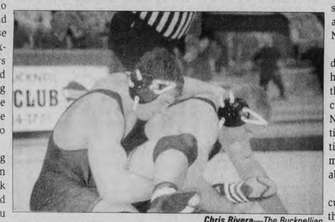
After a hard day's work, Bango looks to her elementary education/psychology major studies as a release and doesn't mind a couple Buffalo wings here and there.

Cracking the wrestler's training regimen

By Brian Klotz
Senior Writer

In the sport of wrestling, monitoring weight is a way of life. Long workouts, small meals and running in two to three layers of clothing to lose weight before a competition have been the tactics of wrestlers for decades. In the words of wrestling team member Brian Falciglia '02, "Losing weight is all about willpower and dedication. It all depends on how much you can stand it."

In common practice, weight loss seems like a normal thing. Millions of people each year diet by eating the correct foods and exercising. But wrestling takes a much different approach to being fit and eating. Just as in track and field where long jumpers try to get as close to the takeoff board in every jump to maximize their measured distance, wrestlers need to be as close to their registered weight as possible. Anything less is giving up weight to the other wrestler and hence giving them an advantage, anything more is not making weight and not being able to wrestle in the match.



Chris Rivera—The Bucknellian

Brian Falciglia '02 views weight loss for competitive wrestling as a matter of dedication to the sport.

"Every wrestler is constantly checking their weight," Falciglia said. "Depending on when it is before a match, one might check their weight three to five times a day, and if you are over right before a match, you are running in all sorts of layers just to sweat out those last pounds or tenths."

Head Coach Tim Wittman wrestled for Penn State when he was in college and knows what many of the athletes had to do to make weight.

"I remember it used to be that losing eight to 10 pounds before a match was nothing," he said. "We would come in the night before and work out in sweat suits and drop five pounds easily, go to bed that night, then come in the next morning and work the rest of it off."

The 1997-1998 wrestling season brought a huge amount of scrutiny to the sport after three wrestlers died of excessive weight loss. Among the rule changes that were instituted in January of 1999 were more accurate calculations of a wrestler's safe minimum weight by doctors, the outlawing of rubber sweat suits and a change in the weigh in policy before meets. Now wrestlers must weigh in no more than an hour before a meet, unlike previous years where it was done the night before. Called by some as "an overreaction" and detrimental to the sport, the new policies make it almost impossible for a wrestler to lose more than five pounds to make weight.

Falciglia experienced the dangers of cutting too much weight first-hand while at a competition.

"One time, out at summer nationals in Lincoln Nebraska, I was running in my sauna suit, with sweats on over it, in 110-degree heat," he said. "That same week I saw a kid go into convulsions after being out in the heat running for so long. Not fun stuff."

Although danger was always present, deaths from excessive weight loss were unheard of before the 1997-1998 season. In fact, the three deaths were the first to happen in collegiate wrestling since its beginnings as an NCAA sport in 1928. But with the new regulations, some saw it as a step in the right direction, making the champions of the tournaments those who have the greatest technical ability, not the best ability to lose weight.

"This year we didn't have any one person cutting a lot of weight as we may have had in the past, so weight control was not really an issue," Wittman said. "The wrestlers on the team realize the importance of eating right, getting enough rest and so on. I have even asked them to take a water bottle with them to class and drink water constantly because most of them are in an underhydrated state and they don't even realize it."

Still, Falciglia thinks that cutting weight is part of the sport. "It makes it more competitive," he said, "However, we are very experienced with losing weight and know our bodies very well. Knowing your body is key in losing weight. You need to read it for signs of trouble and you need to know your limit."

Men's lacrosse to face Virginia in game one

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The Bucknell lacrosse team heads into its final week of the preseason before it tries to knock off North Carolina for the second straight year. Last year's win put the team on the map, as the Tar Heels were ranked in the top 10 in the nation and were heavy favorites on their home field. The Bison have come a long way since the beginning of last season, earning a first-ever NCAA berth by season's end, but they are once again underdogs opening day.

"They've been wanting to play us again since the second the game ended last year," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said. "They're looking at it as a payback kind of a game."

The team's final scrimmage was on Sunday against Virginia, a team that holds a preseason ranking of fifth in the nation. The Bison struggled and were unable to string together a solid showing at any point.

"Virginia's a very good team," Jamieson said. "Their skills and speed were better than ours, and they got to every loose ball, making things difficult on our defense."

The Bison defense is headed up this year by Kevin Smithies '02 who was a pre-season All-American honorable mention. Justin Sussman '03, who started at goalie halfway through last season, will return as the anchor of the strong defense. Sussman too was a pre-season All-American honorable mention.

But the Bison defense, which proved to be the catalyst of last year's run, won't be able to maximize its potential if its opponent is in constant control of the ball like Virginia was.

"We need to slow down the ball against a team like them, so our defense isn't on the field as much," Smithies said. "We weren't able to control the possessions that we had, and they made us pay."

> "Good teams learn from their mistakes and get better. Virginia found and exploited our weaknesses, and we learned a lot from scrimmaging them. I think we'll be able to work on the things we know we can do better and improve as a team."
> —Sid Jamieson, head coach

Offensively, the Bison will be led by Wes Fetchet '04, who won the Patriot League Rookie of the Year honor last season. Fetchet will once again be joined by Dennis Geraghty '03 who led the Bison in scoring last year. The offense is confident that it can get it done against the competition when the regular season starts.

"If we start with the defense and then get into our offense, we can beat anyone," Fetchet said.

The Bison look at their struggle against Virginia as something to build on during this important week in practice before they square off against the Tar Heels.

"Good teams learn from their mistakes and get better," Jamieson said. "Virginia found and exploited our weaknesses, and we learned a lot from scrimmaging them. I think we'll be able to work on the things we know we can do better and improve as a team."

Last year the Bison faced even greater odds against North Carolina opening day because the game was played in North Carolina. This time the Bison should have an advantage, as they will be playing on their new home field. But while they look forward to playing at home, they know that it's not going to be easy against a powerhouse team like the Tar Heels.

"You still have to line up and play," Jamieson said. "It's not like they give you two goals because you're playing at home."

All memories of any struggles that they had during the preseason are put behind them, and the Bison are looking to start off like they did last year.

"We're just going to fire up and give it to them on Saturday," Smithies said.

Kim Werther hands out one of the 2,300 antacid tablets she served to overstuffed participants at Monroe County's annual Chili Cookoff.

An abroad perspective: a Semester at Sea

Davis poses at the peak of Table Mountain in South Africa.

By Russell Davis
Contributing Writer

Fourteen days from the country I love, 14 days from my home, my mind set on having the time of my life: then Sept. 11 occurred. Two days later, I found myself staring up at the last remaining building at the site of Hiroshima, Japan, where 200,000 people were killed in 1945, because of the A-bomb. I tried comprehending what had just happened back home, while at the same time tried to absorb where I was-Hiroshima, Japan.

Just when I thought things could not be anymore complicated, a Japanese woman, old enough to have been alive during Hiroshima, came up to me and offered her prayers for what had happened Sept. 11. I was shocked and considered it a coincidence that I ran into the one person in Hiroshima that did not hate Americans. I was wrong to draw conclusions. Five minutes later, another person approached me—10 minutes later another. Now, picture yourself, 14 days removed from your home, two days since Sept. 11, and smack dab in the middle of Hiroshima—people by the groups approaching you with their prayers, concerns and wishes to take you out to dinner to help you cope with your loss. It was enough to make the strongest of us want to cry. Out of the group of around 25 of us, almost all of us had to sit down and take a moment for ourselves. It was one of the most powerful moments of my life and this was only two weeks into my journey.

This past semester I was cruising around the world aboard the "S.S. Universe Explorer." The best I can do is take you through the process of what I experienced. Let me start by saying, for those of you contemplating traveling abroad—go. The toughest part for me was deciding my destination, but after my Semester at Sea experience I knew I made the right decision. The six people I talked to about Semester at Sea said they would harm me if I didn't go, so I owe it all to them, and now you guys owe it to me, heck trust me. I always get a lot of recurring questions regarding the program, so hopefully I'll answer most of them for everyone.

Are the rooms small? Some of them are, some are not. What really matters is that students didn't spend much time in their rooms anyway. Are the classes hard? Some of them are, and some of them aren't, as it is anywhere. There is a large selection of courses for different majors. The professors are all really fun and vary from semester to semester in keeping with the excitement of every voyage. Fairness and reasonability in assignments is taken into high consideration. The bulk of the knowledge did not lie in the classroom—it was attained through the experiences had in port.

Did people get tired of being on a boat for long stretches of time? Very few complained. Dining on the ocean, playing basketball and volleyball, running on the track, doing homework to the sound of the waves—whatever "floats your boat." It was all there and I never got bored of it. The sunrises were amazing and the sunsets were just as breath taking. It was 90 degrees for the majority of our trip, so weather was never a problem.

Now, for the best part: the countries. We went to nine other countries in 100 days. It was the most unbelievable, unparalleled experience I will ever have. Once in port, everyone was basically on their own. Everyone had the opportunities to eat their meals on the boat, and/or sleep on the boat, yet most people chose to spend their time in port at nights to absorb the atmosphere. There was an assigned time that everyone had to be back by in order to proceed to the next port. There were very few problems with people being late to the on-ship time. Penalties included having to stay on the ship for extra hours at the next port, which served as an effective punishment.

One of the highlights of the trip was visiting Japan. The temples in Japan were unbelievable and the different foods were awesome. Our next port was Hong Kong and China. Hong Kong is a big city, yet there are also quaint little islands, with less than 100 inhabitants, just ferry rides away. What everyone should understand is that unlike America, these little private islands were not crowded with tourists. Instead they were fairly empty and privacy and reflection time was highly valued. Between the islands, boats and skyline, Hong Kong was the most beautiful place to view at night.

Vietnam was next and many people liked it the best. The place was inexpensive, interesting and really fun. The majority of the people were poor, so we all did what we thought would help. I carried around a roll of quarters and distributed them to the children as they came up to me. To them it was like receiving a $10 bill. They were very thankful. The streets were very crowded with motorbikes and cars. For example, seeing 300 motorcycles in one intersection at a time was not uncommon, and yet traffic still moved. Imagine stoplights, signs and road lines not meaning a single thing to anyone. The Mekong Delta was a trip that I went on, and that was simply incredible. We took a little 10-passenger boat down the Mekong Delta River. We stopped at floating markets, which consisted of other little boats selling fruits and vegetables for prices like 10 cents per bushel.

Singapore felt like America, but twice as clean. The laws are not really a burden over there, as most people perceive it. The area is really gorgeous and you can walk out to the most southern point of Asia.

Almost opposite to Singapore was India. The atmosphere in India was very depressing. We docked in poverty stricken Chennai. The clothes I was wearing made up more than they made in three months. I did not go to the Taj Mahal in New Delhi, but those who did said it was amazing. The silk and cashmere in India is of outstanding hand sewn quality, and the abundance of the product made for a convenient, inexpensive price as well. I left India feeling an exceptional appreciation for many things.

Our next stop was supposed to be Kenya, but our route was changed due to safety reasons. Instead, we stopped at the Seychelles Islands, hundreds of miles off the east coast of Africa. These islands were so incredible. Through the water you could see 40 feet down, and the sands of the beaches were completely white. Water sports were a top preference while we were there, just as it was a hiker's paradise.

From there we sailed to Cape Town, South Africa, my favorite port. There was anything and everything to do there, and six days was not enough time. There was skydiving in the daytime and clubs at night, and there were African Townships and historical places of interest, as well. Table Mountain was a uniquely gorgeous plateau-topped mountain. There were 71 vineyards all right outside of Cape Town, so we were all able to brush up on our wine knowledge and gaze at the beautiful mountains and vineyards surrounding us. Personal tours were given by most of the estates. Also, a four course, five star meal would cost less than ten dollars, including a bottle of wine and a tip. The city of Cape Town is as lively and clean as any U.S. city, but the economy in Africa is weak, and the value of the U.S. dollar could buy almost anything. We lived like royalty and loved every second of it.

Brazil was very nice, filled with beaches. I took a bus ride to Lencois, where we took a hike to secluded natural waterfalls and jumped from cliffs, while we walked through caverns. The Pelhourino was a place right near our ship and that was where slaves had once been sold and traded years ago. The educational aspect was immense, and there was much to be learned from the surrounding area.

Our last port was Cuba. Americans are restricted from Cuba for travel and trade purposes so the opportunity was granted to us by the government on a special study grant. Havana, Cuba was stunning and resembled the New York City of the 1920s. Due to the trade limitations with the United States, Cuba cannot easily import cars, so they restore all the cars from the 1970s, making for an antiquated-look. The buildings are the same way, and some of the streets are of cobblestone. A very influential experience of the semester was when Fidel Castro invited the ship to one of his convention centers to hear him speak. He spoke for six straight hours without break, water or even sitting down. Even at 75 years old, he works like a machine. He was an amazing speaker. He was extremely accommodating to us, mainly because we are the generation that will decide whether or not to keep the embargo intact when we get older. After his speech, he provided our group of over 700, with food and drinks at one of his many houses in Cuba. It was a huge establishment made for large gatherings. It was fun partying on Castro's tab.

Overall, I can't truly relay how great of an experience this past semester was, but I can say honestly that it was the single best decision I have ever made. Traveling is one thing, but traveling with hundreds of students your own age, and a very understanding faculty is an experience that cannot be beaten. The friends I made along my voyage will be my friends forever. We all have a bond that no one else could ever comprehend. Many of us talked about how after four months together we became stronger friends than almost anyone back at school, solely because of the nature of our association. The knowledge we all gained from spending time in each port cannot be matched in any classroom or read about in any book. The trip builds character as well as a helpful awareness for other cultures. As college students, we received an unprecedented perspective and taste for the world. There is a reason there is a limit of one trip per college student, because once you've done it, all you want to do is go back and do it all over again.

An abroad perspective: Semester in Vienna

By Taylor Lukof
Contributing Writer

At first glance, discussing the output of a Huggies diaper machine in Berlin with students from Moscow, Warsaw and Budapest might seem a little random. However, it turns out that this represented one of the most important experiences I had while spending last fall abroad with the International Education of Students' (IES) program in Vienna, Austria.

I was one of three students selected to participate in the "Investing in Central Europe" conference in early November, representing the Viennese delegation in Berlin. Our task, along with other IES delegations from Berlin and Freiburg, was to pick a public or private company and then research the company inside and out. We then picked positions: Chief Executive Officer, Chief Financial Officer, and Chief Operating Officer (I was the Chief Operating Officer, we drew straws) and prepared ourselves for what we would have to do to invest in a central European city. Meanwhile, delegations from Moscow, Russia, Budapest, Hungary and Warsaw, Poland were preparing to "wow" us and attract our investment.

Our company, Kimberly Clark, is a maker of paper products, including Huggies diapers. We decided it would be advantageous for Kimberly Clark to setup a diaper production facility in an Eastern European country because of low costs and impenetrable, developing markets. We worked with a faculty advisor for two months and then went to Berlin for a two-day conference.

Lukof and others discuss business plans.

The first night in Berlin, we wined and dined. We met the Eastern Europeans that night and then woke up early the next morning and were treated to a presentation at the DaimlerChrysler facility in Berlin. The Daimler half of the merger talked to us about new products, safety and the intricacies of the recent merger between the two auto giants.

Lukof sits with his team and faculty adviser.

In the late morning, we began the plenary sessions. We explained our company and what our objectives were. The foreigners had a more difficult task, trying to show us why their country matched our business the best. Visibly nervous, they seemed they would be judged by their countrymen based on who invested in them. Initially, we had two hour sessions with each country, with us explaining what we needed and where we needed it and them explaining what they had and why it was better than the other countries. I had to find a location that had the resources we needed (waterways, timber, etc.) and the necessary labor at the cheapest cost. That was the easy part.

After a group dinner, the American students in Berlin took us around the city and showed us a good time. We all got to know each other a little better, and I spent most of the night talking with the Russians, as I found them the most interesting. They had much to ask us about and many, many myths to dispel. Almost all of the stereotypes about both Americans and Russians were brought up, and then laughed at when we realized how far they were from the truth. In fact, we realized how similar our lives, interests and academics actually were.

The final day, we had one last session with the other groups to finalize the deals they each thought they had won. After a three-hour deliberation, we decided to invest in two new facilities, one in Russia near Moscow and one in central Poland. The Hungarians, visibly upset, did not receive a single investment, perhaps indicative of the fact that Hungary is already a much more developed country, meaning higher costs for our companies.

Courtesy of Taylor Lukof

Students from around the world attended a two-day conference in Berlin.

Since the trip, I have been in contact with two of the Russians, Vladimir and Alina, through weekly emails. The Polish team sent out a mass email wishing everyone a Merry Christmas, which I found extremely polite. I believe this shows how important this conference was to all involved and shows recognition of lessons learned. Vladimir has invited me to Moscow in the fall, and I plan on visiting him. I got much more out of this conference than I feel I have gotten out of some of my college-level courses within my major.

The business experience garnered, invaluable as it is, can not compare to learning how to communicate with people from completely different cultures and with completely different goals. Political discussions about September 11 during spare time helped us to see the War on Terrorism from the perspective of kids whose parents lived through battles with a similar opponent. This conference on Investing in Central Europe constitutes the best experience I had abroad.

Scientists propose pet cloning

By Erin Grim
Senior Writer

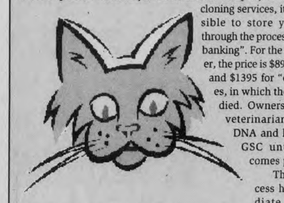
Have a cat or dog that your family just couldn't do without? In the near future it may be possible to clone your favorite pet. Genetic Savings and Clone (GSC), a company that claims it will have pet cloning available in the next year, funded research at Texas A&M University that resulted in the first cloning of a cat.

The scientists have a sense of humor regarding their work, as the kitten they produced was named CC—short for Carbon Copy.

S &T Commentary

GSC's goal, according to its website, www.savingsandclone.com, is to make gene banking and cloning techniques available to the average pet owners. The website reads, "GSC is a new kind of biotechnology company which markets advanced genetic services to the general public."

Right now, the company has yet to clone a dog, but believes that this will be accomplished within a year. Because the company cannot yet offer their cloning services, it is currently possible to store your pet's DNA through the process GSC calls "gene banking". For the average pet owner, the price is $895 for live animals and $1395 for "emergency" cases, in which the animal has just died. Owners can have their veterinarian extract spot's DNA and have it stored at GSC until cloning becomes possible.



This proposed process has raised immediate questions, including some from the Humane Society of the United States. Their argument is that there are already far too many pets in animal shelters, which need homes.

With terms like "cryotank" and "BioBox" used everywhere on the company website, GSC seems like something from "Austin Powers," or a science fiction novel. With most attempts at cloning being medical in origin, the goals of GSC may seem small in comparison, to which the company replies, "When cloning becomes feasible and affordable for your pets, their DNA will be safe, even if they're no longer with you."

This emotional ploy is the basis of the company's existence and for the estimated price of $20,000 it will theoretically be possible to clone your beloved pet, or pets, if you find that you have more than $20,000 to spend on animals that you could simply save from an SPCA.

Perhaps, one reasonable application of the technology is as CEO Lou Hawthorne says, "The birth of CC opens many new and exciting possibilities both for pets and endangered species." This new type of reproduction will most likely raise many ethical questions in the future, but for now, GSC encourages you to call 1-800-9CLONES to ensure that you will have an exact genetic copy of Fluffy in the years to come.

Bison Girls struggle to become sport

By Lindsey Betzendahl
Staff Writer

As the end of the 2001- 2002 season comes to a close, the Bison Girls dance team stands on the brink of becoming a sports team.

The Bison Girls dance team is an organization consisting of 15 girls who put in around 10-15 hours a week of intense practice to learn new choreographed dance pieces for upcoming basketball games. Eloiza Domingo, the Bison Girls' choreographer, is the current head of Multicultural Affairs and was previously a dance member on the Lovables, the Chicago Bulls dance team. With this new spark of immense dedication and commitment, the Bison Girls have made this year a turning point for the entire team.

President Jen Sievering '04 explained that the Bison Girls are moving up into the world of becoming a sport. With a new excitement in participating in competitions, the girls are headed to Hershey Park on May 4 for an open competition against many other colleges, hoping to get a chance to go to Nationals.

As an organization, the Bison Girls do not receive a significant amount of funding from Bucknell Student Government. The Girls, therefore, are required to buy their own uniforms and shoes for dancing. If the Girls become a sport they will not only be funded with more money, but they will get the recognition that they deserve.

The Bison Girls were called the Starletts four years ago. The current seniors, as freshman, changed the entire outlook of the dance team. They decided to spice up their dance routines to be more hip-hop and "up-to-date," as Sievering pointed out.

The Girls are making progress in being recognized at the University, since sometimes they go unnoticed for their remarkable talent. Sievering said that this year "the commitment of the girls has grown a lot, yet it's still a hard process to be recognized as a sport."

The Girls have had fundraisers including a Bison Girls Dance Camp, which provided dance instructions for girls from the ages of about 6-14. By making themselves known to the public and by becoming more of a competitive team, Sievering hopes that they will someday achieve sport status, but "it doesn't just happen over night."

"I wish people knew the intensity it takes [to be a part of the Bison Girls], and people would give us the credit we deserve. I don't think they realize the commitment we put [into this team]," Sievering said.

The competition to be one of the Bison Girls is intense. Over 40 girls tried out this year and the team only took on three new members. However, the team has become a tight-knit group of girls.

"We have become very close friends. Through the Bison Girls I have made the best friends I have here at Bucknell," Sievering said.

At the moment, these girls may only be an organization that dances at the halftime show during men's basketball games, but their hopes and goals are high. They hope to dance during women's halftime and ultimately to become a fully recognized sport by the University. "There is no better thrill than to perform in front of so many people, especially when doing it for a school you love," Sievering said.

With their 2001-2002 season coming to an end, the Bison Girls are fighting with the University to obtain sports team status.

"Vagina Monolgues" return

By Kristi Johnston
Arts & Entertainment Editor

There is a saying that goes, "When men are together, they talk about money, cars and girls. They talk about money as though they had a lot, about cars as though they knew how they worked and about sex as though they had them all. When women get together, they talk about one thing and one thing only: sex. And they never lie about it."

This is the spirit behind the play "The Vagina Monologues." Performed on Feb. 14 and 16, the play consisted of 12 University students alternating among various monologues about women. Through these stories, we see the vagina hidden in every woman, and how it shapes who she is. The monologues are sad, funny or exciting, but always naturally honest.

All the stories upon which the play is based were drawn from a series of interviews with women from around the world. One monologue was dedicated to the women in Afghanistan and another was dedicated to the women who lived through the war in Kosovo.

While each segment of the play addressed the vagina, there were many secondary themes exposed, as well. From trips to the gynecologist to the usage of tampons, "The Vagina Monologues" sought to comically yet forcefully analyze significant issues in the lives of women, many of which are generally deemed taboo by society. The play held nothing back—the vulgarity of the language contributed to the overall message that women should not be ashamed of their physicality nor of the emotions that accompany their experiences as women.

"The Vagina Monologues' was an eye-opening experience for all of us. We were portraying girls that were sexually molested, female sex workers, women that were raped and tortured ... roles that many of us never imagined that we could ever play.
—Sarah Endyke '02

"The Vagina Monologues" were not just entertaining to women. "It was nice to see that there were males in the audience, too," Brandy Fetters '03 said. "[The play] wasn't sensitive only to females."

The performance of "The Vagina Monologues" marked the second year the play was brought to the University on Valentine's Day. The presentation is part of an ongoing international program that began three years ago. The play was created by Eve Ensler and has starred a number of celebrities throughout its run.

In an interview with Time magazine, Ensler said that she wrote the play "after being shocked by how a friend described her body in a discussion on menopause." During the writing process, she conducted more than 200 interviews for material.

The performances at the University this year kept the same general themes as previous performances, but consisted of some new monologues. Also, the play was presented by an all-student cast this year. The students who participated in the performances were motivated by their experiences.

"'The Vagina Monologues' was an eye-opening experience for all of us. We were portraying girls that were sexually molested, female sex workers, women that were raped and tortured ... roles that many of us never imagined that we could ever play," said performer Sarah Endyke '02.

"What made the experience even more dynamic is that we were told not to act. We used the script onstage to offset acting tendencies. Rather, we had to imagine that it was our own personal monologue. We took each of our monologues to heart, and that was the most powerful experience for all of us."

"The Vagina Monologues" has become a consistently popular campus event. In displaying unique and personal stories through a variety of performance techniques, the play has awakened students, both female and male, to the universality of many issues faced by women each day. In order to gain awareness and appreciation for the PMB's experience of being a woman, Ensler suggests, "let's just start with the word 'vagina.'"

Pat McGee Band presents concert

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian
Pat McGee Band played at a full Uptown on Friday night.

Before Friday, I had never seen the Pat McGee Band (PMB) in concert, nor did I have any real desire to, based on its studio recordings. They were always a solid group in my mind, but I had never really listened to them enough to make the effort to attend a performance. Even so, I figured I'd take the chance and go to its show at Uptown. As singer-guitarist Pat McGee told me himself, "We haven't been able to get the feel of our live show on an album yet, and that's why we love it when people come out to see us." He could not have been more right.

In my two years here, the only show that I have seen with a higher attendance was O.A.R. last semester. Just a few songs into the PMB's show, I realized why it possesses such a dedicated fanbase.

"Not to sound cocky, but we do feel fortunate to get to do what people dream of on a small level ... I just feel lucky to be able to go out there and see smiles on people faces or see them know the words and get off on the attitude and vibe of a song," McGee said. "We just enjoy a really good time and our shows are centered on that."

Pandering to the crowd with constant references to past performances at the University, McGee and company started the evening with the song "Save Me," which has yet to be released on CD. They quickly energized the crowd with the better-known tune "Who Stole Her From Heaven," and then received a huge response with the opening notes of "Nobody Knows." The band calmed the vibe down with the softer tune "Haven't Seen For a While" before rushing back into their southern-rock-jam-band feel to finish the second half of the show.

Concert Review

A large part of why the Pat McGee Band has had such a good time playing at the University surely comes from its closeness to Washington, D.C. "D.C. is just ridiculous," McGee said. "You can't forget about your home." Other hotspots for the band in recent years have included Philadelphia, New York City, Denver and San Francisco. "The Mid-Atlantic is like our home, but other markets are really starting to come together for us," McGee said.

What seemed to set this concert apart from those of many other bands was that PMB played what they wanted to, not worrying about whether or not the crowd knew the songs. The set list included several new songs, including one that has yet to be titled and was performed for the first time live.

McGee says that individuality is something on which the band prides itself. "We're at a point now where we're about to make this new record and this album is really going to show what our band is about. This is going to be a role record for us, running through these rock songs. Everyone in the band listens to heavy music."

Some of the new sound of PMB's current project seems to stem from their recent influences. McGee has "been living on" No Doubt's new effort Rock Steady, as well as previous releases from bands such as the Red Hot Chili Peppers and Foo Fighters, as well as more experimental groups like Radiohead. However, as McGee states, his band is just doing what it wants to do—writing songs that the members truly enjoy. "We don't have to make an acoustic or vocal record because people tell us to. We just want to go out there and make the music we love."

Weezer concert appeals to all types

By Sarah Wilson
Staff Writer

The only Weezer album I have ever owned was the blue album in high school, and I'm not sure what happened to it. Besides the 10 or so Weezer songs on my WinAmp playlist (most of them from that album), I don't really have much background knowledge on the band. But allow me to review an incredible show that even a one-album fan could appreciate.

On Saturday, Feb. 9, a few of my friends and I braved the hour and a half trip to Wilkes-Barre. After stopping for the typical college student pre-concert fare (McDonald's) we made our way to the looming First Union Arena. Weezer was preceded by two very "Weezer-esque" openers, Ozma and Saves the Day. We arrived midway through Ozma's set (check out "Natalie Portman") and settled ourselves into our seats during Saves the Day's act, and finally it was time for Weezer.

Concert Review

Weezer had a very effective set with an incredible mix of songs from each of their three released albums and their upcoming effort. True to form, they began with their most recently released song, "Island in the Sun." They then proceeded to trade off songs from each of the four albums, which was a very effective way of inciting different parts of the already fired-up crowd.

Talking with my friends, it seems that every Weezer fan has a favorite album—many (like myself) appreciate the simplicity and candor of the blue album (1994), some enjoy the sophomoric innovation of Pinkerton (1996) and others indulge themselves with the long-awaited Green Album of last year. No matter what your preference, Weezer did an incredible job of integrating everyone's favorite songs from each album.

As a blue album fan, I was afraid that, because of the novelty of the Green Album and the anticipation of the newest album yet to be released, Weezer wasn't going to play much from their first album. I was pleasantly surprised as they played every song from the blue album I was hoping for, including "Say It Ain't So," "Undone (The Sweater Song)," "My Name is Jonas" (my all-time Weezer favorite) and an awesome two-song encore of "Buddy Holly" and "Surf Wax America."

The concert drew people of all types, demonstrating the widespread appeal of Weezer's unique brand of music. They put on an incredible show, one that both first-time listeners and die-hard fans alike could appreciate.

"Weezer took rock to a whole new level that fateful night," said fan Brittany Bohn '04. "As the fans poured down toward the stage, I realized the true allure of their sweet, sweet rocking." Even as a somewhat fair-weather fan, I couldn't agree more.

"The Royal Tenenbaums" is a farce of a fairytale

By Jessica Cortese
Staff Writer

Once upon a time there lived a happy family with three prodigal children. "The Royal Tenenbaums" begins with this cliche narration. Alec Baldwin narrates the story of a father who leaves his family of genius children only to try to worm his way back into their hearts once they are grown up and mentally disturbed after years of neglect.

Director Wes Anderson teams up with Owen Wilson (who also plays Eli Cash, a friend and honorary Tenenbaum) to write the script for this farce of a fairytale. They required an all-star cast for their failed masterpiece, including Gene Hackman as Royal Tenenbaum (the jealous ex-husband), Ben Stiller as Chas Tenenbaum (the older son who smothers his own motherless children with affection to make up for Royal's lack thereof in his own childhood) and Gwyneth Paltrow as Margot Tenenbaum (the fickle and mysterious failed playwright who leaves her husband to have an affair with Eli, even though she's secretly in love with her brother).

★★½2.75

This film falls short of the dark comedy it tried to embody with too many cute absurdities, such as young Chas's invention of Dalmatian rats. Instead of a work of art, "The Royal Tenenbaums" is more like a work in progress that can only be compared to a failed "American Beauty."

"Amelie" lifts viewers' spirits

By Kristi Johnston
Arts & Entertainment Editor

The Campus Theatre recently showed the critically-acclaimed French film "Amelie," continuing its welcome presentation of lesser-known foreign films in the area. "Amelie" is a truly unique and enjoyable spectacle, enhanced by outstanding acting performances and brightened by familiar Parisian scenery.

Amelie Poulan is a 23-year old waitress at a local cafe, "Les Deux Moulins." She is still living with the consequences of her mother's death when she was six years old, leaving her to be raised by an unaffectionate father without the solace of friends. One day, her life takes on new meaning when she discovers an old metal box inside a wall panel in her apartment.

Inside this "treasure box," Amelie finds old trinkets and photographs that were clearly a collection of childhood memories. She takes it upon herself to find the owner of the box and return it to him. She figures that it might bring him joy, and, if not, "tant pis" (too bad). Amelie decides to adopt this new way of life—helping (or hindering, as the case may be) people who need a little nudge in order to fulfill their dreams or realize their potential.

As the film plays out, director Jean-Pierre Jeunet's creative approach to Amelie's adorable personality is enhanced by moments of true hilarity. Whether through Amelie's own machinations or the unalterable course of destiny, the events that occur in Amelie's life and the lives of those around her are both laughable and appropriate.

★★★½3.75

Amelie is played by Audrey Tautou, who brings a fitting spunkiness and spontaneity to the role. The film also stars Mathieu Kassovitz, Rufus, Yolande Moreau and Arthus de Penguern. Each actor delivers a performance that is both believable and amusing.

"Amelie" is the perfect "feel-good" movie. Not since "Chocolat" has an ensemble created such a likeable community filled with comedy and heartfelt emotion. It is a thoroughly enjoyable way to lift your spirits and witness an

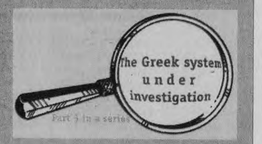
Inequalities in fraternity sizes cause concern

IFC to consider capping future pledge classes at 30 members each

By Carmen Mauriello
Senior Writer

Of the University's 12 active fraternities in 1995, four had a strong fall pledge class of 20-25 pledges. Three fraternities were above this range and five were below. In 2001, only one of the University's 12 active fraternities had a pledge class in the 20-25 range. Five fraternities were above it, while six were below—three fraternities being significantly below with classes of fewer than 10.

This is strong evidence that the University's Greek system is evolving from a traditionally balanced system with several medium-sized fraternities to one with a handful of very large fraternities and several smaller ones that are struggling to fill their houses every year. If this evolution continues, some of the struggling fraternities could be lost, which could reduce diversity among fraternities and de-personalize the Greek experience. The Interfraternity Council (IFC) does not want to see this happen, so it is considering several policy changes to make rush more equitable, including setting a cap of 30 pledges for each fraternity's pledge class.



The growing size disparity between fraternities has accelerated during the past five years. According to Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker, the gap between the larger and smaller fraternities was only about 10 to 15 members when he arrived at the University in 1996. But the tide turned in 1999 and 2000, when Baker said what had been a fairly equitable rush process became dominated by the larger fraternities.

"It seemed like all of a sudden the large fraternities started growing larger while the small fraternities started having more problems," Baker said.

What resulted is a system divided between several fraternities with membership in the 70s and 80s—Lambda Chi and Sigma Alpha Epsilon (SAE) are both over 90 members—and several fraternities with membership in the 30s and 40s, or lower.

If this disparity continues to grow, Baker said there is a strong possibility that some of the struggling fraternities could be lost, something he believes could be detrimental to the Greek system.

The major adverse effect would be less diversity within the Greek system. Not only would there be less fraternities, but Baker believes the remaining fraternities would become more homogenous.

"With more choices, there is more competition and the fraternities become responsible for providing real differences," said Baker. "With less choices, all the fraternities would become pretty much the same. It wouldn't matter which one you belong to."

Merit aid debate heats up

Faculty forum facilitates dialogue on trustee and administration-backed proposal

By Sandi-Jo Galati
News Editor

An open forum on Monday evening left convening faculty members highly divided as discussion continued about the potential implementation of merit aid in University enrollment. The meeting was a result of a request from the equally divided Board of Trustees, who requested faculty input on this issue.

Under the leadership of Chair of the Faculty and Professor of English Michael Payne, the faculty was given the opportunity to raise questions and express opinions regarding the effect merit will have on the University. Prior to the forum, the faculty had been communicating their differing opinions regarding the pros and cons of the issue via email.

"There is a genuine conflict between two equally honorable motivations: to see Bucknell achieve excellence and to award financial aid only to students who genuinely need it," said Jackson Hill, professor of music.

The merit aid proposal aims to attract students who would not receive sufficient financial aid and are being lost to universities that are able to offer more financial assistance.

"Merit aid strikes me as a crucial tool to protect and advance the academic quality of the students choosing to attend Bucknell.
—Charles Pollock, VP for Student Affairs

Merit aid has multiple objectives and has been heavily debated since it was first permitted among the Patriot League schools. These objectives include enrolling more students academically, increasing diversity on campus, increasing performing arts talent on campus, maintaining athletic equality among the other schools in the Patriot League that offer merit aid and preserving yearly gains in the incoming class profile.

By not participating in merit aid, the University has isolated itself with the Ivy League, which does not permit honoring students with non-need based scholarships.

"We are becoming a minority in merit aid," said Mark Davies, dean of admissions.

Ben Marsh, professor of geography and environmental studies echoes Davies' fear of being sequestered from other universities.

"In the last five years more schools have been using merit aid as a tool ... A lot has been done historically to make the institution run, but if we do not institute merit aid, we would be standing alone," Marsh said.

This is an especially significant problem in athletics, in which small teams are particularly affected by merit aid. The University's Patriot League competitors who offer merit aid are able to enhance teams, thus drawing more fan support and generating more revenue.

This is especially true in the case of basketball, in which other Patriot League schools have greatly strengthened their teams as a result of implementing merit aid.

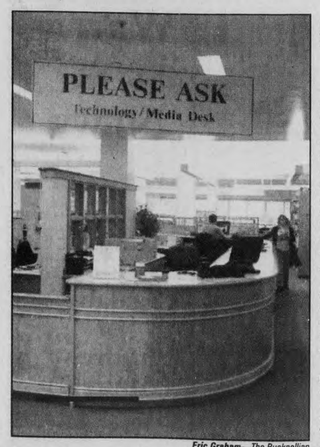
ISR addresses server congestion

Compressed emails now being sent to students to help ease server overloads



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
New 'Student Digest' emails were designed by ISR to relieve University servers from the burden of so many emails.

By Chris Styers
Staff Writer

Information Services and Resources (ISR) has been the focus of some attention recently as a significant change has been made to the "students" listserv. On Feb. 11, ISR implemented a solution to server overloads. Instead of mass emails being sent throughout the day, all emails sent to the "students" server are compressed into one email that goes out as a "digest" each afternoon. This digest includes only messages that were submitted by 2 p.m. and lists them in a single table of contents. Students can then browse the contents and choose to only open the emails that they are interested in.

In the early 1990s, the University established several mass emailing servers, including "students" which distributes messages to students, "facstaff" for faculty and staff and "campus," which sends to everyone.

The ease of mass emailing has been greatly utilized since its introduction. Since it is free and simple to send mass information, an increasing number of students have taken advantage of the system. The amount of campus postal mail decreased significantly as mass emails can even be formatted to the sender's liking.

However, many students complained about how their inbox would become cluttered. In fact, some would remove their email addresses from the listserv because they felt they were receiving too much mail. Amy Hall '05 found that the large volume of electronic mail "was annoying and distracted from other important messages."

Aside from the possible inconvenience of the extra mail, the servers had difficulty keeping up with the burden of so much mail. In the fall 2001 semester, there were periods of time when the server would send duplicates of messages because it was overloaded and lost track of tasks. The system was so congested that it even crashed at one point, erasing all emails sent or received over the weekend.

According to Gene Spencer, associate director for computing and information services, there has been a very positive reaction by most of the University. He says since the changes have been put in place, numerous people have written expressing their approval and thanks for cleaning up the old system.

"I feel that it's an improvement because it consolidates all the emails into one manageable form," Matt Wood '05 said.

Although the new system has been well received it has not been without some problems. Students that use the "stu-

Race issues surround campus following 'black face' incident

Despite positive feedback from Dean of Students Richard Ferraro and Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker regarding the conduct and outcome of the Feb. 12 forum, some campus community members believe that, to a certain degree, much of the early praise has been misguided.

"One of the things that struck me about the forum was the way in which the responses quickly resorted to emotional, 'feel-good' interaction and to the well-intentioned but somewhat flawed notion that what we really need are more educational programs about how we should treat one another," Associate Professor of English Glyne Griffith said. "We just enjoy a really good time and our shows are centered on that."

Pandering to the crowd with constant references to past performances at the University, McGee and company started the evening with the song "Save Me," which has yet to be released on CD. They quickly energized the crowd with the better-known tune "Who Stole Her From Heaven," and then received a huge response with the opening notes of "Nobody Knows." The band calmed the vibe down with the softer tune "Haven't Seen For a While" before rushing back into their southern-rock-jam-band feel to finish the second half of the show.

Concert Review

A large part of why the Pat McGee Band has had such a good time playing at the University surely comes from its closeness to Washington, D.C. "D.C. is just ridiculous," McGee said. "You can't forget about your home." Other hotspots for the band in recent years have included Philadelphia, New York City, Denver and San Francisco. "The Mid-Atlantic is like our home, but other markets are really starting to come together for us," McGee said.

What seemed to set this concert apart from those of many other bands was that PMB played what they wanted to, not worrying about whether or not the crowd knew the songs. The set list included several new songs, including one that has yet to be titled and was performed for the first time live.

McGee says that individuality is something on which the band prides itself. "We're at a point now where we're about to make this new record and this album is really going to show what our band is about. This is going to be a role record for us, running through these rock songs. Everyone in the band listens to heavy music."

Some of the new sound of PMB's current project seems to stem from their recent influences. McGee has "been living on" No Doubt's new effort Rock Steady, as well as previous releases from bands such as the Red Hot Chili Peppers and Foo Fighters, as well as more experimental groups like Radiohead. However, as McGee states, his band is just doing what it wants to do—writing songs that the members truly enjoy. "We don't have to make an acoustic or vocal record because people tell us to. We just want to go out there and make the music we love."

Weezer concert appeals to all types

By Sarah Wilson
Staff Writer

The only Weezer album I have ever owned was the blue album in high school, and I'm not sure what happened to it. Besides the 10 or so Weezer songs on my WinAmp playlist (most of them from that album), I don't really have much background knowledge on the band. But allow me to review an incredible show that even a one-album fan could appreciate.

On Saturday, Feb. 9, a few of my friends and I braved the hour and a half trip to Wilkes-Barre. After stopping for the typical college student pre-concert fare (McDonald's) we made our way to the looming First Union Arena. Weezer was preceded by two very "Weezer-esque" openers, Ozma and Saves the Day. We arrived midway through Ozma's set (check out "Natalie Portman") and settled ourselves into our seats during Saves the Day's act, and finally it was time for Weezer.

Concert Review

Weezer had a very effective set with an incredible mix of songs from each of their three released albums and their upcoming effort. True to form, they began with their most recently released song, "Island in the Sun." They then proceeded to trade off songs from each of the four albums, which was a very effective way of inciting different parts of the already fired-up crowd.

Talking with my friends, it seems that every Weezer fan has a favorite album—many (like myself) appreciate the simplicity and candor of the blue album (1994), some enjoy the sophomoric innovation of Pinkerton (1996) and others indulge themselves with the long-awaited Green Album of last year. No matter what your preference, Weezer did an incredible job of integrating everyone's favorite songs from each album.

As a blue album fan, I was afraid that, because of the novelty of the Green Album and the anticipation of the newest album yet to be released, Weezer wasn't going to play much from their first album. I was pleasantly surprised as they played every song from the blue album I was hoping for, including "Say It Ain't So," "Undone (The Sweater Song)," "My Name is Jonas" (my all-time Weezer favorite) and an awesome two-song encore of "Buddy Holly" and "Surf Wax America."

The concert drew people of all types, demonstrating the widespread appeal of Weezer's unique brand of music. They put on an incredible show, one that both first-time listeners and die-hard fans alike could appreciate.

"Weezer took rock to a whole new level that fateful night," said Ian Brittany Bohn '04. "As the fans poured down toward the stage, I realized the true allure of their sweet, sweet rocking." Even as a somewhat fair-weather fan, I couldn't agree more.

"The Royal Tenenbaums" is a farce of a fairytale

By Jessica Cortese
Staff Writer

Once upon a time there lived a happy family with three prodigal children. "The Royal Tenenbaums" begins with this cliche narration. Alec Baldwin narrates the story of a father who leaves his family of genius children only to try to worm his way back into their hearts once they are grown up and mentally disturbed after years of neglect.

Director Wes Anderson teams up with Owen Wilson (who also plays Eli Cash, a friend and honorary Tenenbaum) to write the script for this farce of a fairytale. They required an all-star cast for their failed masterpiece, including Gene Hackman as Royal Tenenbaum (the jealous ex-husband), Ben Stiller as Chas Tenenbaum (the older son who smothers his own motherless children with affection to make up for Royal's lack thereof in his own childhood) and Gwyneth Paltrow as Margot Tenenbaum (the fickle and mysterious failed playwright who leaves her husband to have an affair with Eli, even though she's secretly in love with her brother).

This film falls short of the dark comedy it tried to embody with too many cute absurdities, such as young Chas's invention of Dalmatian fats. Instead of a work of art, "The Royal Tenenbaums" is more like a work in progress that can only be compared to a failed "American Beauty."

"Amelie" lifts viewers' spirits

By Kristi Johnston
Arts & Entertainment Editor

The Campus Theatre recently showed the critically-acclaimed French film "Amelie," continuing its welcome presentation of lesser-known foreign films in the area. "Amelie" is a truly unique and enjoyable spectacle, enhanced by outstanding acting performances and brightened by familiar Parisian scenery.

Amelie Poulan is a 23-year old waitress at a local cafe, "Les Deux Moulins." She is still living with the consequences of her mother's death when she was six years old, leaving her to be raised by an unaffectionate father without the solace of friends. One day, her life takes on new meaning when she discovers an old metal box inside a wall panel in her apartment.

Inside this "treasure box," Amelie finds old trinkets and photographs that were clearly a collection of childhood memories. She takes it upon herself to find the owner of the box and return it to him. She figures that it might bring him joy, and, if not, "tant pis" (too bad). Amelie decides to adopt this new way of life—helping (or hindering, as the case may be) people who need a little nudge in order to fulfill their dreams or realize their potential.

As the film plays out, director Jean-Pierre Jeunet's creative approach to Amelie's adorable personality is enhanced by moments of true hilarity. Whether through Amelie's own machinations or the unalterable course of destiny, the events that occur in Amelie's life and the lives of those around her are both laughable and appropriate.

Movie Review

Amelie is played by Audrey Tautou, who brings a fitting spunkiness and spontaneity to the role. The film also stars Mathieu Kassovitz, Rufus, Yolande Moreau and Arthus de Penguern. Each actor delivers a performance that is both believable and amusing.

"Amelie" is the perfect "feel-good" movie. Not since "Chocolat" has an ensemble created such a likeable community filled with comedy and heartfelt emotion. It is a thoroughly enjoyable way to lift your spirits and witness an

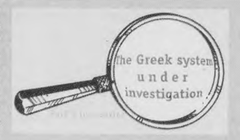
IFC to consider capping future pledge classes at 30 members each

By Carmen Mauriello
Senior Writer

Of the University's 12 active fraternities in 1995, four had a strong fall pledge class of 20-25 pledges. Three fraternities were above this range and five were below. In 2001, only one of the University's 12 active fraternities had a pledge class in the 20-25 range. Five fraternities were above it, while six were below—three fraternities being significantly below with classes of fewer than 10.

This is strong evidence that the University's Greek system is evolving from a traditionally balanced system with several medium-sized fraternities to one with a handful of very large fraternities and several smaller ones that are struggling to fill their houses every year. If this evolution continues, some of the struggling fraternities could be lost, which could reduce diversity among fraternities and de-personalize the Greek experience. The Interfraternity Council (IFC) does not want to see this happen, so it is considering several policy changes to make rush more equitable, including setting a cap of 30 pledges for each fraternity's pledge class.



The growing size disparity between fraternities has accelerated during the past five years. According to Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker, the gap between the larger and smaller fraternities was only about 10 to 15 members when he arrived at the University in 1996. But the tide turned in 1999 and 2000, when Baker said what had been a fairly equitable rush process became dominated by the larger fraternities.

"It seemed like all of a sudden the large fraternities started growing larger while the small fraternities started having more problems," Baker said.

What resulted is a system divided between several fraternities with membership in the 70s and 80s—Lambda Chi and Sigma Alpha Epsilon (SAE) are both over 90 members—and several fraternities with membership in the 30s and 40s, or lower.

If this disparity continues to grow, Baker said there is a strong possibility that some of the struggling fraternities could be lost, something he believes could be detrimental to the Greek system.

The major adverse effect would be less diversity within the Greek system. Not only would there be less fraternities, but Baker believes the remaining fraternities would become more homogenous.

"With more choices, there is more competition and the fraternities become responsible for providing real differences," said Baker. "With less choices, all the fraternities would become pretty much the same. It wouldn't matter which one you belong to."

Merit aid debate heats up

Faculty forum facilitates dialogue on trustee and administration-backed proposal

By Sandi-Jo Galati
News Editor

An open forum on Monday evening left convening faculty members highly divided as discussion continued about the potential implementation of merit aid in University enrollment. The meeting was a result of a request from the equally divided Board of Trustees, who requested faculty input on this issue.

Under the leadership of Chair of the Faculty and Professor of English Michael Payne, the faculty was given the opportunity to raise questions and express opinions regarding the effect merit will have on the University. Prior to the forum, the faculty had been communicating their differing opinions regarding the pros and cons of the issue via email.

"There is a genuine conflict between two equally honorable motivations: to see Bucknell achieve excellence and to award financial aid only to students who genuinely need it," said Jackson Hill, professor of music.

The merit aid proposal aims to attract students who would not receive sufficient financial aid and are being lost to universities that are able to offer more financial assistance.

> "Merit aid strikes me as a crucial tool to protect and advance the academic quality of the students choosing to attend Bucknell.
> —Charles Pollock, VP for Student Affairs

Merit aid has multiple objectives and has been heavily debated since it was first permitted among the Patriot League schools. These objectives include enrolling more students academically, increasing diversity on campus, increasing performing arts talent on campus, maintaining athletic equality among the other schools in the Patriot League that offer merit aid and preserving yearly gains in the incoming class profile.

By not participating in merit aid, the University has isolated itself with the Ivy League, which does not permit honoring students with non-need based scholarships.

"We are becoming a minority in merit aid," said Mark Davies, dean of admissions.

Ben Marsh, professor of geography and environmental studies echoes Davies' fear of being sequestered from other universities.

"In the last five years more schools have been using merit aid as a tool ... A lot has been done historically to make the institution run, but if we do not institute merit aid, we would be standing alone," Marsh said.

This is an especially significant problem in athletics, in which small teams are particularly affected by merit aid. The University's Patriot League competitors who offer merit aid are able to enhance teams, thus drawing more fan support and generating more revenue.

This is especially true in the case of basketball, in which other Patriot League schools have greatly strengthened their teams as a result of implementing merit aid.

"Our sports programs are bound by the rules of the NCAA and the Pa-

ISR addresses server congestion

Compressed emails now being sent to students to help ease server overloads

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

New 'Student Digest' emails were designed by ISR to relieve University servers from the burden of so many emails.

By Chris Styers
Staff Writer

Information Services and Resources (ISR) has been the focus of some attention recently as a significant change has been made to the "students" listserv. On Feb. 11, ISR implemented a solution to server overloads. Instead of mass emails being sent throughout the day, all emails sent to the "students" server are compressed into one email that goes out as a "digest" each afternoon. This digest includes only messages that were submitted by 2 p.m. and lists them in a single table of contents. Students can then browse the contents and choose to only open the emails that they are interested in.

In the early 1990s, the University established several mass emailing servers, including "students" which distributes messages to students, "facstaff" for faculty and staff and "campus," which sends to everyone.

The ease of mass emailing has been greatly utilized since its introduction. Since it is free and simple to send mass information, an increasing number of students have taken advantage of the system. The amount of campus postal mail decreased significantly as mass emails can even be formatted to the sender's liking.

However, many students complained about how their inbox would become cluttered. In fact, some would remove their email addresses from the listserv because they felt they were receiving too much mail. Amy Hall '05 found that the large volume of electronic mail "was annoying and distracted from other important messages."

Aside from the possible inconvenience of the extra mail, the servers had difficulty keeping up with the burden of so much mail. In the fall 2001 semester, there were periods of time when the server would send duplicates of messages because it was overloaded and lost track of tasks. The system was so congested that it even crashed at one point, erasing all emails sent or received over the weekend.

According to Gene Spencer, associate director for computing and information services, there has been a very positive reaction by most of the University. He says since the changes have been put in place, numerous people have written expressing their approval and thanks for cleaning up the old system.

"I feel that it's an improvement because it consolidates all the emails into one manageable form," Matt Wood '05 said.

Although the new system has been well received it has not been without some problems. Students that use the "stu-

Race issues surround campus following 'black face' incident

Despite positive feedback from Dean of Students Richard Ferraro and Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker regarding the conduct and outcome of the Feb. 12 forum, some campus community members believe that, to a certain degree, much of the early praise has been misguided.

"One of the things that struck me about the forum was the way in which the responses quickly resorted to emotional, 'feel-good' interaction and to the well-intentioned but somewhat flawed notion that what we really need are more educational programs about how we should treat one another," Associate Professor of English Glyne Griffith said. "Such an approach is not without value, but we need to remain sanguine about the relative limitations of such an approach as our primary or only

United Way honors University for donations at fundraiser

By Katie Marston
Senior Writer

The United Way of Union County awarded the University student body with a Community Leadership Award at its closing dinner last Thursday evening.

The United Way surpassed its goal of earning $200,000 for this year's fundraiser with a total of almost $209,000. The University contributed approximately $45,000 of this amount, with $8,000 in student donations from clubs, Greek organizations, athletic departments as well as individuals.

Judy Mickanis, the director of the campus campaign, attended the ceremony and was honored with the Campaign Steering Committee Award, for her effort in organizing University support for the United Way's fundraising.

"Judy Mickanis did an excellent job in promoting the Bucknell United Way Campaign. I am very pleased to see her being recognized with this award on behalf of the University," Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker said.

> "The campus worked as a team in contributing the amount raised. The students, faculty and staff should be very proud of their contributions.
> —Director Judy Mickanis

Due to the events of September 11 and the struggling local economy, the United Way would have had a difficult time raising enough money to meet its goal, had it not been for the support of University students. The United Way Steering Committee was very appreciative of all contributions and enjoyed honoring the University.

The United Way of Union County is the local community branch of the United Way of America. This national organization of volunteers is dedicated to making a measurable impact in every community across the country. As a national leader in "the business of caring," the United Way works with Congress and the Administration to promote policies and programs that activate national resources to address local priorities. Through fundraising, the United Way supports 22 charities, including the Red Cross.

Upon recognition of her work for the United Way, Mickanis said she felt honored, "but I also feel this award is not about me. The campus worked as a team in contributing the amount raised. The students, faculty, and staff should be very proud of their contributions."

Another danger is that the larger fraternities could grow too large and become de-personalized. Baker said that the presidents of many of the University's larger fraternities have already complained to him that it's been difficult to educate their 30 or more pledges and keep them engaged.

The danger of de-personalization also extends to upperclassmen members, especially those who do not live in the fraternity's house. As a fraternity's membership grows through the 70s, 80s and 90s, a shrinking percentage of its members have the opportunity to live in its house (according to Baker, the largest fraternity house holds only 38 members). IFC President and Phi Kappa Psi member Aziz Megji '03 believes this could result in more members using their fraternity simply as a social outlet.

"The larger fraternities get, the more likely it will be that brothers will disassociate from the fraternity when they become juniors and seniors," Megji said. "With smaller fraternities, there's more of a tighter brotherhood. More people get involved in the house."

Baker said he would like to maintain the University's 14-fraternity system. However, he did acknowledge that the recent trend of rush candidates flocking to just a handful of fraternities could mean that the appropriate fraternity system at the University is one that is dominated by a few large fraternities.

Still, Baker and IFC are considering measures to restore the prior balance of the fraternity system. They recognize that the primary reason for the size disparity is the preferences of the rush candidates, which they cannot change, but their strategy is to make the rush process more equitable.

One policy IFC is seriously considering is lowering the maximum size of a fraternity's pledge class. The current cap is set at 40, something Baker believes is too high and that fraternities have rarely, if ever, had trouble complying with.

Megji said IFC is strongly considering a cap of 30 pledges. According to Baker's statistics, three fraternities—Lambda, Sigma Phi Epsilon and SAE—exceeded this mark in 2001, with Delta Upsilon right on the fence with 30.

Megji said that the cap could cause some potential members of these fraternities to be denied bids and likely be redistributed to other fraternities. But more importantly, he said that rush candidates would be aware that fraternities have very limited space and that it may be difficult to gain a bid at their first-choice fraternity. Hopefully, they would thus be more open-minded to other fraternities.

Another policy IFC is seriously considering would be to require rush candidates to visit all 12 fraternity houses during rush. This is a major change from the current policy, which only requires a candidate to visit four houses. Baker believes the new policy would eliminate the wide disparity in the number of rush candidates who visit each fraternity.

Together, these two policies appear to strike at the heart of what Baker believes leads to the inequality in the rush process: that candidates are closed-minded going into rush and that the rules don't require them to give every fraternity a chance. The lower cap would likely influence candidates to be more open-minded and the rules would force them to visit every fraternities.

IFC is seriously considering incorporating both policies into its rush guidelines for next fall. Megji's goal is for IFC to draft the new guidelines by March 26 and have a vote on them on April 2.

Big Brothers/Big Sisters hosts 'Rock 'n Bowl'

By Aly Rentrop
Staff Writer

The Big Brothers/Big Sisters of the Central Susquehanna Valley (Montour, Northumberland, Snyder, and Union counties) have organized Rock 'n Bowl, a fundraiser to be held at Wilcox's Lanes in Mifflinburg on March 23.

Teams of three to four individuals can participate in the event. Each student team member must collect $25, while adults must collect $50. All proceeds will go toward the Big Brothers/Big Sisters organization, which is a United Way agency that pairs boys and girls from age 6-16 with adult role models.

The Rock 'n Bowl is the organization's primary annual fundraiser, and members hope to earn an estimated $8,000. "This is a really worthy cause. Big Brothers/Big Sisters operates on a shoe string budget so what we raise on this event really helps, plus it is a fun thing to do with your friends," said Sharon Poff, a member on the board of Big Brothers/Big Sisters.

Treasurer of Big Brothers/Big Sisters, Dan Gale '02, attended the Rock 'n Bowl last year and described it as "... a fun way to help out."

"It gives them [children] an opportunity to hang out with other kids in the area. The purpose [of the organization] is for older kids to mentor them so they have someone to look up to," Gale said.

Cara Perricelli '02 believes that Big Brothers/Big Sisters is popular because it enables participants to befriend a mentor.

"I think the Rock 'n Bowl will be successful because it will give kids a chance to have something to do as well as to interact with an older group of people," Perricelli said.

"This experience has been beneficial for me and for my little as well. I feel that I have been able to be a positive role model in her life and, on my side, it has given me an opportunity to relive high school years through her eyes."

dents" server to conduct surveys found that responses did not get back to them as easily as they did before the change. ISR has worked with students, especially those in the Management 101 class to develop an online means of taking surveys. Other problems also include the wide usage of email readers. Some programs open the student digest as one long email while others open it simply as a table of contents, and the individual emails are attachments.

Other problems include the demand for accuracy in the original email because if someone makes a mistake will have to wait until the next day to make a correction. Also, because senders will want the maximum exposure, there have been more emails sent over the "campus" server than the "students" server than in the past. However, Spencer admits that there are wrinkles to work out

"We will continue to tweak the system until it meets the campus needs," Spencer said.

The "students" server is the first tested with this new system and ISR intends to use the information gathered from the feedback of this change to perform similar changes in the "campus" and other servers.

Black History Alive, an interactive museum event cosponsored by 7th street house, the Office of Housing and Residential Life and the Office of Multicultural Affairs drew a diverse crowd from the campus community. Tours were given of the 7th Street House (also known as the African-American Studies House) from 5 p.m. to 9 p.m. on February 24.

Each tour group listened to the voices of Praise Gospel Choir while waiting on the steps of the house to take the tour. The tour began with a trip to Africa where a traditional dance was demonstrated, followed by a portrayal of slave life on plantations. Tour groups then exited the house and re-entered thorough a side door to participate as runaway slaves in the Underground Railroad and meet Harriet Tubman, portrayed by Leslie Patrick, associate professor of history.

After escaping slavery, the tour visited different rooms of the house, each containing an important historical figure in the fight for African American rights. Students played characters in African American history and read facts about each character's life, after which members of the tour were invited to guess what figure each student was portraying.

The tour finished with food and a slide presentation of facts about African-American students on campus.

Eloiza Domingo, director of the Office of Multicultural Affairs, was a tour guide for the event and feels that it holds a place of great importance in the University community.

"Black History Alive is part of Bucknell tradition. Events like this one are crucial to the overall culture of our community. It brings education and replenishes the community with an interactive, fun, interesting and educational event that brings all types of people together to learn about Black History," Domingo said.

Domingo also noted that although Black History Alive aims to reach out to the entire campus, much of the cultural growth occurs internally.

"One aspect in particular that is important to this event is the bonding that occurs among the residents of the African-American Studies House during the planning and execution of this event," Domingo said. "This group of students has always been multicultural and diverse—the integration and teamwork to host such a successful event that has survived for so long signifies the importance of events like this."

One of the primary purposes of Black History Alive is to promote black history through a fun, interactive and educational event. Nadra Nash '03, portrayed a character and feels that this goal is important for many reasons.

"The goal is to learn about African-American culture and enjoy doing so. Most courses have a distinct guideline, but some often find it boring or time consuming. This Black History Alive experience allows one to encounter the Black experience in 15 minutes," Nash said. "It is not the complete history of Blacks/African-Americans but it offers an example of a different culture. Hopefully, it will spurn a lot of students to be interested in learning about other cultures and to broaden their horizons."

Students recognize the importance of such events and the impact the have on the campus community.

"Black History Alive helps inform students who may not be aware of these issues. It's also entertaining and helps bring students together," Taylor Harchak '05 said. "There were some names of people who I didn't recognize, and some biographical information that I thought was interesting."

For many students, it was the way in which history was presented that made the event so interesting and educational.

"I personally gained a lot from the experience; I got to interact with a lot of the kids on this campus who do not share my skin color. It can be challenging to break the barriers around here sometimes," Tyler Kidder '05 said.

Patrick feels that the event is unique as result of the format in which it presents history.

"Why not present the past in a variety of ways that engage people and hopefully make them think critically about it? Moreover, I think that Black History Alive offers students an opportunity to learn in a new environment where many have never been, namely 7th Street House," Patrick said.

Patrick argues that African American history is a part of our past that many people have little knowledge or shy away.

"As Black History Alive reveals, there is much about the past that many do not know, more about the past that many do not wish to know or would prefer to forget and most about the past that we can learn and must remember," Patrick said.

"I think experiencing something like Black History Alive makes the situation more real, sort of like a validation, that people are real entities, not just figures or facts on a page," Sarah Diamond '05 said. "The two main things I walked away with were a greater appreciation for people and diversity and a greater awareness of what diversity means for the campus community."

strategy."

Rather than only implementing educational programs to promote racial awareness, Griffith believes the solution should accentuate a combination of education and legislation.

He points to a number of significant legislative advancements for African-Americans—the Emancipation Proclamation, the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Brown v. Board of Education ruling, among others—as fundamental catalysts to changing racist perceptions in society.

While the mission of such decrees is to foster interaction among races, they provide sanctions for counterproductive or insubordinate behavior as well.

Griffith believes sanctions are an important part of breaking down the motives behind racism-power and privilege.

"If we recognize that that racism is a form of knowledge consistent with the maintenance of a certain nexus of power relations in society, then we are likely to realize that the subversion of racism is not merely a matter of pouring knowledge into the empty vessel of racist ignorance," he said.

"Sanctions have as important an educational role to play in the struggle against racism as programs directed at enlightenment because it's not just about the truth value of knowledge, but the power value of knowledge which, for its own socio-political purposes, may suspend the falsehood and philosophical valuelessness of some claim in order to maintain or advance a certain set of privileges and a certain sort of participation in power."

Calling the University a "microcosm of larger society," Griffith believes it would be uncommon not to see racial prejudices on campus because of the historical and cultural pervasiveness of racism.

Echoing similar views, Professor of International Relations Hilbourne Watson said the 'black face' incident "reflects an abiding problem in American life, the problem of racism and the ways many people habitually caricature black people and other so-called minorities and have fun doing it.

"It is the naturalization of the social construct of race and the liberal habit of equating the cultural practice of racism to an effect of naturalized race that allows racists to naturalize what is social and historicize what is natural. This strategy allows racists to offend and apologize for the damage they do while never having to compromise on their racialized cultural values and preferences," Watson added.

John Burns '02 believes stiffer sanctions for the students involved in the incident are appropriate, but that ignorance regarding racial issues and a lack of campus diversity are more fundamental problems at the University.

"Racism is evident throughout the world and although I don't think it's a major problem on campus, ignorance is an issue here, due to the uniformity of University students compared to the rest of the nation."

Griffith would like to see the University impose sanctions derived in context with such incidents instead of enforcing blanket rules and regulations, which may overlook the motives and intent. Griffith says there is clearly a difference between the University incident and recent Ku Klux Klan mock lynchings at several southern institutions, but that malice was still inflicted on the aggrieved parties in both situations, intentional or not.

Last Tuesday a second forum, mediated by Assistant Professor of English Sue Ellen Henry and Senior Associate Director of Admissions Gil Villanueva, convened to continue discussing race relations on campus. The forum congregated over 80 student leaders, including members of Bucknell Student Government (BSG,) religious services, the Greek system and Residential Assistants. The University has pledged to continue efforts to address race relations on campus.

triot League, and these governing bodies support the awarding of merit-based aid for athletics," said John Hardt, director of athletics and recreation. "The Ivy League is the only remaining need-based financial aid conference in the NCAA's Division I level, and it is abundantly clear that the Ivy League is not looking to expand its membership."

Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 presented a model situation based upon Lafayette College's Marquis Scholar Award. In this situation, some scholarships will be allocated to students excelling in the performing arts, 20 will be given to minority students, enabling the University to reach its diversity goal of 15 percent and the remaining scholarships will be reserved strictly for academics. Athletic scholarships will be awarded in a separate category than academic scholarships.

Primarily, faculty members feared that this would deny students who are academically qualified to attend the University admission due to enrollment spots taken by athletics or the performing arts, prompting worry that a different standard of student will be established.

"There could be symbolic or cultural costs unless we keep academics on top," Payne said.

Faculty members also questioned the problem of pigeonholing studeats who are competing for athletic scholarships. By enrolling students to play a particular sport, some faculty members feel that students are being deprived of their education should they choose not to continue with the sport and their scholarship is lost. Additionally, these students can potentially be deprived of the opportunity to study abroad or pursue other academic interests if they are tied to an athletic team.

Hardt does not foresee either of these issues as staggering setbacks, holding that the mission of the Athletic Department within the University is to provide for both competitive athletic and academic success.

"We maintain a strong commitment to excellence in both academics and athletics with an appropriate emphasis on academics ... The scholar-athlete tradition is at the heart of the culture and history of athletics at Bucknell, and no adjustment in financial aid policy is going to change that," Hardt said.

In the performing arts, Hill sights that the University is losing applicants to Colgate, Susquehanna and Carnegie Mellon.

"The availability of merit aid would certainly draw some students to Bucknell who are talented in the performing arts but who are at present going elsewhere because the Bucknell price tag is higher than that of the place where they elect to enroll or where they are being awarded scholarships based on talent or achievement," Hill said.

Aside from the specialized scholarships, such as those devoted to athletics, promoting diversity or athletics, faculty members questioned how the remaining, more generalized academic scholarships would be allocated. Many are concerned that these scholarships will promote competition among academic departments for students.

"It pits faculty against one another in bidding for talented students," said Doug Candland, professor of psychology.

> "We should use Bucknell money to make it a distinctive institution capable of offering a uniformly first-rate education to attract students for its reputation ...
> —Doug Candland, professor of psychology

Funding for the 80 academic scholarships for each class is estimated to cost $400,000 to $500,000, with an additional $100,000 projected cost each year for athletic scholarships. This will result in a yearly $2.5 million dollar expense to the University.

These costs prompted faculty to question the morality of awarding non-need-based aid to students who were financially capable of affording the University, while not all student need is being met.

In a financially stable year, all admissions are "need-blind," Pollock explained, meaning that the admissions office does not consider the applicant's financial circumstances before granting admission. Enrollment years that are not as financially viable result in the consideration of the financial circumstances of the final five to six percent of accepted students.

The funding of such a program was another concern of faculty members. Both Pollock and University President Steffen Rogers maintain that the money necessary to fund merit aid can be raised. Having external benefactors, faculty members fear, will turn admissions control over to the donors. If donors were permitted to contribute based upon specific interests, the problem would arise that the appeals of some donors would influence which students were admitted.

"Merit aid strikes me as a crucial tool to protect and advance the academic quality of the students choosing to attend Bucknell ... It is an expensive proposition, but so are many other things we decide are strategically important," Pollock said.

Candland describes merit aid as "a door that once opened can never be closed without fiscal or academic deterioration."

He referred to the history of Christy Matthewson Memorial Stadium, which was built during the economic crisis of the 1920s and 1930s, in an attempt to generate revenue for the University. This was an extremely costly endeavor, which severely inhibited other academic aspects of the University, such as the denial of a chapter of Phi Beta Kappa, the oldest national honorary scholarship society in the United States, until 1941.

Instituting merit aid will require $50 million dollars, one-sixth, of the University's present endowment. Many faculty members agreed that entering into another financial obligation of such magnitude could seriously compromise the character of the University.

Candland instead advocates attempting to meet all of the financial needs of students with financial aid, while using the high academic quality of the University to attract students. His goal, a feeling with which other faculty members concurred, is a university that can be financially need-blind in admissions.

"We should use Bucknell money to make it a distinctive institution capable of offering a uniformly first-rate education to attract students for its reputation, not by offering uneeded money in what can only become an extended and even more expensive bidding war for people without financial need," Candland said.

Faculty also expressed concerns over the lack of fundamental details that should come from the governance channels on campus. It was suggested that a more definite proposal be drafted, including a statement of goals and priorities that could be weighted, so undecided faculty members could begin to articulate their personal stances.

The Committee on Admissions and Financial Aid, the Committee for Campus Diversity, the Committee on Athletics and the Planning and Budget Committee have been involved in extensive dialogue over the issue of merit aid, however, the details have yet to be finalized, Pollock indicated.

Rogers explained that a completed plan was not presented because he did not want the faculty to presume that the proposal was complete.

When asked, however, Pollock commented that he believed merit aid was "inevitable."

"I am hard-pressed to imagine anything keeping Bucknell from awarding merit aid sooner or later," Pollock said. "Given this inevitability, I don't think it makes sense to delay, giving other institutions a strategic advantage even longer."

The minutes of the faculty meeting will be forwarded to the Board of Trustees for further review and to assist in the formal design of the merit aid program.

"I left the meeting with no doubt that the time is now to produce models of a merit aid program," Pollock said. "Only when we give more shape to the concept, including an idea of the funding source or sources, will faculty members' and others' core questions be answered."

Pollock hopes that by answering these questions, faculty members will be more confident in the proposal.

"Faculty members are being serious and thoughtful about this complex and significant question and individuals are acting from their best sense of what is in Bucknell's best interests," Pollock said.

Student digest emails are inefficient

Students, faculty and staff use email as an effective and efficient form of communication. However, due to recent viruses and changes made by Information Services and Resources (ISR), this ease of communication has decreased.

On Feb. 11, ISR created a student digest email which compresses the "students" listerv emails into one daily email. ISR made this change after receiving complaints about the number of "students" emails sent out each day. Although the number of "students" emails has diminished, the efficiency of the "students" emails has declined as well.

Previously, students could read the subject line of "students" emails and then choose whether or not they wanted to delete it. With the "student digest" emails, students must open up the email and then decide which of the enclosed emails they want to read. Therefore, students are more likely just to delete the "student digest" email, whereas with the previous system, students would at least read the subjects.

Some students who felt that the volume of emails was too great had themselves removed from the listserv. Clearly these students are not interested in the first place to read the emails. So why should ISR cater to those students who will probably not start opening student emails in the new format?

Another problem with the student digest emails is the ability to conduct surveys, such as the Management 101 classes often do. With the previous system, students could just reply to the email and the sender would automatically receive a response. However, that is not possible with the student digest email because the response would not go to the original sender of the email. ISR is currently working to create an online method of taking the survey. However, students are less likely to take a survey online than by simply responding to an email.

The new system also can create a decline in the variety of the emails. Some email programs do not show the email in its original form, often causing the text formatting to be lost. Therefore, emails do not stand out as much and students are less likely to read them.

In order to get more exposure, students have resorted to sending emails to the "campus" listserv, which sends email to all students, faculty and staff. In the past month, the percentage of "students" emails has decreased from approximately 60 percent to below 40 percent, while the percentage of "campus" emails has increased from about 40 percent to over 60 percent. Until ISR implements the digest email to all listservs, "campus" emails will increase, canceling out the decrease in "students" emails which have been compressed.

Email is an important part of University life and in order for it to be effective for all members of the campus community, it needs to be simple and efficient. The recent student digest email system has decreased the influence of student emails.

White House behavior disappoints

By Daniel Morel
Staff Writer

I seriously question the behavior of our current leaders in the White House. Most people in this administration have been displaying character traits not quite becoming of any nation's leaders. There seems to be a perception built upon the premise that these leaders are always right, and it will take extraordinary efforts to prove them otherwise.

How does this apply to current affairs and the leaders in the White House? There seems to be a problem with the concept of rules. Even after being told several times to abide by certain rules, it seems easier to forget them and go by their urges and reactionary feelings. Does anyone remember the Geneva Convention? Our current leaders don't seem to; or at least they choose not to. Perhaps there would have been more success in following the rules laid down by the world if they came from an American city and not one of these strange (and possibly "terrorist") foreign cities.

Of course, this is not the only example of unbecoming behavior in the White House. A major pattern in our capitol has been the inability to tell the truth. This has been the case even when the public already knows the truth and are only searching for remnants of scruples. Take the case of the current Enron scandal; a monumental display of greed enhancing, corrupt, capitalistic loopholes and culpable deniability in some ways very reminiscent of the Teapot Dome Scandal. The liability factor here has lain specifically with how close relations were between President George W. Bush, Vice President Dick Cheney and former Enron CEO Kenneth Lay. After the Enron debacle began unfolding, people began demanding knowledge of Cheney's closed talks. His reply was that he had to retain a certain level of confidence with the people he talks to privately. This may be, but Lay was the only person to talk to Cheney individually, and more important than that conversation is the one held between our government and Afghanistan regarding the attempt to secure rights to an Asiatic pipeline. That is correct; America was in close dealings with the Taliban right up until Sept. 11.

As far as Bush's relations to Lay are concerned, he, and many other top staffers, might as well be considered an extension of Enron's Board of Directors. Bush is trying very hard to pretend that his associations with Lay are minuscule. It is already known that Lay did much to help the fundraising effort for Bush's campaign. But that is just one story of how these "not-so-close" friends have come together to support each other.

Bush's father, former President George H.W., welcomed Ken Lay into the White House on several occasions, giving him the endearing name, "Kenny Boy," and then went on to later sponsor the Energy Policy Act of 1992, which allowed for Enron to prosper in the speculation market. When Enron Field had its opening game, George W. Bush flew down to Houston not to pitch the first ball, but to be there and support Lay as he threw the first pitch.

After donating nearly $4.4 million in campaign donations not only to Bush, but congressmen as well, Enron secured themselves an exemption for its energy derivatives business under an act regulating commodity trading futures. This list of ties between Lay and Bush continues for quite some time, including friends and couples such as the Gramms, who helped push the previously mentioned legislation (Senator Phil Gramm, R-Texas) and who sat on the Enron Board of Directors (Wendy Gramm, former chair of the Commodity Futures Trading Commission under Bush, Sr.). If this isn't a group of close friends then I should really be asking more of mine.

1984 coming true in 2002?

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

How long will the American public continue to comply with the wishes of the White House media handlers? Now that the military under the direction of the White House is contemplating the equivalent of The Ministry of Information from George Orwell's 1984 to invent fictional press releases to friend and foe alike, public outcry should be deafening.

The Republicans in past political campaigns against Democrats complained about government becoming too intrusive in the lives of citizens and is happily working on a New World Order style police state. All the traditional ingredients and accoutrements are poised and ready to humiliate opposition while manipulating the public with the cooperation from corporate-owned media. The cohesive glue that holds the Republican Ministry of Information together is simply fear. National security is the mantra of the next four years at this White House (eight years if their plans work out as expected) where they seem to believe that what we don't know will not hurt us. "Trust us, the constitution is just too inconvenient of a document for the 21st century; things are different now we must redefine what the truth is for our way of life to continue." Are we really more endangered and bereft of ideas than this policy seems to dictate?

The first Bush Administration went down this path in their invasion of Panama. The policy of media blackouts and censorship worked so well they used it once again in the Gulf War to great effect. Now the policy of media manipulation and truth manufacturing will be expanded to the world and intensified here at home. The danger of this is that misinformation is a double-edged sword (never doubt it is a weapon) that harms more than it aids our position over the long run. Psychological warfare is one of the reasons that many people in the world loathe the United States. Our forces or people backed by us have used this from Vietnam and El Salvador to Chile and Iran over the years. Robert Novak, the conservative columnist, didn't dispute the existence of this policy but he did deride the boneheadedness of letting it leak out of the Pentagon.

Now that the feverish flag waving after last September's attacks has calmed itself, we must look to how much we have let the terrorists have their way with us. Many have suffered silently while others are using the attacks as a justification to implement every right-wing policy from tax breaks for the rich and corporations to defining the unborn so they have rights to medical care that blur the mother's right to a safe abortion.

The American people must pay attention to what is going on or the country we grew up in will be redefined out of existence right before our eyes. Have you noticed the rightward shift of CNN and other outlets of national media recently?

The Republican party has been mining the conservative side of the spectrum for thirty years or more. They are sure not conserving very much.

Truthfully, they plan to make a commodity of information during this administration and use psychological weapons on our own society to protect us. Isn't this the American equivalent of the Vietnam era practice of burning down the village to save it? Actions like this hand a clear victory to Osama bin Laden and his many supporters. Ignoring the constitution in the name of national security just gives them the match as this White House gladly applies the gasoline to the parchment. 1984's Big Brother complete with surveillance cameras and the Ministry of Information is here. Let us hope that they didn't read about the cages with the hungry rat inside to torture non-compliant individuals. Am I thinking the truth censors will ban Orwell's book as dangerous? That is how a double-edged sword works; everyone bleeds just a bit but cumulatively we all suffer permanently.

What act or thought are you willing to give up for the White House's new found crusade? How many are we willing to sacrifice for the re-election in 2004? Ask the troops that died in the Philippines over the weekend. I wonder what press release the Ministry will put out about their deaths? Truth by definition what a concept: Bin Laden is laughing at us. Misinformation is a bad strategic move. The leaker at the Pentagon knew this to be true; now there is a real American patriot.

Locking Horns

Has scandal dampened Olympic spirit?

By Maren Johnson
Staff Writer

Scandal. Not a word that we can be comfortable associating with sportsmanship, international goodwill or Olympic spirit. While the idea of scandal is not new to the Olympic realm, this year's winter Olympics seemed to be rife with it. It's disillusioning to think that an amazing cross-country ski performance owed it's success to drugs or that the coveted figure skating gold has more to do with the backhanded dealings of judges than talent. Ron Borges, contributing writer for nbcsports.com seemed to have the same foreboding feeling about the future of the Olympics as I did when he questioned, "Certainly the flag will go up again in two years ... in four years ... but will the games ever recover ... ?"

I lost faith in the Olympics after this winter's showing and it will be difficult to ever regain it. Not only did the profuse scandal upset my sense of Olympic spirit, but the rampant accusations gave an air of childish egos grasping for excuses about not winning. While the judging scandal in figure skating allowed for a fairy tale ending for the Canadians, it also fostered a national—even international—skepticism about the validity of the Olympics. My fear is that the scandal received so much attention (mostly because scandal makes for great news, as we all know) that this will become a trend in Olympic games to follow.

I am not saying that the Canadians did not deserve the gold, they did, but if an accusation of faulty judging (which is probably not the first instance) was enough to create a discredit and revise a decision, why not question everything? Think the Russians did a little too well in cross-country, why not accuse them of drug use? Think women's U.S. ice hockey is bitter about losing the gold to Canada, why not start a rumor that they stomped on the Canadian flag? Will this trend continue into the summer Olympics in just two years? Will we be more wary of who takes the medals?

Instead of making the games an opportunity for countries from around the world to get together and display their finest athletes, it has become a mockery of fairness and spirit. One country accusing the other and detrimental rumors flying across the news is not the image that the Olympics should portray. If you want to beat another country, try doing it the old-fashioned way; effort, honesty and sportsmanship.

Even though the Winter Olympic Games are over, the Olympic spirit will never die. I, for one, haven't lost my faith in the Olympics because of that Olympic spirit. I came to this conclusion Sunday night as the Olympic flame was put out to signify the end of the 19th Winter Olympic games. Although the games were plagued with controversy, biased judging mishaps and threats of walkouts by South Korea and Russia, the Winter Olympics seem to get bigger and receive more press every year. Winter Olympians and Olympians in general are being offered more and more endorsements, press, and airtime long after the flame goes out. MSNBC has quoted Olympic athletes earning up to $20 million in endorsements alone during the four years between games, not to mention earning a gold means being the best in the whole world at what you do—I'm sure most people covet that type of achievement.

I believe that the reason why the Olympic spirit will never die is two fold; one reason is because of the natural want and need for humans to compete against one another and to watch others compete. That's the reason why "Survivor," "Fear Factor" and other reality based shows are so popular. Not only do we want to see someone win, but we also want to see someone lose. The spirit of competition is the force that drive the Olympics and its athletes.

The second reason is that scandal is not a new face for the Olympics. The athletes themselves said that this type of judging happens all the time. People thrive off of a good scandal. In fact I think that that scandal is what made this year's Winter Games more televised and the most talked about event since the tragic events of Sept.11. TV shows induce scandal as part of their push for higher ratings, the juicier the scandal the higher the ratings, the higher the ratings, the higher the paycheck.

Even though there is scandal, I say in the end as long as the rightful person(s) gets the medal and/or press then justice has been served. But there is always going to be someone who didn't think that the outcome was fair, but I think dwelling on the negative is just going to make things worse. No, I haven't lost my faith, I just can't wait to tune in to Turin, Italy four years from now.

Israel and Arafat need to take productive steps

By Gretchen Schrock
Senior Writer

Imagine, for a moment, that you are a young child again and your parents have just disciplined you after you committed a serious wrong. With grave faces of utter disappointment and a few harsh words, they send you off to your room as soon as dinner is finished without any dessert or television. Possessing an imaginative mind, you discover ways to amuse yourself during those few hours before bedtime. Meanwhile, you wonder why this is labeled punishment and do your educated parents really expect to change your behavior by denying you the right to watch The Cosby Show?

At present, a similar situation is occurring in the ongoing conflict in the Middle East between Israel and the Palestinians. The Israeli government has assumed the role of the strict guardian and Yasir Arafat, the leader of the Palestinian Authority, is playing the part of the mischievous child. Why has Arafat been confined to his room, the West Bank city of Ramallah?

On Oct. 17, 2001, five Palestinians assassinated the Israeli tourism minister, Rehavam Zeevi, and a succession of Palestinian attacks on Israelis followed. In an attempt to quell the violence, the Israeli government posted tanks outside of Arafat's compound last December. In addition, if he wanted to leave Ramallah, the Palestinian leader would have to receive permission from Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. After a hesitant Israeli government policy decision this week, he was allowed to move more freely within Ramallah and the military vehicles pulled back 100 yards from the entrance to Arafat's compound.

This relatively insignificant position modification is producing a rift within the Israeli government. Hard-line cabinet members oppose any concessions beyond Arafat's freedom of movement in Ramallah and the repositioning of the tanks, while moderate members—such as defense minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer and foreign minister Shimon Peres—insist that the detention by the Palestinian Authority of four of the five suspects accused in Zeevi's murder should greatly enhance the possibility for future peace negotiations.

"It's better for Israel if Arafat is stuck in Ramallah, less available to the murderers and terrorists. Let him stay in Ramallah and think about the path that he has chosen," Tourism Minister Benny Elon said, in the Washington Post. One side clamors for justice in terms of imprisonment, another recognizes the urgent need for firmly established peace.

Despite the objectives of reigning in Palestinian militancy and encouraging the appointment of a new Palestinian leader, the continued policy of movement restriction in regards to Yasir Arafat has only backfired. Instead of precluding his ousting from power, his mandatory confinement has only increased his popularity.

"The Islamic opposition, mainly Hamas, is getting stronger. But by the same token, the symbolic standing of Arafat is strengthening, and he gets wide support, including from the Islamic opposition, because he is engaged in terror and fighting," said one official close to the Foreign Ministry's discussion on the topic, according to the New York Times.

Thus, as a result of his climbing popularity as the symbol of the Palestinian nationalist cause and its resistance to Israeli occupation, the regional violence has not abated, posing the question of the next step in search for sustainable peace. If one cannot punish a misbehaving child effectively in front of his peers, how can one expect that every child will act accordingly to the rule of law and society? Is it possible that it is not the principle of behavior correction that is amiss, but rather the manner in which that correction is taken?

Forcing the controversial, but important, symbol of a nation into relative oblivion will not lead to peace because one can infer from this simple act that Israel is attempting to deny, or at least diminish, the powerful presence of the Palestinian population, leading to the loud, if not violent, objections of the Palestintians.

However, with the same strong, unbreakable ties to the land as the Israelis possess, it is illogical and impossible to pursue the complete defeat of the Palestinian people. Battling a population into definitive submission, regardless of the consequences, has consistently proved harmful in some way. As numerous commentators have pointed out, lasting peace will only be achieved when both sides reach the realization that they will have to learn to live as neighbors, whether it is within the same country as equal citizens or in adjoining states.

Sending the naughty youngster Yasir Arafat to bed without dinner will not be enough persuasion for the Palestinian public to press for an end to the conflict. Only significant positive action on the part of the Israeli government can accomplish that goal.

Oft-mocked Jersey deserves respect

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

I have nothing going for me when it comes to jokes. I play softball, I'm taller than most of my friends, I'm an only child, I'm blonde and worst of all, I'm from New Jersey. So let's get a few things straight ... sure I am spoiled, no I have never stared at a frozen orange juice can, and yes I say "wadder."

I've heard them all, but the Jersey jokes seemed to have eluded me prior to coming here, yet within minutes of arriving on campus, I learned that "Jersey" was a college swear word. I was asked numerous times during orientation, "Where are you from?" To which I enthusiastically, yet ignorantly replied, "New Jersey!" This "possible" friend would say dejectedly, "Oh ... Jersey." I had spoken the horrid "J-word."

So give me a penny for my thoughts (you'll get change back later) because right now, I'm jumping on my soapbox (a.k.a. laptop) and doing the unthinkable; defending Jersey.

Someone once asked me why Jersey people are so defensive about their state, but this was just after she made a "Jersey slur." No state is mocked more than Jersey, the only two-named state that can drop its first name, so why shouldn't we be defensive?

Alright, so I don't have a t-sound in my "water," sue me. It's not my fault that half of the people who mock me have to travel to the Jersey shore to see an actual body of "wadder." So how do you know that you don't say it wrong?

We also seem to have a major deficiency in the cleanliness area. We are "dirty" or more commonly "the armpit of America." What have these people seen, the outskirts of the Newark Airport? Yeah, that is dirty, but that's just one area. And don't bother trying to ask me in jest, "What exit are you off the turnpike?" if you're just going to continue complaining about our driving with no intention of getting off to see how great Jersey really is.

I know what you are thinking, you want me to shut up, because most of the students here are from Jersey and deep in our id we must have this desire to be out in Pennsylvania. But the truth is, deep in our id we want to get to know the state and live in it ... before we mock it.

So it's OK, keep mocking "Jersey," we can take it, we're just "Jersey Trash" right? It's not our fault that people like to flaunt their ignorance. We live there so we know that we never have to cross a state boarder to celebrate every season as it should be; summer at the shore, fall in the colored leaves, winter with a snowball fight and spring with the fresh air.

So, I don't care if 90 percent of accidents occur close to home ... I'm not moving from New Jersey!

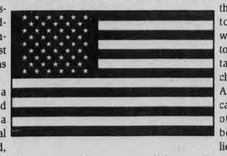
In the words of N.J. native Bon Jovi "If you're from New Jersey, let people make all those bad jokes about our state. Don't tell anybody how great it is here. It's the best kept secret."

I figured anyone reading this article is from New Jersey and in the off chance they aren't, they didn't take one word of this seriously. So fellow Jersians, keep this on the "low down ... down low ... no doubt." And I'll let you get back to your donut seeds.

Who is truly an American?

By Philip Martoma
Staff Writer

Let's be up front and honest. My parents are from India and were naturalized after spending their childhoods in India. I was born in Florida, and am an American citizen. I do not speak any of my parents' original language, nor do I have any significant ties with India. However, I do not understand why this particular information about my personal history is considered to be important by most other Americans I meet.



I had a friend named Scott who had a similar personal history as I did, but whose parents instead came from Scotland. (Scott was actually born in Scotland and was naturalized. However, after living in this country since he was five years old, he had long lost his accent and any identifying features that are Scottish). I compare our experiences often because it seems to me that he is considered by many to be an American, while I am someone who is seen as having chosen to be an American. If this had anything to do with our comparative histories of the time we spent here or whether we were naturalized, then it would logically follow that the opposite would be true.

However, if I ever chose to be an American and not an Indian, it would be analogous to my choice not to be a Canadian. The fact that my parents came from India has no bearing on this choice but to many it would appear to be an important factor. I choose to be an American because of the Bill of Rights and because I believe in the values and themes about freedom that our country was founded on (regardless of whether or not they were applied to reality). I hold these tenets close to my heart and really know almost nothing about Canadian democracy, let alone have a desire to go much as I would to an Indian democracy.

I think sometimes other Americans confuse symbols of America, with what being American is. America is not having apple pie for dessert or turkey at Thanksgiving, or having a story about being the descendant of a Pilgrim.

For me, what makes me feel patriotic and thus American, are principles of our democracy such as our Freedom of Speech and Religion. I do not believe that we uphold all of these principles but I believe in the philosophy of them nonetheless. Still, to many Americans, who would demand that I explain myself, and where I came from (as I felt was necessary to preface this article for many of my audience), these symbols have not changed, and will not until maybe the day that Latino-Americans outnumber Anglo-Americans and Cinco de Mayo becomes a nationally recognized holiday. For me, this would not change anything about what it means to be American, but to many this would be threatening. Though I do not want to create division among my fellow Americans, I believe it necessary to point out that division already exists when I am asked where I came from or when Cinco de Mayo is conceived to be somehow more foreign and (thus threatening to our culture) than St. Patrick's Day.

Letter to the editor

Lack of openness prevents family feeling

To the Editor:

I would like to respond to the opinions given about whether or not the University is actually a "family" in the Feb. 22 issue. Although I basically agree with Philip Martoma's viewpoint, I think that he is missing the big picture. Race, culture and diversity do not keep a certain community from being a "family." Simply because we are not "intrinsically tied to each other," does not mean that we cannot care for each other as we would our own family. Some of my best friends, those of whom I consider to be part of my own family, are from very different backgrounds than I.

The reason that this community is not a true "family" is because no one is open.

The reason that this community is not a true "family" is because no one is open. Coming in as freshmen and into the Greek system as sophomores, the students find their comfort zone and their niche. Most people here are not comfortable enough to allow for anyone else to be included once that group is set. Families openly welcome a new member or a new enthusiastic participant. Our University, on the other hand, has shown at every level that it is closed until forced open. Freshman need to somehow prove themselves to be accepted, and this process only continues for sophomores during rush events. For those of us that don't desire to become a true member of a family by joining a fraternity or sorority, the overall campus community leaves little else resembling a family structure.

As in my case, anyone entering into this community later than sophomore year has an even more difficult time gaining enterance into this campus "family." Only a very few have welcomed me into their circle, and for that I am grateful. But for the most part, this campus is a very closed society with no hope of gaining the title "family" in the near future.

Colombian presidential candidate kidnapped by rebels

By Charles Mitchell
Senior Writer

Ingrid Betancourt, a presidential candidate in Colombia, was taken prisoner by leftist guerilla rebels Saturday, along with her campaign manager. Betancourt, a harsh critic of the rebels, is a candidate of the Oxygen-Green Party and has polled support of less than one percent.

Regardless of her meager electoral appeal, she is known for her "brash, in-your-face" style which, according to the Colombian government, is just what got her into trouble in the first place. She was traveling into an area of Colombia that had been ceded by the government to rebels in 1998, as part of an effort to resolve that country's now 38-year-old civil war.

The President of Colombia, Andres Pastrana, recently became incensed with the rebels, pronounced the peace process dead and ordered the army to retake the area, which is about the size of Switzerland.

Ignoring the army's advice to stay out, Betancourt followed Colombian military personnel into the former rebel enclave. Which, according to her supporters, is very much in keeping with her strong and stubborn character.

"Ingrid is a very bold and daring woman. She takes big risks," said Rafael Orduz, her former Senate colleague.

Pastrana's decision to retake the ceded area was due to the rebels' hijacking an airliner and kidnapping a senator last week.

Ingrid Betancourt, Colombian politician and presidential hopeful was kidnapped this week by Colombian rebels from the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia, a Marxist group fighting the government.

The principal rebel group is the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), a Marxist group. FARC now has, in addition to Betancourt, 800 hostages, including five Colombian legislators. Pastrana has sworn that the peace process will go no further until the FARC stops its attacks and kidnappings. It seems that his countrymen are largely with him in this belief. The civil war claimed 40,000 lives in the 1990s alone.

Recently, the government sent out word that there will be no exchange of captured rebels in return for Betancourt.

Pastrana has accused FARC of "kidnapping democracy," in a remark somewhat reminiscent of President George W. Bush's Sept. 11 remark that "freedom has been attacked."

Notably, FARC and two other Colombian rebel groups are on the U.S. State Department's list of foreign terrorist organizations.

The government's hard line, marked by Pastrana's strident remarks and an army offensive, has elicited a strong response from the rebels.

Three soldiers have been killed in recent days, and the rebels have been bombing reservoirs, toppling utility poles—producing widespread blackouts—and have blown up 11 bridges since last Thursday.

Executions have occurred in cities the army has not yet reached, such as La Macarena, where five people were killed for an unknown reason. According to CNN, Mayor of Bogota, Antanas Mockus, remarked in disgust, "This is the kind of thing that even countries fighting other countries don't do."

Betancourt's party has publicly blamed Pastrana for the kidnapping, since she was refused a seat on a military helicopter that actually brought Pastrana into the area.

Instead, she drove, and could not avoid a FARC roadblock. Military operations to search for her have actually been suspended, because her family believes that they might induce the rebels to harm her.

American journalist murdered by captors

By Matthew Hinson
Senior Writer

Daniel Pearl, Wall Street Journal reporter covering developments in Afghanistan, has been confirmed dead. He was kidnapped in January following attempts to contact Islamic clerics, was trying to get information on Richard Reid, the man who tried to blow up a plane in December with an explosive hidden in his shoe. Pearl's death comes as a shock to his wife Mariane, the Wall Street Journal, and journalists everywhere.

Since word of his kidnapping got out, Pearl's wife and his editor made repeated and emotional appeals to Pearl's captors, begging them let Pearl go. The kidnappers contacted Pakistani officials via email stating that they believed Pearl to be a spy in the employ of the U. S. and Israeli governments. They said that he would be executed unless Pakistani citizens held by the United States as terrorists were returned to stand trial in Pakistan. Pakistani police as well as American FBI officers had attempted to trace the origin of the emails without success.

Mukhtar Ahmed Sheikh, head of police in Karachi, stated that the kidnappers are known, and that the main suspect, Omar Saeed, has been in police custody for the past two weeks. When first arrested, Saeed said that he believed Pearl to be alive, though he later changed his opinion. Police also arrested Fahad Naseem, who they believe sent the email declaring Pearl's abduction—copies of that email having been found on Naseem's computer, Sheik Mohammed Adeel, a police officer, and Salman Saqib. These men are thought to have ties to Jaish-e-Mohammed, which Pakistani officials allege is a terrorist group. Pakistani spokespersons have issued strong statements against terrorism and have promised to bring Pearl's killers to justice.

The Council on American Islamic Relations has condemned the killing, stating that Islam gives immunity to journalists, especially in times of war. Pakistani President Pervez Musharraf said that the execution was probably in response to his choice of a moderate path for Pakistan, which, he said, Islamic extremists reject.

Pearl's death was confirmed by the State Department on Thursday, after officials viewed a video obtained by a Pakistani reporter showing the decapitation of Mr. Pearl. It is believed that Pearl was already dead before the kidnappers stabbed him multiple times in the video. It is believed that anti-Semitism played a role in Pearl's kidnapping and death. His captors forced Pearl to repeat to a camera, "I am a Jew. My mother is a Jew." Speaking from Beijing, President Bush stated, "Laura and I and the American people are deeply saddened to learn about the loss of Daniel Pearl's life. We are really sad for his wife and his parents and his friends and colleagues who have been clinging to hopes for weeks that he would be found alive." The Bush administration had negated calls for negotiation with the captors of Pearl, now believed by the government to be tied to Al-Qaeda, the organization held responsible for the attacks of Sept. 11.

Special Forces to be sent to Georgia

U.S. Special Forces will be deployed to Georiga to help train the military to fight remnants of Al-Qaeda.

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

On Tuesday, the Pentagon announced that the United States is planning on sending Special Forces troops to the former Soviet Republic of Georgia. According to CNN, as many as 200 U.S. troops could be sent to Georgia to help train and equip the country's military. U.S. European Command told CNN that they have had one military trainer and five contractors on the ground in Georgia since November of last year.

The Pentagon has said that the forces will not accompany Georgian troops into combat. Rather, the primary role of the forces will be to train the Georgian troops to fight both Al-Qaeda fighters that are said to be hiding in the country as well as Chechen rebels that supposedly have ties to foreign Islamic militant groups. According to MSNBC, President George W. Bush justified the move to reporters saying, "So long as there's Al-Qaeda anywhere, we will help the host countries root them out and bring them to justice." However, the proposed move has already met with some Congressional disapproval.

Senator Robert Byrd (D-W.Va.) told Fox News "If we expect to kill every terrorist in the world, that's going to keep us going beyond doomsday," and that he would not allow any "blank checks" to be written for the new front in the war on terror.

CNN is reporting that the plan is also being met with some skepticism from the Russian government. The Russian Foreign Ministry has already said that the presence of U.S. military personnel could simply exacerbate an already complex and unstable situation both in Georgia and in the Caucasus region as a whole.

It is also believed that the Russian public and the Russian military are worried about the United States possibly setting up a permanent presence in a region where Moscow has historically exercised influence. However, U.S. officials, speaking on the condition of anonymity, told MSNBC that the Russian comments were purely for "domestic consumption," and that the Russian government had been fully briefed on the administration's plans in Georgia.

It should also be noted that although Georgia has asked for military assistance, there still is no formal agreement between the American and Georgian governments. Still, the Pentagon has already conducted an assessment of the Georgian military and its needs, and plan is expected to be presented early next week.

Saudis develop new plan for peace in Middle East

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

A new plan for peace in the Middle East is picking up steam, and showing extreme potential for ending the violence between Palestinians and Israelis. New York Times columnist Tom Friedman put the plan forth two weeks ago in one of his columns. According to Time, Saudi Arabian Crown Prince Abdullah authorized Friedman to make public the new offer from Saudi Arabia for peace in the region.

The plan calls for Israel to return to its 1967 borders, withdrawing from lands occupied after the 1967 war. These occupied territories include the West Bank and the Gaza Strip. These two territories would then become the Palestinian state. In return for the withdrawal, the Saudi Prince promises to normalize relations, both diplomatic and economic, between all Arab nations and Israel. Such normalization includes full recognition of Israel's right to exist as a state.

Even though Sharon has opposed a full withdrawal from the occupied territories in the past, Israel is eager for an end to the violence, and the Saudi plan offers a reasonable way out.

Time is reporting that although the plan is nothing new, the fact that the plan came from Saudi Arabia and quickly earned moderate Arab support has many experts hoping that there might finally be a viable peace plan for the Middle East. The fact that the plan was put forth by a conservative Islamic state like Saudi Arabia has many hoping that the proposal will have an easier time gaining wide support among the members of the Arab League.

Although Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has yet to officially comment on the plan, one aide close to the Prime Minister told MSNBC that Sharon views the plan as "positive," and would be willing to meet with any Saudi official to discuss the proposal. Even though Sharon has opposed a full withdrawal from the occupied territories in the past, Israel are eager for an end to the violence, and the Saudi plan offers a reasonable way out. This will likely put a great deal of pressure on Sharon, and a failure on his part to negotiate could decrease his standing in the international community. The plan has also already received support, albeit cautious support, from the Bush administration.

Despite the early support the proposal has received, the road to peace is still quite long. The reason can be found in the details. One of the biggest holes in the plan is that it fails to address the status of the highly contested city of Jerusalem. Also, the plan is likely to meet with stiff resistance from the right wing of the Israeli government as well as Arab hardliners. There is also the subject of the current wave of violence. Sharon has demanded at least a one-week hiatus to the violence before Israel would return to the negotiating table.

However, according to Time, Saudi officials as well as Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres are advocating a return to the peace process even before a cease-fire can be reached.

Creamer and Almind lead Bison past Lehigh

Courtesy of Athletic Communications

Vicki Quimby '02 led the Bison scoring charge with 12 points.

By Andrew Bevan
Senior Writer

Point guard Molly Creamer '03 has hit many big shots throughout her collegiate career. She added another this past Sunday against Lehigh. With 3.2 seconds left in regulation and her team down by three, Creamer hit a tying three pointer to send the contest into overtime.

The Mountain Hawks jumped out to an early five-point lead in the extra session and were leading, 72-69, with 56 seconds left. Creamer nailed two free throws with 33 seconds remaining to cut Lehigh's lead to one, and after a crucial turnover by the home squad, the Orange and Blue found themselves with an opportunity to take the last shot. Creamer's game-winning attempt bounced off the rim but was rebounded by Desire Almind '04 who put it back for the eventual game-winner with 6.4 seconds left. Lehigh's last second shot fell short and the Bison emerged 73-72 winners.

"I thought we played excellent defense in the first half. We got stop after stop but we were not capitalizing on them," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said. "Our team kept clawing and battling to keep it close and then our offense came together. Molly's three pointer really sparked the team and gave them emotion."

"We were down five in overtime and I was impressed how the team did not panic. It was really big that we pulled this game out going into the tournament," she said.

The game was frustrating offensively for both sides from the opening tip. The Orange and Blue misfired on their first five shots but battled back with a 10-0 run to take a 15-9 lead with 10:57 to go in the half. Lehigh stayed close and edged ahead, 25-23, with two and a half minutes remaining. Creamer did some foreshadowing of what was to come near the end of the opening stanza as she hit a three pointer with 23 seconds left to get the Bison within one, 29-28.

After trailing by one at halftime, the Orange and Blue shot out to a five-point lead in the beginning of the second half before Lehigh fought back to knot the game at 38 with 15:14 to play. The Mountain Hawks launched a 6-0 run to move out to a 47-41 lead with 12:22 left. They lead for the next 12:19 until Creamer made the tying trey. Creamer led all players with 28 points and she hauled down a career-high 13 rebounds. Kate Franks '03 poured in a season-high 19 points and Almind and Kate Rounsley '02 each added 10.

"Kate had a good shooting night from three-point land and that is great for her confidence. Kate Rounsley gave us punch on the inside when we needed it and Molly went 45 minutes and really gutted it out for us. Desire had a couple of clutch shot. It was a good victory for all of us," Fedorjaka said.

"The Lehigh win was good for us heading into the tournament. Not only did it give us more confidence, it also gave us a taste of how games in the tourney will be. Everyone is going to be hungry and ready to play, much like Lehigh was," Franks said.

The Lehigh win was a strong positive for the Bison after coming off a disappointing 75-51 road loss at Holly Cross. The Orange and Blue shot only 35.5 percent from the floor and the loss was the team's largest of the season. With the victory, the Crusaders clinched their sixth straight Patriot League regular season title and the number one seed in the postseason tournament. The Bison got off to a good start, scoring the game's first four points and found themselves leading 11-10 with about six minutes gone in the opening half. Holy Cross responded with a 9-2 run to take a seven-point lead four minutes later. The home team gradually extended its advantage and entered the locker rooms at halftime with a 39-27 lead. The Crusaders did not let up in the second half, going on two separate 16-6 runs to stretch their lead to 30, 71-41, at one point. Tri-captain Vicki Quimby '02 led the Orange and Blue with 12 points while Creamer had 11 and Almind added 10.

"It was a disappointing loss because the team was so hyped up for the game. We were forcing action and we were not playing Bucknell basketball," Fedorjaka said. "I absolutely believe we can beat them. We just have to play with what has made us successful and recognize that we get away from that for some reason in big games."

"Our loss to Holy Cross was obviously very disappointing. Although the loss ruined our chances of the number one seed, we might see them again, and we know what we have to do. I have complete confidence that this team will respond and play like the championship team that we are," Tri-Captain Monique LeBlanc '02 said.

The Bison finish the regular season 18-9 overall and 11-3 in the Patriot League. They earned the number two seed in the league tournament for the fourth consecutive year and will square off against the number seven seed Navy this Friday at 5 p.m. in the quarterfinal round. The semifinals will be played on Sunday afternoon with the championship game taking place next Wednesday on the court of the highest remaining seed.

"I'm very proud the team has achieved the number two seed four years in a row. I give a lot of credit to the players for this consistency and making us a contender year in and year out in the League," Fedorjaka said. "In the tournament it is just a matter of us remembering what we did that got us here and had made us successful. We have to focus on playing Bucknell basketball. Tournament time has a different mentality and you have to be loose

Men's lacrosse falls to N.C. 12-3

By Pat Evans

Fifteenth ranked North Carolina gave the Bison men's lacrosse team all it could handle in its opening game in Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium on Saturday. The Tar Heels started the game with a six-goal unanswered run, and went on to win 12-3.

The Bison struggled with penalties the whole game, and the North Carolina took advantage of the man-up situations they were presented with. The Orange and Blue were given a few opportunities where they had more men on the field, but were unable to capitalize, missing all six shots they took.

"Hopefully we learned that we can't play in the penalty box, and that we have to score when we have the advantage," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said.

The Tar Heels controlled the ball the entire game, which tired out the Bison defense.

"The main problem is that the other teams we're playing possess the ball too long and we end up playing too much defense," Co-Captain Kevin Smithies '02 said. "A good team is eventually going to score on you if they're given that many opportunities."

Despite the lopsided score, the Bison did improve in some of the areas that they had been working on in the preseason. The team proved that they could play with the Tar Heels in the second half as they gained better control of the ball. Andrew Sanders '03 scored two goals in the second half to show that the Bison offense could compete.

"I felt like we hung in their for 60 minutes," Jamieson said. "We played physical, and we were much improved in ground balls and face-offs, which we hadn't done well in our scrimmages."

The Bison are a much younger team than they were last year. A couple of players hadn't seen the field before this opening game. Jamieson sees it as an advantage that they have opened against such a talented squad.

Nick Scott—The Bucknellian

Reece Pacheco '05 and the Bison lost to N.C. in their first home game of the season.

"It's good for our younger players to play a game like that," he said. "A real game against a team like North Carolina is a lot different from a scrimmage. It's a lot faster and more intense, and it was a good experience for our team."

The upcoming practices for the Bison will be critical in developing their younger players, and helping the team function as a whole.

"We can win or lose games in practices," Jamieson said. "We've got to try to do things right in drills, so that in the heat of battle, mistakes happen less."

Next up for the Bison is a very strong Harvard team that comes into Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium ranked 25th in the nation.

"Harvard has a very established, traditional program," Jamieson said. "They've had lacrosse at their school since its charter, and they always have good players. It's going to be a challenge."

Harvard was at the University for the North Carolina game scouting the Bison, which may be an advantage that they will have. But the Bison hope that they can regain the edge that took them so far last year.

"We lost some pretty talented seniors last year that really knew how to get it done on the field," Sanders said. "That just means that some of the younger guys coming up, including myself, have to find our own ways to win games. There is still plenty of season left and I'm confident we're going to make a run at the Patriot League."

If the Bison are to make a run they'll have to get through a tough opening stretch that begins with Harvard.

"We saw them play in the fall," Smithies said. "There's no reason not to think that we can win this one."

Women's water polo splits 1-1 over the weekend against Slippery Rock and GW

By Barb Morgan

The Bison women's water polo team improved its record to 3-4 this weekend while competing in the Bucknell Invitational.

The Bison first took on Slippery Rock University, whom they defeated in overtime just last week. This game was much more decisive as the Bison soundly beat the Rock 8-3.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Kelly Hofstetter '04 competed in the Invitational last weekend.

The squad jumped out to an impressive 5-1 lead going into the second half behind three goals from Kelly Hofstetter '04, two from Cody Keffer '05 and one from Brooke Rea '02.

"Our defense forced many turnovers that helped ignite counterattack goals and much time at the offense end of the pool," Head Coach John Zeigler said.

Despite being shut out from scoring in the third period, the Bison continued to play tough and added three more goals in the fourth to solidify the win. Hofstetter finished with four goals and two steals and Keffer had three goals and a steal. In the cage, Lindsay Chesterfield '03 played great defense, making 14 saves, grabbing three steals and adding an assist.

"We have a lot of talent on the team this year. We have started to put it together and thus establish ourselves as serious competitors," Hofstetter said.

In their second game, the Orange and Blue faced George Washington and fell 6-3. The game was scoreless after one quarter and in the second, GW shut out the Bison while putting in two goals of their own to go into halftime with a 2-0 lead. Despite two goals in the third from Keffer and Hofstetter, the Bison were unable to overcome the deficit. Hofstetter put another goal in the cage in the fourth quarter, but GW answered back with one of its own to guarantee the victory. Chesterfield recorded ten saves in the cage for the Blue and Orange.

The Orange and Blue again faced Slippery Rock in their last game of the weekend and came away with a 10-5 win. The scoring onslaught was led by Keffer with three goals, and Rea and Hoststetter both had two goals and an assist. Also scoring were Adrienne Schober '02, who added two assists as well, Meg Blitzer '05 with a goal and an assist and Eileen Ketterer '05 with a goal. Chesterfield had a season-high 15 saves in the goal.

"This weekend, much improvement was made from our first weekend. Though we were not able to get it done against George Washington, we are taking shots and getting more efficient on offense every time we get in the pool and when that all comes together we will be a strong offensive team," Ziegler said.

Men's bball drops season closer

A 21-point performance by Bryan Bailey '02 was not enough for the men to overcome Lehigh in the season closer.

The men's basketball team (12-15, 8-6) finished the regular season with a tough 75-64 loss at Lehigh (5-22, 2-12). Despite the loss, the Orange and Blue clinched the number three seed in the upcoming Patriot league Tournament, winning a three-way tie breaker against Colgate and Lafayette.

Captain Bryan Bailey '02 scored over 20 points for the fifth consecutive contest, which is a career-high streak. He finished the game with 21 points to lead all scorers.

The first half, for the most part, was a back-and-forth type of game, evident in the four ties and 11 lead changes.

A 14-5 run by the Mountain Hawks gave the host control of the ballgame early in the second half. With 10:05 left in the game, a Lehigh jumper capped the momentum-shifting run, which gave the Mountain Hawks a 56-46 lead.

The Bison fought back and got within six points at 67-61 after Chris Rodgers '04 drained a three pointer with 2:20 remaining. A three-point play and two free throws by Lehigh increased the Bison deficit to 72-61 with 1:47 left on the clock. Boakai Lalugba '03 converted on a three-point play of his own to trim the margin to eight, but that was the closest the Bison got. Lehigh hit 3-of-4 from the foul line in the final 1:23 to hold on to the win.

Lalugba finished with 14 points and seven rebounds for the Bison. Brian Werner '03 snatched nine boards. Jeremiah Bennett '04 came off the bench and connected on 2-of-3 from downtown. Bailey added five assists and two thefts to his point total. The Bison shot 43 perfect from the field.

The game against Lehigh was preceded by an exciting 75-73 win over Holy Cross (14-14, 8-5). The win improved the Bison's record to 12-14, 8-5 and temporarily tied them with the Crusaders for second place in the Patriot League.

"It was definitely a big win for us. It's a win that shows we can play with the top two teams in the league. As a team, we've been playing with confidence lately and it was demonstrated in (this) game," Bailey said.

Bailey scored a game-high 30 points on 10-of-20 shooting. The Bison survived a last-effort three pointer by Tim Szatko at the buzzer to walk away with the huge victory on the road.

"[Bryan] has been outstanding. We've asked him to shoot a higher percentage and take care of the ball better. In true winner's attitude, he has led this squad on his return," Head Coach Pat Flannery said.

Moonlight Madness

Just when we all thought John Rocker was finished providing the media with gossip fodder, the boisterous lefty has once again wandered into the crosshairs of public criticism and jeering. Once again, it has nothing to do with baseball.

In October, while the plucky Diamondbacks were overturning a dynasty, Rocker was skulking around country clubs in Georgia, killing and dismembering rebellious teenagers with an array of golf course maintenance tools. It's really nothing to be squeamish about —many popular athletes have done it before. I'd go so far as to say that historically, it's made an integral contribution to society's impression of famous athletes. Heck, even O.J. Simpson did it.

I'm referring, of course, to moonlighting.

Since the dawn of motion pictures, or at least shortly thereafter, athletes have tried to transpose their talents onto the big screen—or at least the small screen. Sometimes it was for money. Sometimes it was out of desire for extra adoration. Some athletes turned to Hollywood as an answer for their athletic woes. And some did it for reasons that may forever go undefined.

America's first football hero, Red Grange, did it. Grange, who once said he didn't "like football well enough to play for nothing," was not only subject to lucrative deals as a player —he reeled in simply monstrous paychecks for his silver screen ventures. The Galloping Ghost received $300,000 from Arrow studios to appear in a film called One Minute to Play. $300,000 in 1927. It was one of two movies Grange moonlighted in, along with a 1931 serial ever-so-creatively titled The Galloping Ghost.

John Rocker, who drew tremendous controversy for his racial remarks two years ago, now moves to the big screen.

Johnny Weissmuller did a little moonlighting, too. It may have even defined his career. Sure, Weissmuller had a few glimmering moments as a world-class swimmer—67 world records and five gold medals, in addition to a few other accolades. But it wasn't until 1932 that he really made a mark on society. Weissmuller swapped his swimsuit for a loincloth and monkeyed around the jungle in Tarzan the Apeman. 11 movies later, the swimmer-turned-junglehunk had ensured himself a place in Hollywood history.

Apparently athletes are moviemakers' top recruits when it comes to portraying the lingually-impaired, brutish Tarzan. The list of athletes to hit the vines includes professional football's Mike Henry, Olympic decathletes Herman Brix and Glenn Morris, basketball's Denny Miller and two other swimmers—Olympic gold medallists Buster Crabbe and Eleanor Holm.

Most of those athletes turned to acting after their careers were winding down. Sandy Koufax dabbled in onscreen experiments before he ever touched a Cy Young award. After a few dismal years as a bonus baby for the Dodgers, Koufax — along with everyone else —lost a little faith in his pitching ability and considered other avenues. In 1960, he appeared on such unmemorable shows as Bourbon Street Beat and Colt .45. Fortunately for sports fans, he took another crack at his athletic endeavors later that spring and proceeded to have the most jaw-dropping, dominating five-year run that any pitcher has ever had.

Koufax looked to the world of cinema once again in 1965, this time dragging holdout buddy Don Drysdale with him. The two threatened to dump baseball for Hollywood if they didn't get the cash they wanted. The massive raise that each received before the 1966 season would be a favor to professional baseball and the film industry.

Willie Stargell said hitting against Koufax was "like eating soup with a fork." Along that vein of analogy, believing his performance on Colt .45 was like eating broth with chopsticks.

In the footsteps of fellow football legend Grange, superstar running back Jim Brown tried his moves on the big screen after his premature retirement. In fact, his acting career was allegedly one of the things that led him to walk away from the gridiron. Maybe football was just too easy for Brown —Hollywood offered a novel challenge. His acting exploits were hardly comparable to his Hall of Fame career, but did produce 32 films, including the highly respectable war film The Dirty Dozen.

Athletes have had their hand in various comedies over the years, as well. Kareem-Abdul Jabbar in Airplane, O.J. Simpson in The Naked Gun trilogy, Brett Favre in There's Something About Mary and Shaquille O'Neal in Steel all had audiences buckled over in hysterics. Alright, so the Shaq movie wasn't supposed to be funny. The other three, however, provided some of the best athletic comedy appearances in recent memory.

Simpson's performances in The Naked Gun films rank among the best in any comedy, let alone by an athlete—before he was tooling around in white Broncos, he journeyed down a set of stairs in a runaway wheelchair, producing The Naked Gun's crowning moment. On a whole, Simpson was just plain funny. Murderously funny.

And Favre, while his acting was arguably stiffer than Dan Marino on a rushing attempt, inspired what is possibly the best line in There's Something About Mary: "But what about Brett Fav...ruh?" Imagine what the film would have lost if Drew Bledsoe, the original choice for the part, had taken the job. No matter how you look at it, there's just nothing funny about the word "Bledsoe."

The list of moonlighters is simply endless—those mentioned above only represent a sampling of the many athletes who have aspired towards Hollywood careers. Ultimately, how will Rocker stack up? Sure, he doesn't have a quirky name or the public's affection, but he does have a knack for glaring psychotically—a trait frequently pointed out by the same legion of hypocritical bleating hearts that threw a collective conniption fit regarding his "insensitivity" in 1999. Fighters for social justice apparently have no qualms about mocking the mentally ill (but rest assured, they'll protect that kid with purple hair).

So Rocker's "psychosis" will probably be the legacy of the moonlit horror film—after all, his character in the movie is, well ... a psycho. In the grand tradition of most horror movies, this one, entitled The Greenskeeper, probably suffers a painfully cheesy script. But it might be worth five bucks just to watch Rocker—who was apparently extremely diligent on the set—take his sideshow to the world of motion pictures.

Just as long as you're nimble enough to dodge the batteries ricocheting off the screen.

Track and field team ready to compete in Championships

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer

After outstanding performances by both the men's and women's teams at the Patriot League Championships last weekend, the Bison indoor track and field team will conclude its season this upcoming weekend as they compete in the IC4A and ECAC Championship meets.

These two meets are comprised of the best runners, throwers and jumpers on the East Coast. In order to make it to the meets, the athletes had to reach qualifying standards throughout their regular seasons. Both meets will be held on the weekend of March 2-3 in the Reggie Louis Center in Boston, Mass.

On the men's side, the Bison plan on taking 11 individuals to the IC4A meet. Noel Powell '04 will be competing in both the long jump and in the 200-meter dash with teammate Ryan Newberger '05. Greg Costello '03 will be running in the 3,000-meter race.

The University also has two relay teams taking part in the meet: the distance medley relay and the 4x800-meter relay. The distance medley relay is comprised of Michael Euell '04, Matt Nini '05, Cotie Strong '02 and Lou Palma '03. The 4x800 consists of P.J. Ward '02, Aaron Hanlon '04, Thomas Prochilo '04 and Eric Furst '03.

"We qualified some others for this meet, but we really wanted to concentrate on our relay teams. Everyone who is going has a good chance to score points for our team," Head Coach Kevin Donner said.

The Bison women's team is taking six individuals to compete in the ECAC meet. Theresa Demnis '03 and Becki Marshall '02 will both run the 5,000-meter race. Stephanie Bango '02 will compete in the 800-meter run and is a member of the distance medley relay team. The other three members of this relay team are Rehana Lanewala '05, LaTonya McSwain '02 and Kelly McConnell '02. Andrea Nyce '02 qualified in the pole vault, but unfortunately is injured and will be unable to compete in the event.

"Stephanie Bango is on the NCAA Provisional list and will do well at this meet as an individual," Donner said. "We kept some of our athletes out of individual events because we are trying to qualify our relay team for the national meet."

This meet will be the determinant in whether or not the Bison qualify anyone for the National meet that will be held the following weekend in Arkansas. Otherwise, these two meets will be the conclusion to the University's indoor track and field season.

W lacrosse primed for opener

By Jennifer Ross
Staff Writer

There are two main ingredients for a successful lacrosse season. The first simply involves having all of the right things on paper, like good players, no injuries and depth. The Bucknell women's lacrosse team seems to have a long list of credentials.

The Bison are coming off of a near .500 season ending last year with seven wins and eight losses, and many of those losses were decided in one-goal overtime battles.

"I think we're on the right track and hopefully we've improved in some areas so those close losses will be in our favor this year," Head Coach Barb Jordan said.

"I feel that we are strong everywhere on the field and have a really good chance at making the tournament. We just missed making it to the tournament last year and I know our team is ready to fight to be in it this year," Co-Captain Melissa Montefusco '02 said.

The Orange and Blue welcome back three players who were named to the 2001 women's lacrosse All-Patriot League Team—midfielder Montefusco, goalkeeper Nicole Kallis '03 and attack Suzanne Raffaele '03. However, Jordan feels that everyone will contribute to the success this year.

"It will take all 23 players to be ready to compete if we expect to challenge for the Patriot League Championship. I think our defense is quite strong but our offense has also been working really well together and hopefully we can put it all together and play well as a team," Jordan said.

With the advanced skill level of the returning upperclassmen combined with that of new players, the Bison's future seems to be heading in the right place. Hopefully, that place will be first place.

The Bison will play five games before beginning Patriot League play, where they will face their toughest opponents. Both captains are ready for battle and are very excited for the season.

"We have been preparing extremely hard over the past couple of months for this and I feel that we are ready to show what we are capable of," Co-Captain Jen Gianis '02 said.

> "I think that our team this year is more talented, dedicated, and passionate than ever before ... I can't imagine spending my last season with any other team.
> —Jen Gianis '02

The problem with many teams is that they have the first ingredient for being a good team —they have everything on paper—but lack the most important ingredient, that driving desire inside each player. For years coaches have been saying that you can't teach desire and you can't force your players to like one another, but these are the two things that this year's women's lacrosse team never needed to learn.

"I think that our team this year is more talented, dedicated and passionate than ever before. Most importantly though, we truly love what we do. I can't imagine spending my last season with any other team," said Gianis.

Loving lacrosse is what brought these athletes together, but it is their camaraderie that acts as the glue and key to success.

"I think that of all the years I have played, this is one of the closest groups of girls," said Montefusco. "We have great chemistry this year both on and off the field which will make us that much stronger in competition."

Together, this team has battled through two weeks of practices held at 6 a.m., run countless stadium steps and endured a great amount of physical strain.

"Without a doubt this team has conditioned harder than any team I have had before. I hope the results of all of their hard work are evident to them soon," Jordan said.

It seemed apparent this past Tuesday when the Bison took on the Bloomsburg Huskies in a preseason scrimmage. The Orange and Blue outscored the Huskies and dominated the field, playing most of the second half with Bloom on defense.

"We are going to surprise a lot of people this year," said Gianis.

When they do, it's most likely because their opponents don't know that the Bison have the special ingredients to success. On March 2 we will see just how well they mix them together when the team begins the season on their home field against St. Francis (Pa.) at 3 p.m.

half before giving it right back. They fell behind by as many as six points in the second half before managing to come back and survive the final minute.

Werner hit a three pointer to give the Bison their largest lead at 23-12 with 9:41 left in the opening half. A couple of minutes later, the Bison led 28-17 courtesy of a Bailey three pointer. The Bison led by a point at halftime after Holy Cross closed the half on a 16-6 run.

The Crusaders led for the first time since it was 3-2 after Brian Wilson drilled a three on the opening possession of the second half. Bailey tied the game for the Bison at 49 with 13:04 remaining, but three straight inside baskets by the Crusaders gave the host a six point advantage with 10:38 left.

After falling behind by six points twice, the Bison benefited from Bennett's clutch three point shooting, as he hit long threes twice to keep the visitors close. Down 62-59 after another Wilson basket, the Bison regained the lead after Werner and Rodgers drilled back-to-back three-pointers. Five more lead changes occurred before the Bison took the lead for good on two Bailey foul shots with 1:03 remaining.

Ryan Serravalle's free throw cut the Bison's lead to 74-73 with 35 seconds left in the game. The Crusaders then stole the ball near half court to give themselves a chance for the win. Szatko had two shots from close range with under 10 seconds left to play, but Werner came up with two huge blocks to ensure the victory for the Orange and Blue.

Bailey was fouled on the inbounds pass and hit one of two free throws with 6.4 ticks on the clock. Trailing 75-73, Szatko let a shot go from the top of the key, but the potential game-winner clanged off the rim as the horn sounded.

The game marked Bailey's third career 30-point outing. Werner had a big game, hitting five of eight from the field, including three of three from long range, to finish with 15 points. Rodgers again provided a spark, scoring 10 points on four of six shooting. He also contributed to the Bison's 11 total three pointers by hitting two of three from behind the arc. Dan Blankenship '03 was once again steady at the point, registering five points and dishing out six dimes.

"I undoubtedly felt good; however, my mentality is such that I just try to go out and play hard each and every game. The game up in Worcester was one of my more effective ones," Werner said.

The Bison hit 48.1 percent of their shots and committed a season-low eight turnovers. They also recorded 20 assists on the 26 field goals. The squad also shot well from the foul line, hitting 12 of 15 for an 80 percent clip. They shot 50 percent from three-point territory, hitting 11 of 22.

"One of our flaws this year has been our carelessness with the ball at times. It is imperative that we keep our turnovers to a minimum," Werner said.

"No question. We plan on making a lot of noise. The Bison finishing third has to give us confidence. We need to play every possession with poise and a purpose. We have the ability and the toughness to come out on top. Let's play," Flannery said.

The Orange and Blue will square up against sixth-seeded Army in the tournament quarterfinals on March 2 at 7:30 p.m.

Women dominate at Erg Armageddon

By Krista Killian
Staff Writer

The Bison men's and women's crew teams both had very strong showings in the University's sixth annual Erg Armageddon. Eight teams competed as the women's team broke two Erg Armageddon records and clinched 15 of the available 21 medals. The men's side had six top-five finishes and four medals at the end of the event.

Lisa Baranik '03 used an incredible finish to set the new Erg Armageddon record in the women's varsity openweight with a time of 7:20.8. With 200 meters left, Baranik came from behind to tie for first place on the very last stroke. Laura Jacque '05 demolished the former meet record in the Women's Novice 2K by over 12 seconds with a 7:18.5 clocking.

On the men's side, bronze medals were awarded for the varsity lightweight 2K and varsity 500-meter dash. The Bison earned gold medals in the novice mixed double and varsity mixed double.

For the men, the year began in October when they had their first 5,000-meter race. They had a great showing, and have not stopped since. The team has continued to practice six days a week, whether it is on the water or on the rowing machines. Captain Brian Albert '03 and President Benjamin Pfeiffer '03 have helped keep the team focused inside throughout the rowing and mandatory lifting, as the whole team is anxious to be back on the water soon.

Aaron DeRosa—The Bucknellian

Former team president Jeremy Urban '02 watches intently as Captain Brian Albert '03 hits the erg.

"I hope to have a highly competitive season, and continue to build on that into next season, as well," Pfeiffer said.

The men's team has overcome many limitations caused by the gender equity rules that have affected other sports teams on campus. In the past, they have faced having a capped roster, so that they could continue being a varsity sport.

However, next year the men's team will become a club varsity sport, allowing them to take on as many members as they would like.

In addition, the men's team will lose University funding as a varsity sport, thus having to rely on fundraising and negotiations with the Bucknell Student Government for money.

"The team just hopes to do really well this spring season, followed by successful recruiting in the fall. It will be a benefit to our team to no longer have a capped roster," Jeffrey Dasch '03 said.

The women's team is also striving to have a terrific spring season. Like the men, the women are practicing six days a week in order to get in the best shape so they can get back on the water. Due to the fact that the women's team is not restrained by the gender equity rules, they have a larger amount of novice and varsity rowers.

The novice rowers hit the gym for rowing at 6 a.m., while the varsity team meets later in the afternoon to row six days a week, as well as have double practices with lifting on Tuesdays, Wednesdays and Thursdays.

"We have great camaraderie and close friendships formed throughout my experience," Novice Captain Candice Olszewski '04 said.

The team's main focus in their training efforts is one of the biggest spring regattas, the Dadvail Regatta.

"We plan to have our intense winter training pay off in the spring, when we begin our quest for medals in the biggest regattas on the East Coast," Emily Smith '04 said.

This intense winter training will continue over spring break, as both the men's and women's crew teams are headed to Augusta, Ga. for a week of in-depth training in a warmer area.

Young blood gives track team a boost

By Brian Klotz
Senior Writer

Perhaps the most important part of any athlete's journey from high school to college athletics is the ability to adapt. College workouts are more intense, the sports demand a higher degree of perfection and leadership becomes integral to continued improvement. For this reason, many freshmen entering collegiate athletics often sputter, or get knocked off their game before finally adjusting. However, this is not the case with first-year women's track and field athletes Amy Calvo and Rehana Lanewala.

During the Patriot League championships on Feb. 15-17 in West Point, N.Y., Lanewala and Calvo ran an unprecedented seven and eight races, respectively, including trials. Lanewala ran the 55-, 200-, and 400-meter dashes and had a spot on the 4x400-meter relay, while Calvo ran the 55-, 200- and 500-meter dashes and was a part of the 4x400- and 4x800-meter relays.

Amy Calvo '05 ran eight races in last week's PL Championships.

Both ladies placed themselves high on the University record charts in the process. In the 200 and 400, Lanewala placed third all-time, and in the 500-meter dash, Calvo took the fourth all-time spot. Calvo and Lanewala both ran, legs of the third-fastest 4x400-meter relay in Bucknell women's track history as well.

It was a busy weekend for Calvo and Lanewala, scoring 25 points individually, and 20 more as parts of relays. After it was all over, though, neither was without surprise.

"I didn't expect the level of success that I had at Patriots at all," Calvo said, "But I think the 4x400 meter relay surprised me the most because we ran our best time of the season after our sixth races."

Their teammates enjoy watching them perform. "Rainey (Lanewala) and Amy bring energy, excitement, speed and love to our championship team," Monique Boley '05 said.

Calvo and Lanewala are New Jersey natives who ran in the same meets and the same events without ever knowing each other. Both were recruited for the 400 and came to Bucknell wanting to succeed.

"I really wanted to improve my times from what I ran in high school," Lanewala said. "I also wanted to be able to contribute something to the team."

After meeting at practice in the fall of last year, the two ladies became quick friends, mostly stemming from what Assistant Coach Joe Klim thinks are similar personalities.

"Rainey and Amy are very competitive," Klim said. "They never complain, are always there to give 100 percent, get along with everyone very well and lead by example."

"We compete against each other all the time because we have the same goals," Calvo said. "I never really had someone to run with in high school, so if she runs a fast time, I'll run a fast time."

In a season that saw steady improvement in all their events, Calvo and Lanewala quickly became runners that were available to be put in any race where the team needed the points.

"They can run anything from the 55 up to the 800," Klim said. "Amy ended up placing in the 55 at Patriots and can place in the 800. Rainy is pretty much the same way, but likes not to go any higher than the 400."

Team member Christie Wolfgang '02 thinks that this brings a new dimension to the team.

"Amy and Rainey are versatile athletes that have added depth to our team," she said. "They will continue to be leaders for the next three years."

In the upcoming outdoor season, Calvo and Lanewala want to qualify for the ECAC meet in the 400, and have some extra motivation to keep getting better.

"Everyone on the team can run really fast times," Lanewala said. "You definitely feel like you have something you can improve."

"I'm enthusiastic about the next portion of the year," Calvo said. "I like coming into practice because I didn't realize the closeness. It makes us stronger as a team."

Klim expects to see big things out of Calvo and Lanewala before their careers are over.

"It's been a lot of fun coaching those two," he said. "It'll be interesting to see where they take their success. It wouldn't surprise me if, by the time they are done, they are at the top of their respective record lists."

Baseball makes 0-6 start to 2002 campaign

The Bison baseball team, beginning the season with an extremely tough non-league schedule, has gotten off to a rocky 0-6 start. Because the team lost nine seniors from the 2001 season, its offensive strength was hit hard and the team has had to rely on its aggressive defense to win games. However, with injuries to the pitching staff and an extremely competitive schedule, the Bison have started this season off on shaky ground.

On Feb. 16, the team opened its season in Charlottesville, Va., against tough competitor University of Virginia (UVA). Going into the game, the team was excited and eager to play, but knew the ability of its challenger. In their first game, the Bison ended up losing 8-0 to the Cavaliers. UVA pitchers Dan Street and Joe Koshansky combined to throw a three-hit shutout. Bison players Larry Sheetz '05, Eric Fishman '05 and Chris Mahoney '04 each singled off of Street during the game.

The Bison utilized four pitchers to face the Cavalier's offense; Starting pitcher R.J. Grant '03 lasted the first four innings, Sean Magee '02 pitched the fifth and sixth and Blane Sharpless '02 and Nick Yaeger '05 each got in one inning to close out the game. UVA won the next two contests as well, finishing the weekend with a three-game sweep over the Bison, starting its season off with a 3-0 record.

This past weekend, on Feb. 23, the Bison traveled to Statesboro, Ga., to challenge Georgia Southern at J.I. Clements Stadium. Though the Bison's weekend resulted in a 0-6 record for the season, their 4-1 loss to the Eagles showcased their best defensive effort, with the least runs given up in a game in 2002. After the weekend, Georgia Southern's record is 4-5.

Jared Comstock pitched a tough game for the Eagles, striking out eight Bucknell batters while allowing only five hits and one run in seven innings.

Grant started for the Bison and pitched five solid innings, only allowing six hits and one run, scored in the bottom of the second inning.

The Eagles got their offensive break in the sixth with three consecutive doubles, scoring three runs off of Yeager in a third of an inning.

"It's part of being a competitor; he's not hanging his head, and he'll come back next time and be ready to compete again. As a freshman, it is difficult because he hasn't faced adversity coming through high school like he is expected to face now," Head Coach Gene Depew said of Yeager's performance.

Relief pitcher Tim Peacock '05 held the Eagles scoreless for the remaining two thirds of the inning. Gregg Farmery '02 finished off the game with two scoreless innings.

The Bison got their offense going in the top of the fourth against Georgia Southern's Comstock when Fishman hit a two-out triple, eventually scoring on a groundball by Pete Wolf '04.

"We have opened against some very quality competition; we're not hitting the ball the way we need to as yet. I think it's a combination of seeing some quality pitching and us needing some more game experience," Depew said. "I think we are showing improvement, but we are not where we need to be offensively. We are playing some good solid defense."

The Bison's season home opener starts on March 2 at noon with a doubleheader against Cornell. "Hopefully we will be able to be very competitive with them. We have improved and have had an opportunity to work things out, whereas they are opening and have the disadvantage of not having the game experience we have had," Depew said.

We like sports

You're from Canada, eh?

If the Montreal Expos played a baseball game in 2001, and no one was around to see it, did they still play? You've really got to feel bad for the hapless Expos—the unwanted, dancing midget stepchild of the baseball world. They're the team that everybody avoids talking about at all costs, like bringing up your institutionalized aunt at Christmas dinner.

It's got to be hard to wear that uniform. These guys get snubbed more than me at a singles bar. Only eskimo divorce settlements see more cold shoulders than an Expo signing an autograph (notice the use of autograph in the singular as opposed to autographs plural, which is just wishful thinking for an Expos 'star'). When was the last time you saw an Expo pose for a Nike ad? Probably the last time the Olympics had any credibility.

With no fans in the commissioner's office and certainly no fans in Canada, the Expos averaged a league low 7,648 fans a game, and 619,451 for the season in 2001. Or in other words, the number of people who drove by Olympic Stadium rivals the number of people who sat down for an episode of the "Michael Richards Show" starring a post-Seinfeld Kramer.

Montreal has not only never won a World Series game, they've never competed in a World Series game. Talk about not having a date for the prom. At least the Red Sox have been competitive enough to suck in important games; Montreal can't even claim that. Always a day late and a dollar short, or in this case 33 years late and an Enron-sized debt short.

And now, 30-odd years after a bunch of stoned frat guys thought it would be cool to "expand their world" by expanding baseball, the Expos find themselves voted off the island with no cruise liner to take them back. They are the ultimate lame duck. With the Damocles sword of contraction looming over their heads all offseason, the team begins the season knowing that come next April they'll be mowing lawns or placating restless shut-ins at the old-folks home.

Not to say that contraction is a poor idea. On the contrary, baseball has over-expanded and the talent pool has been diffused faster than a fart in a turbine. But now, with the sale of the Expos, we are presented with the stark realization that baseball's integrity is receding faster than Dennis Miller's hairline.

> Bronson Pinchot's 1997 hit sensation "Meego" has drawn more audiences than the abysmal Expos. We haven't seen a bomb like this since David Caruso left NYPD Blue.

Quick recap: This past offseason, Jeffrey Loria, former owner of the Montreal Expos, purchased the Florida Marlins. When Loria moved, he took the entire Expos front office with him, supplanting approximately 60 members of the Marlins staff. Meanwhile, the Expos, left in the lurch, were purchased by a dummy corporation (Baseball Expos LP) comprised of the owners of the other 29 teams in the league.

Can anyone say conflict of interest? I think, as an owner, it would be cool to own a team that I was competing against. The New York Mets will play approximately 19 games against the Expos this season because they're in the same division. If I'm Fred Wilpon (co-owner of the Mets), I've got to be thinking good things about this situation; on the one hand, I own a championship caliber team. On the other hand, I own the baseball team equivalent of a door mat that will give my championship team approximately 15 wins from the word 'go.' I don't think I'm going to be too upset by that.

Let's also remember that the Minnesota Twins were the other name on the chopping block this off-season and Bud Selig, commissioner of baseball, owns the Milwaukee Brewers who compete with the Twins for revenues. Can anyone say manipulation? If the President of the United States decided to promote the use of domestic oil and happened to own oil rigs in Texas, would we not ... uh, bad example.

Added to the fact is that when Jeff Loria bought the Marlins, he took all the top names in the Expos organization with him and the Expos got nothing in return. Just to give you a comparison, when Bill Belichik opted out of the last year of his contract with the New York Jets to coach the New England Patriots two years ago, the Pats were forced to surrender a first-round draft pick.

Or an even better example, in order for the Tampa Bay Buccaneers to pull Jon Gruden from his last year with the Oakland Raiders two weeks ago, they had to give up four draft picks and $8 million. When Loria looted the luckless Expos, all the Expos got in return was 29 owners with the thought of contraction more prevalent in their minds than Dustin Hoffman's in "Outbreak."

How are the Expos supposed to field a team (much less be competitive) if they can't sign their young players to long contracts? Or pull off trades without the fire-sale bell gonging in the distance? The fact is, they can't and that's how the owners, with Bud Selig at the helm, planned it.

With this in mind, not to mention the flagrantly exorbitant player and team salaries that have exploded like caves in Kandahar, it's easy to understand that all the former dignity that remained in baseball has vanished.

But I rest assured that salvation will come one day and I'll tell you why. Because at the University of Pennsylvania about two weeks ago, a few intoxicated editors at the newspaper decided to put their money where their mouths were, slapped $15 on the table and told their buddies to match it.

These certifiable geniuses began a "Buy the Expos" drive. In a little less than two weeks, the group raised over $100,000 towards the purchase of the Montreal Expos and the number is climbing. It is reported that, at the rate that they have received donations, they will hit $500,000 by the end of the month and their ultimate goal (the cost of the Expos) of $100 million by the end of March. See for yourself, (www.sas.upenn.edu/~spector/expos.html), I put my bid in.

Now I'm not saying that Major League Baseball is conspiring to make the Expos the worst team in the league. Trust me, they don't need any help from the higher-ups. I'm merely suggesting that perhaps there should be some sort of ground rules established to make baseball a smidge more credible. Because when it comes down to it, the Montreal Expos are the best thing to come out of Canada since the Vancouver Grizzlies ... uh, bad example. Wait, that's right, Montreal is in Canada! Never mind then ... contract those buggers. We will make them pay until they take back every last Celine Dion album ever produced.

Baseball's back and better than ever ... for some

COMMENTARY

Rob Schmicker

Baseball is finally back. After an offseason like none other in recent memory, baseball is ready to pick up where it left off. On the field, 2001 may have been the greatest season ever, but off the field, contraction and soaring salaries soured the game once again. From October to the end of February, I have been a bitter, bitter man. I'm sick of listening to Bud Selig and I'm sick of seeing only a select few teams spend money. It's March 1 and the players have finally taken to the field once again. While only a few teams may be able to achieve their goal of a World Series title, spring training breeds optimism into every team. But for those teams who were without the services of a fallen star, spring training offers another chance to shine.

The most optimistic team this spring might be the Boston Red Sox. A busy offseason helped upgrade their lineup, but the mere fact that their two biggest stars are healthy once again will make them title contenders. Pedro Martinez says his shoulder is fine and will once again be the ace of the staff as well as a prime candidate for the Cy Young Award. Combining Martinez with newly acquired John Burkett, Dustin Hermanson and Darren Oliver, Boston's rotation will be better than last year.

But the key to the Red Sox's fate will be Nomar Garciaparra. After sitting out until mid-July, Garciaparra returned from injury only to re-injure his wrist. With the star shortstop in the lineup, pitchers will no longer be able to pitch around Manny Ramirez. With Garciaparra in the dugout, a late season collapse like last year will be unthinkable. He is the heart and soul of the Red Sox. Their fate depends on his wrist. After playing in only 21 games last year, he will look to improve on his .332 career batting average. Jason Varitek's return will also be key for the team —just in case Garciaparra and Ramirez go into simultaneous slumps.

Their AL East rivals, fresh off another World Series appearance, will also be anxiously awaiting the return of two of their starting pitchers. It's hard to imagine the Yankees being any better than they were last year, but the possibility is quite startling. Not only can the Yanks count on their free-agent gems, but they are awaiting the return of David Wells and Orlando Hernandez. Wells is coming off of an injured-filled 5-7 season with the White Sox while 'El Duque' is hoping to win the last spot in the rotation after a miserable 2001 campaign. If both can stay healthy, then the Yankees rotation may be among the best ever.

Across town, the Mets completely revamped their lineup and pitching staff as they added Roberto Alomar, Roger Cedeno, Jeromy Burnitz and Shawn Estes to a team that sorely underachieved last year. But the biggest acquisitions were Mo Vaughn and Jeff D'Amico. While the others are dependable, Vaughn and D'Amico are coming off injury filled seasons. The Mets are gambling on both players, as it is unsure if either still has the right "stuff." If Vaughn can rekindle his career in New York after a miserable stay in Anaheim, then the middle of the lineup will be devastating. If D'Amico can duplicate his 2000 form when he went 12-7 with 2.66 era, then the pitching staff will be solid from top to bottom. Both players need to erase the "If" in front of their names if the Mets look to seriously contend.

Further west, the Cincinnati Reds improved their team without a single big-name free agent. This is because All-Stars Ken Griffey Jr., Barry Larkin and Scott Williamson will all be back in top shape. Griffey, who has been somewhat of an underachiever during his time in Cincinnati, should finally have a productive season if he can stay healthy for the full season. A healthy Larkin combined with Sean Casey will give Griffey better protection, which could lead to another 50 home run season. Williamson, who pitched in two games before being injured is back to lead what was the league's top bullpen in 2000. These three stars may be able to lend the biggest boost to their respective team.

Lost in the shadows are the Los Angeles Dodgers, who at one point last season were without their top three starters. The fact that they finished ten games over .500 without the services of Kevin Brown, Darren Dreifort and Andy Ashby for most of the year is promising for Coach Jim Tracy. Alongside Omar Daal and Kazahisa Ishii, the Dodgers have potentially the best rotation in the NL. Like Pedro Martinez, a healthy Brown could once again be in the running for another Cy Young—now he just needs some offense.

Offense will not be a problem in Chicago this year, as Frank Thomas returns to the already explosive White Sox lineup. Combined with Magglio Ordonez, Paul Konerko and Carlos Lee, the middle of the lineup is beefed up. But can Thomas stay happy and healthy? David Wells questioned his work ethic during last year, saying he was not a team player. Much to Thomas' dismay, Coach Jerry Manuel is considering hitting him in the clean up position. Will he be able to keep his mouth shut and contribute positively? Chicago is sure hoping so.

Elsewhere around the league, Philadelphia is looking forward to Mike Lieberthal's return while Kris Benson is eyeing a mid-May return to a Pirates team that lost 100 games last year. He has incredible stuff and should be good for years to come—hopefully Pittsburgh won't rush him back after arm surgery. In Texas, the Rangers are hoping for a healthy Pudge Rodriguez to bat in front of A-Rod and Juan Gone. His health is a question though, as he has averaged 100 games played over the past two years. Finally, will Carlos Baerga (remember him?) be able to come back after a stint with the Mets ruined his career?

Will all these fallen stars be able to pick up where they left off? Only time will tell. One thing is sure though—both league MVPs could possibly be won by players who were injured last year. With that the case, baseball is lucky to have their fallen stars back in the lineup. Now they can only hope for an encore to last year.

Athlete of the Week

By Scott Kloss

Cody Keffer '05

Cody Keffer '05, our athlete of the week, brings a sense of enthusiasm and leadership to an already prominent Bison water polo team. In the final game of the Bucknell Invitational last week, Keffer, from Berkeley, Calif., scored two of her game-high three goals in the fourth quarter, leading the women's water polo team to 10-5 triumph over Slippery Rock University.

"The past week my coach has been working with me on my shot technique which I think played a vital role in a number of my goals," Keffer said. "My team has spent a lot of time working on certain plays that set up shots for both the two-meter position on offense and the position I play on man up offense. Because of the team's excellent ball handling and passing in the games, I was able to get the ball into the goal."

A distinctive cross between high school dodge ball, basketball and swimming, water polo brings a certain flare to the sports world. Keffer explained how she became involved with the Bison team.

"I was on a swim team from ages 7-11, and then I quit and started playing basketball. However, I was not good enough to play in high school so I decided to try a sport that combined some of the skills of swimming and basketball, and I got hooked," Keffer said.

A true team sport in nature, every single player has her position and each player must rely on one another to direct the ball down the pool.

"I think one of the best things about playing a team sport is that you always have your teammates and your competition to keep you motivated and help you to become the best player possible," Keffer said.

While the water polo season has just begun, Keffer has a mature outlook for the season, focusing on a few goals.

"As an individual, I really want to focus on my two-meter offense and my perimeter defense. My goals for the team are to play up to our full potential and to make it to Easterns this year because I know that the seniors on the team have been working incredibly hard and they definitely deserve to have a rewarding season," she said.

When Keffer isn't making waves in the pool, she is a member of the Activities and Campus Events Themes Committee on campus and participates in the Social Justice Residential College. As for her major, she takes full advantage of her first-year status and is currently searching for the right match.

One thing you won't see Keffer wearing is her cap number during practice.

"It's bad luck," she said.

Women's tennis edged by Colgate

By Caity Selleck
Staff Writer

The Bison women's tennis team fell to Colgate this past weekend with a score of 5-2. Since this was the team's first league match, the players had positive feelings about the weekend and will be working hard in practice in their two weeks off from competition. The men's team has not competed since the Lion's Invitational Tournament in New Jersey.

The women's match, although there was discussion about the regulations regarding it, was played on multi-purpose field house quality carpet in Colgate's Stanley Fieldhouse. The athletic directors of the Patriot League had planned on requiring all matches to be played on an International Tennis Association approved hard-floor indoor court. This resolution did not pass though, and the team had to play on the unfamiliar surface.

"The players did exceptionally well at handling the non-familiar, non-recognized tennis surface," Head Coach Rebecca Helt said. "Even though the decision of whether to play on carpet or hard court went back and forth several times during the weeks preceding the match, the players were mentally strong, and adapted the best they could to the surface."

Colgate	2

Winning points for the Bison were Ashley Diers '05, in the second singles position, and Samantha Berthod '04, in the sixth singles position. Diers took the match after three sets, with scores of 2-6, 6-4 and 6-1. Berthod took the match after sweeping the first two sets 6-2 and 6-0.

Although Helt was pleased overall with the girls' performances, she feels that the lineup will have to be reorganized.

"Our lineup once established is going to be tough to beat because all of our players are very competitive," Jill Wurzburg '03 said. "Our team has a great amount of depth and this will be key to our success this year."

Helt also felt that especially the doubles teams needed to be reorganized.

"We definitely need to work on doubles to make that one of our strong areas," Helt said.

The women's team will next play Radford on March 10, and the men will square off against Georgetown on March 12.

Lock Haven too much for Bison

By Dave Cohen
Staff Writer

The Bison grapplers, coming off a rejuvenation week in which their match with Millersville was annulled, knew that an arduous road was ahead of them. The first stop was to be a clash with 15th ranked Lock Haven on the 21st, followed by a trip on the 24th to Washington, D.C. to partake in a quadrangular match with the likes of American, Virginia, and Eastern Michigan.

At Lock Haven, the Eagles (15-4) capitalized on two falls and two forfeits to triumph over the Bison 37-11 in the non-league dual match. Steve Itterly got Lock Haven rolling with a 21-6 technical fall over Andrew Herbert '04 in the heavyweight match. The Bison then dropped 12 more points on forfeits at 125 and 133 pounds.

Rocky Miller '02 drew first blood for the Bison with a 12-1 decision.

Following the forfeits, Brandn Green '03 was pinned by Justin Owens at 141 pounds. Lock Haven proceeded to extend their lead to 28-0 when Jamarr Billman recorded a 20-4 technical fall over Justin Hartrum '05 at 149 pounds. Billman, who scored five takedowns and nine back points, improved his overall record to 27-2 with the victory. According to the Amateur Wrestling News, Billman is currently ranked second in the nation.

Rocky Miller '02 finally got Bucknell on the board, routing David Beard 12-1 at 157 pounds. Miller recorded a first period takedown, acquired three near-fall points after commencing the second period in the up position, then opened the third period with a reversal from the down spot.

Lock Haven	37

"We had to get something going, it was up to me to get the momentum back," Miller said. "We still had some of our better kids coming up. I was just trying to go out there and do what I could do. Lock Haven is definitely a higher caliber team, but we didn't wrestle the way that we could [have]. Coming into my match there is no way that we should be down by that much (28-0)."

Brock Hostetter '03 outlasted Eric O'Connor by a final score of 8-3 at 174 pounds. Although trailing after the first period, Hostetter surged ahead with a takedown in the late second period to make the score 5-3. He then picked up a final takedown in the final minute to seal the win.

In the highly anticipated 184-pound bout, the Eagles' Mike Greenberg edged Brian Neuman '02 after the score was deadlocked at 1-1 through the first seven and a half minutes. Then the final bout of the evening was claimed by Brian Falciglia '02, who defeated Jarred Dressler 16-5 at 197 pounds. Falciglia recorded seven takedowns to improve to 14-7 on the year and 8-2 in dual matches.

"I was actually expecting to wrestle their starter, but they threw their second-string guy at me," Falciglia said. "It was a little bit of a let down. I asked their coach why they didn't wrestle their starter against me and he told me that it was because of other matches ahead. I was upset at this but I am always trying to go out there and get better every time I wrestle. I was let down, but I couldn't let it get to me because I had to improve myself for the conference tournament and the next matches."

In the next matches in Washington, D.C., Bucknell wrapped up its dual meet season by rallying late to tie American 26-26, and falling 30-9 to Eastern Michigan and 46-4 to Virginia in the quadrangular match. With two bouts remaining in the American contest, the Bison trailed 26-16. However, Josh Perrin '03 was well aware that he had the opportunity to tie the match with four points and win it with five due to the forfeit that was to follow his bout at 141 pounds.

"So from a learning standpoint we wanted to wrestle hard and prepare for the conference matches. The next two weeks will be key for us because we are pretty banged up right now.
—Brian Falciglia '02

"I knew that the point total could work out," Perrin said. "But it really didn't matter, I was going to go out and wrestle the same regardless of the situation."

Perrin ultimately received four points with an 8-0 major decision over Matthew Pelligrino at 133 pounds. Wrestling under pressure is nothing new to Perrin, who was triumphant in the Shippensburg match's final and deciding bout back on January 18.

"I am comfortable wrestling whether it be the first or the last match," Perrin said. "If I can help my team win I am going to do it. It has helped that we have been keeping matches close. It just ends up that way. This is the third or the fourth time that it has come down to a final bout."

Mike Saunders '03 and Falciglia scored first period pins preceding Perrin's bout, while Neuman acquired a major decision at 184 pounds over Kyle Mason. Falciglia was also the lone bright spot in the Virginia match as he rolled over Andrew DeMartino 12-4 in a major decision. In the match, the Cavaliers scored three falls, two majors, a technical fall and an injury default en route to a 46-4 victory.

Falciglia continued to display his dominance against Eastern Michigan, scoring an 8-1 major decision over Jason Johnson to improve his record to 3-0 for the day.

"It was huge because we hadn't had a long day of wrestling in a while," Falciglia said. "So from a learning standpoint we wanted to wrestle hard and prepare for the conference matches. I knew I wanted to wrestle as hard as I could and we all tend to think the same thing. The next two weeks will be key for us because we are pretty banged up right now."

Neuman and Miller also recorded wins against Eastern Michigan. Neuman defeated Adam Gilmore 10-8, and Miller beat out Derrick Keasley 4-2.

The Bison will have time to regroup and tend to their wounds before they compete in the EIWA Championships beginning on March 8 in Bethlehem, Pa.

and go in with confidence."

Despite sweeping the season series against the Midshipmen, Fedorjaka knows it is going to be a battle.

"Navy is a very good number seven seed. They have lost a lot of close games this year. They have a lot of depth in the post and have a very good perimeter player in Courtney Davison. We have to be on our game recognizing things and then adjusting," Fedorjaka said.

"We are excited for the tournament because we have worked hard all year for this. It is a great opportunity for us. Nothing is going to be different though—we are going to count on the heart and determination that we've played on all season. The ball is in anybody's court—the tournament is like a new season," Leblanc said.

24 hour SAMS Dance for great cause

By Katy Zachry
Senior Writer

If you walked through the Bison between 5 p.m. Friday afternoon and 5 p.m. on Saturday, chances are you were surrounded by music, decorations and dancing. This atypical Bison scene was the 24-hour Students Against Multiple Sclerosis (SAMS) dance-a-thon. SAMS consists of 15 active members who raise money and awareness for multiple sclerosis. Two hundred people every week are diagnosed with this chronic disease that attacks the central nervous system.

"So many people are affected by MS, that being involved in a group like this makes a difference for a really large group of people," said Elizabeth Muller, co-president of Bucknell's SAMS club. "Not only can we become more aware of the diseases that plague our world, but we can do something about them."

The SAMS dance is the group's biggest fundraising event. Muller and Aline Baly share the responsibilities of president for this organization. The two had been planning the event since last August, and they hope this event will both raise money for a good cause and help develop their organization.

"One of our goals is to make SAMS an independent student organization again," said Baly. For the past few years, the committee has looked to Calvin and Hobbes and Alpha Phi Omega, the service fraternity, for support. Both of these groups have provided financial stability and many supportive, as well as enthusiastic, members. However, Baly and Muller, both seniors, are trying to make SAMS more independent in the future.

"We've used these two organizations as pillars over the years. We want to bring SAMS back to the traditional state it was, with its enthusiasm both on campus and off," Muller said.

The dance attracted almost 40 sponsors from on and off-campus and gained the support of close to 20 campus groups. Many local businesses donated prizes for the raffle that was held throughout the night. WVBU volunteered time, people and equipment for the cause, providing non-stop music for the entire twenty-four hours. Dining Services offered food for half the price it normally costs, and those who work in the Bison were both accommodating and helpful.

The goal of this event was to raise $5,000 for The National Multiple Sclerosis Society. The girls are hopeful they will reach their goal based on the committee's efforts and the overwhelming support of SAE fraternity.

"We feel we can meet our expectations of $5,000 because of the support from the committee and also from SAE. SAE has done a lot for us," Baly said.

According to Baly, the brothers of SAE "have been so excited and involved" during the fundraising. The fraternity decided to sponsor this organization so strongly because of the close connection it felt towards it.

"SAE chose to support the SAMS dance so strongly because one of our brothers recently experienced the loss of his mother from the disease," said President Joe Capitan '03. "We raised over $1,000 and everybody had a great time for an equally great cause."

The 24-hour dance was broken up into twenty-four one-hour time slots. Individual campus groups were encouraged to sign up to sponsor an hour. Most groups had representatives dance for their hour. If a group wanted to sign up for an hour but could not send members to dance, they were still able to contribute to the cause.

"There's an understanding between the group sponsoring the hour that they pay $1 for every active member in their group," Baly said.

At the height of Friday night, there were at least 100 bodies dancing in the Bison for two hours.

Brothers from Sigma Alpha Mu sponsored an hour Saturday morning.

"SAMS is a good organization to support," said President Tim Henry '03. "One of our brothers mothers was diagnosed with MS, so we wanted to show any kind of support."

Whether students came to show support to a loved one or just wanted to support a worthy cause, the SAMS dance was a success.

"I'm delighted that everyone's having a good time," Muller said. "People came to have fun, and we were able to raise money."

Asian Awareness Week provides learning opportunities

By Allison Crotzer
Staff Writer

This week is Asian Awareness Week at the University and this year's theme is "The Silk Road: A Journey through Asia".

"The goal of Asian Awareness week is to spread awareness by reaching out to those students and people in the community who have never come in contact with or learned about Asian culture," said Melissa Duriya, president of Students for Asian Awareness at Bucknell (SAAB) and public relations director for Asian Awareness Week.

The week features activities designed to celebrate a variety of Asian cultures. Many of the University's multicultural organizations take part in this event. SAAB sponsors the event with help from all of the Asian organizations, as well as the support of the Office of Multicultural Affairs, the Office of the Dean of Students, the International Students Office, Residential Colleges and the Women's and Gender Studies Program.

Duriya stresses the importance of this week for SAAB and the campus as a whole, "Asian Awareness Week is the biggest event of the year that SAAB and all the other cultural organizations sponsor. This week is so important to our club because it embodies our mission statement, that is, to increase awareness of the Asian and Asian-American heritage through campus-wide functions and to promote multicultural education for a multi-ethnic society. This is essential for the University as a whole, if we want to become a more open-minded and diverse campus."

The week hosts an assortment of activities representative of different aspects of Asian culture. On Monday, the film "Time & Tide" was shown in the Gallery Theater. Tuesday night featured a lesson on making sushi in the Terrace Room. Eliot Chang, a comedian from New York City, entertained students at the Bison, Wednesday night, with his comedy show and workshop. The performance of "Within the Silence" amazed and deeply moved students and faculty, on Thursday, by demonstrating the struggle of Japanese Americans who were unjustly imprisoned during World War II. Friday's event affords students the opportunity to decorate their hands and feet with Henna body art, an ancient form of temporary Indian tattoos.

The final event for Asian Awareness Week is a student-run dinner, which is set to take place on Saturday in Larison Dining Hall. The Asian Gala begins at 6 p.m. and promises entertainment to surpass years passed with acts such as a hip hop dance, Thai classical dance, singing, a fashion show, a martial arts skit and a modern Indian dance.

The dinner will include dishes from Japan, Korea, China, the Philippines, India, Vietnam, Thailand, Burma, the Middle East and Pakistan. The dinner remains the most popular event for students.

"This year we added more variety to the entertainment aspect of the dinner, including a combination of traditional and modern dances and performances. I think that people really enjoy this," Duriya said.

It is anticipated that this year's Asian Awareness Week will surpass previous years if the interest in this year's diverse activities and the enthusiasm of the organizations involved are any indication.

"Asian Awareness Week is such a wonderful event because it gives the members an opportunity to bond with each other," said Jon Mau, Vice President of Social Affairs of SAAB. Those who wish to inquire further about the week should visit http://www.orgs.bucknell.edu/saab/minisite/aaw2002.

Video program breaks stereotypes

By Rachel Gold
Staff Writer

"I re-named my program to 'Schmaltz, Shlitz, and Stereotypes,'" said film historian, Murray Blass. In light of the recent racial misunderstandings on campus, Bucknell University Hillel, with the support of the Marjorie M. and Irwin Nat Pincus Fund sponsored Blass to come and talk about "Jewish Stereotypes in Film and Television."

Blass explained that: "In the Webster English Dictionary, 'Schlitck' is defined as an entertainment routine. He explained that in the dictionary the word is not necessarily confined to Jews. He defined 'schmaltz' as rendered chicken fat. The last word is one we are all familiar with: he defined stereotypes as "an over-simplified opinion of a general group."

Blass explained to the audience that some of the widespread stereotypes of Jews include: "A man with a hook nose and a derby hat who is often depicted as either cheap, mean and greedy, or as a comedic fool."

"For many years Jews have been portrayed in literature and theater as being secretive in living habits, a physical coward or a Christ killer," he said.

Blass explained that there would be two parts to the program: the first part would include old videos displaying the stereotypical Jewish man. He informed the audience: "The first video is titled 'A Jewish Dance in Jerusalem,' in which I guess we are supposed to believe they are in Jerusalem."

Clearly, the film was not taped in Jerusalem, leading the viewer to witness a false portrayal of Jews dancing in the streets in what was not the Holy City at all.

"The second movie is titled 'The All Mighty Dollar,' in which a Jewish man is trying to pull off a silver dollar which has been super-glued to a chair," Blass said. This clearly obviously portrayed the Jew as cheap and miserly because he went to such great length to try to remove the silver dollar.

The next movie Blass showed was the 1916 Charlie Chapman film titled "The Pawn Shop." In this movie, the Jew was a mean and greedy pawnshop owner. After "The Pawn Shop," a movie that was formerly titled, "Jewish Prudeness," but was then changed to just "Prudeness," was shown. Here, Jews were depicted literally as "dirty" money grubbers. In one scene, the father instructed his son to: "Take a bath! It's the first of the month."

In the second part of the program, Blass showed us "The Critic," which was produced in the late 1900s with Mel Brooks.

The purpose of the program was to alert students to the misconceptions and stereotypes portrayed throughout the history of film.

"It's great that the Rabbi made this available because many people are interested in learning about stereotypes in their own culture and in other cultures," Hillel President Danielle Cannon '03 said.

Siblings Weekend 2002 filled with events and activities

By Lindsay Betzendahl
Staff Writer

Siblings Weekend has been an event that has been taking place since at least 1991. The weekend, which runs from March 22-24, is a chance for students to invite their siblings to the University in order to enjoy a weekend with a brother, or sister, in a fun activity-filled environment.

The University tries each year to create an atmosphere directed towards achieving a positive sibling bonding experience. This weekend gives students at the University a chance to step back from classes and the normal weekend endeavors to relax and enjoy some time with a sibling that may not have another chance to visit.

Between 1991 and 1995 Siblings Weekend was a combined event with the Residence Hall Association (RHA) and the Bucknell Activities Council, (BAC). From 1995 until 1999, BAC organized the "Come and Play Weekend", which was a carnival and picnic in the fieldhouse and RHA would manage all the events that took place outside of the fieldhouse.

In 1999, the two organizations recombined to organize Siblings Weekend since it had a far more successful turnout in sibling attendance when the two groups joined together. Currently, RHA and ACE (Activities and Campus Events) run Siblings Weekend because together they would receive a more adequate budget and greater student participation in organizing the weekend.

The upcoming Siblings Weekend 2002 brochure exclaims, "This weekend provides Bucknell siblings an opportunity to come to campus and lean more about Bucknell while having a ton of fun at the same time!" This weekend has been highly planned out by both RHA and ACE.

There are events almost every hour of the day to keep students and their siblings entertained. There is Casino Night, a DJ at Uptown, movies in the LC Forum, the comedy improvisational troupe, We Brake for Nobody, performances by the a cappella group, Two Past Midnight, a mock alcohol-related accident scene and much more.

RHA and ACE expect to once again have a high turn out for this weekend.

"It is one of ACE's biggest events and a great way to invite siblings on campus so they can see what it's really like here," said Jen Butler '03, chair of ACE Traditions Committee.

President of ACE Nicholas Yaichuk '02 is also excited about the event.

"I look forward to siblings weekend every year because my brothers and sisters can come down. ACE and RHA provide plenty of activities for siblings of all ages," Yaichuk said.

"Love of Three Oranges" is a public parody of classic fairy tales

Yu-Ling Huang—The Bucknellian

In "The Love of Three Oranges," classic fairy tale princesses were represented by oranges. The play was directed by Hillary DePiano '02.

By Rachel Gold
Staff Writer

After a bad break up, when the earth seems to be falling apart from under a one's feet, close friends and relatives offer their condolences: "Don't worry, there are other fish in the sea." Many girls can relate, for it is a common phrase offered by a sympathetic companion. However, in "The Love of Three Oranges," the comforting phrase from father to son is: "There are other produce in the supermarket of life." Like a typical love-struck guy or a heart-broken girl who believes that the lover who ended the relationship was "the one," the son proclaims, "But the oranges and I are meant to be."

The Department of Theater and Dance presented "The Love of Three Oranges" at the Tustin Studio Theatre from Feb. 22-25. "Carlo Gozzie took a popular children's tale of falling in love with three oranges and used it as the ultimate tool for public parody." said director Hillary DePiano '02 in her introduction.

DePiano was excited by Gozzi's project but explained, "I updated the slang, the jokes, even tweaked the narrative a bit to keep the spirit of the text fresh. Theater, in my opinion, takes itself far too seriously, and this version of 'Three Oranges' is my answer to that."

The play began with the narrator, played by Matthew Griffin '02, addressing the audience members and requesting that they "check [their] disbelief at the door." He explained that the cast would try anything to make them laugh. The omniscient narrator occasionally froze the scene to offer additional information about the characters.

The main plot consists of King Silvio (Stephen Pinciotti '02) trying to get his son, Prince Tartaglia (T. Patrick Halley '05), to laugh. The prince unfortunately suffers from terminal hypochondria and does not enjoy life. His main concern is that he remain close to his "much needed" medications because he is "truly very sick." The king hires Truffaldino, a famous jester played by Robert McGarvey '02, to try to amuse his son. In a very funny scene, Truffaldino runs around the stage with Prince Tartaglia's 'good medication.' Unfortunately for the king, the audience was far more entertained by the jester than Prince Tartaglia was, for he did not laugh.

The stage was filled with many characters that performed various funny skits and jokes in an effort to amuse the prince. Finally, the evil witch, Fata Morgana (Hollie Barattola '04), enters and the jester knocks her off her feet, causing the prince to laugh. But the amusement quickly changes to horror. Fata Morgana puts a spell on Prince Tartaglia, making him chase after three specific oranges with which he will fall madly in love.

After a scene change, the narrator is in the woods trying to come up with a spell to break that of Fata Morgana. He explains to the audience, "The spells rhyme, if you have a problem with that I will see you after curtain call."

The prince and the jester go to capture the three oranges, but the prince lags behind. The jester gets hungry and, since the audience has no food to offer him, he proceeds to "unpeel" the three oranges, who are really three princesses who have also been put under a spell by the evil witch. While Truffaldino "unpeeled" the girls, a strong citrus smell filled the audience.

After being "unpeeled," two of the oranges, princesses Nicoletta (Emma Stefanski '02) and Linetta (Liz Grasing '05), die of dehydration. Of course, Truffaldino didn't notice the "lake with a lot of water" sign located directly next to him which could have saved the princesses from their deaths. When Prince Tartaglia enters the scene, the third princess, Ninetta (Ashi Day '04), survives because she is offered water. At first sight, Prince Tartaglia falls madly in love with her. Princess Ninetta accepts his marriage offer, kisses him and then explains to the audience, "Come on! You try being an orange for a few years and see how picky you are!"

In the end, the evil servants, Brighella (Mike Moran '03), Smeraldino (Rachel Slotcavage '04) and Creonta (Brittany Bohn '04), are banned from the castle. The narrator returns and explains to the audience, "Like every great fairy tale, one must practice a willful suspension of belief and know that the good always wins no matter how unlikely it may appear."

The audience seemed to enjoy the show and the message at the end was one that could brighten anyone's day. The narrator concluded, "The greater power of laughter and happiness can save anyone from the horrors of the world. We want to celebrate merriment." And of course, like any great fairy tale with a comedic twist, "The prince and princess lived happily ever in laughter."

John Mayer mature beyond years

By Chad Flood
Senior Writer

Concert Review

"John Mayer, est. 1977." That was the simple message on the T-shirt hanging at the merchandise booth in the corner of Irving Plaza on Saturday, Feb. 23. Two things occurred to me when I saw this article of clothing. First of all, I was just a couple of hours away from seeing John Mayer perform to support his new record, Room for Squares. The other, however, was that he was only born four years before I was, and I was paying $20 to see him. It took me a minute to justify spending that much on someone who was barely my senior, but by the end of the night, I knew that I had made the right decision.

Over the past several months, Mayer's popularity has increased exponentially. He performed to a crowd of just under 400 in September at the same venue, yet this weekend, he sold out two shows at around 1,000 tickets per night. His album sales have been doing just as well, and even major music stores like FYE and Sam Goody have started to carry it.

I have been listening to Mayer's music for just under a year now, but had not seen him perform live before Saturday night. I didn't expect too much, because young performers and fast-rises to semi-stardom usually don't lead to successful shows.

On this night, however, Mayer proved that he is very mature for his age. Ignoring the annoying cries of "We love you John!" from the surprisingly large number of "teenyboppers" in attendance, the Atlanta native performed for just under two hours, hitting almost every song from room for Squares and throwing in a couple of tunes that only old-school fans could appreciate.

Kicking the night off with "No Such Thing" and quickly following up with "My Stupid Mouth," the night soon became a quiet sing-along that felt as if there was a good friend on stage and not someone who I'd only heard on record. Later, in their customary solo set, Mayer and bassist David LaBruyere took the stage alone for a few songs, and Mayer closed the set solo with the fan favorite, "Comfortable."

As much as I enjoyed the music, I was equally impressed with the way Mayer carried himself on stage. It would be easy for such a young performer to be nervous or act immaturely, but Mayer kept his poise for the entire show, joking with the audience and making comments that one would expect to hear from a veteran rocker.

The entire night, all I could think of was, "Hey, Dave Matthews Band played in this same tiny room in 1994, and look where they are now!" The fact that the next time I see Mayer, it may be at a less intimate venue disappoints me somewhat, but his musical talent makes such a prospect well-deserved.

Player's Ball features fashion show

By Kristi Johnston
A&E Editor

The "Dons and Divas" fashion show marked the highlight of this year's Player's Ball, which took place Saturday, Feb. 23. The annual event was sponsored by the National Society for Black Engineers (NSBE), the Panhellenic Association, the InterFraternity Council and the Office of Multicultural Affairs.

While the show got off to a late start, attendants were treated to a variety of fashion styles modeled by members of NSBE. Philadelphia native DJ Sniper provided the music as the models strutted their stuff on the makeshift runway in the Terrace Room. Jaynemarie Angbah '02 served as the master of ceremonies for the night's festivities.

The clothes that were featured in the fashion show were provided by NSBE members and represented many different styles. From mini skirts and T-shirts to evening wear and flashy suits, the models sported each ensemble with style. In keeping with the night's theme, many outfits had a '70's flair.

The Player's Ball has been in its planning stages for over a year. Money raised from the event will contribute to NSBE conferences. Overall, NSBE members were pleased with the outcome of their efforts.

"I thought it turned out well," Mustafa Hermanstyne '04 said. "It was definitely a better turn out than last year."

After the fashion show, the Player's Ball continued with dancing and the contest for the best dressed duo of the night. They were crowned king and queen of the ball and received gift certificates to local stores.

Attendants of the Player's Ball enjoyed themselves and recognized the efforts of those who organized the event.

"I think it's a great event to stress the prominence of NSBE on campus," Travis Martin '04 said.

"Gosford Park" is a sharp remake of an old classic

By Jessica Cortase
Staff Writer

Director Robert Altman seems to think that if Shakespeare can borrow the ideas of others and make them his own, he can too. His latest film, "Gosford Park," though undeniably witty and clever, is simply 1985's "Clue," refined by an absurd aristocracy that hasn't been so keenly depicted since "Titanic."

★★★½ 3.25

This murder mystery is set in a sprawling English country home where the upper-classes come to play for a weekend of shooting ducks and the breeze, and the lower-classes come to "know their place." Unfortunately, the untimely murder of Sir William McCordle (Michael Gamdon), the host of the party, ruins the festivities. The story unfolds as the motive of each character, whether residing "upstairs" or "downstairs," is revealed.

A bumbling detective (Tom Hollander) questions each guest and a few of the servants. Unlike the audience, he remains oblivious, even when his partner points out valuable clues.

The story behind the murder is complex, especially since there are about a dozen guests and all but one bring a servant to add to the 20-plus regular servants residing at Gosford Park. The murder itself becomes almost a secondary plot line to the clash between the classes and their expected roles, portrayed through sharp dialogue that fights to take center stage.

"Gosford Park" may not be a new idea, but it is the return of an old classic for a second run. The ending might be a bit predictable, but this reviewer firmly believes that originality is overrated.

Love Syndicate to play at Seventh Street Cafe

By Melinda Kummer

Rock, funk, folk, jazz—Love Syndicate artfully combines all of these styles, creating a unique blend of sound. The band will play at 7th Street Cafe tonight from 11 p.m. to 1 a.m. With a cello, guitar, electric bass and drums, an interesting rhythm develops that encompasses everything a coffee-culture loving individual wants on a relaxing Friday night.

> Ruff Nation Records describes the band as 'spontaneous, passionate, energetic, poetic, funky, soulful ... With lyrics wise beyond their years and music sophisticated beyond description, they never fail to leave a lasting impression.'

Ruff Nation Records describes the band as "spontaneous, passionate, energetic, poetic, funky, soulful ... With lyrics wise beyond their years and music sophisticated beyond description, they never fail to leave a lasting impression." Bob Wolter (drums and percussion) has said that his band's music is "soul, because you can play any style of music with soul."

The band, together now for almost three years, began when Josh Komorowski (guitar and lead vocals) and Erin Ryan (cello) started to play together at their local cafe in Wayne, Pa. Gigs at open mic nights led to the establishment of a studio and then the addition of Christopher Luxton (bass guitar) and Wolter. Now playing everywhere from dive bars to New York City to local coffee shops to Lewisburg, the band has made a name for itself with its unique blend of music styles.

Not only is their music impressive, but their lyrics are also challenging. Marjorie Preston of Philadelphia Weekly said, "Komorowski's warm lyricism comes dressed down in a seriously funky groove that testifies [to his musical ability]. Largely due to the rhythm section of Luxton and Wolter, who play off each other obsessively, Ryan's cello adds depth to Komorowski's earnest compositions."

Luxton describes Komorowski's lyrics as a meaningful glimpse into what people are thinking and feeling—an expression of those feelings as a "beautiful work of art."

"Music is the one true passion in my life, I write music to express my heart," Komorowski said.

Alison VanFleet (manger/booker) advocates Love Syndicate's upcoming University show "because it will help them to smile. Not only the music, but the lyrics dig deep to the soul and will captivate every person in rhythm and experience."

Take it from the band—"We always do our best to give 110 percent into our live shows, because that's really where we shine and [that's] why we do this."

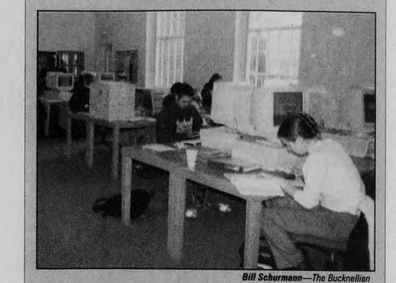
Lewisburg man indicted in child pornography ring



Bill Schurmann—The Bucknellian

Many computers around campus are Internet-accessible without a University-issued screenname and password, making it possible for any individual to gain access online at those particular machines.

By Andrew Burr
News Editor

A Lewisburg man has been accused of possessing and downloading child pornography, The Daily Item reports, and is suspected of having attained some portion of the material from a University computer.

The man, a guidance counselor in the Warrior Run School District, was arrested Feb. 22 by the FBI. According to The Daily Item, the FBI began investigating groups on Yahoo! early this year that were suspected of either transmitting or posting child pornography.

The Lewisburg man was discovered after the FBI attained the email addresses of almost 9,000 members in three suspected Internet groups operating around the world, The Daily Item said.

It was stated in court that the man allegedly used a University computer to download child pornography, although the location on campus of that machine, the amount he downloaded and the date(s) of such actions have not been disclosed.

Many computers around campus allow users—University students and personnel as well as non-University individuals—to access the Internet without entering a login. On Windows 98 and Macintosh machines, users can bypass the login by pressing cancel when prompted for a screenname and password. Machines running Windows 2000, however, eliminate this feature, restricting access to individuals with a valid login.

In the library, computers in the reference section must be kept open for public use (including Internet access) because they contain government documents and must provide "a comparable amount of accommodation to non-University individuals," Client Service Analyst Don Rea said.

Additionally, according to ISR, there are no filters placed on University Internet access.

Prevention of another such incident could mean limiting access to computers in areas such as the library, but University President Steffen

88-74 victory over Holy Cross gives basketball program first ever NCAA bid

By Andrew Bevan

The women's basketball team is headed to the NCAA Tournament following its 88-74 victory over Holy Cross in the Patriot League Championship game on Wednesday in Worcester, Mass. The Bison won the tournament in convincing fashion in their second chance ever at the title. Doing so, they snapped Holy Cross' 61-game home winning streak and won a school record 21 games this season. The team will find out its opponent on Sunday during the NCAA selection show.

Getting to the championship game, the Bison defeated both of the service academies and set up a rematch with Holy Cross from two years ago. They downed Army 83-67 this past Sunday in the semifinals of the Patriot League tournament and the four-time defending Patriot League champion Crusaders came back from an 11-point deficit to overcome the fifth-seeded Colgate, 83-71.

Search begins for Associate VP of ISR

By Chris Styers

A search committee, comprised of faculty and staff from various departments, began to review applicants' responses in early January for the position of associate vice president of Information Services and Resources (ISR).

Currently, the final candidates are being interviewed. That group includes Todd Kelle, from St. Mary's College of Maryland, Thomas Peischl from the University of Wisconsin-Parkside and Gene Spencer, associate director for Computing and Information Services at the University.

According to Jeanie Zappe, chair of the search committee, the University and ISR staff announced they were seeking someone with "proven facilitative leadership skills, creativity, a sense of humor, a passion for supporting a collaborative work environment and the ability to identify trends and exercise mature judgment about the role of information resources in higher education."

The duties and responsibilities associated with the position are vital to the campus community for a number of reasons. The candidate who best meets the committee's expectations will have a number of responsibilities, such as "leading ISR in providing information services and resources for the University, including computing, library, network, instructional technology, classroom support, telecommunications and web services," Zappe said.

The new VP will work with "appropriate faculty bodies to lead ISR in supporting the academic mission of the University by planning and implementing appropriate curricular applications and scholarly uses of information resources and technologies," Zappe said, and "engage the university community, including faculty, staff and students, to gather their feedback and needs." These are only a few of a vast list of duties. The position oversees the entire technological network of the University and thus demands experience and a number of outstanding qualifications.

The most visible way for the candidates to demonstrate their qualities to the campus community was through a series of individual forums. The forums consisted of a question-and-answer session in

The University welcomed a new member to the administrative staff last week. Kurt Thiede is taking on the role of vice president for Enrollment Management (VPEM), a new position that will oversee the financial aid, admissions and registrar's operations on campus.

As VPEM, Thiede will be concerned with the financial aid situation for incoming students and the registration process, as well as student retention and satisfaction.

Charles Pollock '70, vice president for Student Affairs, says this position was created to address two important needs that other vice presidents, with so many other issues to address, could not give appropriate attention to.

"It is critically important that top institutional decision-making be influenced by enrollment management interests and that enrollment management be strongly shaped by the big institutional picture," Pollock said.

Thiede will work with the University's senior staff and a number of committees, including the Strategic Planning Committee. In addition, he will work closely with Pollock and the two administrator's anticipate collaborating frequently.

"The quality of student life affects both Bucknell's admissions performance and students' desire to remain at the University," Pollock said. "At the same time, the quality and character of the students we enroll profoundly determines the quality of student life."

Thiede has been involved with higher education for nearly 30 years, including experience in admissions, financial aid and student affairs. He held a senior level position at Muhlenberg College in Allentown where he worked in enrollment and student life. For the last five years, Thiede has acted as an independent consultant, working with different colleges on enrollment management and marketing issues.

Thiede believes the University is in a strong position and strives for continuous improvement a quality that is very important in the competitive market for higher education institutions.

"My goal is to build on a legacy of good decisions by many good people," Thiede said.

Initially he hopes to bring the admissions and financial aid processes closer together. Other issues Thiede will be addressing include the use of the financial aid budget, ways to enhance recruitment efforts and the merit aid debate.

Pollock believes that Thiede will bring new organization to the already successful financial aid and admissions efforts.

"He will also bring a new level of strategic thinking to how we attract outstanding students," Pollock said.

Diversity, which has been an important issue on campus this year after the disappointing results of the Campus Climate Survey were released, will also be taken into consideration. Thiede hopes to increase diversity in a variety of ways, including racial, religious and socio-economic diversity.

"We exist in a world that is increasingly more diverse and in order for Bucknell to provide its students with the best educational experience possible, the campus community has to reflect the world outside the community," Thiede said.

—Kurt Thiede, VP of Enrollment Management*

Thiede has had knowledge of the University for many years and missed the campus environment. Not only is his wife a graduate of the University, but during his work as a consultant for other colleges, he frequently looked to the University as a resource.

Thiede says his expectations were high when he arrived at on campus but that those expectations have already been met and exceeded.

"This is truly a wonderful place," Thiede said. "I think it is a place where there is real learning going on, and not just students learning, but learning by all of us. I have found here a real commitment to nurture a learning community."

As he settles into this new position, Thiede hopes to become more involved with the students and wants to be a visible and approachable member of the administration.

Rogers is hesitant to act in haste.

"Child pornography is beyond despicable and isn't something we want the University associated with," Rogers said. which all faculty, staff and students were invited to attend and participate. Questions that the candidates were asked to answer dealt with qualifications and passed experience, but more importantly with the future of the ISR and the contributions the candidates intended to make.

Once the forums are completed, the members of the committee must decide which candidate is best suited for the job. Each candidate has the potential to bring valuable, yet unique qualities to the University. Kelley, a former Johns Hopkins University employee, played a large part in helping St. Mary's College create and establish technological services and infrastructure in its library. Peischl has excelled in his roles as assistant vice chancellor Information Resources, university librarian and chief information officer. Spencer's 24-year career with the University helped shape the nature of the present-day ISR.

As the search for the new vice president for ISR draws to a close, the committee will be focused on which one of these men will be able to continue to expand and improve ISR's role in fulfilling the needs of the campus.

basketball of the year. For this reason we knew that we had to play our best basketball and we did," Kristin Valdner '04 said.

Tri-Captain Monique LeBlanc '02 got things going for the Orange and Blue against the Black Knights with two free throws at the 18:30 mark of the opening half. LeBlanc and her teammates then exploded on a 17-4 run over a five-minute span to take a 17-7 lead. Army responded by getting within one thanks to a 7-0 run with 11:18 to play. The game was a close battle until the 4:12 mark when Molly Creamer '03 scored five points to put her squad up 31-24. After an Army free throw, LeBlanc poured in six unanswered points to extend the Bison lead to 12. Tri-Captain Rebekah May '02 nailed a jumper with one-second left to give the Bison a 39-27 halftime edge.

"We were facing our second academy in the tournament and we emphasized matching their intensity and physical play. Our players definitely did that. Again, we got another strong start to the game, which then seemed to propel us to playing well for the night. The players knew before the start of our game that Holy Cross had clinched the first game and would be hosting, and I think they were fired up to just go out and work in our game to get to a rematch in Worcester for the final," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said.

Army did not go away in the second half, going on a 15-4 run over six minutes to cut the deficit to five, 55-50, with 9:07 to play. At this point, Creamer and Kate Franks '03 embarked on an impressive display of scoring to secure the win for the Bison. They combined for 22 points over a four-and-a-half minute span in which neither of them missed a free throw or a field goal. With 2:43 to play, Tri-Captain Vicki Quimby '02 collected her sole rebound of the contest and etched herself into University record books, becoming the school's all-time career rebounding leader with 893.

Creamer led all scorers with 23 points while Quimby added 20 on 9-of-12 shooting. Franks had a career individual effort, scoring 17 points, dishing out a career-best eight assists, and tying a career-high with eight steals. LeBlanc notched her first double-double of the year with 14 points and 11 rebounds. The victory improved the team's overall record to 20-9 and marked the second consecutive year the team has reached the 20-win plateau.

Molly Creamer '03 scored over 600 points this season and took home Patriot League Player-of-the-Year honors for the second straight year.

"In the second half, Army clawed back the entire way, and at one point had the lead down to five points. At this point, it seemed like Molly really stepped up, went to work and showed why she was the Player of the Year. She took and hit some big shot and free throws," Fedorjaka said.

The Bison earned the right to play Army by defeating another military academy, Navy, 72-57 in the first round of the tournament Friday night. Four players were in double figures for the Orange and Blue as they shot 55.3 percent from the field and earned the program's fifth trip to the semi-final round. The Bison found themselves down early 6-0 and at the 16:30 mark answered with a 19-2 run to take a 22-12 lead with eight minutes to go in the first stanza. The Bison only missed two shots during the run and with 24 seconds left opened up their largest lead of the half, 34-16, thanks to a Creamer three-pointer. With 14 points in the first half, Creamer became the school's single-season scoring leader with 632 points, passing the previous record of 619 set by Jen Walz in the 1988-89 season.

The Bison extended their lead to as many as 20 points in the second half before a 15-5 surge from the Midshipmen cut their deficit to ten, 51-41, with just under five minutes remaining in the game. With the score 67-56 and just under a minute to play, the Orange and Blue backed up their statistics as the League's best free-throw shooting team, making five of six down the stretch to win by 15. Creamer scored 18 for her squad and passed off eight assists. Quimby added 16 and Franks dropped in 12 while hauling down eight rebounds.

"I felt like we had had a very good week of preparation going into the tournament and that the team was very focused and ready to just play. I really emphasized to them that we just needed to go out in tournament play and be consistent and do the same things in those games that have made us successful in regular season play over the course of the last two-three years," Fedorjaka said.

"I think our team played extremely well in the tournament. We certainly did not play perfectly, but I think that we took advantage of opportunities and capitalized when we needed to. It was a great weekend for us, and we have been looking forward to a championship opportunity since last year," LeBlanc said.

Creamer and Quimby racked up some hardware for themselves at the annual awards banquet held by the Patriot League the night before the tournament. Creamer was named Patriot League Player-of-the-Year for the second consecutive season as well as being named to the All-League first team. Her award marks the second Bison player-of-the-year honor in the 11-year history of the Patriot League.

Creamer currently leads the League in scoring, averaging 22.7 points per game as well as assists, averaging five per game. Some of the highlights from her spectacular season including winning Patriot League Player-of-the Week honors nine times and becoming the first player in school and conference history to score over 1,500 points as a junior and only the second player in League history to score over 600 points in a season. Her 43 points against Army on Jan. 16 in Davis Gym was the second-best scoring performance in the country this year and Creamer has amazingly scored in double figures in every game this year.

"The award was an honor, but the only trophy that really means anything to myself and this team is the Patriot League championship trophy and that is our main goal right now. We don't want this run to end," Creamer said.

Quimby was named to the All-League second team and made her fourth straight appearance on the conference's All-League team. She becomes the first player in Patriot League history to be named to the either the first or second team all four years. She will leave the University third on the school's all-time scoring list and is one of only three players in League history to score over 1,500 points and grab over 800 rebounds.

The Bucknellian Editorial

Bucknellian reports news in objective manner

In light of recent criticisms and questions regarding The Bucknellian's role on campus and its policies, the Editorial Board finds it necessary to clarify our newspaper's purpose to the campus community.

Like any credible newspaper, The Bucknellian strives to educate the campus in a non-biased and objective manner on all campus issues, and to make sure that those issues are what students should know.

The newspaper also provides a forum for opinions and letters. It is important to understand that in order to remain impartial The Bucknellian cannot accept unsolicited submissions.

The Bucknellian is not a public relations outlet for student organizations, and in a similar manner, is not one for the administration, faculty or staff. There are already several means in which to directly publicize and advertise including email and newsletters.

The six sections of our paper are in contact with a total writer base of about one hundred students who report on campus and community events. We encourage article suggestions, which may be assigned to a writer if we, as students, determine it newsworthy.

All organizations on campus engage in worthwhile activities, but we simply cannot cover every campus event. We strive to provide for the general well being, addressing student organizations and other University departments, as well as the Lewisburg community.

It is The Bucknellian's responsibility to report the news in an objective manner. For example, a staff writer may not report about an organization that he or she is involved in.

To further remain unbiased, The Bucknellian is one of the few student organizations not funded by the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) and is not censored by BSG or the administration.

The opinions section serves an open forum for the entire campus, community and University-related individuals, such as alumni and parents. Letters to the editor are strongly encouraged for people to address articles or other issues. A letter can illustrate any point of view, but the Editorial Board reserves the right to cut or deny any letter that we deem inappropriate. To prevent conflict of interest, staff writers and other editors are not permitted to write letters to the editor.

All material in the opinions section reflects the view of the individual author, not The Bucknellian. The Editorial Board also takes a firm stance on controversial issues and presents it in the weekly editorial. Opinion pieces bring issues to the public and opens them for debate.

The Bucknellian aims to inform the University and greater campus community about important events and issues. It is our goal to express these newsworthy events and issues in an objective manner so that our readers can be enlightened and familiar with what is really happening on and off campus.

Potential rush plan unlikely to work

To the Editor:

On March 1, The Bucknellian, detailed a possible plan by the Interfraternity Council to cap future pledge classes at 30 members. The intention is to help struggling fraternities boost membership numbers. Three fraternities exceeded the proposed cap by a total of nine members in 2001. Now let's make the very generous assumption that these nine individuals, after being rejected by the fraternity of their choice, would still want to be members of the Greek community.

Let's make the even more generous assumption that these nine members would distribute themselves evenly among the three most struggling chapters. That would give each fraternity a whopping three extra members, hardly enough to make a difference. The far more likely outcome is that these nine individuals, if deciding to join fraternities at all, would join one of the four houses with pledge class numbers between 15 and 30. So while this plan might benefit a few houses, it would almost undoubtedly not help the chapters who need it.

It was suggested in The Bucknellian article that "rush candidates would be aware that fraternities have very limited space and that it may be difficult to gain a bid at their first-choice fraternity. Hopefully, they would thus be more open-minded to other fraternities." The truth is that candidates already realize this; the risk of not getting into your first-choice house has always been an issue.

Using the 2001 numbers, this policy would affect nine candidates—that's less than four percent of the total number of new fraternity members. The fear of falling into this four percent would not change the mindsets of rushees. In fact, it would likely have the opposite effect. With fewer spots available, candidates would be even more likely to spend all of their time at their first-choice house. The fear of spreading yourself thin by visiting too many houses would be exacerbated by the tighter competition for those 30 bids. Large chapters would be forced to extend bids only to the most interested candidates. To not do so would risk having a class far smaller than 30. Candidates who go through rush with an "open mind" and visit a variety of houses are likely to get cut.

While some changes to the rush process (i.e. forcing rushees to visit all houses, removing the 80 meal bid cap for struggling chapters) might be helpful in fighting the growing disparity between fraternities, capping pledge class sizes at 30 is not one of them. This new practice will unfairly penalize thriving houses and do nothing to help the struggling chapters.

Biased research from living wage critics

To the Editor:

I feel I must respond to the distortions contained in Tom Elliott's '03 column on the living wage. First, Elliott reports the work of the Employment Policies Institute as "nonpartisan." In reality, this institute is a right-wing think tank, and to suggest that its research is unbiased is a clear distortion.

Second, Elliott argues that increasing the minimum wage will inevitably lead to job losses, and he cites a California study which purportedly demonstrated that an increase in the minimum wage led to job losses. This is a misrepresentation of the facts. The study Elliott cites was a hypothetical estimate of what might happen under certain conditions. It was NOT a study of the actual effects of an increase in the minimum wage, as he reported. Most studies of actual increases in the minimum wage indicate that raising the minimum wage does not adversely effect employment.

Third, Elliott implies that low-wage workers don't need a raise because many live in households with incomes above the poverty line. While it is certainly true that some low-wage workers do come from families that don't earn poverty-level wages, it is also true that 54 percent of low-wage workers are the major earner in their families and more than half of minimum wage workers live in households that earn less than a living wage. So, just because the benefits of a living wage might spill over to a few middle class kids doesn't mean it isn't a crucial policy to pull a large number of families out of poverty.

Finally, Elliott suggests that living wage advocates don't have a good grasp of economics. Elliott's reliance on biased research and his neglect of the empirical research on this topic make it clear that he is the one who is lacking in basic knowledge on this topic. We need a clear, open, reasoned debate on this topic, rather than distortions and empty rhetoric.

Ultra-sensitivity created by administration

To the Editor:

I don't think any of you realize how ashamed I am of my own school. I now get to graduate this university in May knowing that what was once the greatest experience of my life is turning into a complete embarrassment.

I am referring to all of the "possible bias incidents." I think this administration has gotten way out of line and is turning into a type of ultra-liberal thought police. I am scared now to voice an opinion that may differ from the popular view, on the off chance it might offend someone, and I end up in front of a dean, or worse yet, a forum of angry students calling for my head.

Hating someone for the color of their skin is ignorant, and educating people is a fine goal, but by creating this mania built on paranoia, you are promoting an atmosphere of ultra-sensitivity that will do more harm than good. My best friend is Chinese. But apparently I am not allowed to SAY that since, well, technically, he is Chinese-American. Wait, I mean, Asian-American. Perhaps "American-born displaced person of the Pan-Asianic persuasion" might be better. That way, I'd be sure not to offend ANYONE who happened to overhear the way I talk about MY friend.

I think what has been going on around this campus is ridiculous, and I now seriously doubt the intelligence of the administration currently in charge of this university. When the dean of students tells me to my face to dress up as Ted Danson over Whoopi Goldberg because I am white, or that reciting Martin Luther King Jr.'s speeches is "not advised" because I am not black, I get nervous. I am not allowed to celebrate civil rights simply because I am white?

I am not the only one that has raised problems with the decisions surrounding these issues. However, the responses my friends and I have gotten from both University President Steffen Rogers and Dean of Students Richard Ferraro regarding our concerns have been extremely short, and have not addressed any of the issues we raised. Our concerns have simply been ignored. Vice President for Student Affairs Charlie Pollock did not take the time to respond to me in any way. If this type of attitude continues, the administration runs the risk of alienating a significant portion of this campus. Whether or not they are worried about this remains to be seen.

Environmental disputes illustrate Bush's biases

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

One of the many advantages the second Bush White House team has enjoyed since last fall's disasters has been the public's unity of purpose. In many ways this has been positive. However, the White House has taken advantage of this situation to push their pro business and anti-environmental agenda. The nationalistic unity and patriotic spirit they have encouraged at every opportunity enabled the White House handlers to push forward and de-emphasize initiatives and programs. That practice would have been unpopular and unsuccessful without the sea-change of events of last September.

The lawsuit against the Vice President for the disclosure of information about the Cheney Energy Task Force would have been a larger embarrassment without the attacks. Apparently, some in the Environmental Protection Agency are embarrassed. First, the Bush campaign picked Christine Whitman, former governor of New Jersey, to head the Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) to mollify the moderate wing of the Republican Party and have worked hard to gut her initiatives repeatedly since her arrival. From global warming to pro-business decisions on drilling in the arctic, it has effectively made Whitman look the fool while polishing its resume for additional campaign contributions for the re-election in 2004. The effect of this is negating Whitman's future presidential candidate within the party for the foreseeable future and has frustrated many good people at the EPA.

Two weeks ago a top EPA official was quoted in the New York Times as he announced his resignation that he felt the administration was determined to weaken environmental rules. Eric V. Schaeffer, the director of the Office of Regulatory Enforcement for the last five years asserted that the White House was working to undermine the agency's efforts in general and work favorably for industrial polluters. The White House has weakened enforcement on factory upgrades of anti pollution control equipment saving industry billions and has interfered with his ability to file lawsuits to force these installations. Shaeffer stated, "The White House proposals would turn narrow exemptions into larger loopholes." The election of the Bush team to the White House has encouraged companies that have previously agreed to install pollution curbing equipment to refuse to do so since January, feeling they have a lenient enforcer in the White House.

Where does this leave us as Earth Day approaches? An administration that needs more proof of global warming during the warmest winter on record. We are left with a general public driving gas guzzling SUV's at a greater percentage than ever before and no regulations to increase gas mileage in sight.

The EPA being gutted from the inside by an anti-environmental White House through its intimate relationship with the oil companies. The loss of many good regulators and litigators at the EPA that will continue to leave in frustration. The Cheney Task Force on Energy is being protected by the White House in a constitutional battle over executive privilege in the federal court system possibly for years. While our forces are fighting a seemingly eternal war that is complicated because of our addiction to oil. The ongoing Enron scandal may or may not implicate the White House; or why else would the White House guard the transcripts of the Cheney meetings so closely?

We should ask Whitman and Shaeffer what they think about the EPA as Earth Day 2002 approaches? Shaeffer says that Whitman is doing some pushing back at the White House on these matters. He states the it will define her tenure within the administration. These are important issues to her since she gained national acclaim on environmental issues in New Jersey. We all should watch closely since environmental policy will increasingly be mirrored in foreign policy now and in the future. Ask the soldiers that are dying in Afghanistan right now who dying for our right to drive energy wasting SUV's. We must realize what we do as individual energy consumers really matters. Be sure to have a good Earth Day by remembering the actual cost of our lifestyles. The politicians in the White House understand this truth very well and are getting their rewards from that knowledge.

Locking Horns

Has the University become too politically correct?

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

At last week's student leader forum, a "question" was posed to the attendees: "Given that the facts indicate that this campus has a climate that makes people feel unwelcome, unwanted … what do you think has gone into creating this climate?"

What a presumptuous, thoughtless question. The "facts" indicate no such thing. Or better put, maybe people feel unwelcome. That doesn't mean they are.

Look closely at the recent incidents that have fed the perception that our campus harbors widespread prejudice. There was the black face incident, admittedly ugly but unintentional and isolated that has been addressed.

Since then, what has happened to make anyone feel "unwelcome or unwanted"? There was the "incident" wherein an Asian student was supposedly tailed on his way back from the Selinsgrove mall. That incident tells us absolutely nothing about this campus' tolerance and enlightenment. There is no proof he had violent intentions for the Asian student. There is nothing to indicate that his hypothetical animus would be rooted in a racial prejudice. The fact that anyone—especially the learned people running this school—would see fit to label this as a "possible bias incident" worthy of concern, is a real head-scratcher.

What else has happened? There was the swastika drawn in the Langone Center bathroom—the work of a non-Bucknellian. We've also seen the Campus Climate Survey, which supposedly proved that our campus has problematic attitudes towards gays and lesbians—at least, that's how it was reported. But the survey actually showed no such thing. It showed that many FLAGB&T members feel that there's some sort of problem. It does absolutely nothing to show that their feelings spring from any sort of verifiable reality or situation. Their perceptions, however sincerely felt, should not be gospel. They should not trump the fact that there is no actual evidence of improper campus hostility towards gays.

It's not surprising that Friends of Lesbians and Gays (FLAG) members view Bucknellians as insufficiently tolerant; take a poll of National Rifle Association (NRA) members and see if they think the American gun owners' rights are being respected.

Whatever comes from the Committee for Campus Diversity will almost surely be excessive, I don't think the University really wants to start forming its policies on the basis of student "feelings" that have absolutely no grounds in reality. But if it insists on doing so, I've got a grievance I'd like to report.

I am a conservative, and I often feel that my professors don't give my point of view a fair shake in class. My beliefs have been denigrated on numerous occasions, and that's just not right. In fact, it's harassment.

Honestly. I feel harassed. I really do. And I demand action. Give me four A's and we'll call it even.

You see the problem?

If there is ever actual proof of widespread prejudice among this student body, we can and should deal with that. Such proof has not yet surfaced. Everyone take a deep breath. This campus is doing just fine.

As part of the Lesbians, Gays, Bisexuals and Transgenders (LGBT) office staff, I helped with updating the Friends of Lesbians and Gays & Bisexuals, Transgenders (FLAG&BT) website where bios of the members were put up. I thought it was simply a way to personalize our image to the campus, however I was surprised to learn that some students found offense to the term heterosexism and the way it was used in one of our member's bios.

What was most surprising was to learn that they found the term offensive when listed as something disliked by one of our members. Apparently the students took it to mean that our member disliked all heterosexuals, which was not at all the case. This is shocking to me because heterosexism refers to any societal attitudes that denigrate any non-heterosexual behavior in some way. It would be equivalent to someone finding the term racism offensive and castigating someone for hating it.

The issues faced by the Committee for Campus Diversity (CCD) are primarily about rights. If what they do leads to a violation of rights and the freedom of people to express themselves then we have not made any progress. Also, the atmosphere of the campus seems to be changing in the sense that some people feel that the ways they may express themselves are now going to be scrutinized. In this instance, no one's rights were violated, and the students have hopefully learned the definition of heterosexism so they will not continue to take offense to it.

Nevertheless, we must recognize that even what may be forms of expression to one group of people can violate the rights of another group. In the black face incident, two students were (arguably) expressing themselves, but they did so in a way that denigrated the physical features of all peoples of African descent because the historical background of black face affected how their expression was interpreted.

Interestingly enough the students said they were ignorant of the historical background of black face similar to the way other students were ignorant of the definition of heterosexism. This suggests to me that what is probably more necessary than the blame cast on the CCD is rather the education and communication between these various groups on campus. Thus far, both education and communication have been stimulated by what they are doing as everyone knows the atrocities of black face (and hopefully know the meaning of heterosexism) and communicate their concerns.

Within this community we also have to understand that if we are to truly be the family everyone continues to say that we are, then we would only become stronger through the differences among us. This is not the case when people will fight for everyone's right to have offensive remarks (that were only jokes) on their homepage but not stand against someone using the word "gay" as a derogatory remark in casual conversation. The committee is also beneficial because it is heightening our sensitivity to such issues which in the past have alienated many people and helping to fulfill that promise of being a family, one which we sometimes forget the University ever made.

Political-correctness is focus of racism discussions

Campus dialogue appears to reflect belief that only 'oppressed' are victims

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

Recently, there's been a lot of talk about racism on campus; but ironically, the campus continues to be refreshingly lacking racism. What has caused this recent need to address "bias-related harassment" through forums and the like? The answer, unfortunately, is politics—not acts of racism, discrimination or intolerance.

By now, everyone on campus has been made aware of the repeatedly exacerbated "Black face Incident" that occurred last Halloween. While obviously reckless, it remains obvious that the act was not committed under bigoted or malicious intent. Yet it has been manipulated in such a way that transforms the incident into a vehicle exhibiting the dire need for the enactment of campus-wide reforms.

A brief tangent comes to mind: senior year at my high school, around five of my black friends dressed up as white kids for Halloween ("white-face" and all). It was probably one of the funniest things I remember, and the students (of many races) all appreciated the humor of it as well. So what casts that incident as a comical joke, while that of the Williams sisters is a damning call for racial awareness?

The answer is the race and identity politics that have single-handedly driven the era of political correctness and the multi-culturist movement that has engulfed college campuses; although they are arguably one in the same. Under the banner of multiculturalism, we are taught that differences of race, ethnicity and gender are to be treated as "identities" that are not only indissoluble, but morally preferable to our sense of E Pluribus Unum as Americans.

This University does not believe in the principles of a colorblind society, nor does it uphold the image of an E Pluribus Unum nation. Instead, they would rather dwell on every instance of something that could (unintelligibly) be remotely construed as racial/bigoted. The highest goal of the Committee on Campus Diversity (CCD) is not to create less discrimination, but rather, to fashion an environment where identity-related topics are not even allowed to be discussed, as accepting them as anything other than morally-equivalent, is intolerable.

For example, racial and sexual politics are essentially no longer allowed to be discussed in any light other than what the CCD favors. Using the word "gay" (except in its most obvious context) has now become all but illicit. This, an overly stringent response to yet another "incident" in which the word was jestingly used on a student's website in reference to one of his friends, who, was similarly unphased.

Politics, acting as the driving force for a campus utterly devoid of anything that could in some arcane way be claimed to be of offense to another, has become painfully obvious.

According to a joint email from Dean of Students Richard Ferraro and Vice President of Student Affairs Charlie Pollock '70, "We really must make a determined effort to avoid prejudiced and biased expressions, regardless of intent." And Glyne Griffith, associate professor of the English and co-director of the Race/Gender Resource Center, explained through his comments in The Bucknellian last week that sanctions should be levied upon students regardless of their intent, so long as one is able to claim to be offended. Under such a system, the proverbial floodgates would be opened for harassment accusation season.

That is, of course, if you subscribe to the same left-leaning orthodoxy that these professors do. If not, you might as well keep your trap shut. In an incident that was clearly more bigoted and discriminatory in nature than the "gay" comment several students pleaded to Ferraro and Pollock about a website that caused them grief and offense. On FLAG & B's website, a student-member lists among his dislikes, "bourgeois [sic]" and "omnivores." It is assumed he meant, 'bourgeoisie' or 'middle-classes.' Don't check your email for the campus-wide alert of another 'bias-related harassment' case quite yet; because I am faithfully predicting that these complaints will continue to go unanswered. This kind of mentality only exists for victims whom the multi-culturist left improperly rank under the category of "oppressed;" members of the "oppressor" category (whites, bourgeoisie, meat-eaters etc.) don't share these rights. I have complained, being a member of both the groups this student openly disdains, yet I doubt Griffith will be demanding sanctions upon him anytime soon.

In the most unnerving development to date, Ferraro let it slip during the forums about the "black face incident" that some faculty are pushing for speech codes—an unashamed disenfranchisement of students' constitutional rights. The same people, who were burning American flags in protest of Vietnam; gleefully celebrating their First Amendment rights, are now looking to curtail the rights of their critics by imposing a list of language that would be disallowed on campus. This comes from their pompous conviction that their side of the debate is the only one that matters because they (unjustly, in my opinion) place themselves upon the highest moral pedestal.

Perhaps the CCD should be renamed, "Committee in Charge of Enforcing Political Correctness on Campus" and the administration should begin to provide answers to the many who have expressed concerns, or at least treat them equally under the "no bias allowed" campus policy. Better yet, drop all of this and only place interest in real acts of discrimination.

Saudi peace plan vital to American security

By Gretchen Schrock
Senior Writer

Is it not a wondrous feeling when the light bulb turns on in your head and you formulate an original and thoroughly interesting idea? You perceive yourself as the most intelligent and cultured human being on the earth and that everyone will stare in amazement as you explain your newest invention. Everyone disregards the apparent flaws in your reasoning, instead pondering on the various of its implementation.

This situation is comparable to the recent developments in the Middle East in which Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia devised an extraordinary concept to quell the ongoing violence in and around the state of Israel.

Though his idea—the Arab world offering full normalization of relations with Israel in exchange for its withdrawal from all occupied territories—is not entirely novel, it is being greatly welcomed by a majority of countries as an innovation in that it is being presented by the richest and most influential state in the Arab sphere and the hallowed home of Islam's two most sacred shrines.

"I wanted to find a way to make clear to the Israeli people that the Arabs don't reject or despise them. But the Arab people do reject what their leadership is now doing to the Palestinians, which is inhumane and oppressive," said the prince to Thomas L. Friedman of the New York Times.

Furthermore, he is expected to ask the entire 22-nation Arab League to agree to this offer at its summit meeting in Beirut on March 27 and 28.

This endeavor presents exciting opportunities for Israel and its neighbors by providing an avenue through which some level of relative peace might be attained. However, many officials in the Bush administration originally interpreted the idea as a public relations ploy by the Saudis to polish their tarnished image in the United States, and a route leading to dangerously high expectations because the Arabs would never follow through and the Israelis would never agree. Secretary of State Colin L. Powell categorized the Saudi notion for peace as one of some "minor developments that we might be able to work on," according to the New York Times.

Now, as the peace proposal circulates among the international press and various political institutions, the White House is amending its opinion by labeling Prince Abdullah's suggestion an "important step." The serious acceptance of the United States of this invitation as a valid move in the direction of permanent peace is the deciding factor in any further action regarding the crown prince's proposition.

"If the United States assumes the primary role, it will give the process great credibility and effectiveness," commented Prince Abdullah to Time magazine, "If the U.S. has no desire to contribute to this, it should let others do it."

Unfortunately, the present administration seems uninterested in the tensions in the Middle East. It would rather pursue the elusive Osama bin Laden and his Al-Qaeda henchman in the rugged mountains of Afghanistan than acknowledge that the Middle East peace process, which has been deadlocked for months, is in serious trouble without U.S. assistance. A continued lack of involvement by the American government in the Israeli-Arab conflict will perpetuate the presumption that the administration wants to keep these issues in the background in order to better arrange its plans to oust Saddam Hussein.

In other words, the United States is more interested in pursuing its own agenda than considering the needs and desires of other countries, which will undoubtedly lead to a stalled peace process or none at all. A probable consequence of this reluctant stance for significant involvement is growing anti-American sentiment among the Arabic public, which will increase the attraction of extremist groups and the threat of global terrorism.

President George W. Bush and his advisors must realize that the Saudi proposal is central to peace not just for Israel, the Palestinians, or the surrounding countries, but also for the American people. We reside in a globally integrated community, in which positive and negative events in one region have the ability to influence the successes and the failures of another. Whether they want to recognize it or not, as Ahmed Aboul-Gheit, the Egyptian ambassador to the United Nations, declared in an New York Times article, "Now it is the moment of truth."

The 'reality' of dating

By Maren Johnson
Opinions Editor

Reality television is the new soap opera. Everyone knows that someone is going to contract a brain tumor and need a transplant that can only be given by the patient's long lost twin who turns out to be the patient's fiance. Boring. Now in reality TV, that's unpredictable. Life isn't scripted, and lately it has become quite a popular gimmick. Perhaps the best example of reality TV is the genre of "reality dating."

One might think that dating is reality, but not in the way that network big wigs have packaged it. I have to confess that I actually watch these inane programs, but I have a sneaking suspicion that I'm hardly alone. You know the shows I'm talking about: "DisMissed," "The Fifth Wheel," "Elimidate," "Shipmates" and even "Blind Date." They combine all the elements of reality game shows—competition, cattiness, spontaneity, someone to cheer for, and someone you pray will lose—with a twist of sex and some exhibitionism thrown in for good measure.

I realize that my time could be better spent doing something for the good of mankind, or at least reading book, but I'm not entirely sure that these shows are completely without merit. One thing I noticed is that some of the reality dating shows feature occasional episodes with gay contestants duking it out for attention. I have to admit that, sadly, I don't have much personal experience with gay culture. The fact that these shows are making an attempt to be egalitarian in their representation of young singles is highly commendable. It brings gay dating closer to the mainstream and hopefully gives viewers the opportunity to see that dating is dating, no matter who it is.

On the flip side, however, I cannot say that these shows more often than not, make me embarrassed to be a woman. The stunts that some of the female contestants pull in order to win the date make me cringe. Though not so much unlike a Saturday night party here, the skimpy clothing, flashing body parts and throwing oneself at a man are the unfortunate representations of women seen on the shows. In fact, I never knew there were women that catty in the world until I discovered reality dating TV.

Of course, all the shows switch up their contestants and give the men an opportunity to make fools of themselves as well. One recent episode of Elimidate featured a guy knocking over bar stools because he didn't get chosen. Gee, where can I find one like that?

Maybe these programs aren't doing any favors for people in their representations of human nature, but we cannot forget that at their core, they are only entertainment. At least they are equal opportunity—making women, men, heterosexuals and homosexuals alike look shallow and stupid for the benefit of ratings.

Fighting intensifies in Afghanistan

By Kim Spigelmire
Staff Writer

In their largest attack on Taliban forces since mid-December, U.S.-led forces began an offensive in the Sha-Kot Valley in eastern Afghanistan on Saturday. The international army is mainly comprised of troops from the United States and Afghanistan, but includes soldiers from Australia, Canada, Denmark, France, Germany and Norway. The offensive's purpose is to encircle and cut off a group of Taliban and Al-Qaeda fighters who have entrenched themselves in the Sha-Kot valley, to the south of Kandahar. Fittingly, the operation has been named Anaconda.

The attack has spurred the fiercest ground fighting of recent weeks. As of Tuesday, eight U.S. soldiers have been killed and over 40 have been wounded. Ground forces are gradually closing in on the remaining Taliban fighters, who have been regrouping in the caves, bunkers and other hideouts of the valley for the past several weeks. The allied troops are being supported by B-1 and B-52 bombers, F-15 fighters, AC-130 gunships and Apache helicopters. They dropped more than 270 bombs and missiles in the first two days of fighting. The United States utilized a thermobaric bomb for the first time in combat. The 2000 pound bomb sends a blast of pressure and incinerating heat through a cave system, killing any person inside.

The initial U.S. plan entailed using Afghan ground forces to close in on the Taliban, while U.S. troops would cut off escape routes and capture those who fled. However, the Afghan forces were beaten back by the fierce Al-Qaeda and Taliban fighters. The United States assumed control of ground fighting on Tuesday. It marks the first time that the United States has taken the lead role in ground combat fighting.

The survivors seem determined to fight to the death. The majority of Al-Qaeda holed up in the mountain valley are foreigners who were not able to return to their families and farms after the Taliban lost control of Afghanistan. It is speculated that many of the 200 to 400 remaining forces come from the Arabian peninsula, Uzbekistan and even Chechnya. They are armed with rocket-propelled grenades, mortars and Kalashnikov rifles. The difficult terrain has been advantageous to the Taliban and Al-Qaeda fighters, who have greater knowledge and experience in the Afghan mountains. U.S. military officials suspect that the group has communicated with other bands of fighters by sending runners. However, no overarching military strategy is visible at this time.

The battle deaths and difficult fighting have not deterred President Bush from continuing the United States' efforts to capture the remaining Taliban and Al-Qaeda forces throughout Afghanistan. If anything, they have strengthened his resolve. In a statement Tuesday, President George W. Bush said, "...I am just as determined now as I was a week ago, or three months ago, to fulfill this mission. And that is to make sure our country is safe from further attack." Although supportive of the current effort, Democrats remain wary of committing U.S. forces to a task they may not be able to fulfill. In an interview with the New York Times, Tom Daschle reiterated his concern about expanding the war beyond Afghanistan's borders.

U.S. troops in Afghanistan fire an 81mm mortar at enemy positions.

It remains uncertain for how long the United States has known that the Sha-Kot Valley stronghold has been active. Villagers in the town of Zormat, 15 miles to the north, report that 1,000 Taliban and Al-Qaeda members were living in Zormat until late December. Many of the men and their families were Saudi Arabian, Egyptian, Yemeni and from other Gulf states. They moved south at the villagers' request.

Several factors make Zormat an area attractive to the Taliban members who wished to rebuild their forces. Its geographic location, between Kabul and Kandahar, made it accessible to operatives fleeing both cities. Being only 60 miles from the Pakistani border, the town may have served as a thoroughfare for soldiers who planned on fleeing Afghanistan. A smuggler's haven, Zormat provided an environment amenable to those who sought to conceal their identity. Also, the trade links between the town and Saudi Arabia provided a diversified population which the Taliban may have been trying to use in its regrouping efforts.

These same factors may have been part of the reason the United States did not strike sooner, assuming that it knew of the Taliban presence in the area. Many have speculated that the American military distrusted information received from sources in the area. Warring tribal leaders have provided unhelpful, and possibly false, information concerning Taliban whereabouts in the past month. The United States has had to become increasingly skeptical of its information sources. Self-interested warlords may be acting to preserve their own local interests by leading U.S. forces into areas held by their competitors, rather than Taliban forces.

The United States' operation has been in the works for several weeks. Military officials presented Bush with a battle plan before commencing the attack. The intent was to overcome the coordination difficulties which compromised the effectiveness of the Tora Bora attack in early December.

In Tora Bora the United States relied more heavily on Afghan troops, seeking to keep U.S. forces off the ground. While the Afghanis were enthusiastic about liberating Taliban controlled villages, they were less willing to chase fleeing Taliban and Al Qaeda operatives who sought to escape over the Tora Bora mountains into Pakistan. Some Afghan soldiers reportedly took bribes from fleeing Taliban officials in return for safe passage over the border. The Afghanis were also reticent to search abandoned Taliban caves.

Bush imposes tariff on foreign steel

New duties will range from eight to 30 percent on certain imported steel

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

On Tuesday, the Bush administration announced a new plan that would impose up to a 30 percent tariff and new quotas on steel being imported into the United States. According to Fox News, under the new plan, eight to 30 percent duties will be placed on steel being imported from a list of countries that includes Brazil, South Korea, Japan, Russia, Germany, Turkey, France, China, Australia and the Netherlands. However, the Bush administration was careful to keep the plan within World Trade Organization (WTO) regulations by exempting developing countries. North American Free Trade Agreement (NAFTA) members Canada and Mexico are also exempt from the new duties. The plan, which is aimed at helping a desperate U.S. steel industry, has already drawn sharp criticism from the European Union [EU] as well as other nations.

Under the plan, which is to last three years, President George W. Bush can alter the level of tariffs at any time depending on the change in the financial status of American steel companies. According to Fox News, Bush urged U.S. steel companies to use these "temporary safeguards" to restructure their industry to be more competitive with international steel companies. Since the Asian financial crisis in 1998, 31 American steel companies have filed for bankruptcy. Industry lobbyists blame these bankruptcies directly on the cheap steel imports from overseas. Foreign officials claim that the bankruptcies are due to the U.S. steel industry's failure to modernize and the relative strength of the U.S. dollar. According to CNN, the dollar has risen nearly 23 percent in the past two years against the Euro. U.S. Trade Representative Robert Zoellick told CNN, "The American steel industry faces a turning point. We believe the actions the president is taking today can restore the strength and profitability of this very important American industry." According to CNBC, some industry analysts believe the new safeguards will catalyze a wave of consolidation within the American steel industry.

Fox News is reporting that prior to the announcement, steel industry lobbyists had lobbied hard for the highest possible tariffs against imported steel. The industry had wanted the Bush administration to impose 40 percent tariffs, but the President needed to weigh the concerns of both the steel producers and the steel consumers, who will likely be hurt by the new duties. Bush also stopped short of endorsing a $10 billion bailout that the industry has been pushing for recently.

European Trade Commissioner Pascal Lamy chastised the move by the Bush administration, and told CNN that the European Union will be the foremost victim of the new tariffs. He called the move a major setback to the world trading system, and stated that, "The EU will of course launch an immediate complaint in Geneva (at the WTO) against this clear violation of WTO rules and we will take whatever measures are necessary to safeguard our own market."

South Korea also said that they would challenge the tariffs before the WTO.

The European Union has also started to take measures to protect its own steel markets in retaliation of the move by the Bush administration. The move is also to alleviate fears that companies, which formerly dumped excess steel in the U.S. markets, will begin entering the European steel markets.

According to CNN's Todd Benjamin, the decision by the Bush administration is largely political. "He has got an election coming up and he wants to look good to the voters." Benjamin cites the fact that annually, the United States consumes 20 percent more steel than American companies are able to produce, and that other U.S. companies actually need the steel imports to survive.

Business & Politics Editor

Switzerland has finally decided to apply to join the United Nations (U.N.), ending centuries of neutrality in world events. By a vote of 55-45 percent, and a closer vote of 12-11 among the cantons (administrative divisions), the Swiss have entered into the world body. This is quite a contrast to the last time such a referendum was offered to Switzerland. Back in 1986, 75 percent of the voters rejected membership, reflecting fears of having to choose sides in the Cold War that would end traditional neutrality. With this fear gone, the Swiss, a nation of seven million, have chosen to have a voice in the world body. The vote leaves the Vatican City as the only nation not a member of the U.N.

> "It will lead to the weakening of Switzerland"
> —Cristoph Blocher, Swiss People's Party

The government, headed by President Leuenberger, encouraged the referendum. Billionaire Christoph Blocher, head of the Swiss People's Party, who warned that Swiss neutrality would end with this referendum's passage, vociferously opposed it. "It will lead to the weakening of Switzerland," Blocher said. "Freedom and the rights of the people will be limited, and neutrality will at the very least be deeply damaged." Of the cantons, the more populous, industrialized and French speaking districts voted for the referendum, the more rural, German speaking districts against it.

Switzerland already had donated hundreds of millions of dollars to the U.N.'s non-political work. In addition, Switzerland is already very much involved in the work of the world. The headquarters of the World Health Organization, as well as Europe's U.N. headquarters, as well as the headquarters of other world organizations are located in Switzerland, and Switzerland is very much involved in the business of the world, being a large producer of precision instruments, machinery and a leading banking nation.

It is presumed that the United Nations will accept Switzerland's bid for membership when it next meets.

Bison yield to Crusaders' charge

Junior Brian Werner's clutch three-point shot brought the Bison to within two points in the Patriot League semifinal game.

The men's basketball team suffered a 64-57 loss to rival Holy Cross (17-14) in the semifinals of the Patriot League Tournament. The loss marked the end of an up-and-down season for the Bison (13-16). The ninth semifinal in 12 years for the Bison also marked the end of the careers of seniors Bryan Bailey '02 and Peter Santos '02.

"[This] loss does hurt. We went into the game expecting to come out with a victory. Unfortunately, we came up a little short," Bailey said.

The Bison led by as many as six points in the opening frame before ending the half only ahead by a point, 27-26. The Crusaders scored the last five of the half to provide the margin at intermission.

The second half started fast, with both teams alternating the first 11 baskets. Fourteen lead changes and seven ties occurred in the period, with neither team going up by more than two possessions until Holy Cross went ahead 58-54. That was their largest lead of the game since it was 6-2.

With 4:25 left on the clock, Chris Rodgers '04 gave the Bison their last lead of the game with two shots from the foul line. The Crusaders got the lead for good just a minute later when they connected on a 15-foot jumper. Tim Szatko, who had 19 points and 11 rebounds, scored to provide the 58-54 margin. The Bison turned the ball over on the ensuing play and allowed the Crusaders to grab two offensive rebounds before being forced to finally foul with 34.6 seconds left in the game.

Holy Cross connected on one of two free throws to increase its lead to five. Brian Werner '03 then drilled a long three-pointer to cut the deficit to two for the Bison at 59-57 with just over 24 seconds left.

The Orange and Blue called an immediate time out, but received a huge blow after their bench was called with a technical foul. Ryan Serravalle sank both technical foul shots for Holy Cross to increase their lead to 61-57. The Crusaders added two more points from the line after being fouled on the ensuing inbounds pass.

Both teams struggled against great defense the entire game. The Bison shot an even 40 percent from the field while the Crusaders managed to hit only 38.3 percent of their field goal attempts. Perhaps the biggest difference in the game was the foul shooting. Holy Cross attempted 37 from the line, sinking 27 of them. The Bison hit 14 of 21.

Boakai Lalugba '03 and Werner led the Bison with 14 points and two steals apiece. Antario Glover '05 put together a solid game, totaling three points, four rebounds and three assists. Matt Quinn '03 was efficient from the field, scoring eight points.

"Antario performed extremely well in our two tournament games. He was a huge spark for us in both games, keeping us in the game with his hustle plays and offensive rebounding," Bailey said.

Bailey, who led the squad with over 17 points per game this season, finished his career by tallying 11 points and a team-high six caroms off the glass.

"The loss definitely doesn't characterize my career. Overall, I believe I had a good career," Bailey said.

The loss against Holy Cross came a night after the third-seeded Bison (13-15) defeated sixth-seeded Army (12-16) 70-59 at Show Place Arena. It was the third time this season that the Bison beat Army and it improved the Herd's all-time Patriot League Tournament record to 13-11.

Lalugba had a monster game, tallying 20 points and grabbing 13 boards. He, along with Bailey, combined for 33 points and 18 of the team's season-high 47 rebounds. Both were earlier named to the All-Patriot League First Team.

"It feels good to be named to the first team again. It just demonstrates that hard work does payoff in the off-season," Bailey said.

Army struggled immensely from the field, as they managed to connect on only 32.7 percent of their shot attempts. Their leading players, Chris Spatola and Charles Woodruff, were held to two field goals apiece. Spatola was only two of 14 from the field. The Bison shot much better than their counterparts, hitting 42 percent of their field goal attempts.

The game was sluggish, as both teams combined to score 28 of the final 38 points of the ballgame from the foul line. The Bison only hit 26 of 44 from the line the entire game. Only five field goals were scored in the final 11:53.

Werner scored the final basket for the Bison, a put-back with 2:36 left. The basket increased the Bison's lead to 64-53 and capped a 6-2 run after Army pulled within 58-51 with 6:08 remaining. The largest lead for the Orange and Blue was 15 points at 53-38 after they pulled off an 11-4 run.

The Bison led 32-25 at intermission but led 40-27 after the first 2:47 of the second half. Glover, who was making his first career start, scored a key basket in the early second-half run.

Werner finished the game with 12 points and eight rebounds. Bailey scored 13 points and snatched five off the glass. Glover chipped in with six points and seven rebounds. Rodgers added two steals.

Controversial foul halts Bison

Last-minute technical foul on Head Coach Flannery destroys comeback effort

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The semifinal game of the men's basketball Patriot League Tournament was stained with controversy as Bison Head Coach Pat Flannery was assessed a questionable technical foul with just 24.8 seconds remaining and the Bison down by two. Holy Cross ended up hitting both free throws, and eventually went on to win the game 64-57.

With 34.6 seconds remaining, the Bison grabbed a rebound off a missed Holy Cross free throw and brought the ball up the court. When Brian Werner '03 drilled a deep three-pointer to bring his team to within two, Flannery called a time out to get his defense prepared to stop the Crusaders and hopefully get another chance on offense to win the game.

But during the timeout one of the referees approached Flannery and told him that he was not afraid to call a technical on him this late in the game if he complained about any calls. According to Flannery, when he and his team backed away and went back in the huddle he was given a technical foul.

"It was totally unjustifiable in every way, shape and form," Flannery said.

The Bison never got a chance on offense at the end of the game as Holy Cross controlled the ball the rest of the way.

"You can't give a technical foul with that little time left in a semifinal game," Werner said. "It almost seemed like the referee instigated it."

The Bison saw three of their players foul out of the game while Holy Cross, who is known for its physical play throughout the League, had no players forced to leave. For Bryan Bailey '02 it was a difficult way to end his career with the Bison. With eight minutes remaining Bailey was knocked hard to the ground and came up limping. But the senior co-captain persevered through his injury and finished out the game until he fouled out at the very end.

"If I were a referee I'd let the game be decided by the players," Bailey said. "But we can't do anything about that now."

Down by only two points with 24.8 seconds left, the Bison would have been able to foul Holy Cross after the inbound pass and would have had a chance to win the game. But the technical foul ended any hope that Bison had.

"There was a lot of play left," Flannery said. "It would have been nice to see what would have happened, but I'm not beating myself up because there's nothing I can do about it. We never say that a call beat us."

Bison sweep as Cornell hides under rug

The baseball team took all four games against the Big Red machine in the home opener

By Meghann Chipko
Staff Writer

The Bison baseball team surged ahead in its chilly home opener against Cornell with a 4-0 sweep over the Big Red. A mix of smart pitching and fiery offense led the Bison to improve its record to 4-6 after the weekend.

Cornell, playing in its first game of the 2002 season, fell to 0-4.

The pitching was strong in game one. Cornell's Brendan McQuaid threw six innings, and although he earned the loss, he gave up only three hits. Zack Allen '03 started for the Bison, earning his first win of the season, and Gregg Farmery '02 finished off the game, allowing only one hit.

The Bison got off a quick start in the first game on Saturday at the West Field when Eric Fishman '02 hustled to third off an infield single, a stolen base, and a wild throw in the bottom of the first. Pete Wolf '04 increased the lead to two when he reached first on an error and scored the Bison's second run of the inning after B.J. Batterson's '03 single to centerfield.

Cornell scored their only run of the game in the top of the fourth.

Allen went on to pitch seven innings with four strikeouts - one in the bottom of the fifth off Cornell's Erik Rico with two outs and runners on first and second. Allen recorded his first win of the season.

In the sixth, Batterson popped up and Larry Sheetz '02 scored on a sacrifice fly pushing the Bison ahead 3-1.

Farmery finished up for the Bison, as he pitched the last two innings, allowing only one hit and picking up the save.

Saturday's nightcap proved to be an exciting game offensively for both teams. In the top of the first, Cornell went up with a 3-0 lead over the Bison's starting pitcher Kevin Burns '03.

The Bison struck back when Fishman's two-run homer brought home Sheetz in the bottom of the first, closing the gap to 3-2.

Burns and Cornell's Chris Schutt both pitched three straight shutout innings thereafter.

In the top of the fifth, Cornell's Baysinger hit a two-run homer to give the Big Red a 5-2 lead. However, the Bison retaliated immediately, scoring two runs themselves when Chris Cipollini '04 ran home from third off Sheetz's infield single and Fishman scored from third after Wolf reached first on a third-strike wild pitch.

The Bison went on to score the winning runs in the bottom of the seventh with three hits resulting in two runs, giving the

The Bucknell indoor track and field team finished its season just how it started it—on a high note. This past weekend, a select few traveled to the Reggie Lewis Track and Athletic Center in Boston, Mass., to compete in the IC4A and ECAC Championship Meets. These meets bring together the best male and female athletes from all of the Division I schools on the Eastern Coast.

Greg Costello '02 made it to the finals on Sunday in the 3K. He ended up with a ninth place finish with a time of 8:21.32, missing All-East honors by less than one-tenth of a second. In addition to that, the 4x800 and distance medley relay both performed exceptionally well, both teams missing the finals by less than two seconds. Other athletes qualified for individual events, but the coaches decided to really concentrate on the relay performances.

The performance displayed by the women's distance medley relay was the highlight of the meet for the Bison. Comprised of Stephanie Bango '02, Rehana Lanewala '05, LaTonya McSwain '02 and Kelly McConnell '02, the relay team placed sixth overall at the meet and met the provisional qualifying standard for the NCAA Championship. Finishing in a time of 11:35.10, the women destroyed their own school record by 15 seconds.

"It was a pretty big honor just to hit that standard. We brought up the idea to the ladies at the beginning of the year and they

CECILY CAIRNS CLASSIC CORNER

When Ruffians leave us too soon

In the infield of New York's historic Belmont Park, far beneath the sharp green and white colors of the New York Racing Association flag, immersed in the deep soil and wrapped from head to toe in white canvas, lies a horse—a filly, to be exact. She would have turned 30 this April. If she were around today, she'd be a scraggly, pensioned ex-broodmare, stumbling blissfully around some plush field in Kentucky, while tourists peer at her over pristine white fences, hoping to get one last look at the greatest racemare in history, before time steals her away.

But time stole Ruffian away far too soon for anyone to get a last look. On July 6, 1975, she should have been relaxing in her stall, surrounded by flashbulbs and adoration, bathing in the glory of the most important victory in horse racing's storied past.

Instead, she was buried at dawn, surrounded only by those closest to her. There was no press, no celebration, no smiling—only a solemn silence hanging in the soft early-morning overcast of fog.

Racing fans never got a chance to see her grow old. The only image of her is as she was the day before she died: unequivocally perfect. She was the perfect racing machine—a huge beast, all highly chiseled muscle, wrapped in a glistening black coat. She had perfect conformation, with every tendon and muscle in her long, powerful legs, it seemed, constantly taught and ready to project her into flight.

Illustration by Cecily Cairns

Her stride was graceful and devastatingly easy. Ruffian didn't gallop; she glided. She wasn't just perfect to watch; she was perfect on paper, too.

Ruffian raced 10 times. Ruffian won 10 times. She set or equaled a track or stakes record in every single one of those efforts. Not only was she in front at every finish line she crossed, she was in front at every single call—every fraction—of every single race in her career. Her average winning margin was over eight lengths.

She had a perfect heart, too. She wouldn't settle for anything but the lead at any point in a race, regardless of who was challenging her or what kind of fractions she had to set.

It never occurred to anyone that such a perfect creation might unknowingly self-destruct.

After she won her 10th start, after she had soundly defeated every filly there was to beat, there was really only one foe left for her—the best colt in the country, Kentucky Derby winner Foolish Pleasure.

Female horses are inherently slower than colts by the time they are three years old, so Foolish Pleasure could have blown the doors off most fillies in 1975. But Ruffian wasn't like most fillies. She wasn't like any filly the sport had ever witnessed.

So Belmont Park arranged a match race, a one-on-one, no holds barred dogfight between the two champions. July 5, 1975. One mile and one quarter. $350,000 in prize money. The ultimate boy-versus-girl showdown. In an age where Americans were always on a social tirade, a race of this nature was more than just a sporting event.

"They'll burn from the start," ran the headline in Sports Illustrated's preview of the race, and for a little under a half of a mile, that's exactly what they did. They burned the first quarter in 22 1/5, with the filly on the lead—exactly where she'd been in the other ten races of her career.

It would go down as a "one" underneath the quarter-mile mark in her past performances, in perfect accordance with the other neat columns and rows filled with that simple number. But that was the last fraction she would ever set. In the next column over, underneath the half-mile split, there sits only an asterisk.

And then it's all blank.

No one really wants to rehash what happened on the backstretch that day, but it's a memory that won't fade for anyone who's seen it. The filly was in front, showcasing that fabulous stride, gliding along, when everything just collapsed—the sesamoid bones in her right front leg, to be specific.

As thousands watched on national TV, she leaned into the bit and kept toiling down the stretch, thrusting her 1,125-pound frame onto the shattered leg for a few more strides of the futile chase. By the time she finally veered to a halt, the ankle buckled under her like a ragdoll.

Any other horse would have been dead on the spot, but this was Ruffian—they had to at least try to save her. It didn't matter that bones jutted out of the black fur of her ankle, or that to say she had a 10 percent survival chance would have been optimistic.

It didn't matter that her terrified eyes begged for nothing but escape from the pain. To destroy her would have been to destroy one of God's most perfect creations, and no veterinarian wanted that on his conscience.

But in the end, after hours of surgery, she left them with no other choice.

The loss turned out to be the deathblow for a sport that had once enjoyed immense popularity. Horse racing lost its pride and glory, ironically, about a month after track and field had lost its biggest star. But fate is never concerned with timing when it snuffs out our brightest flames.

The premature death of an athlete is invariably harrowing, like an unfinished work of art—like the creation of a masterpiece brought to an abrupt halt. The loss of a Ruffian or a Steve Prefontaine, a Roberto Clemente or a Thurman Munson, leaves only our imaginations to complete the creation.

Sometimes it's best not to try. The unpleasant demises we witness don't vanish when we imagine them otherwise. Some creations are simply fated to remain incomplete, fated to end this way.

But still, masterpieces do not fade in their incompletion.

After all, perfection, even in an unfinished state, is still perfection.

Women swimmers place eighth at ECAC championships

By Adam Yukelson

Members of the Bison men's and women's swim teams traveled to the University of Pittsburgh this past weekend to compete in ECAC Championships. With 165.5 points, the women's team finished an impressive eighth out of 31 schools. The Bison men's team totaled 73 points and earned a 15th place finish among 30 schools.

For the women, Jamie Flick '05 continued to perform well as she placed third and rewrote her own school record in the 200 breast in 2:21.13. Darby Golino '03 and Daniela Faas '04 also swam well for the Bison, as the duo finished ninth (2:05.66) and 10th (2:08.99), respectively, in the 200 back. Faas' time was the sixth-fastest in school history. Jackie Feinthel '05 put on a solid showing in the 200 fly, taking 12th place in a time of 2:08.91.

The ECAC Diving Championships were also held this weekend at the University of Delaware. Freshman Adam Freeman placed fifth in the three-meter diving with a score of 413.60, third-highest in school history, in what he called the meet of his life. Freeman attributed his success to the more relaxed atmosphere of ECAC's.

"There is not as much pressure to perform. ECAC's are just a chance to do well for yourself and have some fun," said Freeman, who also won the one-meter diving yesterday with a score of 289.45, a mark that bettered his former school record.

Reflecting back on the season, Freeman was pleased with the way the team came together towards the end of the season and during Patriot League championships.

Sarah Petcavage '04 also competed in the diving championships, and placed 14th in the one-meter with a score of 182.85. Petcavage placed fifth in the three-meter and reset her own University record with a score of 352.55.

The Bison's 400 free relay team of Abby Weaver '02, Golino, Jennifer Cancro '04 and Lynne Ashenfelter '04 came in ninth in 3:52.72. This performance came just over a week after Golino and Cancro were named to the All-Patriot League Honors. For Golino, this was her third All-Patriot League selection in three years.

The men's and women's swimming and diving teams are very pleased with their season in which many records were rewritten, and many expectations were far exceeded.

Softball squad ignores poll

By David Cohen
Staff Writer

The Bison softball team has been projected by the Patriot League coaches and sports information directors to finish fifth for the 2002 season. The Bison completed the 2001 season with a 19-26-2 record overall and an 8-12 mark in the Patriot League.

Although the team's initial ranking is nearly in the cellar, shortstop Meredith Gill '03 has ignored what she views as merely a number.

"To be perfectly honest I don't think the team really cares that much about the preseason poll," Gill said. "They just base it off how people did last year and how many seniors each team lost. Our team has improved a lot since last year and nobody setting the preseason poll knows that yet. They will find out when the season starts next week."

Pitcher Brandi Porter '03 has in a sense used the ranking as a motivational tool.

"Of course being ranked fifth is disappointing, but in a way it could be an advantage," Porter said. "No one expects us to be competing for the PL title, but we're going to surprise a few people."

Bucknell tallied 18 points, trailing the projected first place Lehigh, which is the three-time defending regular season champ, by 32 points. Lehigh also received ten first place votes.

"Lehigh is a good team because they are solid all around," Porter said. "They're not unbeatable; we beat them last year. We're practicing so that we can be consistent in all aspects of our game. We need to be solid and play to our potential."

The Bison have three all-league selections on the roster returning from last season, including outfielder Jenna Demetriades '02, Porter and Gill.

"I (have) tried to step it up from last year, and consistently do a little bit more each time I pitch or lift," Porter said. "The team in general is really working hard this year, thanks in large part to the senior leadership, so it makes it much easier to give it your all, which is really all that you can do. If everyone continues to give 100 percent this year, we're going to have a very successful season."

"The entire team has really worked hard all winter in the weight room and gym during indoor practices to make sure we are ready for our hectic season," Gill said.

The Bison commence the 2002 season over spring break, competing in the Rebel Spring Games in Orlando, Fla., on March 10th. They will battle at least ten teams on the trip before returning home to host Delaware on March 20.

ended up being in the top 7.6 percent in the country. We were nervous going into the meet because in order for us to achieve what we set out to, we needed all four people to PR all in the same day. They each had to run their best time which is very difficult to do," Assistant Head Coach Joseph Klim said.

With 312 schools across the country having Division I track programs, it is not easy for Bucknell to compete. They are constantly up against much larger institutions that give athletic scholarships and have better facilities. For anyone to qualify for the National meet, they have to be about 16th in the entire country.

This year, the Bison had three athletes hit provisional standards. Noel Powell '04 finished 27th nationally in the long jump, just four inches short of going to the National Meet.

Stephanie Bango '02 was a provisional qualifier in the 800-meter run, but ended up too low on the national list with a ranking of 41. Finally, the Women's distance medley relay finished 24th on the national list, just missing the National meet by six spots.

With a Women's Patriot League Championship Title, a second place League finish for the men, many national qualifying times and a plethora of personal best achievements, the Bucknell Indoor Track & Field season can come to a close.

The team will be back in action on March 16th, as they kick off the upcoming spring season.

St. Francis didn't have a prayer in 15-0 rout

The women's lacrosse team demolished first-time competitor to make strong start

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

While the Bison women's lacrosse team began its 26th season as a woman's varsity sport this past Saturday, its opponent, St. Francis (Pa.), was competing in its first collegiate women's lacrosse game. These two teams met at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium in hopes of opening this season with a victory. In such a match of expertise versus inexperience, it is easy for the superior team to drop to the level of its opponents, but the Bison stood tall.

Bucknell	15
St. Francis (Pa.)	0

They mixed their passion for the game, their amazing skill and their love for one another into a 15-0 victory over St. Francis. The game looks to pave the way for a very successful season for this team.

"I think that the team played exceptionally well considering that the competition was not extreme. It is the games like this that really show what a team is made of. We stayed disciplined and composed for 60 minutes of play. We kept our heads in the game and really concentrated on our skills and plays," Jen Gianis '02 said.

The Bison received a stellar game from attack Suzanne Raffaele '03 who had a hand in eight of the Orange and Blue's 15 goals, scoring four and obtaining the assist in four.

Also aiding the Bison's victory was Laura Nuss '04 who matched Raffaele's four goals. Nuss also netted the final goal of the game with five minutes left after receiving a pass from Amy Lee '05 capping the Bison's victory at 15.

Captain Melissa Montefusco '02 made her senior-year debut taking part in four goals, scoring one and handing out the assist in three.

"The game against St. Francis was a good first game for us because it allowed us to gain some confidence. It also allowed us to work on our offensive plays, passing in the midfield and patience on defense," Montefusco said.

Goalkeeper Nicole Kallis '03 registered eight saves gaining the first ever shut out in the team's 26-year history. "What a great day for Nicole. I am glad that I was able to help her to get a shut out in goal. That is a rare occasion in lacrosse," defender Erin Curtis '02 said.

"I thought our team as a whole played very well together, it is my hope we will continue this even in tough games. If we can stay together as a team through the good and tough times, I think it will help us come out on top in games," said Head Coach Barb Jordan.

"We have 23 athletes which are all capable of contributing this season," Gianis said. "With such a heavy lead heading into the second half, all members off the team had the opportunity to contribute to the victory, in which they proved how capable they were."

"I thought we did play well on Saturday, but the true test of what kind of team we are is coming up in the next few games. Saturday gave us a good chance to run a number of different plays and to work on our discipline as an attack. I'm hoping this will help us down the road," said Jordan.

Down that road the Bison host one last game this Wednesday against Mount Saint Mary's before they take the road for a series of four games over Spring Break. They face Columbia, Wagner and Fairfield before starting Patriot League competition on March 16 here in Lewisburg versus American at 1 p.m.

"Overall I am so proud of my team. I think that everyone handled themselves with poise and wonderful sportsmanship. We are ready for our next game this Wednesday and look forward to the tough competition that we will face over spring break," Gianis said.

Men's lacrosse falls to Harvard 10-9

The Bison came out strong and led Harvard 4-3 at halftime in Christy-Mathewson Stadium, but the 25th-ranked Crimson battled back and the scoreboard read 10-9 at the end of play. The Bison are now 0-2 as they continue their difficult opening stretch.

The beginning of the second half was the turning point of the game as Harvard scored its first of five goals in the third quarter in the first minute of play, tying the game at four. Wes Fetchet '04 helped the Bison regain the lead as he cut through defenders and took advantage of Harvard's man-down situation. But it was the last lead that the Herd enjoyed as Harvard never looked back.

Harvard	10
Bucknell	9

"We failed to produce on the offensive end, which gave Harvard chances with the ball," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said.

The Bison actually out shot the Crimson 37-25 in the game, but were unable to capitalize.

"For the most part we were getting good shots," Jamieson said. "But when we get opportunities like that, we have to convert."

Some of the offensive chances were wasted because the Bison shot the ball too quickly instead of waiting for a breakdown in the defense when they could get a better shot.

"Our major problem was that we didn't stick to our game plan," Fetchet said. "We needed to be more patient and make better decisions on offense."

It was critical that the Bison make the most of their possessions because they weren't getting as many as they would've liked to. The team has had trouble all year getting the ball when it's loose. Harvard won 13 of the 24 faceoffs in the game, and won the ground ball category 45-34.

"Sometimes our players are waiting for their teammates to go get the ball instead of getting it themselves," Jamieson said.

The problems with communication that the Bison are experiencing are typical of any young team that hasn't played together very long. This year's squad includes several first-year students who have not played in college games, and have not been able to gel with the rest of the team.

"Right now our defense isn't comfortable together," Jamieson said. "As they play more, they'll begin to get familiar with each other and make fewer mistakes. Right now we need to make up for that on offense."

Offensively the Bison had their bright spots as Rob Lane '03 drew first blood in the first 50 seconds of play. Chris Cara '05 had two of his three goals in the game in the first half, helping the Bison gain the lead going into the locker room.

"In the North Carolina game I felt like I didn't play up to my potential," Cara said. "This game I tried harder to get better shots, and I was able to put some of them in."

But the Bison shooting percentage decreased in the second half as many open shots sailed over the goal or were saved.

"In the third quarter Harvard won the battle of possessions, and the few opportunities that we had we couldn't bank in," Cara said.

The Orange and Blue refused to quit as they scored two goals in the final 90 seconds of play, but the Crimson proved to be too much in the end.

"I felt like overall we were probably the better team," Jamieson said. "But that's meaningless because we didn't prove it on Saturday."

The schedule for the Bison gets no easier as another national powerhouse, the University of Pennsylvania, comes to Christy Mathewson this week. The Bison know that they can compete and win against this challenging stretch of games played against the top tier teams in the nation.

"I don't make a schedule saying that we're going to lose any games," Jamieson said. "I think we can beat everyone."

Bison a 6-5 lead.

Farmery finished off the pitching, ensuring the Bison's second win of the season.

On Sunday the Bison won 7-6 and 6-2 to finish off the four game sweep.

In the first game, at the top of the second inning, Cornell's Flint Foley, Jim Jackson, Justin Depalo and Justin Irizarry teamed together offensively over the Bison starting pitcher R.J. Grant '03 to give the Big Red an early 4-0 lead.

"Last weekend, every time they did something we answered," Head Coach Gene Depew said.

Over the next three innings, the Bison scored five runs with five hits to take the 5-4 lead by the end of the fourth. Wolf hit two key singles and Cipolloni ran home in the fourth to take the lead for the Bison.

In the top of the sixth, the Big Red came back and reclaimed a 6-5 lead. Meanwhile, the Bison decided to replace Grant with Farmery during the inning, who went on to gain his second win of the season.

"He pitched in three of the games, got two wins and a save, pitched a total of five innings and didn't give up a run; he has yet to give up a run this year," Depew said.

After Cornell's final offensive streak, the Bison rallied from behind to take the lead in the bottom of the sixth. Sheetz hit a game deciding two-run, two-out double.

Later that night the Bison put away another seemingly easy victory. The game started off slowly offensively; both starting pitchers Sean Magee '02 for the Bison and Erik Rico for the Big Red did not allow a hit in the first three innings.

Cornell went on to score at the top of the fourth, but the Bison quickly answered with Austin Barrett '05 hitting an exciting two run single bringing in Batterson and Campagna. In the fifth and sixth, the Bison took a 5-2 lead when successive runs were scored by Fishman, Batterson and Stoll.

Magee was relieved in the final inning by Cory Nadler '04 who maintained the Bison lead and went on to finish off the win.

"It was a good weekend for us, obviously it feels good to win but, we also played better then the last time out and actually played better Sunday then we did Saturday," Depew said. "We kind of got some life in our offense this weekend; we had guys come through with hits in key situations, good defense and also a good pitching effort."

The team looks forward to a spring break trip to Florida where it will match up for seven games throughout the week against very competitive teams such as Indiana and Northern Illinois.

"We play every day, which gives us a chance to do a little more experimenting with our lineup. Hopefully after spring break we can declare ourselves midseason ready," Depew said.

The Bison dominated Cornell pitchers, tapping them for 22 runs in four games and bringing their record to 4-6.

Whatever happened to cooler heads prevailing? Whatever happened to calming exercises? Maybe a part of pre- and post-game warm-ups should be yoga meditation, just to relax some of these people and realign their Feng Shui.

Athletic competition is difficult. You put your body on the line, risk your mental and physical health and you do it, ideally, for fun. That's right, the "f" word. Unfortunately, that aspect of the game has gotten lost in recent years. How many highlight clips do you see of guys smiling in the dugout as opposed to people kicking over water coolers and screaming at their teammates. Of course, the smile shots don't count if the team is winning, because that's just gloating.

As Kobe Bryant sat on the sidelines for warm-ups, serving the first game of a two-game suspension for a fight with Reggie Miller, Shaquille O'Neill stretched the lanky Bryant's jersey across his own 350-pound frame in tribute. Anyone getting a Chris Farley "fat guy in a little shirt" vibe here? Apparently, after Shaq was suspended for sucker punching Chicago Bulls center Brad Miller, Bryant had some Bangladeshian sweat shop workers stencil Shaq's jersey number into his size 12 Nikes to show solidarity.

And as nice as it is to see teammates looking out for one another, what if fellow Ravens star Jamal Lewis slung a machete across his back and strapped a broad sword to his uniform belt in tribute to Ray Lewis' murder settlement? Oh wait, Lewis was innocent. Bad example. Well what if OJ's teammates had ... strike two.

This week the Red Sox fired their GM Dan Duquette and their manager Joe Kerrigan because they were bad for workplace morale. Players weren't happy playing for them. Player morale is the reason why Bobby Bonilla retired, Carl Everett was shipped off faster than the new line of Pokemon thermoses and Rickey Henderson has played for more teams than Ellen Degeneres in a mid-life crisis.

But more and more audiences are finding it hard to cool themselves off, let alone the players on the field. We like the scuffles on the pitcher's mound—we egg them on. We tell the batter that the pitcher said something rude about his mother last night. It's "normal." If you doubt me, then check out the footage from the Cleveland Browns game where the refs made a bad call and the fans wound up tossing beer bottles onto the field. The next day, the president of the team applauded their chutzpah and admired the crowd's intensity for the game, hoping the players could match it.

I want to be entertained. I don't want to sit around watching a bunch of lethargic meatheads half-ass a game while my chili dog with extra relish gets cold ... that's not exciting for me. Let's see some blood. I want to see bench-clearing brawls that result in suspensions and fines and make me nervous to run to the bathroom to relieve myself of the aforementioned chili dog in case I might miss something.

Let's see ... do I want players more intense than they already are? What would that entail? More intense than the pedophile Mark Chmura, scheming murderer Ray Carruth or the coronary-prone Bill Parcells? If you ask me, I think our athletes are plenty intense—and so are the fans.

Why do you think people watch pro-wrestling? I'll be honest; I think it's the worst abomination on the athletic community since the Yankees, but it's not without its own social significance. It confronts what every other sport is ashamed to admit ... the absolute brutality of athletics. It doesn't shy away from its violence.

I'll admit, sitting in my seat in section "hell," row FU, seat 666 in West Wherever, U.S.A., watching a sporting event, I want to be entertained. I don't want to sit around watching a bunch of lethargic meatheads half-ass a game while my chilidog with extra relish gets cold ... that's not exciting for me. Let's see some blood. I want to see Jorge Posada spitting in an umpire's face again. I want to see bench-clearing brawls that result in suspensions and fines and make me nervous to run to the bathroom to relieve myself of the aforementioned chili dog in case I may miss something. I want broken limbs and great water cooler conversations the next day.

You tell me which conversation is more exciting: "I saw the BoSox game last night. Pedro pitched a good game, it was fun," or "Dude, did you catch the BoSox fight last night? It was so awesome. I was there. Pedro hit a guy and cracked his skull open and you could see the blood oozing from under his helmet and then the umpire charged the mound and started wailing on Pedro's arm so that he'd never pitch again ... it was GREAT!"

Notice, at that point, it's no longer a BoSox "game," but rather, a BoSox "fight." Roger Clemens is notorious for this type of attitude and he is praised for it. He hurls a broken shard of bat at Mike Piazza in the heat of the moment and he and his fans REVEL in it. Joe Torre stuck by him too, which is good of a manager, but is that the kind of behavior we want to instill in future youths of America? Are we trying to demonstrate to these kids that if they don't make par four at Sinker's Mini Golf Course that they should throw the ball into on-coming traffic, use their putter to smash all the windows and take down the clown and that obnoxious smirk?

What happens after a player has finished his career, goes back to his three-winged mansion and settles down for some Montel Williams? What happens when he can't vent his anger on the field anymore? Or even to players who are still playing that can't settle down. You remember, that competitive desire that we instilled in him that day we told him to turn the opposing team into quadriplegics, what do those players do when they're off the field?

But are we going to stop cheering? No, of course not. Are we going to suggest that Clemens not pitch inside to Mike Piazza? No, that's ludicrous. So what are we going to do? How do we end this cycle of glorified violence? Well I'm banking on the fact that by the time they start fighting on Jerry Springer, cooler heads will prevail ... right? Hello? Anyone?

NCAA Tournament gets under way

It all begins in late September—325 Division I basketball programs begin play with hopes of an upcoming NCAA Tournament appearance. After Sunday, only 65 will have realized their dream. Most of the time, the teams deserve the bid, but sometimes someone will sneak in to ruin the party.

Of the 65 teams, 34 receive at large bids, while the remaining 31 receive automatic births for winning their conference tournament. For 15 of the smaller conferences, their tournament winners will be the sole representative in the NCAA tournament. It's either win, or go home—only the champion will receive the automatic birth.

NATIONAL

Rob Schmuecker

Any team in that conference can win the tournament—all it needs to do is win three or four games in as many days. A team that has five wins all year is given the same chance as one that has won 20 games. While it may be highly improbable, the chances of the worst team in the conference receiving an automatic birth are far from impossible.

This year, Siena has on the Cinderella slipper, as the Saints enter the NCAA Tournament with a losing record of 16-18. The emotional value of such an occurrence—a 12-18 team winning four straight games to receive an unlikely birth—is incredible. It reminds us why the NCAA Basketball Tournament is the ultimate competition- any team can win.

But logically it makes no sense. A championship tournament, no matter what sport, should be made up of only the best teams—the teams that have been the best for the whole year. One of the top three teams—Rider, Manhattan or Marist—should be representing the MAAC and not Siena. They were more consistent over the course of the whole season, not just over a four-day span. The Saints were, at best, mediocre all season long and yet they have been awarded an opportunity to play against the nation's best teams in the NCAA Tournament. It just doesn't seem logically right.

If the NCAA wants to award automatic births to conference tournament winners, why not have a season-long tournament of some kind? Why play the regular season at all?

The Butler Bulldogs are wondering the same thing. They began the Horizon Conference Tournament as a number one seed after a 12-4 conference record; 25-4 overall. But after a huge upset loss to Wisconsin-Green Bay (8-20, 4-12), the Bulldogs are on the bubble. Because their RPI ranking is so low, they may not make the tournament—even though they have a 25-5 record and were clearly the best team in the conference.

All of this would not be a big deal if these smaller tournaments would get the respect that they deserve. Never will these "One-Bid" tournaments receive more than one birth in the NCAA Tournament because the conference is thought to be inferior. Maybe so, but the fact remains that conference tournaments are not totally fair. As with Butler, one bad night can cost a team the chance to fulfill its dreams.

In light of the ongoing practices, I propose a new rule: each conference receives at least one birth. If the top seed fails to win the tournament, then it should receive an automatic birth along with the conference tournament winner. This new rule would ensure that the best team during the entire season would receive a reward for its hard work, while not taking away the added "Cinderella Element." Teams in the lower half of their leagues would still have a shot at a tournament birth and thus the tournament would not lose its appeal.

Some might say that this is impossible to implement because of the set number of teams that participate in the NCAA Tournament. Critics may argue that giving a league like the Patriot League another potential representative takes away from the Big East. My response is that maybe the Big East doesn't deserve to have seven teams make the tournament every year. If this is such a big deal, then expand the NCAA Tournament a little more. We are always thirsty for more.

Other critics may say that, knowing that they will receive an automatic birth regardless of what they do in the conference tournament, top seeds will take it easy and not try. My response is that coaches would not allow their players to overlook a so-called meaningless tournament. Every coach strives for his team to be the best it can be—it would like to be a well-oiled machine by the time the tournament starts. Any extra time to work certain things out in a game setting is invaluable.

If this can't solve the problem, why not just get rid of conference tournaments? The Ivy League has survived since its inception without one, and this year was the most exciting finish ever. With Penn's win over Princeton on Tuesday night, the Ivy league had its first ever three-way tie. Because Yale, Princeton and Penn all had identical conference records, they will be forced to play in a two-game playoff to determine the winner. This is how conference tournaments should work—the best two or three teams battle for the chance to dance in the NCAA Tournament. No matter how exciting a two-game playoff may be, the conferences will continue to stick with their current system in the future. There is a better chance of hearing Rey Ordonez and "good hitter" mentioned in the same sentence than there is of ESPN throwing away all of the money it receives from Championship Week. Conference Tournaments are all about money and television ratings—because people want to see David beat Goliath, they are more willing to tune in.

Because of this, the NCAA will never be able to have a championship tournament with only the best teams. In the pros, only the teams with the best records make the playoffs. Only the most consistent get a shot at the title. While I am firmly planted on the Gonzaga bandwagon for what they have done in the past few years, the fact remains—we deserve only the best teams competing for the title. Until this happens, I will feel slightly cheated.

Athlete of the Week

By Scott Kloss

Vicki Quimby '02

Vicki Quimby '02, our athlete of the week, exemplifies the true team player. Quimby, a six-foot forward on the Lady Bison's basketball squad, brought her best effort against rival Army last Sunday.

In an 83-67 victory over Army, she became the University's all-time career rebounding leader with 893 in total, while adding 20 points to seal Army's fate.

"We all played really well throughout the weekend. Bucknell cannot win without all 15 players playing together! We won both of those games as a team, which has been our biggest strength this year," Quimby said.

As for her rebounding record, she recognizes that it would not have been possible without a solid supporting cast.

"It feels nice to be in the record books, but I had no idea that such a goal would be obtained until a few games ago. I am just glad to be a part of such an awesome team," Quimby said.

With the victory, the Bison have achieved their second-straight 20-win season, tying the school record for wins set a year ago. The Bison (20-9) travel to Worcester, Mass., to face the four-time Patriot League Champion Holy Cross on Wednesday. This is a daunting task, but Quimby is focused on winning.

"We will all need to play our best to win this game. The two best teams in the league going head to head, you cannot ask for a better championship game. If we come out and play like the true team we have become, no one can take our dreams and goals away from us. The girls are coming together through hard work and determination and becoming a true team. (We are) working always for the best of the whole and not the parts," she said.

When asked about her inspiration to strive for excellence, Quimby looks no further than one of her teammates —Molly Creamer '03.

"Molly, whenever I have wanted to give up or just say 'that's good enough,' you have always been there to make me a better person and teammate. It isn't always in your vocal leadership, but through your actions and I hope that someday I can repay the favor. You have the true heart of a champion. Thanks Molls," Quimby said.

With the season winding down, Quimby reestablished her goals this year.

"My individual goals were to leave Bucknell and to have made a difference in this program. My team goals were to become a true team and to win a Patriot League Championship," Quimby said.

Off the court, Quimby enjoys perusing her elementary education major and history minor.

Club rugby finishes third in EPRU

By Brian Klotz
Senior Writer

Given the sheer number of athletic opportunities available at the University, it's a common occurrence for a non-varsity sport to play, and have no one know about it. There are 28 official varsity sports, 15 clubs sports and more than 30 intramural sports that run through their seasons every year, many enjoying a great deal of success.

The club rugby team finished third in the Eastern Pennsylvania Rugby Union (EPRU) in the fall season, and it just barely missed the chance to move on to the playoffs this spring. With a club that has 30 members and continues to grow, the rugby team has a positive outlook on the spring season and the years to come.

Beginning in the fall, this year's club rugby had only five upperclassmen members, no coach and the relatively small amount of funding that club sports receive. With a large influx of first-year students, however, the team grew quickly. Captain Pete Tulaney '03 was impressed by the interest. "We have an awesome class of freshman this year," he said. "We needed them to play in the fall, and many of them really liked it and stuck with it."

Working with the fairly young team has been a challenge, but the upperclassmen have taken over the job of teaching the skills of the game in the absence of a coach. Returning starters Tulaney, Zack Davis '02, Keon Burley '02, Joe Free '04, Dan Kelly '04, John Roache '03, Colin Swank '03 and Scott Roe '03 all take part in the process.

While early season practices stress learning the rules of the game and drills, the team now runs mostly live scrimmages, working on strategies and weaknesses from previous games. If last week's 22-10 defeat of Lock Haven (one of the best teams in the league) is any indication of the strength of the team, look for continued success throughout the course of the spring.

"We will definitely have an undefeated spring season," Tulaney said. "I think it's pretty realistic we can win the Mayor's Cup tournament later in the season."

"We will definitely have an undefeated spring season, I think it's pretty realistic we can win the Mayor's Cup tournament later in the season."
—Pete Tulaney '03, captain

The schedule for the team lists games for every weekend after spring break, except Easter and House Party. On March 23, the team plans to play a home night game at 8 p.m. under the lights of the mod fields versus Susquehanna. The following two weekends after Easter show away games versus Temple and the Mayors Cup tournament in Philadelphia.

In the spirit of club sports, the rugby team makes sure that everyone gets the chance to play. "We're very democratic about who gets to play," Tulaney said. "Usually it's the people who show up to practice the most, but we put in the people who can help the team win. The way the league is run, there are also B-side games that the non-starters can play in."

Rugby is a relatively popular sport in the Eastern Pennsylvania area. The University team is a member of the aforementioned EPRU, which is a part of the Mid Atlantic Rugby Football Union (MARFU). Every year, teams compete in the fall for a shot at the EPRU semi-final tournament and the winner of that tournament advances to the much more competitive MARFU tournament.

"Rugby is persuaded as a tough guy sport, played by people of college age," said Tulaney. "It's just club, and not an NCAA sport, so everyone at least gets the opportunity to try out for the team."

Although a significant budget cut will prevent the team from getting a coach next year, continued improvement is among the goals for next year's team.

"We will continue trying to make the program more structured," Tulaney said. "We only have three seniors on the team this year and about 70 percent of the team is freshmen, so we have a lot carrying over into next year. I expect our team to be the best in the league, possibly win the EPRU tournament and place well in the MARFU tournament."

Men's tennis romps St. Francis

The Bison men's tennis team traveled to St. Francis for their first dual meet of the season. After a decisive victory of 7-0, the team is preparing for their spring break competition and practices in Hilton Head, S.C.

Bucknell	7
St. Francis (Pa.)	0

The team won all singles points with Co-Captain Alex Davydov '02, at first singles with a scores of 7-6, 6-3, Scott Allen '02 taking both sets 6-4, 7-5, and Joe Menezes '05 came back after losing the first set 3-6 to take the match with sets of 6-2 and 6-1.

Bucknell completely dominated the last three singles positions with Co-Captain Todd Jacobs '03, winning 6-0, 6-3, Gerald DiChiara '05 winning the first two sets with scores of 6-1 and 6-0 and Leland Tien '05, who did not lose a single game, taking the match 6-0, 6-0.

As for doubles play, the team went 3-0, winning one point for the best two out of three, with the combination of Allen and Jacobs winning 8-4 at the first doubles slot, Davydov and Nick Denefrio '05 with a score of 8-5 at the second doubles slot and DiChiara and Tien shut out the third doubles slot with a score of 8-0.

As the first dual match of the spring season, this was not a very good indicator of how the team will fare for the rest of the season.

"Due to the lack of competition that this team presented, it's hard to determine what the team needs to work for the rest of the season," Head Coach Bob Hammerlee said. "I really don't think this team would be able to compete with any of the teams in the Patriot League, and therefore really isn't a good indicator of our strengths and weaknesses at this point in time."

Courtesy of Athletic Communications

Scott Allen '02 took both of his sets as the Bison obliterated St. Francis.

The Bison beat St. Francis in the fall season with a score of 6-1, after losing to them in the spring season of 2001. Although St. Francis only lost one senior from last year, Hammerlee attributes the Bison's recent decisive victory over St. Francis to the amazing rookies, four of whom were on the starting lineup last Thursday.

Over spring break the team will continue to do hard conditioning as well as skill work during their practices in Hilton Head, and will face a challenging schedule with matches against Georgetown University, IPFW, and American.

game, only one had seen the Bison play during the year. Nowhere else in the NCAA would a game of this magnitude have referees involved that weren't familiar with the way one of the teams played.

"To play a Conference Championship game, and to have two referees not know our players is disgraceful," Flannery said.

While the two of the referees had not seen the Bison play, the official that called the technical foul on Flannery lives 30 miles from Holy Cross, and refereees many of Crusaders' games.

"We knew Holy Cross was going to play us physically, so we were trying to play tight but careful defense," Boakai Lalugba '03 said. "But the way the refs were calling it favored Holy Cross' style of play."

Despite their feeling that the officiating was biased, the Bison take full responsibility for the loss, and do not look to hold anyone else accountable.

"We have to go out and play, and we can't do anything about the calls," Bailey said. "We can't blame this on the refs."

The Bison will continue to handle this controversial situation with the class that they pride themselves on having.

"It's a heartbreaker that we didn't get a chance," Flannery said. "But we know there's nothing we can do to go back, and I'm confident that our athletic director will fight for us, which makes me feel good."

Abroad perspective: Semester in France

Koenig visited the famous Magical Mont St. Michel during her time in northern France.

Staff Writer

I came to the University knowing that I wanted to go abroad. To me, it seemed like a core part of the college experience. Hearing the stories of both family members and friends that had gone abroad formed my desire to see and experience another part of the world. Exactly where I wanted to go was still up in the air, although my thoughts leaned towards either an English speaking country or France since I had taken basic French in high school. When it came time to choose which program I was going to apply to around the middle of my sophomore year, the combination of the University having its own program in Tours, France (the Bucknell en France program) and the encouragement of the incredible French teachers I'd had here made the decision of where to go quite simple. France it would be.

The spring semester of my sophomore year flew by, as did the summer, and before I knew it I was being driven to the airport by my parents. The comforting part about my arrival in Tours was that our host families would be waiting to pick us up. But the terrifying reality of that initial meeting was that from that point on, or at least until I saw the other students on the program again, I would be able to speak nothing but French. There was no choice in my household since my host family knew only a few words of English. Although the language barrier was inhibitive at first, living with a host family was one of the best parts of being abroad. Not only was it much easier to learn the language, but I learned so much about their culture and the history of their country as well.

One of the biggest differences I found between the United States and France is that of lifestyle. From what I experienced, they lead much more calm, laid-back lives, taking time to truly appreciate what's around them. Besides the 'haute culture' seen in Paris, the obsession with money and material things, which is a general part of American society, is either very well hidden in France or is just not there. So what are they crazy about? That question can be answered in two words: wine and cheese. Food is an ever-present and very important part of their culture. Food to the French is a way to bring people together, relax and socialize. The five-course, two-hour long dinners I had every single night were a good example of that—not that I'm complaining.

I attended an intensive French language school during the four months I was there. There were only four American students in my class including myself. The others had come from countries all over the world: Mexico, Spain, Korea, Thailand, Taiwan, Spain, Switzerland, Kuwait, Japan, China and Italy. I was not only exposed to just the French culture while I was abroad, but a plethora of others as well. It was truly amazing to see the difference in ideas, ways of life and mannerisms of the other students.

Traveling throughout Europe being both efficient and cheap, we took full advantage of the weekends and breaks. My first trip was a night in Switzerland followed by a week traveling through Italy. The breathtaking views of the Alps rising up behind Lake Geneva was an impressionable start to the trip. Italy was all the good things I had heard about and more. There is an abundance of history, art and food, not to mention the unbelievable beauty of the land. The organized excursions that the Bucknell en France program offers throughout France were also a great way to see the different regions of France which are all so diverse.

The most memorable of those excursions was that to Normandy in northern France. We took a fully comprehensive tour of all the World War II sights and museums in the area. WWII being a subject we had all learned so much about growing up and it being a popular movie theme in the past few years, I felt like I knew a lot about it. Little did I realize how much more there was to learn. But it was not only the facts and stories that were so astounding; it was simply being there. Standing in the American cemetery overlooking Omaha beach where my grandfather debarked early the morning of D-Day was a feeling I will never forget. The beauty of both the beaches and cemeteries dedicated to those who died in the war is so contradictory to what actually happened on those beaches and what the pristine, white crosses actually represent. It was a very powerful trip that gave all of us a greater understanding, and more importantly, a profound appreciation for what happened there, as well as the sacrifices that were made for our country and the freedom of others.

I had heard from many people before I went abroad that when I came back from being abroad I would not be the same person that I was before I left. The way I see it, I did not undergo any extreme changes while away from home, but I did learn things about myself that I never would have if I had not been taken out of my comfortable life here. Self-reliance is one of those things. Although I had a very supportive host family and great friends, there were certain situations where the only person I could turn to was myself.

While in Paris, Koenig visited the Sacre Coeur.

So what am I trying to express in this brief medley of experiences during my time abroad? If you ever have the chance to go abroad—do it. There are very few reasons why anyone should give up the chance at such a rewarding opportunity. The fear of "missing something" is no excuse not to go. Whatever you think you might miss, whether it be friends or experiences, they will both be here waiting for you when you get back. Looking from the outside in at everything you have ever known is a truly eye-opening picture. I feel like I learned more about myself, as well as the world, in my one semester abroad than I ever imagined possible. Being in France sparked a compelling interest in exploring other cultures while, at the same time, it strengthened my identity and pride in being an American.

Domingo uses enthusiasm and energy to coach Bison Girls

Before coming to the University, Domingo danced with the Chicago Bulls Luva-Bulls. Now she coaches the Bison Girls.

By Kelly Korecky
Staff Writer

During her first year as director of Multicultural Affairs at the University, Eloiza Domingo said that one of the most rewarding parts of her job has been working with diverse groups on campus. Domingo is not only enthusiastic and energetic about her involvement with multicultural activities on campus, but she also directs her energy towards helping the Bison Girls, the University's dance team, which performs during halftime of men's basketball games and at other campus events.

Domingo's energy and enthusiasm served as assets when she danced with the Chicago Bulls Luva-Bulls professional squad before beginning her master's of science degree in higher education and student affairs at Indiana University-Bloomington. Since her arrival at the University, Domingo has volunteered her time to work with the Bison Girls, who will be competing for the first time ever in May. Although the captains of the Bison Girls and select members of the team are primarily responsible for choreography, Domingo has contributed choreography, as well as support to the team.

"With her prior experience of dancing professionally, Eloiza has helped us to focus our goals as a team and has given us direction through advice, critique and feedback," said Ashley Price '02, former captain and president of the squad.

Immediately after her undergraduate years, Domingo learned about the possibility of dancing professionally for the National Basketball Association (NBA). Even though Domingo had limited technical background, her energy and enthusiasm were immediately noticeable and she wound up making the cut for the Luva-Bulls out of approximately 750 other dancers. After making the squad, Domingo quickly became immersed in the grueling practices and numerous publicity events for the team.

Although Domingo went on to pursue her master's degree several months after joining the squad, she says that dancing with the Luva-Bulls "was a really good experience. I would encourage anyone who wants to do it, to definitely try it."

Through Domingo's professional experience she has learned that it is so important to love what you are doing.

"If you get out there and you don't love [dancing], the crowd can tell. But, the Bison Girls definitely love to dance, and that's what makes them good," Domingo said. "I've always had a dream of working with a college dance team, so I'm just really lucky that I got a really good group of girls who love to dance. The timing was just perfect."

The members of the squad are also thankful for the energy Domingo brings to the group.

"The experience and enthusiasm that Eloiza has brought to the Bison Girls is immeasurable. She is a great asset to the team and we are very lucky to have her," Co-Captain Louisa Young '03 said.

"Even with her busy schedule, she is always willing to help the team in any way she can. Eloiza's love and dedication for the Bison Girls has not gone unnoticed," Usanee Prasapairan '02 said.

Domingo's energy is a characteristic noted not only by the Bison Girls, but also by the many students and administrators with whom she works.

"Eloiza's energy is a big part of her character, and everywhere she goes she gives off that energy to every single person and everyone feeds off her energy and wants to do better," said Tunde Owolabi '03, president of Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc.

"Ever since Eloiza came here, she has definitely impacted the Bucknell community in a positive manner. She has been the backbone of different multicultural activities on Bucknell's campus, bringing various multicultural events to the community," said Bryan Bailey '02, senior member of Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc.

Domingo's enthusiasm permeates through all the campus activities with which she is involved.

"We were really glad to have her on board. Eloiza is a person with really, really high energy," Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said.

Overall, Domingo feels that the University "is very committed to diversity, multicultural education and just overall multicultural awareness." However, she aims to continue working towards heightening all levels of diversity and awareness on campus through implementation of programs such as a first-year orientation class on multicultural awareness and diversity.

Domingo said her main goal is "to make sure that the thread of diversity is run through every aspect of this campus, so that people understand that diversity is not just on my plate because I'm the director of Multicultural Affairs, but that all professors, staff, deans and students must be aware that diversity touches everybody on this campus in some form or another."

In her time here thus far, Domingo has obviously made an effort to reach out and begin weaving that thread through the University community while spreading her enthusiasm throughout various student organizations.

Vegetation in bloom in the greenhouse

By Josie Cetta

It was William Wordsworth who once said, "Let Nature be your teacher," and Albert Einstein who said, "Look deep into nature, and then you will understand everything better." Both men must have seen some version of the beauty and knowledge on the fourth floor of the Biology Building in the University greenhouse.

Sunlight passing through the transparent, glass windows of the greenhouse highlighted the world of plants, in its glorious shades of green, with every shape and form imaginable—whether found hanging from the ceiling, resting upon a bed of water or growing off a tree. Used mainly for classes and tours, the University greenhouse is open to all those with a curious mind.

> "Anyone who is interested in learning more about plants or is just looking for a peaceful environment to relax is welcome to visit the greenhouse."
> —Mark Spiro, assistant professor of biology and interim director of the greenhouse*

"The greenhouse is a resource available to the entire University community. Anyone who is interested in learning more about plants or is just looking for a peaceful environment to relax is welcome to visit the greenhouse," said Mark Spiro, assistant professor of biology and interim director of the greenhouse.

Each portion of the University greenhouse is adjusted according to the environment each plant is adapted to live. For example, the desert portion is a warmer temperature and receives more sunlight. There are three main ecosystems represented: desert, wetland and tropical forest. Pot labels describe the Latin binomial and family name of each plant.

The rooftop greenhouse begins with plants of the desert ecosystem, known as xerophytes. One may take particular notice in the stems and leaves of these plants, which have a thick coat of water retaining wax and are often fleshy and water-storing. Thorns, hairiness (to keep the plants cool) and prominent ribs are also characteristics of these plants.

Rosette plants, which lack internodes, stem regions between leaves, have two sets of spirals, one clockwise and one counter-clockwise. By looking at a pine cone, or the seeds of a sunflower, one could count the number of spirals and rediscover the mathematical Fibonacci sequence (1, 1, 2, 3, 5, 8, 13, 21, 34, 55, etc.).

The greenhouse also has a wetlands display, including hydrophytic, water-loving plants. One type of hydrophytic plant is the carnivorous plant, such as the Venus fly trap, sundews and pitcher plants. These plants live in bogs that have nutrient deprived soil. They get necessary nitrogen and phosphorus by digesting the proteins of the animals they capture.

Moving along, one finds themselves surrounded by the more familiar vegetation of the tropical forests. Here, above are the vines of a vanilla plant wrapped around a pipe. According to W.G. Abrahamson, a professor in the biology department, over 90 percent of climbing plants occur in tropical rainforests.

From cycads to tree ferns to the epiphytes found in the air, mainly attached to trees to obtain the hard to find sunlight, there is much to be learned. Observe the pointed, drip tips of the leaves on the plants. Absorb the freshness of the atmosphere. Breath the air filled with the citrus smell of pomegranates. Notice that bananas, papaya, and coffee plants are also grown here.

Being that there are hardly any insects in the greenhouse, pollination can only occur by hand, using a paintbrush. Even so, the atmosphere of the greenhouse is that of co-evolution—where plants, such as orchids, evolved to have a close relationship with another species, which, in this case is insects. The beautiful variety of colors, shapes and sizes are the result of this interaction.

Everyone should take an hour out of his time to learn from the splendor of nature. The University offers a number of programs and tours to aid in the process. For more information, contact Flora Eyster, director of the greenhouse, or professor Spiro.

"We welcome volunteers who would like to work with plants and learn about horticulture," Spiro said.

University model for Alderson Federal Women's Prison

By Edward Reilly
Staff Writer

If you ever want to stump one of your friends with a fun piece of University trivia, ask them which prison was modeled after the University. That's right. A prison was actually modeled after the University. Kind of scary isn't it? In the 1920s, Alderson Federal Women's Prison was built in Alderson W. Va., and it was modeled after the University's Georgian architecture. Built in the Allegheny Mountains, it was the first federal prison for women. The History Channel did a series called "The Big House" that included a video on Alderson. The video may be found in the library.

In the early 20th century, prominent women were sent to jail for protesting during the Suffrage movement, and their stories of mistreatment while behind bars helped bring about prison reforms for women. Alderson was designed as one of the solutions. It was created to care for prisoner's needs and to reform. Some of Alderson's famous inmates include Billy Holiday and Tokyo Rose. Alderson was situated on 200 acres of land that was easily assessable by rail, but difficult to escape from because of the mountains. Alderson very much looked like a college.

Women lived in a cottage system at Alderson that was much more homelike than a typical jail or prison. Each cottage had its own kitchen, dining room and typically contained 30 beds. Inmates cooked for themselves and were very self-sufficient. There were 16 two-story cottages with groves of trees in between each. A network of paths crisscrossed the prison just like the University. There were no walls, fences or guard towers at Alderson. Women stayed knowing that to escape meant a much stiffer penalty if caught.

> Women lived in a cottage system at Alderson that was much more homelike than a typical jail or prison. Each cottage had its own kitchen, dining room and typically contained 30 beds ... A network of paths crisscrossed the prison just like the University. There were no walls, fences or guard towers at Alderson. Women stayed knowing that to escape meant a much stiffer penalty if caught.

Alderson Federal Women's Prison was an experiment in women's incarceration. It was meant to retrain instead of punish. There was a regular schedule of work, classes and recreation. Types of work included a farm, dairy, greenhouse and a garment factory. Inmates lined up at least twice a day to be counted when they heard a teacher's bell ring. Unlike the University, everyone was required to attend church. In June 1928, the official dedication of the prison took place. It has been said that it looked more like a college graduation than a prison opening because of the more than 1,000 visiting dignitaries who attended including women's rights groups. Once their time was completed, many prisoners reoriented into productive members of society.

In the early days of Alderson, women were allowed to keep babies they had while incarcerated. There was a playpen kept in storage of each cottage's attic just for this purpose. However, the state eventually decided this was not in the babies' best interests and required they be kept in foster care until the mother was released. A nursery was built, and once a week, mothers could visit there young there. Unfortunately, for various reasons, several babies did not survive and had to be buried at a cemetery at the prison, because the mothers could not afford anywhere else.

Due to what the state considers to be prohibitive costs of upkeep and renovation, the cottage system at Alderson is being abandoned. An 800 person, typical jail building is being constructed to house all inmates under one roof. The past success of Alderson's system is not being questioned just the willingness of the state to pay for it. Alderson had become a society of women where individuals could take pride in themselves and their relative freedom. It is unfortunate that such a success is now endangered.

Women's History Month celebrated

World-wide event promotes womanhood and awareness

By Katy Zachry
Senior Writer

Of 960 million illiterate people in the world, two-thirds are women. Women in the work force are paid 74 cents to a man's $1. Seventy percent of all poverty stricken people in the world are women. On average, women work more than 16 hours a day.

March is Women's History Month. Women from all over the world come together in body and spirit to celebrate womanhood, promote equality and raise awareness of the injustices brought against women. The Women's Resource Center (WRC) has organized a number of speakers, films and panels throughout the month to increase awareness about women's issues within the University community.

> "It is important to promote Women's History Month at Bucknell because women make up half of the population on this campus. We are concerned with women's rights and hope that by raising issues related to gender, it will have an impact on the campus community to do things."
> —WRC Intern Tamanna Hye '04*

"We at the Women's Resource Center put a lot of time into the cause," said Tamanna Hye '04, one of 11 students working in the WRC. She, along with Director Janice Butler, worked with other individuals to plan the events throughout the month.

"There are many organizations and departments that have been involved, including International Students Services, Office of Multicultural Affairs, the Women's Studies Department and the Panhellenic Association," Hye added.

Located on the second floor of Roberts Hall, the Women's Resource Center has been around since 1986 after a group of students and faculty petitioned for a space where they could address their concerns about the treatment of women on campus.

"Women are still not equal to men and we need to address why this is. The Women's Resource Center is a great resource on campus because it brings awareness of women's needs, and it brings up sensitive issues that are not usually discussed on the campus," Hye said.

The office began with only a part-time director and tiny budget and has expanded to a full-time director and secretary as well as close to a dozen student interns. Because the WRC has increased in scope over the past few years, the office can now host bigger events, such as those relating to Women's History Month.

"We've grown a lot, but we have a lot more work to do on campus," said Butler, who has been director since 1988.

Butler, along with Director of the Office of Multicultural Affairs Eloiza Domingo and Professor of Sociology Elizabeth Crespo, co-director of the Race/Gender Resource Center, were three women who participated in one of the organized staff panels. Held on March 5 in the buttery rooms, this panel attracted an all-female audience of an equal distribution between students and faculty.

"The campus has responded very well to Women's History Month. The people who support the Women's Resource Center have been very responsive to the events," Hye said.

The panel on Tuesday consisted of each director talking about a different aspect of women's issues. Janice reviewed the history of Susquehanna Women in Transition (SWIT) and commented on its importance and involvement in the area. Domingo, who is second generation Philippino-American, remarked on growing up as an active and involved leader but being asked repeatedly to suppress this quality. Crespo reviewed the history of International Women's Day, citing that "poverty and violence against women is a good summation of the struggles women have encountered." The audience was then invited to share its thoughts about Women's History Month with the group.

"We encouraged the participants to discuss the role of women from a global as well as local perspective. It is important for us to get to hear from both staff and students," Hye said.

On Monday night, Neesha Mirchandani, from the Afghan Women's Mission, spoke in the forum.

"The turnout was very good for that," Hye said. "I am proud that our events have been well attended and hope that it will bring awareness of women's issues on campus."

As the main speaker for Women's History Month, Mirchandani's program was entitled "Empowering Afghan Women." It was a slide show and discussion about women's conditions under the Taliban and the ongoing struggles faced every day.

"It is important to promote Women's History Month at Bucknell because women make up half of the population on this campus. We are concerned with women's rights and hope that by raising issues related to gender, it will have an impact on the campus community to do things," Hye said.

O'Conner impresses audience at Stadler poetry reading

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

The Stadler Poetry Center sponsored a poetry reading by Deirdre O'Connor '85, a writing and teaching consultant in the Writing Center. The reading took place this past Sunday at 8 p.m. in Bucknell Hall. O'Connor read from her recently published book of poems. The book, Before the Blue Hour, won the Cleveland State University Poetry Center Prize in 2001. O'Connor read several works including family poems, epigraphs and poems about Lewisburg.

The family poems focused mostly on her childhood memories and described her touching relationship with her grandmother. The epigraphs philosophized about quotes that caught O'Connor's eye or thoughts about relationships. The Lewisburg poems included one written from the first-person view of a leaf.

"The great thing about O'Connor's work is her use of vivid contradictions—things that seem completely different, but with her mastery, come together and perfectly describe the settings she lays before us," Eric Bundy '05 said.

The audience, with nearly 110 people in attendance, was impacted. It was "among the lengthiest and most enthusiastic applause at a Bucknell poetry reading," Stadler intern Ron Mohring said.

"I have been a fan of Deirdre O'Connor's poems for nearly ten years," Mohring said. "I love these poems for their unflinching attention to detail, for the way they inhabit equally the outer and inner landscapes of the world and the heart, for their tension between place and a kind of displacement. I can't read any one of the poems in this book without being drawn into their subtle, difficult territory; I have to read on, again and again. Before the Blue Hour is a marvelous accomplishment by a poet whose voice I find deeply necessary."

Not only did students receive her work with enthusiasm, but her former professors and colleagues also praised her highly. John Wheatcroft, former director of the Stadler Poetry Center and retired professor of English, remembers having O'Connor in his freshman English class.

"She made herself a poet and we tried not to ruin her," he said. "She has a finely tuned ear which is very important in writing poetry. She also has a superior ability to make her poetry accessible, while at the same time creating incredible depth. She does this all with great integrity and that's what makes her a great poet."

Robert Taylor, acting director of the Stadler Poetry Center, introduced O'Connor. "Deirdre O'Connor's poetry reading was a memorable event for the Poetry Center. I knew beforehand that she was a good poet, but was nonetheless stunned by the force and beauty of her poetry when I read the poems gathered together in Beyond the Blue Hour and then heard her read them aloud. Her poems move with a sly sureness to the heart of mystery," Taylor said,

Speaking of her themes, O'Connor said, "I think my poems are about a woman's consciousness trying to make sense of her world, which includes love, loss, family, history—all the usual subjects. I think they often try to describe the invisible and the unspeakable in ways that others might understand, or at least find provocative. They are, in a quiet way, committed to the experience of women who have often been relegated to a position of subordination in some way. One goal is to give voice to a kind of women's silence, the silence of the good girl who actually has some articulate anger and pain inside her."

O'Connor utilizes her own experiences as a female to ensure the poignancy of those themes. She began writing during her freshman year at the University and continued her education at Penn State University, earning her Master's Degree in Fine Arts. While at the University, she received the Smithson Prize and a Phi Beta Kappa Award for creative achievement. She believes that poetry "... has much to offer students because it enables us to think and feel in complex, surprising ways that attend to our hearts and souls as well as our minds. Poetry can be a 'momentary stay against confusion' as well as a reminder of who we are, or who we should be, at times when it is easy to forget."

Asian Gala sells out to success

By Kristi Johnston
A&E Editor

Asian Awareness Week, sponsored by Students for Asian Awareness at Bucknell (SAAB), culminated with the annual Asian Gala. The gala continued the theme of The Silk Road: A Journey through Asia. Previous events of the week included a movie, a sushi making demonstration, a comedian and a demonstration of henna art.

Decorated with colorful fans and other Asian memorabilia, Larison Dining Hall provided the location for the festivities, held on Saturday, March 2. Following the serving of appetizers, SAAB's own hip-hop dance group, Rhyme and Reason, performed an exciting dance choreographed by Sonny Kim '04.

Pawin Sriusvagool '03 then sang and accompanied himself on the piano for two musical numbers, including a traditional Thai song. Despite calls for a third song, dinner was then served. The food was cooked by members of SAAB and other students and represented traditional cuisine from many different Asian countries, including Japan, Korea, Thailand, India, Burma, Vietnam and China.

Following dinner, students put on a fashion show, modeling traditional clothing from Asia. Afterwards, SAAB President Melissa Duriya '02 and her sister Jennifer performed a Thai dance wearing beautiful gold ensembles.

The next event in the program was a martial arts demonstration. This began as a skit, in which SAAB members played a group of guards protecting a princess and an opposing group of bandits. They performed many different martial arts techniques. Then the group wowed the audience with various forms of breaking, using one-inch thick pinewood boards. They also demonstrated a form of martial arts called Kuryo, from which the American word "Korea" derives its name.

Kristi Johnston—The Bucknellian

Emily Rackoff '04 and Anna Lightman participated in the SAAB fashion show.

The final event of the evening was an Indian dance choreographed by Yamini Laks '03. Laks enjoyed participating in the program, as well as attending the gala. "I really enjoyed the food and the entertainment, and the decorations were lovely," she said.

Other students shared this sentiment. "The fact that they pulled off such an amazing dinner in addition to all the other events of the week is really incredible," said Azizeh Salloum '02.

The annual gala was once again sold out this year. Students, faculty and townspeople alike enjoyed the combination of Asian food and entertainment.

Academy of Ancient Music brings Mozart to life

Yu-Ling Huang—The Bucknellian

The Academy of Ancient Music, directed by Christopher Hogwood, brought Mozart's music to life

By Kang Tchou
Staff Writer

The immortal notes composed by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart filled the hearts of a mesmerized audience in a phenomenal performance that became a diamond among the many jewels that represent instrumental performances at the University. Last Saturday evening, the Academy of Ancient Music (AAM), with the aid of fortepiano soloist Robert Levin and under the direction of Christopher Hogwood, brought the essence of Mozart to life in a packed Weis Center concert hall.

This amazing night of music opened with arguably the best overture composed by mortal men. "The overture to 'The Marriage of Figaro' is one of the best known, most loved curtain-raisers ever penned," said Neal Zaslaw, Mozart expert and professor of music at Cornell University. "Brilliantly showing off the orchestral palette, it froths along at a breakneck pace, sending sparks in all directions."

After the thrilling opening, a pianoforte was raised onto the stage. Robert Levin treated the audience to an awe-inspiring improvisational performance of Mozart's Piano Concerto No. 24 in C minor K 491. The inclusion of elements of improvisation was a common affair in Mozart's era.

"It may surprise some listeners to learn that even the orchestral sections for the keyboard concertos are affected by the soloist's improvisation," Levin said. "At the time Mozart composed and introduced his path-breaking keyboard concertos, they were anything but classics. Their language was and remains a volatile synthesis of elegance, charm, impishness, audacity, operatic staginess, earnestness, pathos and tragedy. A performance style capable of encompassing such vast dramatic scope must have been imbued with spontaneity and characterized by a directness of discourse far removed from the preoccupation of recent generations of Mozart performers with beauty of sound, grace and piety."

Current tastes in music adhere mainly to ideals established in the 19th century, and modern performances stay true to the exact score written by the composer. For all the performers, the decision to improvise was not made haphazardly. "The decision to improvise cadenzas and leadins, in spite of the survival of original cadenzas, was not taken lightly," Levin said. "After considerable reflection, soloist and conductor felt that observing the spirit of Mozart's concerto performances, instead of the letter of their transmission, was especially important, and a logical outcome of the historical performance movement."

After temporarily satiating the Lewisburg audience with the first two pieces of the evening, Maestro Hogwood took full control of the stage and led the audience on a musical stroll that analyzed three dances from the ballroom scene of Don Giovanni K 527. The orchestra was split into three groups, each performing one of the three dances. The first dance was the "Minuet," preferred by aristocrats. The second dance was the "Contredanse," a favorite of the middle-class. The bawdiest of the three dances came in the form of the "Teitsch." After the individual performances, all sections of the orchestra combined the three dances into one, providing the audience with the essence of Mozart that, surprisingly, is often overshadowed.

Revealing the music of Mozart in its truest form is the ultimate goal for the Academy. "Although the technical skill of combining the three dances is often commented on, in the theater the result is frequently overwhelmed by the action and of course, the singing. In this presentation we have the opportunity to disentangle the dances and present them without distraction," Hogwood said.

Members of the audience did not overlook the effort of the Academy to present this inventive analysis of this popular piece of Mozart. "The performance of the three dances in isolation was unusual, but extremely informative from an analytical point of view," said Jackson Hill, composer and professor of music at the University.

Continuing in the spirit of reinstating the essence of Mozart, Symphony No. 35 in D Major 'Haffner' K 385 was reunited with Haffner March in D Major K 385a. This was a fitting piece to end the main program of the evening.

The Academy lived up to its acclaim for adhering to the historical accuracy within their performances. Not only were the members of the orchestra arranged in late 18th-century fashion, but an authentic fortepiano was also shipped in especially for the concert. The usage of period instruments and the arrangement of the orchestra are critical to an authentic replication of the music of Mozart.

"The arrangement on stage was typical of orchestras at the end of the 18th century and the beginning of the 19th century, with the second violins on the right, opposite the first violins. These arrangements enhance the antiphonal effects between the two sections," Hill said.

Not only were members of the music faculty at the University impressed, the usage of period instruments was also a success with students at the University. "The antique pianoforte was a superb addition to the show," Steve Young '05 said. "I thought the playing was fascinating and it held my interest."

The usage of period instruments also broadened the horizons of students at the University. "I've heard of pianofortes before, but I've never seen or heard one. It definitely added to the performance," Taylor Harchak '05 said.

For some members of the student audience, the rare instruments raised more than just mere interest. "We actually got caught trying to sneak back stage to look at the pianoforte. I had never seen one before. I think it made the entire performance that much better," Taylor Chase '05 said.

Members of the local community also attended the concert. For some, it was a rare opportunity to see their favorite orchestra. "My family and I enjoyed the concert immensely," Lewisburg resident Bob Sanders said. "I've listened to the Academy of Ancient Music with Mr. Hogwood for many years (going back to a few cherished LPs) and it was a pleasure to see them in person for the first time."

The immense triumph of this performance can be judged by the endless rounds of applause that the audience awarded to the Academy at the end of the final piece. The relentless crowd finally convinced the members of the Academy to perform an encore. In a humorous manner, Hogwood informed the audience that a most surprising discovery had been recently made that suggests certain American influences are found in the overture to 'The Marriage of Figaro.'

Without further delay, the orchestra launched into a delightful encore that mixed melodies of the overture with a familiar American tin-pan alley tune popular in the 1920s. Hill and his wife were quick to identify the melody as "If you knew Suzie." The audience expressed their delight at the humorous improvisation with muted laughter. This marvelous night of music ended with this light-hearted and joyful mood, perhaps much like the performances in which Mozart was there himself.

Policy changes made to House Party weekend

University restricts mugs, limits guest numbers and increases registration fees

By Carmen Mauriello
Senior Writer

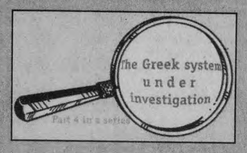
Two major policy changes for this year's House Party will prohibit under-21 year olds from carrying mugs and increase the fee for guests to $20, limiting the number of guests each student can host. The House Party Committee, composed of students from the Interfraternity Council (IFC) and Panhellenic Council, developed the changes in early March.

Committee Chairman Garrett Carlough '04 attributed the changes to cost reasons and the need to create a safer environment at House Party events. Also, Carlough said the changes were made to end the common misconception that House Party is a "rules-free weekend."

"The rest of the year the administration discourages underage drinking," Carlough said. "There's no reason that this weekend should be an exception."

No Mug for You

The only mug that will be permitted at this year's House Party events will be the official House Party mug, which will only be distributed to of-age students when they are registering for their 21-and-over wristbands. This wristband and an official mug are required to drink alcohol at House Party events. (The 21-and-over wristband will be a different color than the House Party wristband).



This stricter mug policy will break the House Party tradition of allowing students to bring their own mugs to events. Under the previous policy, the only identifier of an of-age person was a wristband. Carlough said this made it difficult to separate the of-age and underage students.

Carlough said these identification problems made it nearly impossible to monitor underage drinking and enforce the University's alcohol policies—major reasons why the Dean's office asked the committee to consider changing the mug policy.

"We needed a separation of the 21-and-over and the under-21," Carlough said. "This makes it easier to find out who's 21."

The mug policies will be enforced by security guards monitoring the entrances to Fraternity Road, Greek Monitoring Team members and Public Safety officers performing spot checks on the grounds as well as fraternity members checking at their houses' entrances and serving areas.

Sigma Phi Epsilon (Sig Ep) President Brian Lowe '03 believes the change will make fraternities better equipped to enforce underage drinking policies.

"I think it will be a lot easier [for fraternities] to control who's being served," Lowe said. "With the mugs and wristbands, you know who's 21."

Carlough believes the stricter enforcement will reduce underage drinking during House Party weekend.

"It's unrealistic to assume underage drinking won't go on at the events," Carlough said. "The best thing we can do is try to limit it."

Whose Event is It?

Guests have always been a major part of House Party and also a major source of problems. The new guest policy may change both of these issues.

Guests will have to pay $20 to register for the weekend, up from $5 last

Biomedical engineering major added for fall 2003 semester

By Krista Reisdorf
Senior Writer

Due to booming interest and the generosity of alumni donors, the University has announced a major in biomedical engineering.

Currently a minor, biomedical engineering is becoming a "full-blown program," University President Steffen Rogers said.

According to the Alumni e-mail newsletter from Feb. 8, 2002, Virginia (Emmitt) Chitwood '59, Richard B. Emmitt '67 and William C. Emmitt Jr. '69, pledged $3.2 million to be used towards a major in biomedical engineering beginning in the fall of 2003. Their pledge was made in honor of their parents, William and Gertrude Emmitt of the class of 1930, now deceased.

"We're very grateful to the family," Rogers said. "We now have a solid foundation for a major or program."

The biology and engineering faculty had established a minor, but wanted to put a full program together on their own.

"It [biomedical engineering] was a hot topic, but the faculty needed more to establish a long-term program," Rogers said.

To have more consistency in the potential program, the faculty began to talk to perspective donors and found a lucky match with Richard Emmitt.

"The interest was really there with Dick Emmitt," Rogers said. "He's been extremely enthusiastic the whole time, especially because of his interest in the field."

"Biomedical engineering is currently the fastest-growing engineering field, and it is developing into a permanent and well-defined discipline ..."
—James Orbison, interim dean of engineering

The money donated towards the program not only covers the salary of the new department chair, but also provides an operating budget. There are also plans for a new bioengineering building to house the program, Rogers said.

However, the University does not intend to increase enrollment in engineering. The program also needs cooperation from other departments.

"Some departments will have to give up their majors to bioengineering in order for the program to exist," Rogers said.

It has not yet been determined which departments and majors will be affected. A department chair has also not yet been chosen.

"We plan to have it filled next year," said James Orbison, interim dean of engineering. "This additional position is critically important to the program, as it will provide the staffing resources necessary to permit the program to begin offering a Bachelor of Science in Biomedical Engineering degree (with an emphasis in biotransport), starting with the 2003-2004 academic year."

Orbison noted that bioengineering is a rapidly-growing engineering that has become a hot topic in programs throughout the country.

"Biomedical engineering is currently the fastest-growing engineering field, and it is developing into a permanent and well-defined discipline, much as environmental engineering and computer engineering

Degenstein Foundation honors Janet Weis

The Janet Weis Fellow in Contemporary Letters will sponsor resident authors

The name Weis is highly recognizable to any member of the University community. Everyone knows the benefactors Sigfried and Janet Weis and their contributions to the University through the Sigmund and Claire Weis Center for the Performing Arts, given in honor of Sigfried's parents, as well as the Sigfried Weis Music Building, given to the University by Janet in honor of Sigfried.

The Weis name will again be honored at the University, this time by an award from the Degenstein Foundation. The Janet Weis Fellow in Contemporary Letters will be a University award given annually to "honor and recognize an individual who represents the very highest level of achievement in the craft of writing within the realms of fiction, non-fiction or biography," according to the description of the endowment.

The description states that the fellowship will be awarded to "an author whose work has been accessible to a wide audience and has resulted in a broadly-based record of public recognition and appreciation." The first Janet Weis Fellow in Contemporary Letters will be awarded next year.

The Degenstein Foundation is a regional organization established by a significant gift from Charles Degenstein, brother-in-law of Sigfried Weis. Degenstein is described as a highly community-minded man.

"His generosity and commitment to this community has made it a better place to live. Charlie Degenstein was concerned with both the welfare of the community and the institutions within it," said Gary Sojka, professor of biology.

The Foundation decided to honor Janet Weis for her significant commitment to the community as both an active member and benefactor through this generous grant to the University. The award will be a major prize and event at the University.

"The gift presents a wonderful opportunity for future Bucknell students and faculty," said Jim Rice, assistant vice president for academic affairs.

The fellowship includes the author visiting the University and possibly giving a lecture or a reading of his or her work. The Janet Weis Fellow in Contemporary Letters would have the opportunity to interact with the University community as much as possible to

Non-paid internships to receive quarter credit

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

As a result of the joint effort between the University's Parents Board Career Advisory Committee and the faculty, the University will expand the Non-Traditional Study Program to allow students to receive a quarter credit for non-paid internships.

"The issue to me isn't the size of the credit but rather the fact that this new policy opens so many doors for our students who are now competitive with students from other universities that have provided a vehicle for their students to compete for these opportunities to get some 'real world' experience," Co-Chairman of the Parents Board Career Advisory Committee Mark Rosenthal said.

In the past students received one credit, but they also had to pay for that one credit. With this new policy, it's more affordable for students to take advantage of non-paying internships.
—Laura Denbow, CDC director

The Parents Board Career Advisory Committee first presented this idea to University faculty and staff. Then, a proposal was written by Associate Dean of Arts and Sciences Robert Midkiff and Interim Dean of Arts and Sciences Mark Padilla.

It was then approved by the Curriculum Committee of the College of Arts and Sciences in February. It also went to the University Committee on

Rogers interviewed on radio program

President discusses campus issues on WKOK's 'Leaders and Lawmakers'

By Molly Koenig
Staff Writer

While students were away on spring break, University President Steffen Rogers gave an informative interview on 1070AM WKOK's "Leaders and Lawmakers" program hosted by Mark Lawrence. The issues discussed ranged from community relations to Vision 2010, but the overriding message was clear—that the University is on the move to becoming one of the best undergraduate institutions in the country.

How is this being achieved? Rogers cited improvements in the University's curriculum (which was last reviewed 10 years ago), stronger recreational programs and improvements in religious and non-Greek life.

Rogers also made note of all the construction happening around campus, joking that "there are times when I feel like I'm president of a construction company."

But although the construction can be a disturbance at times, the improvements will be tremendous. The most recent additions are the New Residence Hall and the music building and the projects currently underway are the O'Leary Building for Geology and Psychology and a new recreation and athletic center.

The athletic complex will cover 400 percent more square footage than the current facility, benefitting not only collegiate athletes but also the intramural and recreation programs for students who are still interested in staying in shape.

> "There is the need to communicate as much as possible with the community, so the chance to have an interview broadcast on the radio was welcome."
> —Steffen Rogers, University president

At other universities, service and research agendas and graduate programs can come between students and faculty. But high levels of personal interaction between the students and faculty are one of the characteristics Rogers believes is so unique to the University.

Just as important, the students at the University are multi-focused. No matter what their major, they are immersed in student life. Students joke about being stuck in the "Bucknell Bubble," but it's often true.

"The students really don't think about what's going on elsewhere because they are so consumed by their life here," Rogers said.

Rogers also spoke about University relations with the outside community. He stated that there is little friction with the community besides at the borders where campus meets the Borough, but the overall feeling between the two are excellent.

"There is the need to communicate as much as possible with the community, so the chance to have an interview broadcast on the radio was welcome," Rogers said.

As for what is being done to ameliorate relations with the community, Rogers stated that "the Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 has been working on revamping the approach his committee is taking to the community so that it is not just a presentational committee, but a committee that will work on solving the problems at hand."

Rogers concluded the interview by stating his optimism for the future of the University.

"I am excited about the opportunity to take this University to the next level and move onto the national scene in a way that perhaps Bucknell hasn't moved in the past."

University lifts Tri Delta suspension

By Andrew Burr
News Editor

The University lifted a nearly six month-long suspension of the Delta Delta Delta (Tri Delta) Sorority March 21, although the chapter remains under suspension from its national organization.

The suspension originated from a hazing event involving pledges of Tri Delta and members of the Kappa Delta Rho (KDR) Fraternity early last semester.

According to Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker, the Tri Delta pledges were "subjected to some inappropriate behavior concerning alcohol" while at the KDR house.

After an investigation, six members of Tri-Delta were sanctioned and approximately 12 members of KDR were sanctioned for their participation in the incident, which violated the University's policy on hazing.

Appeals in February and March from the members of Tri-Delta to the Appeals Board upheld the original Campus Judicial Board decision. The sanctioned members of KDR did not appeal their sentences.

"The last few months have been hard, especially on our pledge class, but we stuck together and got through it," Tri Delta pledge Lindsey Renninger '04 said. "I think in the long run, this will only make our sorority stronger."

According to a campus email sent last week by Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, "Having resolved the individual cases and finding no evidence of broader participation by the sorority, the suspension of Delta Delta Delta sorority is lifted today as of March 21, 2002."

fully optimize the educational benefits of a visit to the campus.

"This award brings major benefits to the University. It could increase our visibility in the world of letters and also benefit University students who are interested in good writing. It's a wonderful opportunity for the University to work with the Degenstein Foundation to honor Janet Weis in a way that will benefit both the University and the community. We will make a serious effort to bring in remarkably qualified recipients," Sojka said.

The University is very pleased and honored to receive this endowment.

"We appreciate the generous gift from the Degenstein Foundation to endow the Janet Weis Fellowship in Contemporary Letters. These funds will provide an exceptional and unique opportunity for our students to meet and study with authors of contemporary literature and, at the same time, honor Janet Weis, one of the University's great supporters. What a wonderful combination of events," University President Steffen Rogers said.

Although many recognize the Weis name, not many know that Janet and Sigfried Weis did not attend the University, nor did any of their children or grandchildren. They attended Goucher and Yale University, respectively, and have been involved with the University because of their great love for the community. Janet Weis is also a published author of two novels.

"The Degenstein Foundation wanted to honor Janet Weis in a way that reflected her very active interest in contemporary writing," Rice said.

"Janet Weis has been a great friend to this University, as was her husband. This award appropriately honors her through letters and literature because that is her own passion," Sojka said.

have over the past 30 years," he said. "Presently, there are over 70 graduate programs in biomedical engineering in the United States, undergraduate programs are forming throughout the country and enrollments are growing rapidly. The national engineering accreditation board (Accreditation Board for Engineering and Technology, or ABET) now offers accreditation of these programs as well—an acknowledgment of the significance of this discipline."

The topic has also been popular in the University community, Rogers said.

"There have been a significant number of students who have expressed interest and would like to see a program in place," he said.

The creation of the program balances the needs of the University and the interest of the donor, Rogers said.

"One of the most difficult components of fund-raising is finding a match," he said.

Perhaps this is one reason why it is not too often that a University can afford to make the drastic move of adding a major.

"It's a very rare occurrence," Rogers said. "Most universities have to have something else removed from the university in order to add on."

Because of this, Rogers feels the University is very lucky to have such an advantageous situation.

"With the generosity of donors, we can create a program with money that usually isn't there," he said. "We've been very fortunate."

U.S. troops welcome in Georgia

PANKISI GORGE, Georgia, March 22—For years, Moscow has accused its opponents in the former Soviet Republic of Georgia of harboring terrorists—specifically, Chechen fighters in the Pankisi Gorge. Now there's a move afoot to do something about this alleged terrorist enclave, but it is American troops, not Russian, who are arriving to do the clean-up. For the moment, Russia has been sidelined, and many here believe that is a positive step.

Athletic Center on schedule and budget

Pool and fitness center to open in September and gymnasium to open in January

By Aly Rentrop
Staff Writer

The progress of the new Recreation and Athletic Center was recently reported as both on budget and on schedule.

The newly renovated recreation center will open in phases, the first of which is scheduled to open on-time in early September 2002. This first phase is comprised of the new pool and the new fitness center.

The largest component of the renovations, the new gymnasium, is only one month behind schedule and is expected to be completed in early January.

Assistant Vice President for Facilities Dennis Hawley said the project's finances are being tracked very closely, and it is currently on budget.

Hawley, who is involved in the areas of construction, maintenance and operations at the University, explained that the new construction is approximately 131,000 square feet, with the new pool measuring three times the surface of the existing pool and the new fieldhouse addition almost doubling its current size.

The contractor undertaking this project is R.S. Mowery, who is also working on the O'Leary Center, the new psychology and geology building under construction uphill.

With the upcoming changes that are underway, there are some temporary adjustments to contend with, such as the location of the fitness equipment, which now overlooks the indoor track in Davis Gym.

> [The new athletic center] will be a dramatic difference in the space for fitness and recreation and students should really enjoy the increase in facilities.
> —Dennis Hawley, asst. VP for facilities

"Students seem to be adapting fine to the newly located gym equipment, but I have noticed that professors and people living in the Lewisburg area that have used the University's equipment are no longer present, or have cut down their workout schedules," Christine Charles '03 said. "For this reason, it has been easier for students to find treadmills and other equipment to use, rather than waiting in lines."

Students must also temporarily do without some of the features of the old fitness room.

"The spacing and ventilation in the wrestling room and the amount of equipment still available are some of the many positive aspects of this temporary situation," Andy Findley '03 said. "The negatives of a lack of music and ventilation in the weight room are extremely minor when compared to how bad this situation could have been. Through careful timing of not working out during peak hours and patience during a workout, the inconvenience regarding waiting for machines is minor."

The new Recreation Center will provide the University with an advanced and improved facility and those involved with its renovation are hopeful of its success.

"It will be a dramatic difference in the space for fitness and recreation, and students should really enjoy the increase in facilities," Hawley said.

Students react to temporary dining options

Caf to include more dining features and technology support upon reopening

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

Returning from spring break this semester meant returning to a University without the Caf. It's out with the old and in with the new. Out with the retro look in the Cafeteria and in with a more modern and efficient one.

An ambitious renovation plan unveiled by the Resident District Manager lays out the details: a redesigned serving area, old kitchen equipment replaced, the serving area opened up with reduced block columns and new lighting 10 times brighter than before.

There has not been any major work done to the Roy G. Bostwick Cafeteria, located on the first floor of the Langone Center, since the building was constructed in 1971. Renovations will continue through part of the summer and the cafeteria should be operating at full service by the beginning of the fall semester.

"The scope of the work did not allow it all to be done over the summer. This would have driven up the budget by as much as 25 percent," Resident District Manager Tim Tenon said. "If the work did not start until after this semester it would not have been completed until October and the Caf is much busier in the fall than in the spring."

"Work that had been done over the last several years was just cosmetic and not a long-term fix," Tenon said.

The look and feel of the new Cafeteria will be very different than the old one. The serving area to the Caf will be overhauled and much of the cooking equipment will be brought closer to the serving lines to bring food fresher and quicker. The large center station will feature a grill, char broiler and fryers to allow cooking more to order. The pizza/pasta station will allow for cooking of both the pizza and pasta on the serving line.

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Caf renovations, evident outside the LC by the presence of huge trailers and dumpsters, are occurring this semester so they will be done when the University reconvenes in the fall.

The Cafeteria will also become more tech supportive. "If costs allow, the new modern cafeteria is also hoping to add wireless Internet connections for students that have laptops. If this does not occur there will at least be various ports around the room to allow for connections," Tenon said.

To accommodate students, the Terrace Room, Refectory, Center Room and 241 rooms are now set up as locations for the temporary cafeteria. Most of the menu options will be available in the 241 rooms and Terrace Room, with soup and salad bars available in the Center Room and Refectory. Seating is available in the Terrace Room, Center Room and Refectory; when possible, other locations on the LC second floor will be used as well. The two pool tables from the stage area in the Bison have also been replaced with tables and chairs. Larison Dining Hall is available as well for more lunch features as well as the traditional cafeteria dinner.

Although the food will be largely the same at the temporary locations, meals will include one 20 oz. bottled soda or water with each meal because of limited soda machines. Fountain beverages will be available in the Terrace Room, as are juices, tea, juice blends and other beverages in both the 241 rooms and Terrace Room. Dining Services has included an ice cream chest in the 241 rooms to replace the soft-serve ice cream in the old cafeteria.

Because the dishroom is unavailable, students will now have to use more disposable items.

"Having smaller rooms to eat around the main one is nice. I don't like that they give us bottles of water to drink and if we don't drink half of it, they still make us throw it away because we can't take it out of the caf. It's a waste. I also wish they would use paper plates instead of Styrofoam while the dishroom is unavailable," Hillary Beveridge '05 said.

Faculty and staff have been moved to Walls Lounge for the rest of the semester to keep all the student meals in one general area.

"The faculty and staff are supportive of this move to make it easier for the students. We had to limit their menu, however they seem to be adjusting fine," Tenon said.

The changes to accommodate dining services all over campus have impacted everyone, including dining service staff.

"At this point we have not had to add staff, but we have had to shift many of their responsibilities. As we regain the use of the dishroom we will need to re-evaluate the staffing levels and may possibly need to hire more staff. Most of the staff has taken the changes very well. Many students have commented that they feel we have done a good job with a difficult situation. I also think the staff realizes that this will be a short-term inconvenience for a long-term benefit," Tenon said.

"Having to go to Larison and the Terrace Room doesn't bother me, it actually makes things interesting. The atmosphere is always different, except the food options are always the same," Emily Turner '05 said.

Freshmen still remain bound by the 19-meals a week plan.

"I think the new cafeteria set-up, although not ideal, is very efficient and makes the best of the circumstances. However, it would be better if there were more variety in food selection. I also think it would be helpful for the Bison to accept meal credit during more hours and on weekends, especially since there are less choices at the temporary caf," Ashley Wilhelm '05 said.

Some of the operational changes made for this half of the semester will remain permanent. The daily menus posted on the Internet will continue, as will food service at the Bison Express.

"We are working to make the Bison Express bigger and better for those customers uphill. Other positive changes that students feel have happened in the difficult time for renovations will be considered as options in the fall," Tenon said.

Brigade returns to Nicaragua

Volunteers construct Women's Health Clinic and new dormitory on seventh trip

Brigade members worked alongside Nicaraguans in Nueva Vida creating a Women's Health Clinic (left) and a new dormitory for visiting brigades .

The Bucknell Brigade embarked on its seventh pilgrimage to Nueva Vida, Nicaragua during spring break. This Brigade, lead by Alison Draper, professor of environmental chemistry and student leaders Dee Michael '02 and Sarah Rives '02, focused on continuing the clinic's work with new supplies and the creation of a Women's Health Center.

The Brigade took suitcases of supplies donated or purchased by various people and organizations in both the campus and Lewisburg communities. Materials brought aided in the restocking of prescription and over-the-counter drugs as well as bandages and other medicals supplies that would aid in the building and establishment of a Women's Health facility that would provide services, education and pre-natal care to Nueva Vida's women.

The group worked alongside highly skilled Nicaraguans while helping to move the structure's giant cement slabs into place.

"The people of Managua are very friendly, inspiring people willing to share their lives despite the hardships they have been put through," Alyson Steckbeck '03 said.

Since October 1998, when Hurricane Mitch devastated much of Central America, the Bucknell Brigade has been traveling to Nueva Vida, Nicaragua, a resettlement area for those left homeless in the wake of the storm. Each year students and faculty travel to this village of nearly 14,000 to complete various projects to help the residents of Nueva Vida.

The Brigade's most recognized project is the creation of the only full functioning medical clinic in Nicaragua. This clinic, dedicated by University President Steffen Rogers in 2001, is the only place in the nation where patients receive a diagnosis and immediate medication from the clinic's pharmacy.

"I was anxious before we got to the clinic. When we finally saw it, I couldn't control the tears rolling down my face. I thought to myself, 'Wow, we've really come a long way. I can't believe I'm a part of this!' It was indeed the best feeling in the world," Maria Lopez '02 said.

Although the Women's Center was the main goal during this most recent Brigade, there were two other projects in which the Brigade was involved. The Jubilee House Community, a part of the Center for Development of Central America (CDCA), which houses the Brigade and other brigades such as the one led by Laura Dunn '01, through the Peddie School in Hightstown, N.J.

Brigade members also began construction of a volunteer dormitory to house the various groups aiding in the restoration of Nueva Vida. The Brigade devoted time to this project in addition to creating a wall for a cooperative. Cooperatives are businesses owned by the workers with help from the CDCA. In order for these businesses to trade internationally, they are required to have walls around their cooperative compound.

On the days the Brigade rested from their projects they worked to expand their appreciation for the geography, the country of Nicaragua itself and its people's culture.

The Brigade visited the U.S. Agency for International Development, historical sights in Managua, Nicaragua's capital, and some unique places such as the Masaya volcano and a volcanic lake.

"One of the most memorable parts of this brigade was going to a rural coffee plantation and being able to see a variety of communities and cultures within Nicaragua," Rives '02 said.

The community around the coffee cooperative had only about 300 residents, offering a huge change from the 14,000 living in Nueva Vida.

"I have traveled further than ever before. And by this statement I do not mean in terms of miles ... The distance I am talking about is a spiritual, intellectual and emotional distante," Kristin Kowalew '02 said. "My experience in Nicaragua stretched my entire being, to the extremes of brilliant hope and desperate hopelessness from a feeling of vibrant, idealistic enthusiasm to that of external, political powerlessness and despair. The human condition was both exqfisitely and frightfully tangible. Life became real."

John Peeler, chair of the Political Science Department, described the trip as one that changed lives.

"The experience of working with people who are poorer than we can imagine, of seeing them work harder then we can imagine, frequently changes the lives of our students," Peeler said.

Not only did it change the lives of the students involved, it also made a difference in the lives of the 14,000 people still trying to recover from a catastrophic event.

"The Brigade makes a difference," Draper said. "Maybe not in the amount of work we do in Nicaragua, but in the understanding that we gain of what life is like when you are 'living on the edge.' Perhaps if everyone had this experience, things would change. In the meantime, we change what we can."

INTERNSHIPS Page A1

Instruction and was finally approved by the Academic Council a few weeks ago.

"I am particularly proud of the way this new policy came into being. Basically, the parents (i.e., our Committee) came to the Faculty and Staff of the University to discuss the merits of creating this policy to help our students obtain further opportunities in the marketplace," Rosenthal said.

Midkiff also praises the Parents Board's efforts.

"We've been struggling with [this change] for the last couple of years. The Parents Board has been helpful to move it forward," Midkiff said.

According to a proposal written by Padilla and Midkiff, one of the main motivations behind the development of this program was the fact that many corporations and foundations are restricted by the Fair Labor Act to offer non-paid internships to college and university students only when the student receives some form of institutional recognition.

Although the most recent Post Grad Survey indicated that approximately 90 percent of internships had by University students included remuneration, industries such as broadcast journalism, law, publishing and advertising rely on non-paid internships.

"This is super news for Bucknell students, particularly students who are not majoring in engineering, business or the hard sciences. For example, there are hundreds of intern positions in the communications industry that are non paying intern positions," Rosenthal said.

"However, it is essential for employers to have legally some form of remuneration—and credit or partial credit by a student intern's college or university satisfies a corporation's legal requirement for remuneration. Now, with the passage of Bucknell's new policy, our students are competitive for these opportunities."

Because many companies require that students receive academic credit if they are not being paid, many students in the past had to pay the University approximately $800 to receive a full credit. With the new policy, students will be able to receive a quarter credit and pay about $200.

"In the past students received one credit, but they also had to pay for that one credit. With this new policy, it's more affordable for students to take advantage of non-paying internships," Director of the Career Development Center (CDC) Laura Denbow said.

According to the proposal, non-paid internships might provide greater access to initial employment opportunities for liberal arts students in highly non-applied fields.

"Internships offer a smooth transition from a university education to the professional world," said Maggie Nadar '04, an international relations major.

"Internships help students put their educations in context. Internships help students to see the connection between the classroom and the real world, especially the world of work. They see how professionals go about their careers."
—Steven Bowen, provost/VP of academic affairs

Provost and Vice President of Academic Affairs Steven Bowen also feels that internships help students see the connection between their education and the real world.

"Internships help students put their educations in context. Internships help students to see the connection between the classroom and the real world, especially the world of work. They see how professionals go about their careers," Bowen said.

"The research tells us that students are much more confident and engaged when they have had internships that help them anticipate the relationship their educations as whole persons, their work lives situated in the real world."

Jim McKenna, co-chairman of the Parents Board Career Advisory Committee and vice president of CBS News in New York City, believes that this new policy will allow students to find out if the like the industry in which they are interning. He also feels that companies often go back and hire students who were former summer interns.

"The internship program has become an integral part of the college experience," McKenna said.

Denbow anticipates that this new policy will also benefit cooperations.

"We know from our conversations with organizations that have hired interns how great our students do in these roles, so we'll be able to educate more organizations about Bucknell and the incredible academic experience we provide by making the process by which students are able to apply for these non-paying internships simpler and more cost-effective," Denbow said.

Bowen believes that this change will provide more opportunities for companies to form relationships with students.

"It provides more opportunities for cooperations to get to know young professionals who might be interested in joining those companies," Bowen said.

The CDC will also play an integral role in this new policy. The CDC will identify appropriate non-paid internship experiences and provide a list to students. Since the student will be receiving academic credit, he/she will be required to meet with a faculty adviser.

"The Career Development Center will be working closely with the faculty advisor to make sure a broad array of opportunities are available for students who want to pursue non-paying internships for academic credit. As a result, students will have a better experience and will be able to call upon that experience when making future decisions," Denbow said.

According to the proposal, Students who wish to receive a quarter credit, must write a minimum one-page essay explaining how the proposed experience relates to their academic interests and experiences. Upon completion of the internship, students will submit a two-page essay discussing in a self-reflective manner the relevance of the internship for their academic progress.

"We want to focus on the academic side of things," Midkiff said.

According to Midkiff, he is currently writing a course description for this new option and he hopes it will be ready for students to take advantage of this summer. He is also looking for a faculty adviser for the program.

A formal announcement about this policy will be made shortly. In the mean time, any questions can be directed to Midkiff.

year. Also, limits were placed on the number of guests each student may host. A non-Greek will be allowed two guests, while Greek students will be allowed four.

Roy Baker, associate dean of students and director of fraternity and sorority affairs, said the need to change the guest policy became apparent after last year's House Party. He said that many students expressed concerns about guests, which he estimated composed over 1,000 of last year's 5,000 attendees.

"A lot of students expressed concerns after last year that there were more non-Bucknell students than Bucknell students," Baker said. "They said it created an atmosphere that they didn't like and that it didn't turn out to be a Bucknell event but an event for non-students."

Baker said that guests were involved in most of the incidents at last year's House Party, including physical assaults, damage to University property and damage to fraternity houses.

"The major problems come from non-Bucknell students because they care less about the fraternities and the Greek system," Baker said. "They come here to drink—and drink excessively—and cause problems."

Still, Baker said that the new policy doesn't aim to eliminate guests, but rather make their behavior more responsible. He said that stricter wristband enforcement should propel students to register guests. This makes students accountable for any problems their guests cause, which Baker hopes will encourage students not to bring guests that may cause problems.

Guests are not the only group affected by the policy, as students and alumni also have to pay higher registration fees. Students will be charged $5 and alumni $10, up from $1 and $5, respectively.

Baker explained that the increases aim to cover IFC's rising costs for Greek Week and House Party. Baker said that the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) didn't allocate IFC any funds for Greek Week or for the student workers for House Party, so IFC is hoping to cover these two costs with the fee increases. Also, IFC purchased more food and alternative beverages for this year's House Party.

According to Baker, there is a large discrepancy between guest and student fees because BSG allocates House Party funding specifically for students and not for guests.

Us Versus Them

Many students are frustrated by the stricter regulations on House Party. Dena Ebert '02 said the increasing regulations over the past four years have damaged the House Party tradition. She also noted adverse effects they often have on underage drinking.

"The more regulations you place on students, the more it will increase binge drinking in dorm rooms," Ebert said.

Fellow senior Brandi Herman agreed. She said that increased pre-loading by underage students could create an "unsafe environment" at fraternity parties.

"People will find a way to drink," she said. "If you're going to drink, you should do it in a safe manner."

Herman explained that drinking at a fraternity is a relatively safe way to drink because the fraternity has bottled water and soft drinks—and food, including hot dogs, hamburgers and cotton candy. In addition, he said they're getting a weekend full of great entertainment, including a number of fraternity-hosted bands.

"The administration clearly said that if a couple things go wrong like last year, there's not going to be a House Party next year. That's what we don't want to happen. We want the House Party tradition to continue and I believe these policies are a step toward that."
—Garrett Carlough '04, House Party committee chairman

regulations and students will likely wait in line for beer, talk to friends and "dance it off" instead of taking 10 shots in their dorm room. In addition to preloading, Lowe said that many underage students may spike the bottled beverages with liquor.

Another common criticism is that the registration fee for guests is excessive. Ebert said that hosting friends is an important part of the House Party experience for many students, but the higher costs may make this less appealing.

"House Party is a time when students show off Bucknell to friends," Ebert said. "Because of the higher costs, it won't be that way anymore."

This was true for Jesse Lumin '05, who was thinking about inviting a high school friend for House Party but decided against it primarily because of the higher cost for guests.

"I don't understand why they have to charge $20 [for guests]," Lumin said. "It will put a damper on a lot of people's fun."

Herman said that the regulations have made House Party more of a time of frustration than excitement. She explained that in past years, a reference to House Party would yield enthusiasm in students but now it just yields complaints about the regulations and the administration.

"It becomes more of and us versus them thing," she said.

Changing the Tradition

Baker and Carlough argue that if the House Party tradition is that the weekend is a free-for-all for alcohol, then the tradition needs to be changed.

"We're sending the message that House Party will not be a time when underage students can walk around with alcohol and the University looks the other way," Baker said.

Carlough acknowledged that the student concern that stricter House Party policies would lead to binge drinking in dormitories was legitimate. But he said that the IFC is only able to control drinking at House Party events. Still, he said the fraternities will deny excessively drunken or disorderly students admittance to their parties.

Baker said that it would be difficult to detect if bottled beverages were spiked with liquor, but he added that students who did so and drew attention to themselves would be sanctioned.

Carlough said that the $20 fee for guests was reasonable. For that cost, he explained that guests are getting a weekend's worth of beverages—beer and/or

Dining Services praised for Caf renovations

University Dining Services has been planning the renovation of the Bostwick Cafeteria for over a year and their plan was finally implemented during spring break. Students are no longer allowed to eat in the Cafeteria, but instead must choose between the Bison, Larison or the Terrace Room/upstairs Langone Center (LC). The Bucknellian would like to congratulate Dining Services for making the transition simple, being organized and still providing many food options.

Dining Services has done a wonderful job of informing students about where they can eat. Not only is the information posted on the Internet, but is also available at both the uphill and downhill LC entrances. Students are therefore aware of where they can eat, when they can eat and what food will be at each place. Students can view their options in an easy and effective manner.

Dining Services has also placed plans of what the new Cafeteria will look like when it is finished.

The Terrace Room provides a nice ambiance for students to eat. The large windows provide sunlight and an open atmosphere.

The Dining Services staff has been extremely helpful and organized through this transition, especially in the Terrace Room and other second floor LC eating places. Staff members are constantly making sure that there are plenty of food items available. They have also kept students informed as to where to find certain food items.

One major concern that students had was that the Biscn and other eating places would be too crowded. Dining Services has placed extra tables in the LC Mall and upstairs LC to alleviate the problem. In fact, the Bison has been less crowded at noon and 6 p.m., times when lines are usually long and finding a table is near impossible.

Although many students questioned the variety of food that would be available due to the renovation, Dining Services has done a superb job providing various food options. Not only does the Terraces Room and 241 rooms have almost the exact same food as the Cafeteria did, Dining Services is also offering 20 oz. bottled drinks and prepackaged ice cream.

There is no doubt that the majority of the Cafeating student body was skeptical about the temporary eating plans for the rest of the semester, and it appears that Dining Services has proved themselves. While it may have been feared that the University would leave it up to the students to find alternative dining options, University Dining Services has gone above and beyond in taking care of the most specific needs of student dining.

Alumni's two cents on economics

To the Editor:

Having read Tom Elliott's '03 column on the living wage and Professor of Economics Geoffery Schneider's response, I felt that I too had to respond.

I believe Elliott's column did not accurately represent what the results of an increase in the minimum wage would be. An increase in the minimum wage has many excellent benefits. Professor James Galbraith, a professor at the Lyndon Johnson School of Public Affairs at the University of Texas at Austin wrote a book, "Created Unequal: The Crisis in American Pay" that serves as an excellent reference that supports my beliefs.

Galbraith's main point is that the amount of wage inequality (the difference between what the wealthiest make and what the poorest make) is tied directly to a number of key factors: the unemployment rate, the interest rate, the strength of the dollar and so on. There is a considerable amount of technical research presented that supports the thesis and demonstrating a strong correlation between wage inequality and unemployment.

Galbraith concludes that not only has a purportedly "natural" rate of unemployment been set too high, way over any "ethical" rate, but also that such action by government is one of three means of keeping wages low, making the distribution of income and wealth more unequal than it would be in the absence of such deliberate policy.

Elliott's argument that people don't need a raise because they live in households with incomes above the poverty line shows ignorance and quite frankly, heartlessness. Does he know what the poverty line is? It is practically impossible to raise a family at the "poverty" line. An increase in the minimum wage is a humane way to alleviate the situations facing the poor.

People who support an increase in the living wage have a fine grasp of economics, contrary to Elliott's beliefs. He is the one who seems not to have such a grasp.

A race remembered: kudos to Cairns

To the Editor:

I am writing to tell you how much I enjoyed the article written by Cecily Cairns in the March 8 issue. It was so well written and the illustration of Ruffian was gorgeous.

The story just touched my heart. You see, I witnessed that race on television that day. My father was an accountant and had many clients from the horseracing world. We frequently had jockeys and trainers at my house so from a very early age I enjoyed the sport.

Then when I married my husband, he lived very close to Belmont Park. We went to the races a couple of times a year and got a lot of pleasure out of seeing these splendid animals. It is true, unfortunately, that racing is not like it used to be.

I am so lucky that my grandson Jim Leahy has me on the subscription list for the paper because I would have missed this touching story. I read most of the paper and you have a very talented staff.

Again, kudos to Cairns.

Sincerely,
Alice Leahy

Water polo more than school yard sport

To the Editor:

In Scott Kloss's March 8 article, he wrote an story concerning Cody Keffer's nomination as Bucknellian Athlete of the Week. The women's water polo team was both excited and flattered to have one of our outstanding teammates recognized.

However, we found the comparison made in the article of water polo to "a distinctive cross between high school dodge ball, basketball and swimming" slightly misleading. The basketball and swimming comparisons were not too far fetched, but it is this comparison with dodge ball that amuses us.

We understand that water polo is not a game that many understand, and in an attempt to educate the Bucknell community about our sport, we have complied the following list of ways in which dodge ball and water polo are practically opposite sports. We will concede that both games include two teams and a ball. Otherwise:

1) In dodge ball, the two teams must stand on opposite sides of the gym or court. In water polo, both teams are welcome to swim where they may.

2) In dodge ball, there is a definitive line down the middle of the court. If a member of a team crosses this line, they are out of the game. No such rule or line exists in water polo.

3) There is no defense in dodge ball, you simply dodge the ball. We spend the majority of practice on defensive plays.

4) In dodge ball, if someone catches the ball with two hands, the person who threw the ball is out of the game. In water polo, if you catch the ball with two hands, you are out of the game.

5) In dodge ball, balls are whipped at the other team at high speeds in an attempt to remove them from the game. Water polo players only throw the ball to the other team if their contacts have fallen out of their eyes.

6) There is no starting line up of a dodge ball team, the entire team (usually masses of overly energetic individuals) storms the court at the onset of the game. In water polo, we have six players exclusively selected by the coach to begin the game.

7) There is no goal that dodge ball players shoot at, and therefore no goalie. A water polo game contains both.

A final question that we, the women's varsity water polo team of Bucknell University pose to Kloss is, who played dodge ball in high school? None of us can remember playing it after middle school.

Complexity of color

To the Editor:

Several things sadden me about the conversation about race relations on this campus. Perhaps accusations and backlash are inevitable, but this conversation represents an opportunity, and is successful only when seen as such. A few points to consider:

1) The fact that race lacks a sound biological definition is a red herring. Many terms thrown around in science lack airtight definitions; in my field (chemistry) the definition of molecule is problematic. Science doesn't work from definitions, it works towards them. The lack of a perfect definition is not evidence something is not real. Furthermore, science does not get to play ontological gatekeeper. I, for one, know too many dweebs with science Ph.D's to allow public discourse to be edited for accuracy by scientists.

2) Intention is not the only factor when race-based speech/actions are considered. Language has memory; actions have precedents. Blackface has not yet escaped its history; it was used at one time to show how people with black skin were less intelligent and less evolved than Caucasians (and we cannot forget that redface and yellowface served similar purposes.) Whiteface does not share that past. No matter how well-intentioned a blackface homage may be, it shares that past, and that should give one pause.

3) In America we like to picture our speech as occurring against a neutral background—your speech and my speech are baubles to be analyzed independent of context. This is false. Our society is, at least in part, the product of a racist past (hopefully beyond debate). I say we live in a society that is still racist (many say this is open to debate). But we must consider how our words and actions relate to our racist past. I benefit every day from being white and male and straight—it is my burden to act and speak in a way aware of this unearned benefit.

And a final, minor point: There is a subtext to some of what's been written and said—these agitations are the work of frustrated, flag-burning, aging hippies. Do the math. I was dropping bombs in my diapers when Sterling Hall was bombed in Madison, Wis. Number one song when I graduated from college? Something by Paula Abdul (also my burden). An analysis of the motives of those agitating here cannot simply evoke the sixties—it's not that simple.

Sig Chi says thanks

To the Editor:

The Brothers of the Kappa Chapter of Sigma Chi would like to extend their sincerest thanks to Janice Butler, Mary Snyder and the One-in-Four group for making a presentation at our chapter house on Saturday, March 23, during our Alumni/Undergraduate Conference. The brothers in attendance were exposed to a wide range of issues dealing with sexual responsibility, which had a profound and sobering impact on us all. The program presented at the house was extremely thorough and well organized, and it will have a lasting effect on everyone in attendance. The brothers of Sigma Chi would highly recommend the program to any and all organizations on campus.

Additionally, the brothers would like to thank Associate Dean of Students and Director of Fraternity and Sorority Affairs Roy Baker for his presentation on the Plan for Prominence, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro for his availability in a question and answer session and Chapter Advisor Dr. Stechschulte for his attendance and support.

The Alumni/Undergraduate Conference was a great success, thanks largely to the aforementioned parties.

No offense meat-eaters and middle class

By Philip Martoma
Staff Writer

It has come to my attention that people have found remarks on my bio on the Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender's (LGBT) Web site offensive. Not only have these comments been considered offensive but they were also compared to the hate speech of blackface. This seriously concerns me, as I personally would assure everyone that I do not hate anyone. By stating that among my dislikes are bourgeois and omnivores I made some people feel that I was proclaiming hatred at these groups. This puzzles me because it was apparently construed by so "many" as being threatening. As far as I understand, hate speech can be defined as a statement that is interpreted as threatening and is sent from a group that is empowered with some advantage to another group.

In the case in which a student's home page used the word "gay" in a derogatory manner, a message was sent from the community in general (which is primarily heterosexual in number) to the homosexual community that their sexual orientation was in fact bad. This was dependent on how the word was used in the contexts, and to what else it applied. "Gay," (referring to sexual orientation) and "gay" (referring to something bad) are not simply homonyms, as the history of the word has not yet changed the meaning to make them completely separate from each other. The fact that the word "gay" is so often used in this way shows that society in general approves of it being seen as derogatory, which is how it is a message sent from a group (empowered in number) to another group at a disadvantage. This is therefore threatening because it creates an impression to the LGBT community that they will be treated just as what they are called, and that any negative treatment they receive would be enforced by the sheer power of their numbers.

This is how a threatening remark comes to exist. My bio, however, was not sent from a group with some natural advantage over another. I am a vegan, I am not aware of any threatening advantage we have over omnivores. I am aware that after having entered this omnivorous atmosphere (the University) I am physically threatened by the lack of food options for vegans that has caused my mother to worry because I have lost over 20 lbs. I am aware that the presence of so many omnivores on the campus has created this dilemna for me because their number requires the cafeteria to provide more options for them than for myself, and thus the physical threat, though not a threat I am complaining about. I simply am wondering why people could construe my dislike as threatening to them. I am only one person, not an army of vegans out to change everyone's diet by force.

I also said that I disliked bourgeois, which some construed to mean "bourgeosie," or the middle class. As what I said in my bio was bourgeois, that is all that I am responsible for, and it is an adjective, which refers not to people, but rather the materialism of the middle class of the West in 1848. I believe Jesus, Gandhi, John F. Kennedy and several other people would agree with me about my statement of dislike for this group. Being a member of the middle class, I do not understand why these people would feel threatened from a member of their own class especially when I was not referring to them but attributes of a particular group.

Self acceptance supported through silence

By Josh Fisher
Staff Writer

On Thursday, April 4, Bucknellians will stand alongside tens of thousands across the nation and speak out against Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender (LGBT) harassment, prejudice and discrimination by saying nothing at all. This student-led movement for basic civil rights has come to be known as the National Day of Silence.

Day of Silence was born in 1996, organized by students at the University of Virginia. The event was a great success, with hundreds participating. By 1998 nearly 100 colleges and universities were involved, and currently the number of participating schools, including high schools, has escalated to nearly a thousand. Support for LGBT basic civil rights continues to grow.

Lesbians, gays, bisexuals and the transgendered are truly everywhere, coming from every neighborhood, every race, every culture, every age and all parts of society. But yet society still discriminates against LGBT, subjecting them to verbal, and even physical, violence. Homophobia is still rampant, pervading the thoughts, words and actions of even the most well-meaning individuals—indeed it is difficult not to internalize this homophobia in a culture that, for some reason or another, feels threatened by this "alternative lifestyle."

But being gay, lesbian or bisexual is neither an alternative nor a lifestyle. It is not about stereotypes or images, it is about for whom you feel romantic love, it is about who you are. You can choose your lifestyle; you can choose to live extravagantly or simply, to sleep late or get up early, to pledge Greek or not, but you can't choose who you are. And you can't choose who you love, for love sees no gender.

Gender roles and sexuality norms about what is "natural" in society are indeed imbedded deeply into our psyches, but LGBT individuals are not deviants; homosexual behavior is not socially or biologically aberrant. Imagine anthropological examples around the world where so-called "homosexual" behavior is the norm, and deviation from that is cause for reproach—these societies exist. And not even 150 years ago that very same biological justification that says "homosexuality is unnatural" was used to enslave blacks, because they were claimed to be biologically suited for labor.

Gender roles and sexuality norms about what is "natural" in society are indeed imbedded deeply into our psyches, but LGBT individuals are not deviants; homosexual behavior is not socially or biologically aberrant.

What an absurd notion that is today … Until we realize that LGBT are real people, deserving of the same basic human rights as every other individual, this discrimination will continue.

Lesbians, gays, bisexuals and the transgendered are silenced every day by the words and deeds of those around them. Many spend a long time trying to bury deep-seated feelings in order to fit into the straight "norm," many undergo deep psychological trauma, even commit suicide because society teaches that same-sex attractions are a negative thing. The silence produced every day by harassment, prejudice and discrimination is real, and it is unacceptable.

On Thursday, April 4, protest this discrimination, this inequality and homophobia—participate in the National Day of Silence and show your solidarity in the form of visible silence.

Race should not be considered for merit aid

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

When it comes to merit aid, I think I speak for many students when I say, "So … what's on TV?" As a stand-alone issue, it's quite boring.

But injecting racial questions into any issue can make it fun! Check the details of the proposed system, as reported in a recent Bucknellian article. And I quote:

"Vice President for Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70 presented a model based upon Lafayette College's Marquis Scholar Award. In this situation, some scholarships will be allocated to students excelling in the performing arts, 20 will be given to minority students, enabling the University to reach its diversity goal of 15 percent and the rest will be reserved strictly for academics. Athletic scholarships will be awarded in a separate category …"

Catch that? This proposal would create four types of merit: academic, athletic, performing arts and diversity, or the color of your skin (here's to hoping I'm wrong, and the goal is increased intellectual diversity. Yeah right). Such thinking seems better suited to the Old South than a modern institution of higher learning. It doesn't matter what "colors" are favored or disfavored; it's wrong as a matter of principle.

Administrators would almost certainly justify this policy on the grounds that Bucknell is insufficiently "diverse" and that to recruit minority students, we should offer financial incentives, to make our campus complete with those minority "perspectives" inaccessible to the rest of us. What nonsense.

The notion that a white or black or Asian or Hispanic student can only learn while sitting next to someone of a different race is foolish, insulting and wrong as a statement. Further, if we are interested in their ideas, their thoughts or their minds (and not their actual physical skin color), why wouldn't white perspectives be subjected to the same screening? After all, an avowed communist, even if he were white, would certainly provide a perspective on the world inaccessible to most of the rest of us.

When are we going to finally mean it when we say that it isn't who you are on the outside that matters, but who you are on the inside?

Race-based distinctions—in admissions, in hiring, in financial aid—are stupid and unnecessary, so long as the University continues to build its growing reputation for academic excellence. College-shopping minority students are looking for the same things as everyone else—quality of life and a chance to learn—and nothing more. I don't expect that they view the color of their skin as "meriting" anything, except an equal chance at admission and need-based financial aid. Excellence begets excellence, and it is beneath this institution to resort to cheap, race-based bribes as a shortcut towards its goal of achieving "diversity."

Any administrator supporting this "diversity as merit" proposal ultimately loses his moral authority to condemn racist social structures such as those found in the Old South. As a wise man once said, they can't really say they condemn racial discrimination (which, by the way, has as its primary definition "differentiation," not "statement of prejudice") in principle; they can only say they condemn it as it was practiced back then.

For once, radicals are right about something. Many of the practices we see in society and on campuses are little more than expressions of "power relationships." But in this context, proponents of a degraded, intellectually lazy version of "diversity"—the racial beancounters— have the power to define how race will matter, just as southern white males once did—and they will use it to further reject the "colorblind" approach that they disfavor.

Only In America . . .

U.S. fails to inspire Arafat to embrace peace process

By Gretchen Schrock
Senior Writer

The escalating conflict in the Middle East has taken on a new dimension this past week, one that can be compared to a cable television game show with bright lights embroiling the contestants. The charming host is the Vice President Dick Cheney, who is currently asking the ultimate question to the finalists, Israelis and the Palestinians, that will require determination to solve: Are you thoroughly committed to the achievement of peace in the region?

Unfortunately, the American government, acting as the director of this costly production, is uninterested on focusing the camera on the Israelis, but instead is solely concerned with the answer of the Palestinian representative, Yasser Arafat. According to the Bush administration, Arafat failed to answer the question correctly and will not receive the grand prize of meeting with the vice president in the near future to discuss his commitment to a workable peace process.

Arafat "is capable of doing much more than he has, but up to now he has not expended the level of effort we think is warranted," Cheney said, quoted by the Associated Press.

What were the exact demands of the American government that the Palestinian leader had to fulfill to win this marvelous gift? Arafat would have to give a public speech in the Arabic language about the imperative need to end terrorism, instruct his security services to enforce the ceasefire, convince the Palestinian nation to share intelligence with the Israelis about pending terrorist attacks and arrest people involved in terrorist acts against Israel.

Obviously, this is quite a bit for one person to accomplish in a few weeks, especially if Israel, the state that will be benefiting from these acts, continues to limit the person's freedom of movement.

Luckily for the Palestinians, there is a consolation prize in the opinion of Secretary of State Colin Powell, which is explained in an Associated Press article, "The vice president could go at a later time. It doesn't have to be right away. The important point is that Chairman Arafat knows we want to engage with him as we move forward."

In other words, the leader of the Palestinians should be heartened by the fact that the Bush administration is considering further involvement in the peace process, which would be a wise thing to do for various reasons, most importantly to cement support in the Arab world for the planned intervention against Saddam Hussein.

Where does Arafat losing in the final round, Israel rejoicing backstage for their survival as America's favorite among the Middle Eastern states and the American diplomats shaking each other's hands for another excellent show leave the average citizens who must constantly deal with the never-ending violence that engulfs the region on a daily basis?

The response is in the same place that they have remained for months—watching the death toll mount, burying their loved ones and praying for an end to the horror. Last Sunday, the conflict claimed another seven lives, both Israeli and Palestinian, innocent and guilty. How many more people will have to be killed in order for the United States and other powerful countries to become thoroughly involved?

The consolation prize of a possible visit by Cheney will not be sufficient enough to incite the Palestinians to terminate their terror campaign and follow the path of lasting, cooperative peace. The Bush administration must provide a more generous reward that is truly conducive to significant change like dedicated assistance in the promotion of the peace process, which would not run counter to its own interests.

"The importance of reaching a just settlement for both sides has never been more important because it holds up and it precludes and it confuses all the other issues which are of concern to all of us, specifically weapons of mass destruction," said Crown Prince Salman of Bahrain in a New York Times article.

While the White House may blame the Palestinians for the stagnation of the peace process through enduring terrorism, it is not completely erroneous to point a finger at the United States for its lack of courage and resolution in pursuing peace in this volatile area. It is quite possible that the government does not know the answer to its own game show question—Are you thoroughly committed to the achievement of peace in the region?

BU World distorts women

By Maren Johnson
Opinions Editor

So courtship is essentially dead on this campus, and many others around the country, I'm sure. I cannot dispute that aspect of a recent article in Bucknell World, entitled, "Whatever happened to dating?" While most of the sentiments in the piece rang true to the experience of this student, and many others, it is the angle and appropriateness of the piece that I must take up contention with.

Admittedly, Bucknell World, is not a publication that I often read, but the cover of the March 2002 issue caught my eye. I have long considered it to be a magazine directed towards parents and alumni, thus I was surprised to see the cover story actually referring to the profusion of "hooking-up" at our University. OK, so they go my attention. I read the article and was left with a sense of betrayal from my own campus community. While the piece initially contended that women on campus have aspirations far surpassing those of simply marriage and kids after graduation, the image of the University woman quickly went down hill from there. A good half of the article was dedicated to making us—the women on campus—look like pathetic, swooning little girls who think a hook-up leads to a ring and are devastated when that does not pan out.

I beg to differ. I cannot say that this sentiment does not hold some truth, but within the entire section of the piece dedicated to student attitudes about hooking up, only one small quote mentioned the fact that guys get attached too. I certainly have no disillusions about men pining away for the girl they hooked up with last night, but I couldn't help but feel catapulted back to the 1950s when I perused all the quotes and "professional" research on women's attitudes towards the almighty hook-up.

This is a publication that, as I said before, is ultimately directed towards parents and alumni, and I feel that women on this campus should be outraged at the fact that we have been represented in this light. This attitude is what is demeaning and stereotyping women on this campus. Whether you read the article or not the mindset here seems to be that women are using sex for a commitment and they turn into bunny-boilers a la "Fatal Attraction" if they are denied.

Maybe women's lib hasn't gotten us far enough to have more women than men asking for the date or proposing, but I would like to think we're a little farther along than sitting by the phone on Sunday waiting for Prince Charming to call. At a University filled with successful, intelligent women its truly a shame that we are still seen as no more than sex objects, and desperate ones at that. Perhaps Bucknell World would be better off doing an article on sexy single women whose minds are occupied with more than whether or not Johnny is going to call.

Manhattan woman files suit seeking $1.4 trillion in reparations for slavery for all African-Americans

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

On Tuesday, attorneys for a former law student filed a federal lawsuit that seeks to collect reparations for the descendants of slaves. Although the filing does not give a specific dollar value, it is estimated that the amount could range as high as $1.4 trillion. The lawsuit names eight major corporations alleged to have profited from the slave trade over 137 years ago. According to Fox News, Deadria Farmer-Paellman, claiming to represent the nation's 35 million African-Americans, filed the lawsuit against Aetna Inc., CSX Corp. and FleetBoston Financial among others.

"We are going to finally hold corporations accountable for the crimes against humanity that they've committed against my ancestors," Farmer-Paellmann told reporters Tuesday. While the suit currently names eight corporations, the plaintiffs hope to file more suits naming up to 1,000 corporations with direct ties to slavery. CNN is reporting that, among other things, the companies are being accused of conspiracy, human rights violations and unjust enrichment from participation in the slave trade. Farmer-Paellman contends that Aetna "insured human slave owners against the loss of their human chattel." Aetna provided Farmer-Paellman with documents regarding corporate policy on the insurance of slaves. CSX is accused of using railways that were built by slaves during the 1800s. Finally, Fleet Boston is named as the direct corporate descendant of Providence Bank. The implication here is that the bank loaned money to one John Brown (a founder of Brown University), a slave trader, and thus the bank profited from slavery. The plaintiffs are being represented by some of the lawyers that were responsible for winning $8 billion from Swiss banks for Holocaust victims.

Deadria Farmer-Paellman is suing American companies for their connections to slavery.

According to CNN, the company responded to the lawsuit with a statement saying, "We do not believe a court would permit a lawsuit over events which — however regrettable — occurred hundreds of years ago. These issues in no way reflect Aetna today."

While a spokeswoman for Fleet Boston said the company would not comment on the lawsuit, railroad company CSX has issued a statement in defense of itself. The statement says "The claimants named CSX because slave labor was used to construct portions of some U.S. rail lines under the political and legal system in place more than a century before CSX was formed in 1980. The lawsuit to be filed in federal court in New York City against CSX and other corporations demanding financial reparations is wholly without merit and should be dismissed."

A CNN/USA Today/Gallup poll shows a wide divergence of opinion on reparations between white and African American respondents. Nine out of 10 white respondents said the government should not make cash payments to descendants of slaves while 55 percent of African American respondents said that the government should make payments. Seventy-five percent of African American respondents said that corporations who profited from slavery should set up scholarship funds while only 35 percent of white respondents said that they should.

Although Farmer-Paellman's suit is the first of its kind, it is unlikely to be the last. According to Fox News, it is rumored that lawsuits against institutions such as New York Life, AIG, JP Morgan Chase Manhattan Bank, as well as Harvard University and Yale University are currently being researched.

However, Fox News legal analyst Andrew Napolitano does not think the lawsuit will win. "I don't think it will prevail. It's inconceivable that someone alive or enjoying this wealth today had anything to do with it 150 years ago." Columbia scholar Manning Marable feels that the lawsuits do not have to win a judgment to accomplish their purpose. Manning told Fox News, "To me it's not fundamentally about the money, it is about the truth of history and bringing the truth to light, which will promote a frank and honest discussion across the racial divide."

Critics of the lawsuit claim that the companies and political environment today look nothing like they did over 100 years ago. They also claim that it is unfair to punish shareholders who were not even alive during the era of slavery.

Prince Abdullah proposes peace plan as violence erupts in Middle East

By Matthew Hinson
Business & Politics Editor

This week has witnessed interesting developments in the struggle for lasting peace between Israel and her Palestinian population. The week began full of hope, as a summit of the Arab League was set to convene, in which Crown Prince Abdullah of Saudi Arabia was to outline a plan for lasting peace between the two concerned peoples. Vice President Dick Cheney was in the region, pushing for peace between Palestinians and Israelis, while berating Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat to do more to curb violence by his people.

Cheney also was traveling to test the political waters, trying to determine how the Middle East would react to a U.S. attempt to topple the regime of Iraqi President Saddam Hussein. Cheney returned home without any support for a U.S. attack on Iraq. The United States also was pressuring Israel heavily to let Arafat attend the summit of the Arab nations, as it was believed that his presence would aid a possible settlement.

As the week went on it became clear that Israel's demand that Arafat call a truce to the violence that has raged for the last year in exchange for letting him go to the summit would not be accepted by the aging Palestinian. Arafat decided early this week that he would not go, stating that he would rather sit out the summit than let Israel dictate cease-fire terms to Palestinian negotiators. Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak also declined to attend, nor were Moammar Gaddafi or Saddam Hussein, each leaders of Arab League member states, in attendance.

The Arab summit convened early Wednesday. The highlight of the meeting was Abdullah's fleshing out of his plan to satisfactorily resolve the questions of Israeli security and Palestinian statehood. The main points of the proposed agreement call for Israel redrawing its borders to what they were in 1967, before two wars which increased Israeli sovereign territory. In exchange for the creation of a Palestinian state and allowance for the return of hundreds of thousands of Palestinian refugees from camps all over the world the Arab states would recognize and normalize relations with Israel and guarantee the security of Israel as a state. From Ramallah, Israel, where he is under house arrest, Arafat applauded the initiative, calling for the League to adopt the Prince's ideas. Israel's first reaction was to reject the right of refugees to return, as they have done in the past, and to desire to know specifically what Abdullah means when he says "normalization" of relations.

Then, as the summit opened on Wednesday, a Palestinian suicide bomber blew himself up in the town of Netanya, killing 15 people and injuring more than 100 in a hotel on the eve of Passover. Israel has promised that such an act will bring devastating military strikes to the Palestinians, and there are fears that this will end hopes for peace talks. President Bush called on Arafat to help halt the violence. Abdullah's plan seemed to have been a light at the end of the tunnel for both sides. Hopes for peace though faint, still exist, for an end to this most recent conflict between Palestinians and Israelis, which has claimed over 1,500 lives in the past 18 months.

American pilot, shot down during Gulf war may be alive in Iraq

By Michael Gorman
Business & Politics Editor

Iraqi officials said on Sunday that they were willing to accept a U.S. delegation to discuss the fate of a pilot who was downed during the first days of the Gulf War. According to Fox News, Lt. Cmdr. Michael Scott Speicher was lost when his Navy F/A-18 Hornet jet was shot down on Jan. 17, 1991. He was initially listed as the first casualty of the Gulf War. However, the Pentagon changed that status last year after receiving persistent reports that Speicher was alive and in captivity in Iraq. He is now classified as missing in action (MIA). In 1995, investigators found the canopy, spent flares, and pieces of a flight suit at Speicher's crash site. No trace of Speicher was found.

According to Fox News, the State Department asked the Iraqi government, through the International Red Cross, for any information regarding the downed pilot after his status was changed. The Iraqi government maintains that the pilot was killed without ejecting from the plane but that no body was found. "We presume that he is dead," Iraq's U.N. Ambassador Mohammad Al-Douri told Fox News on Sunday. When the ambassador was asked about why the topic was being brought now he said "Really I think that's part of the campaign against Iraq."

According to CNN, an unnamed Iraqi official said that the best way to solve "such mere technical matters" was through designated legal channels. A State Department spokeswoman said that the United States "is deeply committed to resolving the fate of all Gulf War missing in action," including Speicher.

We all pay when Congress leaves emissions standards lax

B&P Commentary

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

Last week, while many of us were busy enjoying spring break, our national political process failed to provide adequate leadership. Special interests from the oil companies to the automobile industry lobbied hard to stop any effective fuel emissions standards for automobile mileage for the U.S. car market. This disingenuous legislation was heralded as a great victory for the American consumer by corporate interests and others with anything to gain from economic and environmental shortsightedness.

Corporations were not alone in this work -- labor unions were in league with them. The same coalition that successfully advocated for drilling in the Alaskan Arctic Wildlife Refuge last fall came through once again. The bill, co-sponsored by Senators John McCain (R-Ariz.) and John Kerry (D-Mass.), was a minimal proposal to increase mileage requirements so industry would have an incentive to produce safer and more fuel-efficient cars while lowering our dependence on foriegn oil imports. Now, however, business as usual will continue at the expense of the consumer and the environment. We need not worry for the forseeable future: we as a nation will be able to drive the largest fleet of gas guzzlers on the planet. The United States can continue in its denial of its addictions to too large personal transportation, imported oil, the pollution and all the foreign policy nightmares that will surely come with it.

Senator Trent Lott (R-Miss.) was ecstatic at the defeat of the proposal. Holding up a picture of a small economy model car he stated, "We do not want to consign the American driver to cars such as this one."

In retaliation, Kerry held up a photo of the Toyota Prius, a hybird/electric car on sale today, saying, "This is the car of the future-a bridge technology toward fuel cell driven autos." The unions (Teamsters and Autoworkers especially) supported this legislation because they would see increased employment in the short run. The New York Times reported that the 700,000 jobs projected by unions were probably overinflated tenfold at least. The stilted debate on the Senate floor went forward, but the outcome was not surprising as it went down in defeat, beaten by the usual suspects.

The winners were corporate and union interests in the short run, but the long-term losers were the American people and the rest of the world. The United States already uses 25 percent of the world's energy and nothing has been accomplished to change this fact. Markets have driven us into the current predicament of oil and energy dependence. How can markets alone extricate us from this practice that distorts our foreign policy while limiting our options even as new technologies come online to aid the problem? Conservative economics will ultimately fail without effective regulation.

The jobs the unions anticipate will be produced, but not efficiently or inexpensively. Studies by the U.S. Geological Survey conclude that at current prices the Arctic oil is too expensive to produce. Economist Paul Krugman writes that what the energy companies really want is the $35 billion in tax breaks and subsidies the Bush energy plan will provide. The jobs will end with the end of these tax breaks and subsidies and we will be no closer to energy independence. In fact, we will be worse off because we will have wasted more precious time and resources as we drive blindly forward in our sport utility vehicles. Our wasteful, selfish attitudes are reinforced by our friendly lobbyists in Washington who will tell us just what we want to hear. All the while the rest of the world uneasily worries over the direction the United States is leading the world as time grows short for an adequate energy solution.

Men's lacrosse rides win streak

Justin Sussman '03 tallied 19 saves against Army and earned him P.L. defensive player of the week.

The men's lacrosse team executed on both sides of the ball en route to a 14-4 victory over Holy Cross on March 23, capping off a three-game win streak. Army and Mount St. Mary's fell victim to the Bison's stingy defense earlier in the week, falling 8-5 and 5-3, respectively.

The Bison have allowed only 12 goals in the past three games, the best the team has done since 1970. They showed what relentless defense could accomplish when combined with a productive offense against Holy Cross.

"That's the best we've played all year, and we can still play better," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said. "We went after them and they couldn't get their feet set at all."

Chris Cara '05 registered four goals and added three assists to ignite the Bison offense.

"We moved the ball around well, and the crease was wide open because we did a good job dodging the defenders," Cara said.

Dennis Geraghty '03 tallied five goals to help the Bison control the ball, giving his team's defense the opportunity to rest.

"Our offense did a great job of helping out our defense," Jamieson said. "Holy Cross didn't have the ball as much, which put less pressure on our defense."

Against Army, the Bison jumped out to an early 2-0 lead and never looked back. Although the offense wasn't able to put as many points on the board, the defense was in gear and able to prevent the Black Knights from gaining any advantage.

"We had a few opportunities where we didn't score when we should've, but we did what we had to do to get the win," Cara said.

Justin Sussman '03 made 19 saves against Army and now has a save percentage of .646, his play earned him the Patriot League Defensive Player of the Week award for the second straight week. Leading the defense in front of Sussman has been Kevin Smithies '02, who has made it difficult for opponents to get good shots.

"We've been settling in to our timing, and everyone's starting to get comfortable playing with each other," Smithies said.

It was the defense once again that prevailed in the Mount St. Mary's contest, as Smithies made 16 saves, and helped the Bison allow only three goals. Cara and John Salveson '05 added critical fourth quarter goals to seal the victory.

"We always win games on the defensive end of the field," Jamieson said. "This was a perfect example of that."

The wins over Army and Holy Cross are important because of League implications. The Bison hope that the three-game win streak can help them in future Patriot League play as they look to defend their title. The Bison next face League rival Hobart, a school that is synonymous with lacrosse.

They'll have to do it without two key players who have suffered injuries during play. Wes Fetchet '04, who was Patriot League Rookie of the Year in 2001, and solid midfielder John Terracciano '03 will both be out for the season because of torn ACL ligaments.

"It puts a big dent in our experience," Jamieson said. "Now we have to go to the drawing board and try to find a way to get it done. Our guys are starting to settle in, and I think we'll be able to rebound."

The Bison, who are now ranked among the top 20 in the nation, know they'll need to have a game like they had against Holy Cross if they want to beat Hobart, as they did last year.

"We're the defending champions, so we're favored. We just have to focus on our game and we'll get it done," Smithies said.

Tennis teams excise Mount St. Mary's and St. Bonaventure

By Caity Selleck
Senior Writer

Last weekend, both the men's and women's tennis teams had successful matches. The men's team traveled to St. Joseph's, while the women's team hosted Mount St. Mary's and St. Bonaventure. Over spring break, both teams traveled to Hilton Head, S.C., where the women's team went 2-2 in match play, and the men's team went 2-1, suffering its first loss of the spring season in its last game of the break.

On March 24, the women scored a decisive victory over Mount St. Mary's, sweeping all matches in doubles and singles play. On March 23, the team beat St. Bonaventure, 5-2. Winning for the Bison were Nadezda Curcic '05, who took the second singles slot, 6-0, 6-1, Kristin Inglis '02, who won the fourth slot 6-4, 7-5, Tanya Sichko '05, who won the fifth slot, 6-0, 6-1, and Samantha Berthod, in the sixth slot, who won by default. The lady Bison also won the second doubles slot, 8-3, and the third slot by default.

"Spring break is usually the first opportunity for us to play matches in the spring season," Helt said. "The team played well, considering it is still early in for us. Because we don't have indoor facilities in which to train, our players are always weeks behind most of the teams we play in terms of 'match play'. Playing four matches over spring break gives our players the very crucial 'match experience' and definitely helps prepare us to play well against our rivals."

The team also spent its free time together over the break, bringing the players closer together.

"We spent a lot of time together as a team, going to dinner and hanging out," Sichko said. "I feel that this really made us closer and stronger as a team."

Yu Ling Huang—The Bucknellian

The men's tennis team picked up their first loss of the spring to American.

In match competition, the Bison lost their last competition of the break to Southern Mississippi by a score of 4-1. Sichko was the lone winner for Bucknell in the fifth singles slot, winning by scores of 6-1 and 6-2.

On March 12, Bucknell swept Indian-Purdue-Fort Wayne 7-0, winning all singles and doubles matches in decisive victories after losing to Indiana State 7-0 the day before. In their first match of the break, the Bison beat Radford 7-0, starting off their training trip on a positive note, again sweeping all of the singles and doubles matches.

"The more matches we play, the stronger we will get," Curcic said. "We realized that there is still room for improvement after our match against Southern Mississippi, but overall, everyone on the team gave their best, and if keep working hard we should be able to make it to the Patriot League tournament at the end of April, which is our goal this season."

The Bucknell men's team improved its record to 5-1 with a 6-1 win over St. Joseph's on March 24. Scoring points for the Bison were Alex Davydov '02, with scores of 6-3, 7-6 in the first singles slot, Leland Tien '05, with scores of 6-4, 6-4 in the third slot, Todd Jacobs '03, with 6-0, 6-1 in the fourth slot, Gerald DiChiara '05, with 7-5, 3-6, 6-3 in the fifth slot, and Scott Allen '02, with scores of 6-1, 6-1. The Bison took the last two slots for doubles play.

Over spring break, the men's tennis team suffered its first loss of the spring season to Patriot League competitor American University with a score of 6-0, as the second singles slot did not finish, allowing for an undecided seventh point. Tien lost a close singles match to American's fifth slot player with scores of 6-4 and 7-5.

The men's team also playcd and beat IPFW with a score of 5-2 on March 14. Winning for the Bison were Jacobs, defeating the third singles' competition 6-1, 6-2, Tien, who took the fourth singles win with scores of 6-3, 6-1, DiChiria, who won the fifth singles 6-2, 6-3, and Allen, who took the sixth singles slot with scores of 6-0, 6-3.

Bucknell also won the second and third doubles slots with scores of 8-0 and 8-4 respectively. Bucknell's first matches of the break netted strong showings against Georgetown and Wilmington, as they won by scores of 6-1 and 7-0, respectively.

"Our strength and the key to our success so far this year is our depth," Allen said. "We have seven guys that could legitimately play one for our team. This gives us a lot of flexibility with the line-up and makes us a tough team to beat."

Women's bball falls to Baylor at NCAA tourney

By Andrew Bevan

By winning the school's first-ever women's Patriot League Championship, the Bucknell women's basketball team earned the right to participate in the NCAA tournament. The Orange and Blue's 88-74 victory over top-seeded Holy Cross on March 6 that ended the Crusaders' 61-game home winning streak against League opponents sent the Bison to the field of 64 for the first time in school history.

"Going to the NCAAs was an unforgettable experience. You work so hard to get there, always having it as an ultimate goal in mind. I've been watching March Madness for years now and reading the brackets with envy—to finally be part of it all is unbelievably rewarding," Monique Leb-Blanc '02 said.

"Our team worked very hard at becoming a true team, and I think it showed by the way whoever was out on the court played well together, and how awesome the bench was. Also, so many of us have always dreamed at a chance to go to the 'big dance' and it was awesome to get to go," Molly Creamer '03 said.

The team learned their seed and who their opponent would be on Sunday, March 10 on the tournament selection show broadcast by ESPN. The Orange and Blue were selected as the number 15 seed in the East region and would square off against number two seed Baylor in the first round. The Bison traveled to Waco, Texas to square off against the Lady Bears on their home court on March 15.

"We had heard everything from a 14 to a 16 seed and Duke and Vanderbilt were two potential opponents that were tossed around. Baylor was not really talked about so it was a surprise in a way. Watching the show and seeing our name and the players so excited was a neat experience," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said.

"Everything in regards to the tournament was done so well. It was done first class across the board, especially from our administration. Tim Pavlechko, Amanda Backus, John Hardt and everyone else involved did such a good job in making all of the arrangements for us. They just asked us to focus on getting ready for the game and they took care of the rest. They were awesome," Fedorjaka said.

The contest was a close battle at the beginning but the home team pulled away from the Orange and Blue near the halfway point of the first stanza and would maintain a sizable advantage before eventually securing an 80-56 victory. The win was the first-ever for the Lady Bears (27-5) in NCAA tournament play.

With 11 minutes left in the first half, Baylor led the Bison 23-17 and then exploded on an 11-0 run over the next three minutes. They went on to outscore the Orange and Blue 13-10 the rest of the half and entered the locker rooms with a 47-27 lead.

"The coaches and I truly believed we could go down there and pull off the upset. We knew we had to have our best game to probably do it but we all confidence that the team could do it. We still felt good at halftime being down 20 and didn't think we were out of it," Fedorjaka said.

The host team shot 52 percent from the floor for the game while the Bison shot only 32 percent. Baylor dominated on the glass as well, outrebounding the Orange and Blue 46-25. Creamer led the Bison with 18 points and Desire Almind '04 added 14.

"Everybody was relaxed and calm and not intimidated at all by the crowd, which at 9,800 was the largest ever at a Baylor game. The team came out of the gates well, which we needed," Fedorjaka said.

"They had a lead of 12 with around two minutes left in the first half and I thought this was a critical point in the game because we had made some defensive stops but we were unable to score during this stretch. I was hoping at that point that we could cut into their lead some and get it into single digits by halftime," Fedorjaka said.

"I credit the kids so much because they played great defense and we were getting good looks but they weren't falling," Fedorjaka said.

"I was very proud of how our players hung in there in the second half. We were only outscored by four in the second half and I thought our team earned a lot of respect from Baylor and the crowd," Fedorjaka said.

"Baylor was a great team, probably the best we have faced all year, so even though we lost, it was just a great opportunity to get to play against a top level team in the country for 40 minutes," Creamer said.

"They put a lot of attention on Molly but I thought she played well and kept her head. I thought it was great for Desire to end her sophomore year with that performance. Her scoring really showed her great athleticism and I thought that would help her in a game at this level against the number seven-ranked team in the country," Fedorjaka said.

"I also thought Kate Franks '03 was really aggressive and made some great moves. She was really effective off the dribble," Fedorjaka said.

The boys of spring

As the Major League Baseball's regular season looms on the horizon, it's time to bid farewell to yet another heart-pounding session of Spring Training festivities. There's nothing quite like Spring Training—a tradition abounding in 13-run games, humble ballparks and non-descript players donning uniform numbers higher than the Tampa Bay Devil Rays' combined age. It's an opportunity for contending teams to kick back and experiment, aware that Spring Training games have been statistically proven to "mean nothing." Meanwhile, teams with no chance whatsoever at achieving any level of respectability during the regular season can bask in the glory of a 20-8 record in the preseason, boldly sustaining the delusion that the goings on in Spring Training actually foreshadow events to come in the "real" games.

It's a chance for baseball writers to rev up their laptops and flex their gossip muscles, providing the public with a day-by-day report of how the free-agents are settling into their new homes and which rookies will be "the next [enter famous baseball player of choice]."

And it's an opportunity for teams to decide who to ship back to the AA ranks and who to honor as the subject of the regular season's first bobblehead giveaway night.

But Spring Training hasn't always been about meaningless games and cutesy souvenirs. There was a time when it was pure—a time when it was just about meaningless games. And sobering up.

Back in the 1880s, the offseason was a time for players to laze about and maximize alcoholic intake as much as possible. For some teams, allegedly including Cap Anson's boozy 1886 Chicago White Stockings, preseason warm-weather training was a chance to tone down what had been a few months' worth of perpetual intoxication (which, invariably, started right back up again during the season).

Although the stately tradition of ballplaying lushes has long since fallen by the wayside, Spring Training burrowed its way into baseball's annual routine based on a different function—financial benefits. Greed, of course, is a tradition that has not only thrived in baseball, but has blossomed into an all-consuming force reminiscent of the Audrey II in Little Shop of Horrors. And Spring Training, historically, has been an additive in the blood that kept it blooming.

It was A.M. Gilliam, a reporter for the Philadelphia Record, who came up with a masterful scheme to profit - and help owners profit - from the training sessions down South. He would pay teams for updates and gossip from their training camps, and then serve the news to the public, who in turn would lap up the reports and game scores. Thus the Spring Training phenomenon was born.

Eventually every team had some sort of Spring Training plan set out for itself, fully equipped with sportswriters and fan-followings. Contests were scheduled against other teams' squads, giving the media and fans more meaningless games in which to indulge themselves. As the whole fiasco became formalized, leagues began to develop, the most prominent one being Florida's Grapefruit League, which cropped up in 1914.

Although Florida was by far the most popular locale, a few squads did experiment with westward springtime ventures. The Chicago Cubs parked themselves in Los Angeles as early as 1903, and subsequently bounced from city to city in the western half of the United States. The New York Giants, Boston Red Sox and Chicago White Sox also dabbled in non-Floridian Spring Training episodes.

It wasn't until 1945 that the Cactus League was actually christened, and by 1947 it had a little drawing power of its own. Sure, it only consisted of two teams—the Giants and the Cleveland Indians—but those teams happened to field guys like Mel Ott, Bob Feller and Lou Boudreau. When the Major Leagues began shipping teams to the left coast permanently, the Cactus League swelled with the addition of teams like the L.A. Dodgers, San Diego Padres and Seattle Pilots.

The Spring Training spectacle has evolved quite a bit since the days of its infancy. The Cactus League has managed to scrounge up 10 teams, and the Grapefruit League has 20. The number of camp invitees has skyrocketed, while the average blood-alcohol level of players has slightly declined. Ticket prices are higher, facilities are swankier, players are haughtier and Disney has found a way to profit from Spring Training games.

That's not to say we shouldn't enjoy the "Boys of Spring" while we can. On Monday, the days of leisure will be over; the games will start to count. The good teams will start winning. The lousy teams start looking, well, lousy. MLB.com will start actually charging for their audio broadcasts.

But until that dark day steals the spring away, I'm going to kick back and bask in the soundwaves of free broadcasts and carefree games. After all, my Baltimore Orioles are but two contests away from the coveted Grapefruit League Pennant.

And we all know how much that means.

Women's lacrosse goes 2-2 over not-so-spring break

While many students flocked to the warm south for spring break, the women's lacrosse team remained in frigid Lewisburg to compete in four games.

"Spring break definitely gave our team an opportunity to bond. We played four games over break, had many team meals together and traveled a lot. One of the greatest things about our team is the fact that we can have so much fun together doing absolutely nothing," Co-Captain Jen Gianis '02 said. "Everyone's attitudes were so amazing. No one was disappointed that they weren't lying on some beach somewhere, but instead we were all focused on the task at hand and enjoyed being together."

Nicole Kallis '03 earned Patriot League Player of the Week with 12 saves.

The team's togetherness proved to be an asset in its four contests over break. On March 13, they squared off against Fairfield for a non-conference showdown. The Bison jumped out to a 5-1 lead with 12:27 left in the first half and went on to defeat the Stags 11-6. The victory is due in part to the stellar efforts of Suzanne Raffaele '03, who netted five goals, and goalkeeper Nicole Kallis '03, who contributed 12 saves in the net.

"The Patriot League games were tough; we came out ready to play and did just that. They were all surprised by the performances that we gave," Gianis said.

The Bison began Patriot League competition on March 16 when they hosted the American Eagles. After taking a 2-1 lead 12 minutes into the first half, the Orange and Blue faced a 7-0 run by the Eagles.

In the second half of action, the Bison showed signs of a comeback when they went on a three-goal run, but time ran out before they could complete their task, allowing American to walk away with a 9-5 victory. Co-Captain Melissa Montefusco '02 led the offense with two goals, one in each half of the loss.

In their second Patriot League match on March 21, the Bison took on the Mountain Hawks of Lehigh. They jumped out to a 4-0 lead and never let Lehigh close, reeling in their first Patriot League victory 13-8. Montefusco again led the Bison's offense, having a hand in six of their 13 goals.

She opened the first half by scoring the first goal of the game unassisted with 26:28 left, continuing for two more assists and two more goals in the half. Raffale '03 led the team in goals with four, two in each half of the vic-

Individual honors can't erase 1-6 spring break record

By Meghann Chipko

After its four-game sweep over inter-conference rival Cornell two weeks ago, the Bison baseball team was excited to discover that two of its players received Patriot League honors for the week ending on March 24.

Sean Magee '02 was named Patriot League Pitcher of the Week because of his impressive 2-0 record for the season after the Bison's first home series. He also struck out seven players in his 11 innings of work and gave up only eight hits.

Brian Day '05 was awarded Patriot League Rookie of the Week honors after he assisted the Bison offensively, especially in their series against Bloomsburg. His pinch-hit grand slam in the bottom of the sixth led the team to a convincing victory.

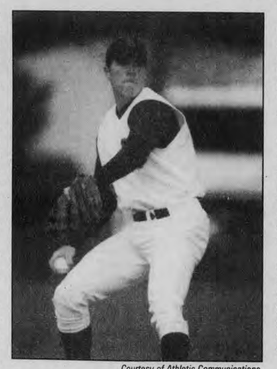
"I think we are starting to pull together, and I think we look good going into the Patriots," Day said.

Along with fielding the two honored players, the baseball team has competed in some pretty tough matches to lead it full swing into mid-season.

Over spring break, the Bison traveled to Florida looking forward to good competition against teams such as Indiana, Illinois and Dartmouth. Though the team finished off the week 1-6, the Bison remain pcsitive.

"The spring break trip provided us a good opportunity to work on a lot of things, the team did great work, all games could have gone either way, and we were competitive," Head Coach Gene Depew said.

This past weekend, on March 23, the Bison matched up in a double-header against nearby rival Bloomsburg at home. The Herd, 9-13 after the weekend, split the two games with the Huskies, winning its morning game and losing a heartbreaker at night after an unfortunate fielding error.



Courtesy of Athletic Communications
Coming out of the bullpen in a clutch situation, Chris Lackett '02 came through for the Bison.

"A good offensive lineup and good, timely hitting gave us success this weekend," Depew said. The Bison had a convincing 9-5 win.

Starting pitcher R.J. Grant '03 picked up his first win of the season, pitching five innings and holding Bloomsburg to only five hits and two runs.

The Bison offense started off strong, scoring nine runs off Bloomsburg's starter Biedermann. The Bison took an early 3-0 lead in the top of the first, and the Huskies could only answer with one run in the bottom of that inning.

The Bison finished up in the bottom of the third with an impressive 8-1 lead. A wild pitch forced a run with bases loaded, and both Ben Stoll '04 and Chris Cipolloni '04 hit two-run singles to increase the lead.

Chris Lackett '02 entered the game in the middle of the sixth to pitch for the Bison. With no outs, two runners on base, and high pressure, Lackett struck out the remaining three batters to finish up the game with a victory.

Later that night, the second match-up against the Huskies proved less fortunate. Unable to find an offensive surge, and making a few game-changing fielding mistakes, the Bison ended up losing a close game 3-2.

The Bison look forward to facing Penn State this upcoming week, then to beginning their Patriot League showdown against Holy Cross at home.

"It should be a very competitive series and a good barometer for the rest of the Patriot League play," Depew said.

Lack of green won't stop golf team from getting their putt on

The golf team has started practice for its spring season and hopes to build on its success. Both the men's and women's teams practice about two hours a day, five days a week, as well as in their spare time, seeking to maximize their skills and perform as well as possible. This year looks to be another successful season for the teams and they are eager for the season to begin.

Men's Captain Nick Leibowitz '02 will try to lead his team to another productive spring. The team has a large amount of youth and a lot of potential for a great future.

The Bison competed in Fredericksburg, Va., this week to begin their season. They train whenever possible and each golfer looks to improve on his past performances. The team looks for strong performances from Scott Leeder '04 and Abbie Valentine '04, along with other players.

"We're hoping to have a good season," Dan Gale '02 said. The team trains hard and looks forward to facing its biggest rivals, such as Colgate, Cornell and Lehigh. The women's team also expects a strong showing this year.

The women had a successful fall and although they must overcome obstacles, wish to experience similar results in the spring.

Courtesy of Athletic Communications
Captain Nick Leibowitz '02 will lead a young but talented group.

The team lost three key players to study-abroad programs, but Head Coach Kevin Jamieson feels the younger talent will step in to compensate for the players who are absent. The brand new lineup will face difficult competition throughout the season, including key rivals Princeton, Notre Dame, William and Mary and Yale.

The team's biggest strength on the greens is its driving ability. Jessica Hetrich '03 can drive the ball 240 yards, the longest of anyone on the team. The team's most crucial weakness is its lack of collegiate experience, but the players will be exposed to many matches this year, allowing them to build upon their skills.

"We had a great fall season for our young program and look to continue our success throughout the spring," Jamieson said.

Hilary Mainka '02 will be the team leader this year, and hopes for quality performances from everyone. Contributing to the new talent are Jaime Hays '05, Allison Kasic '05 and Caitlin Sullivan '05. The team plays at William and Mary over Easter weekend.

Rea breaks Bucknell all-time goals record

By Barb Morgan
Senior Writer

The Bucknell women's water polo team traveled to Villanova this past weekend to compete in the Villanova Invitational. On Saturday the Bison played three games against opponents Villanova, Iona and Queens.

The Bison faced league opponent Villanova in their first game of the day, and fell to the Wildcats 10-8. The Orange and Blue fell behind by one, 3-2, after the first quarter, but fought back to tie the game at 6-6 at the half.

Both teams scored twice in the third before the Bison were outscored 2-0 in the last quarter. Senior Co-Captain Brooke Rea '02 led the team throughout and in all aspects of the game. Rea tied the University's single-game record with a career best of six goals, and added an assist, for a season high of seven points.

In addition to goals and assists, Rea also registered two steals. Also scoring for the Bison was Kelly Hofstetter '04, who scored the other two Bison goals.

"Although the calls were not coming, Rea fought on scoring throughout the game," Head Coach John Zeigler said.

The next opponent of the day was Iona, and at the half Bucknell found themselves at a 0-5 deficit. Bucknell could not recover in the second half, and lost to Iona 10-4. In the game, four different players put goals in the net, including Co-Captain Adrienne Schober '02, Rea, Cody Keffer '05 and Ashley Aiken '05. In addition to their goals, the first-year athletes each added an assist, as did Larissa Brown '05. Goalkeeper Lindsay Chesterfield '03 recorded six saves in the contest, as Bucknell moved to 5-12 on the season.

In the night game, and third game of the day, the Bison put together offense and defense and turned out a strong 12-2 win against Queens. The Bison shut down Queens with their inside game, and allowed their opponent only two goals, both on outside shots. The Orange and Blue were able to put 12 goals on the board, with eight different team members scoring.

Rea again led the team with three goals. In scoring her third goal of the contest, Rea became the University's leading goal scorer with 133 career tallies. Also putting up points for the Bison were goals, Aiken and Schober, each with two goals, and Hofstetter, Meg Blitzer '05, Eileen Ketterer '05, Brown and Keffer contributing one goal apiece.

The Orange and Blue jumped out to an early 2-0 lead after one quarter. At the half, the score stood at 6-2, after a four-goal performance by the Bison in the second quarter. Bucknell recorded six goals in the second half, including five in the third quarter, while holding Queens scoreless the rest of the game. In addition to a season high 12 goals, the Bison also recorded 18 steals, a number which clearly exhibits the strong defensive effort. The defense was led by Katie Hartigan '05. "[She] essentially shut down any two-meter player Queens had and was a big reason for our allowing only two goals in the game," Zeigler said.

Also, goalkeeper Chesterfield finished with five saves. Combining strong consistent defense with counterattack and movement on offense, the Bison put together a 12-2 win in their last contest of the day. The teams record improves to 6-12.

The Bison will be in action at home again, on April 5 and 6 when they host the final event ever to be held in the Freas-Rooke Pool with games against opponents Villanova, George Washington and Princeton.

Creamer finishes season with team lead in points, assists and steals

By Brian Klotz
Senior Writer

It seemed an unlikely outcome. The Bucknell women's basketball team had upset the regular season Patriot League champions, Holy Cross, in the final game of the Patriot League tournament. Holy Cross hadn't been beaten at home by league opponents in 61 games, and Bucknell hadn't won against Holy Cross in the last 14 confrontations. There were several players that were integral to the success of the team that night, but Molly Creamer '03, who led the team in points, defensive rebounds, assists and minutes on the court, guided the way for the Bison's first ever trip to the NCAA tournament.

Creamer's dream of someday playing in the tournament had finally come true.

"Yes, it was always a goal of mine to make it to the tournament," said Creamer. "I got that from growing up watching the men's tournament. I have this big cutout on my wall that says 'If you wanna go to the big dance, you can't be shy.'"

"We recruited Molly three to four years ago and she certainly was a player who had a goal to get to the NCAA tournament," Head Coach Kathy Fedorjaka said. "She had a certain drive in her, a passion. She wanted to do that. I think you have to have a vision to get somewhere and I think Molly's vision has led this team to some belief and has driven them."

The team finished the regular season with an 18-9 record, coming off of a big win at Lehigh. It was in that game that Creamer hit a three pointer to send the game into overtime. Along with the team's win against Pittsburgh at Pitt, and a win at the Bahamas tournament, this became one of Creamer's season highlights, and after it, the team got rolling again.

"We had just lost to Holy Cross the game before the Lehigh game, which meant we wouldn't win the regular season title," Creamer said. "But we didn't roll over, won the game and went on a win streak."

After the big win against Holy Cross, Creamer remembered the atmosphere and the celebration.

"People were sobbing and laughing because they were so happy," she said. "The range of emotions was big, but it was the same in that it was all excitement. We didn't get back until like three in the morning because we all went and synchronized swam. The drive home was a good feeling because we had never really come back on a good bus ride from Holy Cross before."

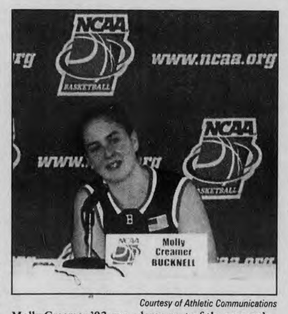
Creamer finished the regular season with 673 total points, 177 assists, and 82 steals, leading the Lady Bison in those three categories. Fedorjaka is impressed by how the team reacts when Creamer is on the court.

"She is very confident in herself, and players on this team feed off of that," Fedorjaka said. "Through her work ethic, dedication and her poise, Molly is absolutely a player who has the ability to raise the level of everyone that she plays with."

"The biggest thing that Molly brings to the team is leadership," teammate Maribel Castillo '02 said. "She's in there an hour before practice and two hours after, working hard on and off the court. She does it all and the team feeds off of her."

For Creamer, her first visit to the tournament was nothing short of special.

"It was our first time, and we were so close as a team," said Creamer. "Winning the championship was so awesome because it meant the trip to the NCAA tournament and being part of something bigger than yourself and your school. It's something you see growing up, and now you can say you were a part of it."



Courtesy of Athletic Communications
Molly Creamer '03 was a large part of the women's basketball team's success, leading the squad in points, assists and steals.

Although everything about the trip to the tournament was new including the organization, stepping out onto the court for the game brought back memories for Creamer.

"When we were warming up, Baylor's first player came out and the crowd went crazy," Creamer said. "There were so many fans, similar to the number at a state championship I played in. It was great to be a part of that for one night."

The game ended up with a final score of 80-56 in favor of Baylor. Creamer finished the game with 18 points, Desire Almind '04 had 14 and Kate Franks '03 had nine. Although the game wasn't the team's strongest of the season, the experience was.

"We knew we were up against one of the best teams in the nation and we gave a challenge," Creamer said. "Personally, I would have liked to play a little better. After the game was over, it was sad because it was our last game together."

Teammate Vicki Quimby '02 thinks that now the bar has been raised.

"Being it was our first year there, it sets a standard for the team to get back next year, and do whatever it takes to do that," she said.

Already looking ahead to her senior season, Creamer sees more of the same.

"My role will probably be similar to this year, but more so of a leadership role," Creamer said. "We have to make sure we have to let up, don't lose any easy ones and keep the mentality of playing every game like it's our last."

Fedorjaka summed up Creamer's effect on the team this year.

"Molly's play speaks for itself," she said. "Her play at the point guard position, being the on-the-floor general, her personality and her outlook on team all make her the player that she is. The other players know that Molly is in it for the team."

Athletes demand respect ... and a healthy stipend

Lately, I've been hearing a lot of talk about whether or not NCAA players, namely basketball, should be paid for their services. Yeah, NCAA basketball players need to get paid like "Love Boat: The Next Wave" needs to be aired for another season.

This is the most absurd malarkey I've heard in the sports community since the last time John Madden opened his mouth. Why on earth would we consider paying these students? They are students, not athletes. The concept is mind-boggling. It makes about as much sense as Dennis Miller's latest "Monday Night Football" dithyramb on fundamentalist Hittite code of laws in reference to a Michael Strahan sack.

Critics argue that the NCAA is just another big business that takes advantage of cheap/free labor. Basically, student athletes generate a lot of money by competing in the NCAA basketball tournament; a lot of money that never filters down to the players who make the sport possible.

Can anyone say "free college education?" Most players at Division 1 schools are given free rides to upper echelon universities simply to lead a team on the court and now they want to be paid, too? Where's the justice in that? That logic is about as sound as Ted Kennedy logrolling with an inner ear infection during Mardi Gras.

These players aren't pros; they are students. If they get paid for playing basketball in college, then all of a sudden they become professionals rather than students. Everyone else following the logic here? College athletics did not begin as a training ground for professional athletics and certainly not as a showcase of purchased talent. If we begin paying these students, then college athletics will become just as political as professional sports at a time when these people should be focusing on their studies—or at least bribing other people to care about their education and write their term papers for them.

And what would be the possible ramifications of paying these players? Well, let's take a look at it logically. Universities would need to shovel more money into already over-bloated, high profile programs like football and basketball. What happens to smaller programs who can't generate the types of revenues that these other sports can? What happens when a university needs to comply with Title IX regulations? What will happen to smaller programs like wrestling?

I'd like a free college education. How about you? But I can't shoot a layup over an oompaloompa with chronic fatigue syndrome and Amyotrophic Lateral Sclerosis—does that hurt my chances of a free ride?

Critics argue that these student-athletes don't have time to earn money with a part-time job when they are forced to split their time between workouts and class work. So how are they supposed to generate money for themselves? Well, simply put, if they don't have enough time to take on a part-time job, then they don't have time for a social life and ergo do not need the money to begin with.

And what would they spend that money on if they did get paid? I suppose the pessimist in me would think that they would spend that money on booze, drugs and grades. You don't think a star shooting guard getting a free ride to college to play basketball wouldn't think of turning his earnings around to get him a passing grade? Conversely, the optimist in me thinks these athletes would donate their money to local and international NGOs and TSMOs who struggle to monitor and inform the public about human rights violations throughout the world. Yeah, that's about as likely as a Hussein-sponsored Rockettes tour.

Look, when you accept a scholarship to a university, you must accept certain responsibilities. It's a part of the deal. If you accept an athletic scholarship, you understand that you are devoting yourself to certain demands. The same applies for those with merit-based scholarships. Those students realize that they must devote a significant portion of their time to keeping their GPA above a certain level. It's a SCHOLAR-ship, not an ATHLETE-ship.

I think these athletes must take a step back for a second and realize what they're already taking away from the system, instead of getting their Hanes boxer-briefs in a castrating knot and demanding more. These students will walk away in four years with a degree. That's more than another disadvantaged child with no three-point skills can say.

I'd like a free college education. How about you? But I can't shoot a layup over an oompaloompa with chronic fatigue syndrome and Amyotrophic Lateral Sclerosis—does that hurt my chances of a free ride? Or, what if I really excelled at bocce (which I do)? Where's my big contract? Someone get me Scott Boras on the phone.

I don't care what kind of revenues the NCAA is earning from their basketball tournament, paying these students is not the answer. What are the limits on this? If we start paying sports players, then why not other competitive ventures like chess or mancala? The journalistic community is extremely competitive, how about paying students for writing articles for The Bucknellian. Can I get a scholarship and a small yearly stipend for writing this pathetic excuse for a column? It seems to generate a lot of intrigue, if not hate mail.

The loss marks the end of an incredible season for the Orange and Blue who, en route to winning the program's first-ever League title, established a new school record for wins with 21, breaking a record they set just last year.

The defeat also marks the culmination of a spectacular career for the senior class of LeBlanc, Vicki Quimby, Kate Rounsley, Kate Florence, Rebekah May and Maribel Castillo, who will leave Bucknell as the program's all-time winningest class. What these six individuals have contributed to Bucknell women's basketball will be difficult to measure as they have played a huge part in taking the program to an entire new level.

"Winning the Patriot League Championship and getting a chance to play in the NCAA Tournament was a dream come true. This team has done amazing things this year and I was glad to be a part of it all," May said.

"The experience we had at the NCAA tournament was something that can not be put into words. It was just an incredible feeling to have everything that you have worked for so long and so hard for finally work out. The trip was well deserved for everyone on the team, especially all the seniors. I couldn't think of a better way of thanking them for everything they have done for the entire team. We couldn't have done it with out them and they will be truly missed next year," Franks said.

"They have been a big part of what we have done here. I thought winning the League title was very fitting for them being my first recruiting class. I sold to them the idea that we were building something that would produce a team at the top of the conference every year," Fedorjaka said.

"Being a senior, it's hard to come to grips with the fact that your career is over, but there is so much to be proud of this season. I'm grateful to have shared such a wonderful season with my best friends and to have ended my career on such a positive note and I hope it carries through to next year," Rounsley said.

"Being a senior on this team and this being my last game made it extra special for me. I know the six of us have been waiting for this our entire lives and to end our careers here at Bucknell in this style, one could not ask for a better exit," Quimby said.

They have been the core here and I am so happy that they get to go out like this. Winning the Patriot League title completes their resume and it is something they will remember for a lifetime," Fedorjaka said.

Patriot League can't get no respect

Hassan Booker, Mike Bright, Stefan Ciosici, Brian Ehlers, Rob Feaster, Adonal Foyle, Patrick King, Bob Krizansky, Tucker Neale, Sitapha Savane—the Patriot League men's basketball All-Decade Team reads as a who's who list of ... well, of obscurity. Even to a Patriot League buff like myself, knowing more than three of these players is an incredible feat. Let's face it, the Patriot League isn't exactly the ACC.

In 12 years, the Patriot League has sent 11 automatic qualifiers to the NCAA men's basketball tournament. The first Patriot League team to earn a birth was Fordham in 1992. The 14th seeded Rams, who have since left the conference on a permanent basis, were narrowly defeated by UMass 65-58 in the first round. The following year, Holy Cross received a 13th seed, only to be destroyed by number four Arkansas, 93-64. After the blowout, the Tournament committee decided that the newly founded Patriot League no longer deserved such a favorable seed (and yes, 13 is indeed favorable for most one-bid conferences). Since then, a Patriot League team has not been given a seed higher than 15th.

Rob Schmicker

Many points back the fact that we deserve such a low ranking. The RPI ranks the Patriot League as the fifth worst conference and for years, publications have declared the Patriot League as the only conference without a pro prospect. We are 0-11 in the first round of the NCAA tournament and our highest-ranking team in the RPI is Holy Cross at 162 (out of 324). All the facts point to the futility of our conference, but I am not convinced of this point. The Patriot League is getting better and deserves some credit in the years to come. Any one of the eight Patriot League teams can compete with the powerhouse teams when it comes Tournament time. For all of you who saw the Kansas game, you know what I'm talking about.

What makes the Patriot League attractive in my mind is the competitiveness of the conference. Every year it seems as if there is a three to four-team logjam at the top of the standings. This year, Holy Cross, American, Bucknell, Lafayette and Colgate were all within two games of each other in conference play. Because of this, every game is critical. No opponent can be overlooked because there is so much parity. In order to remain standing at the end of the season, teams must possess physical as well as mental toughness. If a team expects to cruise through the conference schedule unscathed, it is sorely mistaken. The Patriot League is a competitive and mentally demanding conference. What it lacks in raw talent, it makes up with its mental prowess. When Holy Cross drew Kansas in the first round, I'm sure they all heard the word "blowout" more than once. Yet they remained composed even with top-ranked Kansas staring them in the face. They led at halftime because they were not afraid of the Jayhawks- they executed their gameplan and enjoyed their time in the spotlight.

Ultimately, Kansas pulled out a 70-59 victory that was much closer than the score indicates. But this is not new territory for the Crusaders, as last year they battled number two Kentucky throughout the game, before falling by only four points, 72-68. The committee may have forgotten what they did last year, but they won't be quick to forget this performance.

What they have also been gracious enough to forget is the quality wins that Patriot League teams have had this year. American beat Florida State, Colgate beat Yale, Bucknell beat Hofstra, and for the second straight year, Holy Cross defeated UMass. While these wins come few and far between, Patriot League teams lost by fewer than ten points to Miami, Penn State, Princeton, Penn and Boston College. I realize that other conferences are able to support the same claims, but they at least they already receive some recognition.

The Patriot League is known nationally as the other "non-scholarship" League, the league that John Feinstein wrote a book about and the league that produced Adonal Foyle, when we should be known for being a competitive basketball league that the powerhouses can never overlook come tournament time. While Patriot League teams are 0-11 lifetime in the NCAA Tournament, they have been outscored by a modest 17.63 points. In that same time span, the Southland and the NEC are both 0-11 with margins of defeat of 24.9 and 23.9 points, respectively. The SWAC is 1-10 with a margin of defeat of 22.9 points; while the MEAC is 2-11 in the same span while being outscored by 22.4 points in their 11 defeats. Finally, the somewhat respected Sun Belt conference is 1-11 with a margin of defeat of 16.54 points, only a point better than the Patriot League. I ask, Why do these conferences get more recognition than the Patriot League?

A margin of defeat of 17.6 points per game for a consummate 16 seed is not bad at all. And if one was to overlook Navy's 88-52 loss to UNC (who went on to the Final Four) in 1998 and Lafayette's 73-47 loss to Temple in 2000, the average would be even less.

The bottom line is that the Patriot League deserves a little more credit. For the second straight year, our conference champ has scared a powerhouse, and we are only getting better. Five of the eight institutions are beginning to offer basketball scholarships (a topic I will politely dance around at this moment), with the other three holding on to their morals for dear life. The level of competition in the league will undoubtedly rise in the next few years and in the future, the committee will be hard pressed to hand select us as Duke or Kansas' whipping boys.

Rugby buries Susquehanna

The Bucknell Men's Rugby Club played Susquehanna University this weekend, for its second game of the season. The Bison men pleased one of the largest home crowds they ever attracted with a 34-0 routing of the Susquehanna Crusaders. Key first half tries were scored by Todd Seitz '02, Nathan Bridge '05 and two by Joe Free '04.

"I owe it all to Iggy Ti An," Free said. "His coaching and support is constantly helping us through the season, and with this victory."

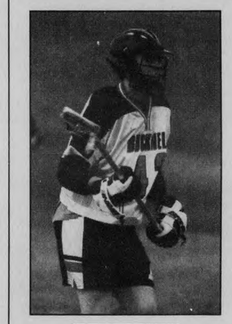
The Bison's scoring assault ended late in the second half, with a 15-meter run up the gut by Kurt Kubbs '05.

The Bison benefited from efforts by Curtis Sachse '05, Sam Sullivan '05, and John Pollak '04, and team Co-Captain Hugh "Colossus" Kelly '04, who helped lead the defensive charge.

The Bison improve their record to 2-0 this season, and hope to bring their win streak to Philadelphia in a few weeks for The Mayors Cup Tournament.

Athlete of the Week

By Scott Kloss



Kevin Smithies '02

Kevin Smithies '02, our athlete of the week, leads a daunting men's lacrosse defense into a promising season. Kevin, a 6'4" senior defender for the Bison, has exhibited his leadership skills by following a rigid work ethic that his fellow lacrosse players have learned. Over the last three games, Kevin and his teammates have only allowed in 12 goals—a feat last achieved in the 1970s.

"It can be attributed mainly to time. We lost two other starting defensemen and our starting long-pole midfielder from last year and on top of that our defense has had lots of personnel changes since the beginning of the season," Smithies said. "We've finally starting to get our timing down in all of our slide packages and that's led to some solid defensive efforts."

Smithies has high hopes for this season and if the last couple games are any indication of what's to come, then the sky is the limit.

"I'd like to win the Patriot League and get Bucknell's first ever win in an NCAA tournament game," Smithies said.

In order to achieve such goals, there are a couple of matches this year that will prove be to paramount in the team's quest for the Patriot League crown and beyond.

"Hobart, on this upcoming Saturday, has now become the biggest game of the year. Once we defeat them we'll have defeated our two biggest opponents in the Patriot League and be well on our way to another NCAA tournament," Smithies said.

Watching Smithies's back is Bison goaltender Justin Sussman, who allows a miniscule miniscule average of 3.33 goals in net. When the two of them are on the same page, Bucknell gets the respect of a top-notch lacrosse team. Currently, after a three-game winning streak, the Bison have amassed a 3-4 record and are ranked 20th in the nation's top 20 this week's (USILA Coaches' Poll).

Smithies gives credit where it is deserved when discussing the success of late.

"Our coaches scout each of our opponents and Coach Fedorjaka spends hours preparing all our defensive schemes," Smithies said.

Off the field, Smithies pursues his major, but has time for little else.

"I'm a business management major and with class and lacrosse I don't really have enough time for any other significant activities," Smithies said.

The team's next game will be Saturday, March 30, at 1 p.m. in Geneva, N.Y.

Track and field kicks off outdoor season

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer

Despite less-than-ideal weather conditions this past weekend, the Bucknell track and field team came out with some very solid performances, as it traveled to the University of Pennsylvania to participate in the Quaker Invitational. Overall, the Bison collected 10 top-three finishes, seven for the women's team and three for the men's.

"The weather was not conducive to fast times on the track and big marks in the field events, but most of our athletes competed very hard and placed high in their respective events, which will set them up later in the year at the more important meets," Head Coach Donner said.

The Bucknell women's team had seven individuals or relay teams finish amongst the top three in their events. Kiley MacDonald '05 and LaTonya McSwain '02 were among the top performers of the day with their first place finishes in the 100-meter hurdles and 800-meter run, respectively. MacDonald earned first place out of 13 competitors with her time of 15.17. With a time of 2:15.30, McSwain beat out 36 other athletes. The women's 1600-meter relay team also earned a first-place finish with a time of 4:01.50. Finishing second in the hammer throw, only five feet and seven inches shy of first, Maria Garcia '04 threw for a distance of 162'1". Theresa Dennis '03 finished third in the 1,500-meter run with a time of 4:48.86. Erin Lee '04 earned third in the discus with a toss of 129'6". Also taking a third place was the 400-meter relay team with a time of 49.90.

The Bucknell men recorded three top-three finishes. Finishing just .3 seconds behind the winner, Eric Furst '03 took second place in the 800-meter run with a time of 1:55.65. Teammate Lou Palma '03 placed third behind Furst in 1:56.35. With a time of 9:49.30, Stephen Schaefer '04 finished third in the steeplechase.

"It was a good early season meet for our entire team and it gave the coaching staff a chance to evaluate who will travel to some of our major meets coming up at North Carolina State this weekend and the College of William and Mary next weekend," said Donner. "This meet also gave many of our athletes a chance to compete at the same facility as the prestigious Penn Relays in late April. The Penn Relays in the largest and most exciting track and field meet in the country for collegiate, high school and post-collegiate athletes."

The Bison will be back in action this upcoming weekend, as several of their top athletes travel to the North Carolina State Raleigh Relays, while the remainder of the squad will be competing in the Susquehanna Invitational on March 30.

Softball splits 2-2 at Delaware State

By David Cohen
Senior Writer

The Bucknell softball squad was triumphant in two of its games last weekend at the Delaware State tournament in Dover, Del.

It didn't take long for the Bison to get on the scoreboard in their 10-6 victory over tournament host Delaware State on March 23. A first inning single by designated hitter Kelly Dugan '02, who reached base three times on the afternoon, drove in Barb Wood '02, providing the Blue and Orange with an early 1-0 advantage.

According to catcher Angela Stackhouse '04, it was imperative to set the tone in the early stages of the game.

"It is always important for people to get on base as soon as possible," Stackhouse said. "The team is usually quick to follow after someone like Kelly gets us started."

After a scoreless inning, Bucknell broke the game wide open, ripping off five runs in the top half of the third inning. The inning commenced somewhat innocently with a Dugan walk and a Stackhouse sacrifice, however a Lauren Titus '02 single and a proceeding Delaware State error kick-started the team's engine.

Outfielders Erin Doyle '04, who went two-for-three on the day, and Jenna Demetriades '02, who was a flawless three-out-of-three at the plate, smacked back-to-back singles, setting the table for shortstop Meredith Gill '03, who eventually capped off a five-run inning for the Bison with a triple to right center.

Titus is confident that the hitting of the two consecutive singles was far from coincidental.

"We have been talking all season about lining hits up together," Titus said. "Things seem to both jumpstart and click when this happens."

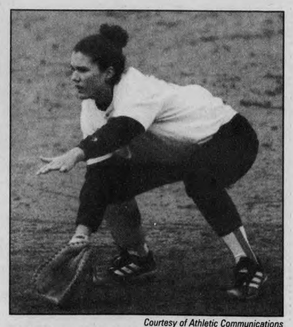
In terms of the game-breaking triple by Gill, Stackhouse is certain that the team thrived psychologically. "There is obviously a huge difference between a 2-0 and a 5-0 lead," Stackhouse said. "Big plays get the overall team spirit high."

Delaware State retaliated with four runs of its own in the third inning and two runs in the fourth, knotting the game up at six runs apiece. However, the Bison responded with a run in the fifth on a Gill groundout, and tallied three insurance runs in the sixth, while Delaware State failed to muster up a late rally in the game's final three innings.

The pitcher of record for Bucknell was Kelli Haskins '05, who tossed for four innings in which she struck out three, and improved her season record to 2-2 with an earned-run average of 2.83.

On March 24, Bucknell outlasted Radford by a score of 4-3. It initially seemed as if Bucknell would coast its way to a win after putting up two runs in the first two innings.

After Gill and Wood opened the game with consecutive walks, Stackhouse and Doyle drove them in with back-to-back singles. In the second inning, a double to center by Wood drove in Gill, who scored her second run and gave Bucknell a 3-0 lead. Wood then proceeded to score on a wild pitch after previously advancing to third base on a passed ball, providing Bucknell with a 4-0 advantage after two innings.



Courtesy of Athletic Communications

Kelly Dugan '02 helped the Bison in their victory over Delaware State, reaching base three times.

Radford refused to go down without putting up a fight, as it put one run on the board in the fourth inning and two more in the fifth. However, Bucknell held on, riding solid pitching to acquire its fifth win of the season.

"We held together strong," Titus said. "We played excellent defense because we wanted to make it happen. It was a team that we knew we could beat, so it was a matter of holding everything together and playing seven strong innings."

Although Bucknell dropped games to both James Madison and Patriot League powerhouse Lehigh in the tournament, the team can feed off of its two wins when it returns to action on March 28 at Columbia, and when it returns home to Lewisburg for a four-game stretch with Patriot League opponent Army.

tory. Goalkeeper Kallis tallied 14 saves.

In their most recent game of Patriot League competition, the Bison traveled to Easton to face rival Lafayette. The Bison held the Leopards scoreless for the first 15 minutes of play jumping out to a 2-0 lead after goals by Raffaele and Meredith Wright '04.

They increased their lead to 5-3 after the half, when Amy Hasler '04 scored her second goal of the game. Eventually, the Leopards cut down the Bison lead to one before tying the score with 9:42 left in the game. Despite a remarkable performance in the net by Kallis, who had a season high 24 saves, Lafayette netted the final and winning goal of the game with 21 seconds left.

"I think that the Lafayette game and American game could have gone either way, and unfortunately neither went ours. In both games the defense played outstanding and I am confident that we will come up with needed wins in the next half of the season," Kallis said. "Erin [Curtis '02], Mia [Donahue '04] and Amy Hafets ['04] did a great job holding all three of our Patriot League opponents to under 10 goals. Our losses were very emotional, but they give us a reason to work harder to get to the finals and I am confident we will be able beat both those teams when we get there."

After taking a week off from competition, the Bison will take to the road to play Niagara on Saturday and then head back to Lewisburg to host Monmouth on April 2. They resume conference play on April 6 against Holy Cross.

"We are good this season, really good. If we keep playing the way that we have been and have a little luck along the way, we should be contenders for the league title. We still have a few more Patriot League games and will come out with the same intensity and drive that we did for the first three," Gianis said. "It would be very hard to find a team more committed to [its] goals and [its] teammates."

Going to Cancun, Fla., South Padre Island or the Caribbean in search of a nice tan and some good times is one of the many traditional ways to celebrate the most anticipated event of the spring semester, spring break. There is also the option of going home in order to visit mom and dad, sleep for long periods and catch up on the missed soap operas.

What most people do not realize is that a growing number of students do something completely different for their spring break. They go to different places around the country, roll up their sleeves and get to work, giving something back to the community. Programs in numerous states bring in college students from around the country to work in some of the nation's poorest counties, helping rebuild or build housing and other support objectives.

As a member of the University's Catholic Campus Ministry, I had the opportunity this spring break to go to Jackson County, Ky. to work in a program called Workfest, an annual event run by the Christian Appalachian Project (CAP). The group included Father Marty Moran, Sarah Mournighan '03, John Richards '05, John Roche '03, Mike Tomlin '04, Mary Wycheck (GR) and Kim Zimbal '02.

We worked in neighboring Owsley County—number six on the United States' poorest counties list—on houses that needed major repair work of some sort. Owsley is a county of 4,858 in central Ky. that has little, if any, major industry and is almost completely caucasian. It still sees some economic gain from tobacco farming and other agrarian means, but they are not able to bring enough revenue into the county.

Monsignor Ralph Beiting founded CAP in 1950 when he began to help the people of the Appalachian region. Since then, it has grown to include 70 programs serving over one million people each year. The Workfest program began 11 years ago and has grown to become a five-week event that benefits from the services of hundreds each year. This year, we worked on eight projects around Owsley County as part of the second week.

Our time spent in the Appalachian region was immensely enjoyable. Housing for the week was at CAP-owned Camp Andrew Jackson, a summer camp for children. Although a little small (tiny showers, short beds, little everything), it was comfortable and it served our needs well. Every morning, we woke up at 6:30 a.m. and were on the road by 8 a.m., headed for our sites. Some of the more interesting sights at camp were the midnight lake swimmers, the loud and incessant snoring by a couple of the guys and the game of spoons at midnight.

My worksite was a house owned by Floyd and Martha Sandlin in Booneville, Ky. The house was in bad shape and we worked on some of the floors, bathroom and insulation. The biggest project, however, was the roof. I was able to spend my entire week working on it, helping to shore and re-shingle it. The work led to some interesting times (yes, I did fall through the ceiling—but only up to my knees) and a decent tan ("so there" to everyone who spent a week at the beach).

Floyd was a great guy and a sweet man who lost his job of seventeen years as a truck driver due to major back injuries. He has a number of children and cares deeply about them. He welcomed us into his home and gave us all a smile and a kind word throughout the day. The other groups had similar experiences and all were sad to leave their sites on Friday after five good days of work.

The team sits in the dugout at the baseball museum at Louisville Slugger.

Despite all this work, we did manage to have some fun during the week. Because the program began on Sunday and we left on Friday, we were able to spend Saturday and Sunday morning touring around Kentucky. Our first stop was the home of the baseball bat that so many pros have used over history, the Louisville Slugger. We toured the factory floor and saw bats in production. From there, we went off to two of the more important bourbon distilleries in the Bardstown region, Jim Beam and Makers Mark. At the Makers Mark distillery, we were able to get up close and personal to the bourbon under production (even tasting some of the fermenting product right from the vat).

Some of the other sights included Abraham Lincoln's birthplace and boyhood home, the Trappist Monastery at Gethsemane, the cathedral in Covington, Ky., the home of the best ribs in the United States at Montgomery Inn and the oldest cathedral in the Old West—Bardstown's St. Joseph's.

The other major stop in our journey was at the campus of Berea College in Berea, Ky. Founded in 1855, Berea was the first fully integrated liberal arts institution in a slave owning state. Today, the school boasts an enrollment of about 1500 students who each receive a full tuition scholarship–the students all come from low-income households and must work at least ten hours each week in a variety of on-campus jobs. Our tour guide was President Larry Shinn, former dean of Arts and Sciences at the University.

Despite the touring, the primary focus of our trip was the week in the mountains. We spent our time with students from Webster University in Mo., Texas Christian University in Texas, Saint Richards Parish in Ohio, University of Notre Dame in Ind., University of Saint Cloud in Minn., Carroll College in Wis., College of Saint Scholastica in Minn. and Saint Norbert's College in Wis. Those students are now friends. We talked, reflected, worked and enjoyed it all.

Spring break is usually a time of fun and sun. Working is not a bad way to spend it either. After one week of Workfest, I was completely satisfied that I made the right choice on where to go for my vacation. I touched lives and made friends I'll never forget.

V-Day makes name for itself

By Josie Cetta

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

A forum was held in the LC on Tuesday to discuss "The Vagina Monologues."

V-Day Bucknell, an organization recently recognized as an official club this spring, has wasted no time in making themselves a name. This past Tuesday night, a forum was held in the LC on the subject of "The Vagina Monologues" and its implications. The forum presented a panel of both students and faculty. Following the recent production of "The Vagina Monologues", much controversy has been stirred within the University surrounding the purpose of the play.

Some believe the play to have been a direct attack upon men. Others saw the production to have been a celebration of Lesbianism, or considered it to be excessively vulgar. A mock "Penis Monologues" was published in the March 8 issue of the University's Conservatives Club newsletter, "The Counterweight."

"'The Vagina Monologues' is a piece about women. It is not a play against men. It is a play about women to themselves. It is a spectrum about how women feel about themselves," said Marty Gates, director of Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition.

"The Vagina Monologues", which began in 1996, is the centerpiece of a global movement known as V-Day, whose purpose it is to end violence against women and girls. Started by Eve Ensler, "The Vagina Monologues" sector of V-Day is spreading throughout the country, particularly on college campuses, through the V-Day "College Campaign". All profits received from the play are donated to organizations that work in various ways to end violence against women.

"Eve Ensler wrote 'The Vagina Monologues' to share real women's experiences. The un-politically correct or offensive issues in the text only show that women's lives, people's lives, are not perfect. How is this revelation offensive?" President of V-Day Bucknell Courtenay Mastain, '02 said.

Each member of the panel had a chance to voice their opinions on the matter. The panel included Marty Gates, Courtenay Mastain, Mary Snyder, program assistant at the Women's Resource Center, Denise Chaykun, '04 secretary of the Conservatives Club, Glynis Carr, University professor of English and Alexander Riley, University professor of Sociology. An hour-long question and answer session followed the panel discussion.

In defense of the "Penis Monologues," Denise Chaykun said that the Conservatives Club was "supposed to be funny and mirror 'The Vagina Monologues,'" but the club's ultimate purpose was to make a statement not "just to be funny." Chaykun believes herself a feminist, although not a radical feminist, and disagrees with the approach of "The Vagina Monologues." She feels that in those in disagreement with the production are often wrongly mistaken as women haters. Chaykun feels that the monologues showed no mutual respect between men and women.

"The play portrayed men to be evil and women were seen as victims. It seemed like a big pity-party," Chaykun said.

In a similar sense, Alexander Riley saw the play as being "misandrist," representing men in a warped fashion. Riley disagrees with the overwhelming portrayal of men as evil in the play. He pointed out that the production portrays every male character, with the possible exception of one, as a rapist or a misogynist or both. He feels that the strategy of the play is incoherent because of this aggressive attack on men and heterosexual relationships.

"If the intent of the play, or playwright, is at least in part reducing sexual violence and improving relationships between men and women, it strikes me as bad strategy to present an image of men and relationships between men and women that is so overwhelmingly negative," Riley said.

During the question and answer portion of the forum, Laura Kamienski challenged Riley's point of view on the play. As owner of Kicks Martial Arts for Women, in downtown Lewisburg, which recently launched "Kick Back Against Violence 2002," a three-hour kickboxing marathon benefiting Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition, Kamienski defined feminism, in regards to the play, as not being about men, but about finding a voice and recognizing that women's perspectives are worth considering.

"Feminism says women in general have different life experiences than men, and that our experiences are often discounted, or not given a voice. It astounds me that every time women do something—anything—by themselves and for themselves they are instantly accused of hating men. It simply isn't about men," Kamienski said.

She praised "The Vagina Monologues" for its ability to exert a range of feelings that span from a "freeing laughter" to complete sobbing. According to Kamienski, all women have been faced with some form of harassment in their lives and she blames society for saying that this is ok.

Carr believed the play to have been "masterfully done." The production brought up issues that cannot be ignored, according to Carr. Regarding the controversial monologue depicting lesbianism, Carr admitted to the undeniable fact that it may have been uncomfortable to experience for some, including herself, but it was worth it.

"Who cares if it made me feel comfortable or uncomfortable, I took the monologue in that vein. I think 'The Vagina Monologues' is a very important play," Carr said.

Carr, an activist in the Gay, Lesbian, Bisexual, Transgender movement, did not see the play as a celebration of lesbianism. With regards to the "Penis Monologues," Carr pointed out its failure to address men's experiences as victims or perpetrators of sexual violence in real life.

Snyder, a rape survivor herself, described how the tragic event affected not only her, but also her entire family. In light of "The Vagina Monologues," Snyder feels as though her voice has been heard without even having to speak.

"Never do the monologues, or their author, claim to be representative of all women's experiences, rather they are a space for women to share, to listen, and from the experience of being a member of the cast or the audience, people begin a discourse. That is what V-Day is all about," Courtenay Mastain said.

V-Day Bucknell's next mission is to empower women within the University through the publication of "VaVoom," a literary magazine that will give voice to "The Vagina Monologues" and serve as a collage of literary and artistic works meant to empower and inspire pride in women.

"'VaVoom' will serve as a forum to express opinions, feelings and intellectual ideas not often heard in a cohesive publication," Mastain said.

The magazine will debut before the end of the semester and submissions are welcome to Vlam@ until April 15.

Diversity week gives opportunities to expand horizons

By Molly Koenig
Staff Writer

If everyone in this world were the same, life would not be nearly as interesting. In celebration of this diversity, next week will host numerous events and forums for students, administration, faculty and support staff.

Diversity week will kick off Monday, April 1 with the Start the Love Picnic from 4-6 p.m. on the Uphill LC lawn, which is being sponsored by SIRENS and co-sponsored by Lesbians, Gays, Bisexuals and Transgender (LGBT) Awareness Office and V-Day Bucknell. The rain location is Roberts Hall Lobby. Meals will be available for $4.50 of declining balance or one meal credit and DJ Garry Thaniel will be playing the tunes of the '60s. "Take Back the Night" will be held Monday at 8 p.m. at the downhill LC staircase. Tuesday at noon there will be a student diversity panel in the LC Forum. Forums for the administration, staff and support staff will be held on Wednesday at four different times and three different locations: the administration forum (8:30 a.m. in Walls Lounge), the faculty forum (12-1 p.m. in the Forum) and the support staff forums (1:30-2:30 p.m. and 2:45-3:45 p.m. in the Personnel Services Conference Room).

"Day of Silence" is happening on Thursday and sign-ups are required prior to the event. Registration dates are March 27 - April 2, from 9 a.m. - 4 p.m. in either the Women's Resource Center Roberts 200A, the Office of Multicultural Affairs LC 219, or the Office of the Deans of Arts and Sciences 113 Marts, or from 11 a.m. - 1 p.m. at the Langone Center Mall. Those observing silence will be doing so in support of lesbian, gay, bisexual and transgender rights. It is an opportunity to think about the voices that are not being heard and to be inclusive of people of all sexual orientations. Those participating will be wearing buttons and will have cards to hand stating their reasons for not speaking. The week will wrap up on Friday, April 5, with "Jeans Day" and an invitational diversity dinner at 6 p.m. in the Terrace Room.

A huge amount of effort and planning has gone into this week and there is a great variety of organizations involved in the event: the Office of LGBT Awareness, the Office of Multicultural Affairs, the Women's Resource Center, International Student Services, the Office of Chaplains and Religious Life, the Race and Gender Resource Center, the Samek Art Gallery, Residential Colleges, the Office of Deans of Arts and Sciences, the Office of the President and the Committee for Campus Diversity.

Next week is a great opportunity for all Bucknellians to expand their horizons and think about issues that are sometimes easy to push off onto other people. For those who are interested in more information about Diversity Week, there are flyers posted around campus, as well as a separate calendar of events in this week's Bucknellian.

"There are many events on campus that bring awareness to diversity, but having so many in one week makes a big difference." She added that, "So many different forums provide students with the opportunity to see what's going on at all levels of campus, not just the student level," said Kristen Erickson '02, who has helped plan the event.

Art students travel to Philly

Group visits galleries and studios to experience a new side of art

Courtesy of Mark Mahosky

While the students who participated in "The Art Trip of Philadelphia" had a busy schedule, they found that the trip gave them a better understanding of different aspects of art.

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

Art students from the University recently had the pleasure of taking a tour of Philadelphia's art community. The trip, officially titled "The Art Tour of Philadelphia," took place from March 1-3 and led students on a tour of leading galleries, artists' studios and two world class collections of art. These expeditions included tours of Bruce Pollock's studio, the Larry Becker Gallery, Gallery Joe, the Bridgette Mayer Gallery, the Fleisher/Ollman Gallery, The Barnes Foundation, Tremain Smith's studio and the Philadelphia Museum of Art.

The students' schedules were extremely full, which to some was the most invigorating part. "I was so impressed with the variety of unique experiences we had, and the time we were able to spend discussing and looking at so much art," Sarah Rives '02 said.

"It was the most intense, realistic, and in-depth art experience I have had here at [the University]," Jonathan Hanowell '02 said.

Jamie Shelman '05 was also inspired by her experience. "Personally, this trip had a great effect on me as I began to see art in a whole new light, one that I had not fully grasped or anticipated before."

Any current University student who had previously taken or was currently enrolled in an art or art history course was encouraged to apply to participate in the trip.

Out of 24 applicants, 12 students were chosen to participate based on the strength of their application and an art and art history faculty member's recommendation. Besides the aforementioned participants, Alissa Chandler '02, Andrew Davis '02, Susan Koehler '02, Sarah McCaughey '03, Suzanne Mejean '03, Meghann Reilly '04, Harlow Wetschler '02, Amanda Young '02 and Michele Zager '04 also went on the trip.

Assistant Professor Mark Mahosky utilized connections that he had built while he attended the Tyler School of Art at Temple University to organize the trip in order to focus the experience on diversity in art, from creation to sales and from presentation to differing institutional support. Mahosky had several goals in mind.

First, he wanted to expose the students to the many sides of the art world that exist simultaneously, such as the artists' studios, galleries and museums. Second, he wanted to make these places seem familiar and approachable to the students. Third, he wanted the students to see the important collections and resources of the Philadelphia Museum of Art and the Barnes Foundation.

The trip also offered the chance for art students at the University to strengthen their community and create ties with alumni. Director of University Relations Aurilla Fusco organized alumni and parents as hosts for the attending students. Bill and Carol Lenker of Malvern, Pa., Pat and Jack Graham of Devon, Pa. and Bridgette Mayer of Philadelphia, Pa. graciously offered their homes to support the tour. Another opportunity to build community with alumni was the tour of the Bridgette Mayer Gallery, which is owned and run by Mayer.

The trip exceeded many expectations, especially those of the students. "The opportunity to compare and contrast more contemporary forms of art with those of earlier eras in the same spaces was precious to me, and I feel as though it, in a sense, tied up my contemporary art history education here at [the University]," Young said.

Zager appreciated the special bond she formed with the other students. "The strong art community could be felt throughout the weekend and it seemed to strengthen the bond between [University] students," she said. "As we went from galleries to studios to museums, we shared the same excitement from seeing new styles of artwork, listening to gallery directors and artists, seeing inspirational works and viewing the world in new contexts."

Zager captures the feelings of all the attendees as she supports the continuation of such programming at the University.

"I would love to see our [University] art community built stronger on campus and I believe that future off-campus activities such as this will not only enhance our art community, but will also help art students in their personal development," she said.

The Art Tour of Philadelphia was generously sponsored by the University Art Department, the Office of Academic Affairs and the Association of the Arts at the University.

Dance Company tells the story of a culture

Performance illustrates aspects of African-American culture

By Kristen Habacht
Staff Writer

Robert K. Brown's Evidence: A Dance Company recently proved to the campus community why it has amassed such respect in the world of dance. Performed on March 22 in the Sigmund and Claire Weis Center, the company of eight performers held the audience spellbound from the moment it took the stage. Through three separate performances, the Company told the story of the rich history of the African-American culture.

"It was a visual expression of the sounds of African-Americans and their culture," Michael Karapetian '05 said.

The renowned company, which has been featured in The New York Times, The Chicago Record and The New Yorker, established themselves as more than mere performers, but also people to whom the audience could relate.

The bare set and basic lighting allowed the audience to focus solely on the performance and its message. The bright costumes, fluid movement and never-ending stream of action made the production both aesthetically pleasing and entertaining to watch.

"I was particularly impressed with the performers' incredible commitment to the richness and tradition of the movement as a whole ensemble and in each individual," Iris Rifkin-Gainer, outreach coordinator of the Weis Center, said.

Brown, who choreographs and dances in the performances, started the company in 1985 and has been using his apartment in New York City as the studio for the company ever since. He asks his performers to draw inspiration from their lives and from their cultural history.

> "I was particularly impressed with the performers' incredible commitment to the richness and tradition of the movement as a whole ensemble and in each individual."
> —Iris Rifkin-Gainer, outreach coordinator of the Weis Center

The music is a combination of modern jazz, simple spoken word and everything in between. The dance style draws from many forms and histories of dance. "I especially enjoyed the incorporation of several forms of dance," Jennifer Perlick '05 said.

Audience members saw history unravel on stage, from a slave auction to a jazz club. Many performing arts draw their inspiration from history, and, conversely, history is built around the arts. This circular connection of arts and history is seen several times throughout the performance, with the company forming a physical circle at the beginning or end of each scene.

Another common thread of each performance was that of bare feet. No matter the era, place or time, the performers were always barefoot. This technique is more than simply not wearing dance shoes; it is a statement that these dancers are connected with the earth, with the past and, most importantly, with each other.

Renowned poet to present work

Paul Muldoon will speak at the University next week

By Julianna Pietak
Staff Writer

"Young, inventive, experimental, playful"—these terms usually conjure up images of pop culture, not poetry. However, they have all been used to describe highly acclaimed poet Paul Muldoon.

Muldoon is the first in a series of poets brought in by the Stadler Center for Poetry to speak to the University community. He will be performing his reading on Monday, April 1 in the Bucknell Hall auditorium.

To say that Muldoon is a "special" poet would be an understatement. Muldoon was born in Northern Ireland, something reflected in much of his writing. He has lived in the United States for well over a decade, giving him a bi-continental perspective.

Muldoon holds numerous honors in the literary world. He is not only head of the Creative Writing Department at Princeton University, but he holds the honorary title of professor of poetry at Oxford University. The Times Literary Supplement, has said that Muldoon is "the most significant English-language poet born since the Second World War."

Aside from his technical praise and achievements, Muldoon is highly praised by his readers and by the academic world. John Rickard, chair of the University English Department states that he is "a very important voice, at the center of what's going on." Beyond this, he says that Muldoon is "focused on contemporary culture, a challenging and playful poet."

Muldoon is successful in the eyes of the public. His critics, readers and the academic world simply mark the quality of his work. The University is privileged to have a poet of his stature speak here, no matter where one's interests lie. As Rickard points out, "there is just no one else quite like him."

Soulive's album shows maturity

By Campbell Gerrish
Staff Writer

Soulive, a favorite of jazz and funk fans, released its new album, Next, this week. The follow up to its hit albums Turn it Out and Doin' Somethin', Next offers plenty of the catchy grooves old fans crave, but also includes some new and collaborative work that reaches more into the R&B realm.

Originally a trio, Soulive became a quartet with the addition of Sam Kininger on alto saxaphone. Although he is a longtime collaborator with Soulive, Next is Kinninger's first album as a permanent member. His saxaphone playing is something fans will find familiar in songs such as "Tuesday Night's Squad," "Flurries" and "Liquid," tunes reminiscent of the band's tight, rhythmic jazz style.

Later in the record, Dave Matthews makes an appearance in a rendition of Ani DiFranco's "Joyful Girl." This revamping of DiFranco's ballad could easily be mistaken for a Barry White love funk song, except for Matthews' delicate and raspy vocals.

Another song of interest is "Clap!" which features The Roots' Black Thought. This song is noticeably different from Soulive's previous sound. Over a tight hip-hop beat, deep R&B-style bass and subtle strokes of melodic guitar, Black Thought lays down a smooth lyrical work that is completely new for Soulive.

Guitarist Eric Krasno has normally played a leading role in the band's music, frequently belting out impressive and intricate solos. This time around, however, he focuses more on adding melody and texture, as displayed in "Whatever It Is" and "E.D. Hambone." On these tracks, one can hear a larger focus on rhythmic scratching and slower, more soulful solos.

Next differs from the band's older material in that the songs were produced specifically for the studio, not as takes of live material. With this approach, Soulive's sound has grown up a bit and may appeal to more listeners. Either way, with the introduction of new sounds, new friends, a blend of styles and classic elements, Soulive's Next is a worthy purchase for any fan of funk, jazz, hip-hop and R&B.

Frequent student arrests in Borough strain town-gown relations

By Alyson Walker
Staff Writer

Recently, University students have been making the news for run-ins with the Lewisburg and East Buffalo Township Police Departments.

On Nov. 7 at 27 South Eighth Street, Joseph Schonewolf '04 allegedly grabbed Lewisburg Police Officer Fred Hetrick and pushed him into a table. He also allegedly kicked East Buffalo Township Police Chief Barry Hosterman in the face. The police were called to the location because of a loud party.

Schonewolf was charged with two counts each of aggravated assault, simple assault and harassment and one count each of disorderly conduct, resisting arrest, underage drinking and public drunkenness.

SPECIAL REPORT

"If there is a lesson that can be drawn from this particular case, it is once more that as alcohol consumption moves from moderate to heavy, personal risks increase and increase exponentially. Individuals who are generally good and responsible individuals, when highly intoxicated, can behave in a way that reflects very poorly on themselves, their friends and their school," said Richard Ferraro, dean of students.

> "Individuals who are generally good and responsible individuals, when highly intoxicated, can behave in a way that reflects very poorly on themselves, their friends, and their school."

Schonewolf was sentenced to one to 11 months in the county jail for simple assault, as well as probation of one month to one year on a simple assault charge. The sentences were imposed by Judge Louise Knight in Union County Court.

"I am satisfied with the outcome. There seems to have been an honest attempt by the student and by the legal authorities to come up with a response that makes provision for both justice and mercy," Ferraro said.

Police also filed four charges of harassment by communication against Michael J. Bell '05, with Lewisburg District Justice Leo Armbruster. Police said the incidents began in December and began the investigation in February. University security also assisted with this case.

Bell allegedly sent harassing emails to Sarah Hausman '05, who was also recently charged with underage drinking after being transported to the hospital for an alcohol overdose. These cases are subject to pending University judicial proceedings.

In another off-campus incident, Nathan Hopfinger '02 was arrested and charged with defiant trespassing after being found in the residence of 611 St. George Street. On March 19, codes administrator Tom Sauers of the Union County Code Enforcement Department deemed the house "unfit for human habitation," as reported by the Daily Item on March 26..

Hopfinger was found in the house at 8:39 p.m. after police stated that residents were allowed in the house only to remove personal belongings during daytime hours. The house has been under inspection since Feb. 26 for problems with rubbish and debris.

Director of int'l education named

Lisa Donatelli joins University after eight years in Georgetown's int'l education dept.

By Michelle Dombeck

With about 35 to 40 percent of students in each graduating class going abroad, international education is an important part of the University. Recently, the University officially announced the appointment of a new director of international education. Lisa Donatelli will be joining the University's International Education Department, bringing a great deal of experience and knowledge to the program.

For the last eight years, Donatelli has worked at Georgetown University in various positions in the Office of International Education. About 50 percent of Georgetown students study abroad (around 900 students), giving Donatelli a great deal of practical experience in this area.

One of the reasons Donatelli was attracted to this position was the opportunity of working with and advising students.

"I was pleased to find a position which would allow me to continue to use my strengths in student advising and overseas studies policy development," Donatelli said. "The students are, and continue to be, the primary reason I entered this field."

Stephen Bowen, provost/vice president for academic affairs, feels that Donatelli's experience will help her improve the University's already well-established international education program.

"She is very familiar with the educational, legal and logistic aspects of working with a variety of different cultures to establish, evaluate and monitor an overseas study program," Bowen said. "She really brings a wealth of experience to the University that will help us take our programs to a higher level of aspiration and accomplishment."

As a student who has participated in the Semester at Sea program, Liz Wilmarth '03 believes International Education is very important to an education at the University.

"Going abroad was a wonderful addition to my academic education—something I could not have

Eugene Spencer '76 moves from ISR associate director to VP; Interim-Dean James Orbison '75 accepts permanent position

By Matthew R. Ellis

After a national search, Eugene Spencer '76 has been named as the new associate vice president of Information Services and Resources (ISR).

Spencer played a leading role in the foundation of ISR and formerly served as associate director for Computing and Information Services.

Spencer has a long history with the University. He has been on the staff for 24 years and was also an undergraduate for four years prior to that.

"My history brings me a passion for the environment provided by Bucknell and our unique academic mission," Spencer said. "Bucknell is blessed with challenging students, an amazing faculty and a dedicated staff. Like so many other Bucknellians, I feel fortunate to be a part of this community."

His strong technical background and broad view of what technologies should be invested in were key factors in Spencer's selection.

"Gene brings a wealth of experience to this appointment. His primary expertise is in information technology," said Stephen H. Bowen, provost/vice president for academic affairs.

The school received applications from over 100 candidates from all over the country for this position.

The members of the selection committee, Jeannie Zappie (chair) Doug Allen, Cindy Bilger, Nancy Dagle, Michael Frey, Helen Morris Keitel, Jim Maneval, Kelly Stover, Michael Weaver and Lori Wilson sorted through the numerous applications that were received.

"After reviewing all applications, Gene definitely

After a national candidate search, James G. Orbison '75 was appointed dean of engineering. The appointment became effective April 1.

Previous to his selection, Orbison served as the interim dean of engineering and as a professor of civil and environmental engineering at the University. Orbison also earned his undergraduate degree in civil engineering from the University, graduating in 1975.

"Jim brings to this appointment a wealth of experience as an engineer, a university teacher, a scholar and an academic leader," said Stephen Bowen, provost/vice president for academic affairs, in a campus-wide email.

After graduating, Orbison received both his master's and P.h.D. degrees from Cornell University, working as a project engineer between his degree studies. After graduating from Cornell in 1982, Orbison returned to the University as a faculty member, and has since taught 18 courses in structural engineering, engineering mechanics, engineering materials and the introductory engineering course. He is also a registered professional engineer.

Orbison has been awarded 23 grants for research, including one for his current research focus on high strength bolted steel connections. In previous research projects Orbison has investigated nonlinear structural analysis, prestressed concrete design and stainless steel and aluminum alloy performance.

His numerous awards include the University's Lindback Award for Distinguished Teaching (1988) and the AT&T Foundation Award for Excellence in the Instruction of Engineering Students awarded by the American Society had on campus," Wilmarth said. "Students who go abroad have the opportunity to see the world and meet a range of people that come from many different backgrounds, which is not something one finds easily on campus."

As Donatelli helps the international education program improve, University students will find themselves better prepared after graduation.

"International education is something the University values and sees the need for. This is almost a cliché, but I think the world is becoming a smaller place," Marianne Torza, interim director of international education. "Many companies that our students work for after graduation have a global reach and will require them to work on more than just the state or national level. The more we can expose students to the greater world, the better we prepare them for life after graduation."

Donatelli also hopes that in addition to developing the program, she will be an asset to individual students.

"I hope the students will continue to feel they are welcome to explore their options for overseas studies with the Office of International Education," Donatelli said. "My door is always open."

for Engineering Education (1990).

"In summarizing Jim's strengths for the appointment, the search committee particularly emphasized his collegial leadership style based in large part on consensus building," Bowen said. "This will serve him well as the College engages in Bucknell's recently launched Vision 2010 Strategic Planning process," Bowen said.

Orbison's colleagues are also pleased with his appointment and look forward to continuing work with him in the next academic year.

"I felt that the College of Engineering is very fortunate that Professor Orbison has been appointed Dean of the College. He has a deep and abiding commitment to Bucknell, the College of Engineering and its students," said Karen Marosi, associate dean of engineering. "The Engineering Dean's Office staff and I are pleased to continue working with him."

Bowen feels that members of the University community should take pride in Orbison's appointment.

"The fact that, after a national search, we hired "one of our own" reaffirms the stature of our engineering faculty, Bowen said. "We are indeed fortunate to have a colleague of Jim's experience and talent to lead our College of Engineering."

Orbison was unavailable for comment.

emerged as the leader of our candidates," Bowen said.

Another reason Spencer was selected was because of the high praise he received by many of his co-workers.

"Gene's colleagues in ISR cite his facilitative leadership style and his abilities to identify the strengths of the organization and leverage them as one basis for innovation and improvement," said Bowen.

Spencer, an active member of the American Library Association and the Association of College and Research Libraries as well as Educause and the Association of College and University Telecommunications Administrators, hopes to provide leadership in making sure ISR understands the needs of the campus.

"I'll continue to help ISR grow in its collaborative working style and to build new relationships, both on and off campus," Spencer said. "It will also be my responsibility to ensure that ISR is squarely focused on the academic mission and striving to keep up with the changing demands of research, scholarly publication and the teaching/learning process."

The near future of ISR will be filled with many challenges that Spencer and the organization will have to overcome.

"Over the next few years, ISR will need to continue its strong linkages between information technology and library systems. The organization will also have to determine what technologies we should invest in and what systems may not be as worthwhile," Bowen said.

Part of the vice president of ISR job description is leading ISR in providing information and resources for the University, including computing, library, network, instructional technology, classroom support, telecommunications and web services. Spencer hopes to accomplish this by determining how to integrate ISR fully into the Vision 2010 strategic plan.

"In five years, I would like to think that we'll find as many students who chose Bucknell because of the richness of our information and technology environment as those who come because of the beauty of the physical environment."
—Gene Spencer, associate vice president of ISR

"We need to support moving the University's web presence dramatically forward, both for internal and external audiences. We'll continue to work carefully to define the proper balance of print and electronic information resources," Spencer said.

ISR has multiple projects that it is already laboring on. Work is underway for improving our service model, increasing our support of the academic mission, maximizing the University's information resources, providing greater access (including mobile access), protecting our resources and enhancing our collaborative work environment.

"ISR has a strong agenda for moving ahead. In five years, I would like to think that we'll find as many students who chose Bucknell because of the richness of our information and technology environment as those who come because of the beauty of the physical environment," Spencer said.

Incidents reflect poorly on University

The Daily Item recently reported three incidents that involved University students committing crimes such as harassment and defiant trespass. These students were charged and one is even serving jail time.

Although these incidents only represent a very small number of University students, they help to create a more negative image of the school.

These incidents were published in a newspaper that is seen by the entire surrounding area, not just the University. Therefore, members of towns such as Sunbury read the reports and can gain a negative image of University students.

Although it is not fair or accurate to judge the whole school based on a few students, it is inevitable that it will happen.

This negative view can also influence town-gown relations. Throughout the past few years, the University, students and community members have worked hard to improve town-gown relations.

Although the relations are still not perfect, they are better than they were in the past. By students committing crimes, they are setting a bad example. They are also being counterproductive in terms of town-gown relations.

It should be one of a student's priorities to establish good town-gown relations and to work to improve them. If a student gets in trouble to the point where the information is publicized, that student is setting a bad example not only for other students but for the University as well.

These incidents remain in the minds of community members and influence their view of University students.

In some of these instances, alcohol played a major role. As Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said, alcohol intake increases personal risk. This risk also has the potential to influence other students and possibly harm them, as it did in one of the reported incidents.

Although many students can be responsible while drinking alcohol, it still has the potential to change the way many people act, particularly during this weekend.

Houseparty is a weekend when alcohol plays a large role in the festivities. If students are responsible, the alcohol will not create problems. However, if students do not act appropriately, Houseparty can be a failure.

Students should take the opportunity presented to them at Houseparty and show that they can be responsible. If they act appropriately, it will reflect well upon them and the rest of the University.

Houseparty changes help students

To the Editor:

I want to first give credit to Carmen Mauriello, the author of the Greek series, and compliment him on a fine series of pertinent and important issues that have surrounded the fraternity and sorority system at the University.

Many have questioned the fact that non-Greek students are being charged $5 for Houseparty and guests $20. The event is costing the Interfraternity Council (IFC) and Panhellenic Association (Panhel) over $25,000, and only a very small portion is covered by Bucknell Student Government. The individual chapters are spending $1,000-$7,000. In total, Houseparty is costing the fraternity and sorority system over $65,000, which equates to around $55 per Greek. In addition to the monetary contributions, Greek students organize the event, open up their houses to the campus, run risk management for parties, set up, clean up, work the entire event and are liable for any incidences. Attending Houseparty is neither a right nor privilege of non-Greek students or their guests. We welcome non-Greek's attendance—that is why IFC and Panhel extend an invitation to them. We charge to cover our expenses and send a message that the fraternity and sorority system will not provide a social outlet for this campus, and incur all the costs. If you still feel the price for students is excessive, I suggest that you stay at home and use the money to buy a Whopper Value Meal at Burger King. But you'd probably be better off using the money to have all you can handle food and entertainment for 33 hours at Houseparty.

This year, the fraternity and sorority system took a bold stance in implementing policies that we feel will send the message that Houseparty is not an excuse for underage consumption and that the University will not turn its back on policy. For those students who think this the case, they are gravely mistaken and in for a rude awakening. We understand that there were problems in the past and have taken steps to address those problems, in hope to make a safer and more fun atmosphere at Houseparty. If these policies increase binge drinking in the dorm rooms, we cannot control that. But, I assure you that this year in our houses we will neither send the message that we advocate or condone the misuse or abuse of alcohol. I anticipate a fun, safe Houseparty, and if there are any incidents I assure you they will not be from Greeks.

V-Day contradictions abound

To The Editor:

The fundamental fact I took from the Vagina Monologues/V-Day forum ("V-Day makes name for itself," March 29) was the glaring incoherence at the root of the position advocated by most of the proponents of the play who spoke, both from the panel and in the audience. Many, faculty and students alike, seemed to want the play to be both a contribution toward 'ending violence against women' (a project that inevitably involves the participation of men, who perpetrate a lot of that violence) and an isolationist, divisive, this-is-just-about-us-women-and-we-don't-care-if-you-men-don't-get-it radical feminist message.

But you can't have both. If Eve Ensler wants to write a play that's about women closing ranks, sharing their feelings and in the process representing all men as evil as a twisted way to affirm themselves, then of course she is free to write such a play; I think this is precisely the play she has in fact written. But it's illogical then to wonder why the play contributes little to actually ameliorating the problem of violence between men and women. For she has deliberately created a work that alienates very large numbers of men and women simply by the overwhelmingly negative and inaccurate nature of its portrayal of men (and of women too; clearly, many people would not want their young daughters to emulate much of the activity portrayed therein as 'positive,' such as have sex at age 16 with 24 year old adults, become a sex worker as a way to express one's 'liberation,' etc.).

A similar confusion was apparent in the remarks made to me afterwards by a few audience members. They wanted at once to be able to claim that all knowledge is completely perspectival and therefore relative and that their particular interpretation of the frequency of sexual violence against women is superior to all others. Again, you can't have both. It is a telling commentary on the contemporary state of higher education that these students, and indeed some of their faculty allies, did not even seem to notice the glaring contradictions at the core of their position.

Management company helps local animals

To the Editor:

Imagine that for over a quarter of your natural life, the man who was responsible for your food and shelter routinely physically abused you so badly that you are now afraid of all men and the threat that you believe they pose to you. Would you want there to be a place that you could go to take refuge from the pain and anguish? Well, for the menagerie of animals at T& D's Cats of the World (located in Sunbury), the wildlife sanctuary serves as an invaluable refuge.

Animals such as the leopard which was just being referred to, as well as various lions, tigers and even bears, are able to live out the remainder of their natural lives in peace and comfort. However, because T & D's is a private non-profit organization, its owners need the help of the surrounding community members to help maintain and expand its capacity for support of these wild animals.

In the University community, past Management 101 companies have done a lot of very important services for the animals of T & D's Cats of the World, and this year Management 101 Company B, Big Cats, Balls and Bats is proud to be added to the growing list of volunteers that help to keep these animals safe and supported . Through the sale of Bucknell-logo baseball tees this week, we plan to raise enough funds to finance our current project of assistance to the needy organization. Our company has dedicated its time and energy to the creation of a new otter pen for the refuge, in which two sea otters will be able to live the rest of their lives in peace and shelter.

Like so many management companies of the past, we are channeling our resources through the University in order to make an important difference in our community and create safe and happy lives for these abused animals.

Weekend fee is reasonable

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to the article written in last week's edition of The Bucknellian about Houseparty and some comments that were made in that article. As a member of a Greek organization it really bothers me when people, especially non-Greeks, have the nerve to complain about the price of Houseparty and how it really puts a damper on a lot of people's fun.

The $20 admission fee to Houseparty is more than fair for the following reasons: you're getting 48 hours of food, drinks, entertainment and parties. That's well worth $20 for people that in no way have to face the after effects of houseparty. If you go a popular city club it costs about $25 just for admittance, and that's only for a very short period of time.

The amount of money spent by InterFraternity Council and each individual house, is in the tens of thousands, yet $20 is too much for a non-student of this school to pay? Not to mention the amount of time spent by Greeks setting up, working, and cleaning up after the event.

I really hope when everyone is enjoying Houseparty this year you realize the amount of effort that goes into it and nobody except the people who are putting the many hours into making Houseparty happen this year have the right to complain.

Jeans Day shows support

By Philip Martoma
Staff Writer

Jeans Day will kick off with many students wearing jeans in support of Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender (LGBT) rights. This particular event has caused much controversy as many counter-activists have often chosen to wear khakis or other types of pants to show their lack of support or protest the holiday in general. One of the many arguments against Jeans Day is that it makes people show support who may unwittingly worn jeans as a habit. Those who support the celebration are often asked why jeans were chosen as the symbol to promote LGBT rights (an already controversial statement).

In defense of Jeans Day, I personally would say that this is not something we are trying to do. Nevertheless, let's face it; jeans are a popular thing to wear, and so why were they chosen as our symbol? The answer to this pervasive question can be found in the history of this holiday and LGBT rights in this country. It was originally meant for LGBT individuals who were closeted to come out within their own social circle and daily life and later the focus changed to simply show support of LGBT rights.

The reason jeans were chosen originally was because they were so widespread and because people who unwittingly wore them would feel the stigma attached to it that day that LGBT people feel all the time. Now that the meaning has changed the reason for continuing to use jeans (other than the obvious that they were originally chosen for the holiday) has also changed. Due to the fact that they are so widespread, many people for whom LGBT issues do not affect are forced to make a conscious choice about what they will wear and why.

To me it doesn't seem logical to argue that the commonality of jeans is related to the reason why they were chosen in the first place. At many colleges people who wish to show their lack of support have often chosen not to wear jeans, however many conservative organizations have chosen to start counter holidays (i.e. khakis day—showing support for conservative issues by wearing khakis).

Though I understand that many conservatives will not want to support LGBT rights I also feel this is immature and counter-productive. There are many conservatives who still strongly support LGBT rights, and to force them to choose between issues could make some of their support waiver.

This holiday does not have to be a conflict between conservatives and liberals and although political dissent should be encouraged I would hope that the simpler truth about the message of Jeans Day would not be lost. As one of my friends put it, "I think that jeans day is a great idea. Everyone owns jeans and by wearing them, they can support the rights of gays and lesbians … I just hope everyone understands how meaningful it will be." If we all focus on showing (or not) support for LGBT rights then this holiday would be more effective and less controversial.

'Nazi' accusation made against student

Anti-living wage poster on first-year's door defaced by reference to 'Nazi Party'

By Peter Hackeman
Opinions Editor

Much has been made of the many 'bias' and 'potentially bias' motivated incidents on campus this semester. Unfortunately, two weeks ago a disturbing threshold was crossed when a student was targeted specifically for her political beliefs. A self-described conservative freshman, who wishes not to be identified in this public setting, posted on her door the anti-living wage poster distributed by the Bucknell University Conservatives Club. Within 24 hours, the closing line had been crossed out and replaced, changing the phrase "Here & Now; Common Sense" to "Here & Now; Nazi Party."

The student was "shocked at first, then scared that people would hate a group that much." While we may not all be shocked that hate of this magnitude exists, we should be disturbed that it exists on our campus. The living wage issue is one which brings out strong emotions among many members of the campus community, no matter which side people may take. It is my hope that this incident is just the result of a person who got carried away, who forgot for a moment how to be civil and respectful to his or her fellow student.

A campus-wide advisory was never issued, and while one could debate whether it should have been, I'm inclined to defer that decision to the administration. What matters more than another email from the administration that is promptly deleted by many of the student body is the response of the students on this campus. Whereas most of, if not all of, the previous incidents may or may not have been perpetrated by University students, this one almost certainly was. Furthermore, this occured on a residence hall; it occured at the door to someone's home, on a hall where 20 to 30 students live. I cannot think of an event that should hit closer to home for all of us than this one. Even though the vast majority of our campus would never think of doing such a thing, hopefully this will be a wake up call to us that we all need to be more tolerant of others and demand the same of our friends.

The accusation that the Conservatives Club is the same as the Nazi Party is absurd and dangerous. While I've rarely been confused with a conservative, even I can see the fundamental differences between the Conservatives and Nazis. While conservatives and liberals both aim to protect the rights and liberties of people in different ways, the Nazi Party rejected this principle outright. The labeling of this group as Nazis resembles the tactics and ideology of Nazism itself more than the anything else. A true conservative believes in the right of groups to voice their opinions and wouldn't resort to this kind of demagoguery. A true liberal celebrates the diversity of ideas that are present in this kind of intellectual debate, no matter how much he or she may disagree with them. It then stands to reason that the person responsible for this can't hide under the banner of either of the major ideological groups in our country, and I expect that all the groups on this campus will refuse to support this sort of behavior.

A true conservative believes in the right of groups to voice their opinions and wouldn't resort to this kind of demagoguery. A true liberal celebrates the diversity of ideas that are present in this kind of intellectual debate, no matter how much he or she may disagree with them.

This action is as inexcusable as it is embarrassing. I won't try to speculate on the motivation of the perpetrator, but will simply say that I can think of nothing that justifies this action. No amount of compassion for the status and economic difficulties of the workers making below a living wage could necessitate an action such as this. In fact, this sort of act distracts from the reasoned, civil, fact-based and open-minded debate that is so badly needed on this issue. Unfortunately, this event has left at least one person "weary of debate on the living wage issue" because she feels that "there are people who don't want to have an intellectual conversation; they just want to turn it into personal attacks."

No amount of administration action will solve this growing problem if we as students are not willing to stop it ourselves. We should not be dependent on the various administrators to tell us how to discourage these views.

We are about to become, if we are not already, highly educated members of a great country which demands that we respect others and their ideas. Amongst the roughly 3,300 students on campus right now, there are future leaders in business, politics, military, academia and countless other parts of society. If we are to become those sucessful leaders and promote the values that differentiate us as the leaders of the world, we must demand tolerance from our peers. It certainly seems time for us to start that journey.

History full of unjustified U.S. aggression

By Josh Fisher
Staff Writer

Of the many unfortunate truths about terrorism, a stark one stands monumentally alone: it works. On a September morning beautiful in a summer breeze, America's most prestigious couple was set against a perfectly blue sky … but in the face of the two poetic specters, rooted in such unparalleled circumstances, "moral equivalency" took the final fall.

How to morally judge, for example, America's direct aid to the Chilean military coup of 1973? A superpower, touting doctrines of freedom, liberty and democracy, aided the overthrow of the elected socialist government of Salvador Allende, whose platform was wealth redistribution in order to help the poor, including nutritional programs initiated for malnourished children.

Indeed, if there is a face to state-sponsored terrorism in America, by our own definition, it is the face of Henry Kissinger.

Allende, after elected, spent the next three years restraining a mass political movement of immense revolutionary potential. Meanwhile, a Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) cable from Oct. 16, 1970, released under the Freedom of Information Act, spelled out U.S. Government objectives: "It is firm and continuing policy that Allende be overthrown by a coup … We are to continue to generate maximum pressure toward this end utilizing every appropriate resource. It is imperative that these actions be implemented clandestinely and securely so that the U.S. Government and American hand be well hidden." In September 1973, U.S.-trained militants in the Chilean military overthrew the government, and Allende was killed. The United States then offered to aid the military junta of General Augusto Pinochet that murdered over 30,000 civilians within the first few months of its 17-year dictatorship; thousands more "disappeared."

Pinochet's opponents suffered torture by flamethrower and bone crushing, and the bodies of the victims were dumped into the sea from helicopters. The torture practiced by the Pinochet regime was well known to the Nixon administration—but as Henry Kissinger told the U.S. ambassador to Chile, "Don't give me any of those political science lectures. We don't care about torture. We care about important things"—"I don't see why we should have to stand by and let a country go communist due to the irresponsibility of its own people." Indeed, this is democracy redefined.

How to judge American direct military interventions under "humanitarian" pretexts, CIA sponsored assassinations and invasions, frequent breach of international law, support for right-wing human rights-violating dictatorships, arms sales and nuclear threats? The case against the U.S. government is exhaustive. And Kissinger should be considered America's premier candidate for an international war crimes trial. Kissinger's involvement is obvious, and leading off the list of offenses, the early 1970s "carpet-bombing" of Cambodia and Laos.

The hypocritical cries for freedom forever … perhaps we need to re-learn what these words really mean.

The bombing was not approved by Congress, defied the U.S. Constitution and resulted in, by conservative estimate, the death of 950,000 civilians of nations against which the United States had not even declared war. Kissinger utilized chemical weapons, and oversaw every committee linked to every element of the campaign against Laos and Cambodia. His campaigns extended to all corners of the globe, and as journalist Christopher Hitchens stated this year, "Many if not most of Kissinger's partners in politics, from Greece to Chile to Argentina to Indonesia, are now in jail or awaiting trial"—including Augusto Pinochet —"His own lonely impunity is rank." But indeed, as American songwriter Tom Lehrer once said, "Political satire became obsolete when Henry Kissinger was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize." Indeed, if there is a face to state-sponsored terrorism in America, by our own definition, it is the face of Henry Kissinger.

On Sept. 11 debate quickened suddenly around the question of moral equivalency—what differentiates American military actions in the last 50 years from those of terrorists? The doctrine took its final blow when the U.S. government issued an open-ended war on terrorism. Countless crimes against humanity had this sort of eventuality—and now it's our job as citizens to perpetuate retribution, to see that these 3,000 pawns disguised as people, in our government's big game, didn't die in vain. The hypocritical cries for freedom forever … perhaps we need to relearn what these words really mean.

Military seeks to disregard environment to train troops

By Gretchen Schrock
Senior Writer

The consequences of the horrific terrorist attacks of last Sept. 11 have obtained an interesting new dimension as the Pentagon gears up to fight its latest sworn enemy—endangered species.

According to various sources at the Pentagon, endangered species of all shapes and sizes are threatening the training abilities and readiness of this country's military forces and the development of necessary weapons. How can a bird named the loggerhead shrike, endangered on San Clemente Island off the California coast, and other harmless creatures instill fears among gun-toting, grenade-carrying American soldiers that they lack the preparation needed to battle against the relatively primitive armies of the axis of evil?

The answer is that the environmental laws that have protected endangered species and their habitats for years have also cost the Pentagon $4 billion a year in compliance, money that could be better spent on further equipping and instructing the military sector for combat. "Our troops' first exposure to live fire cannot come as they land on a hostile beach in combat," said Paul W. Mayberry, deputy under secretary of defense to the subcommittee on military readiness, which was quoted in a New York Times article.

Thus, introduced as a part of the defense spending bill that Congress will consider in the near future, the Pentagon proposal includes an exemption from these environmental regulations on national security grounds for bombing ranges, air bases and training grounds from sections of the Clean Air Act, Clean Water Act, Marine Mammal Protection Act, Noise Control Act, Migratory Bird Treaty Act and the Endangered Species Act.

One example that can be cited to support this claim is that at Fort Hood, Texas, 84 percent of the 200,000 acres devoted to training are subject to limitations that seek to protect two endangered species and precious cultural artifacts, decreasing the scope of operations that military personnel may perform on that base.

The issue is not whether the military agencies are truly trained and supplied with the essential weapons and informational systems but whether military needs should be paramount in every respect to the other priorities of the American government. The Pentagon in its proposal made it abundantly clear that environmental concerns are waste of financial and spatial resources.

A draft of the bill says, "Federal departments and agencies shall not place the conservation of public lands, or the preservation or recovery of endangered, threatened or other protected species found on military lands, above the need to ensure that soldiers, sailors, airmen and marines receive the greatest possible preparation for, and protection from, the hazards and rigor of combat through realistic training on military lands and in military airspace."

With Congress' overwhelming support for the administration's efforts to quell all terrorist forces at home and abroad, it is evident that military interests will be victorious to the permanent detriment of the environment. If the military is permitted to do whatever they want in order to achieve the greatest possible readiness for battle, then soon our country, to its outraged horror, will discover that public drinking water is contaminated with munitions, air is filled with disease-causing pollutants from bombing discharges, noise levels are exceeding what is appropriate, and sensitive marine life have been substantially harmed or killed from the effects of test weapons. All of these ramifications of unlimited military activity are extremely difficult, if not impossible, to reverse.

Our federal government cannot allow its vision to become so clouded by the necessity to defeat terrorism that other areas of national well being are ignored. National security is not only obtained by possessing the latest technological weaponry, the most skilled military force, or the most productive espionage team but also by possessing a healthy and rich natural environment.

Every part of the national habitat is affected by the negative events that occur on another piece of it, reducing its overall reproduction of important biological functions. For example, when the Berlin Wall fell in 1989 and the international community could fully comprehend the environmental disaster caused by years of industrial neglect by the East German government, the economic and political weakness of that area increased significantly.

We cannot allow the United States to tumble into the trap of believing that security and supremacy can be forever achieved by disregarding other zones of political and economic strength that are perceived as unimportant or unrelated to present issues. A government can never predict how significant the success of these areas may be for the prosperity of future American generations. Instead, the current administration should conceive of ways to favorably integrate the needs of the military and the demands for a thriving environment.

Lt. Colonel Cynthia Colin, a spokesperson for the Pentagon, commented to the New York Times, " We are always concerned by anything that might adversely impact the training needed to protect our military people, our nation and our way of life." However, she does not realize that if the Pentagon is truly concerned by anything that threatens our nation and our way of life, it must include the menace of a destroyed environment.

America needs informed leadership to be an honest broker in Middle East

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

With Easter last weekend, the massive imbalances in the Middle East have once again shown to be a continually worsening situation. The latest suicide bombings have momentarily taken the world's attention off the war against terrorism in the Afghanistan/Pakistan region and focused on Israeli policies in the occupied territories. The Bush Administration, that until recently had a hands-off policy toward the Palestinian/Israeli peace process, claims that the Clinton peace initiatives were too intimately involved and ultimately hurt the peace process.

What has been happening since the Sept. 11 attacks in the United States has been a type of myopic vision of anti-terrorism by international eradication. Anti-terrorism has become the prime focus on the domestic front, as well in the United States. Homeland/domestic security has become a massive and controversial, political endeavor and Prime Minister Arial Sharon has mistakenly extended this type of "homeland security" into the already highly militarized situation in Israel with tank raids into the occupied territories. Initially, Bush chastised Sharon for these moves, but unfortunately Bush seems to have embraced the Israeli position that Iran and Syria have been meddling in Israeli politics while supporting Hamas (a terrorist organization). Bush unconvincingly stated on Saturday that he believed this to be true but had no proof. Why say this days after the Saudi peace initiative was brought forward?

To be a "fair broker" for peace, even a super-power needs informed leadership. Recent events don't prove out this to be entirely true. Vice President Dick Cheney went to the Middle East to find support for an attack on Iraq and embarrassingly found little stomach for anything even approaching another version of Desert Storm in the current violence charged atmosphere. Cheney was told by sympathetic ally, Jordan, that it was not the time and had to return home.

A reassessment of the U.S. position is in order if we are to play the "fair broker" in the Palestinian/Israeli dispute. There seems to be a case for political tone deafness in the planning and timing of Cheney's support seeking in the region. The body language between General Zinni (U.S. peace envoy) and Yassir Arafat to put it kindly, looked hopelessly doomed to failure.

As long as a colonial atmosphere remains in the occupied territories, the hopelessness and bombings will continue if not intensify. Thirty-plus years of occupation has done nothing but militarize the situation and given an entire generation a hopeless vision of the future. The disheartening situation has become gloomier with the recent development of female bombers carrying out attacks. How can the United States be thinking of expanding the war on terrorism in a region that has as little hope as this demonstrates?

Making the rubble bounce in Arafats' building complex will not stop this bombing campaign. The belief that Arafat has the authority to stop it may be mistaken. Sixteen year olds don't strap on bombs and blow themselves up in supermarkets if they have hope for the future. Perhaps both Sharon and Arafat need replacing in this process. Both men have too much warfare and history between them to function as effective peace envoys for their respective sides.

The idea that the United States can be "fair broker" for peace in the Middle East seems laughable at this point while we are looking for support for aggression against Iraq. The United States looks vengeful and warlike, not like peacemakers in this instance. Three million Palestinians wait for a vision of the future. Israel as a inhabitable state is inextricably linked to that future of a Palestinian independent state.

Moral opposition to homosexuality is not hatred or intolerance

By Aaron Hanlon
Staff Writer

American society consists of a very broad spectrum of moral foundations, and the University community is certainly no exception. Some of us were brought up Christian, some Muslim, some Jewish. Some of us adhere to the moral ideology that these and other religions prescribe, while some of us do not. Some of us simply listened to mom and dad when they told us right from wrong, and never gave God a thought. Quite possibly, others never listened to mom and dad, some may have listened to mom and mom, and others were raised by MTV or ESPN.

In all likelihood, most of us were raised on a combination of things, from which we have been molded into the moral beings that we are. Regardless of the origins of our moral foundations, each one of us is entitled to our own set of ethics, which need not be written in stone, but rather can be subject to change in light of new knowledge.

Such an entitlement, however, does not relieve us from our responsibility to do what is right, nor does it guarantee us that we are right simply because we believe it to be so. What is right, in turn, is not always some mystical, elusive phenomenon.

All of us have proclivities toward doing the right things: resisting the urge to lie, cheat, steal or kill, among other things. Of course, there are gray areas as well: Is it morally sound to eat meat, have premarital sex, execute a murderer or abort a child? This is where it gets difficult. This is where the diversity of our backgrounds shows brightest. This is where we have problems.

Ideally, one's moral position should be defended in any instance, for what is moral or ethical to one is what is most important to him. One's right to free speech, as well, should never be taken away, and censorship should not occur. There are some moral positions, however, that are very difficult to publicly defend without being offensive, flip or arrogant. For example, we do not generally publish articles that demean one religion in favor of another. If it is possible for one to claim an ideology to be superior to another without berating that other senselessly and without justification, let him do so. This very difficult task has been taken on by some attendants of the recent V-Day forum and some members of the University administration, and taken on poorly to say the least.

The issue of homosexuality is one that is clearly controversial and sensitive, as opinions and normative judgments on this matter vary across the board. For those of us who are morally opposed, the University can be a very hostile environment. (The condition of "hostile" was determined by a small survey of 10 University undergraduate students, which is one more than the total number of undergraduate students who were included in the results of the previously reported Friends of Lesbians and Gays & Bisexuals, Transgenders (FLAG&BT) Campus Climate Survey.) Supporters of homosexuality often resort to calling me a homophobe or a bigot. They often suggest that I harbor hatred against homosexual individuals, and that I am somehow ignorant or cold-hearted or intolerant. To set the record straight, those of us who are morally opposed are not in any way afraid of or threatened by homosexuals, as is suggested by those who slander us as "homophobic." We do not hate homosexuals or condone violence against them or mistreatment of them. We very simply disagree with them from a moral standpoint in the same way that a Mormon may believe that it is wrong to consume alcohol, or a Catholic may be of the view that Jesus Christ was resurrected from the dead.

That being said, how often do we find articles suggesting that Catholics have a contempt for science because they believe that a resurrection occurred, or hear speakers decree that Mormons have a phobia of alcohol because their ignorance of it blinds them to its value. Even if there were such ludicrous statements published, how seriously would you take them?

Administration strangling social scene

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

There is something rotten in the state of Lewisburg. A long, proud and festive tradition has recently fallen into a tailspin toward utter demise. Alas, what was once great; yet now tarnished, must call forth the noisy protest of the overwhelmingly socially-minded student body.

Allow me to wax nostalgic while I fondly recall the days that prompted me to apply for early decision to this school—my frequent visits to hang out with my sister, Meredith Elliott '00. I came for popular times like Siblings Weekend, Parents Weekend, Houseparty, etc. In those days I remember every house on Fraternity Road rocking out every time I visited. It was amazing going from one huge fraternity party to the next—this school was, believe it or not, really fun. Ironically, at that time the students were complaining that the school was headed downhill in terms of partying.

There are many high-quality liberal arts schools that rival the University in the Northeast. So what makes prospective students want to spend their four undergraduate years wedged between cornfields and a prison, conveniently located right in the middle of nowhere? For everyone I know: a nice campus, and a strong, enviable social scene.

Our current batch of students has had the unfortunate circumstance of attending while the campus has been under endless construction; however these projects are generally for the good. On the other hand, we are also plagued by the unfortunate circumstance of attending a university in which the administration has turned away from things rational in favor of things draconian. Absurd and impractical idealism is now the guiding principle that dictates University policy. Alcohol is public enemy number one. Parties equal bad. The administration will announce its intention to move the emphasis of the social scene uphill, while in the same breath, pronounce new regulations making the opposite outcome inevitable.

I can't even think of the last time there has been a fraternity party—the very unsocial ones for charity do not count. There used to be around five a weekend—I don't think there has been one this semester.

It's hard for there to be any sort of social scene uphill when every fraternity is on probation. What's concerning is these fraternities have done little wrong to merit such sanctions. Sigma Alpha Epsilon (SAE) was put on probation for having their pledges drink a keg (those monsters). Lambda Chi Alpha (Lambda) is on probation for people drinking in brothers' rooms during a party. Kappa Delta Rho (KDR) is on probation for playing a dangerous drinking game called pong, or beirut to the professionals. The ones that aren't on probation do not host parties, out of fear of falling victim to the same fate as the rest.

A school that demands a lot from its students academically should allow them to unwind in equal proportions. The popular credo comes to mind, "we work hard, we play hard." Well, not here folks, or at least not anymore. The administration doesn't want us to play hard, medium or at all, really. If we had a decent social scene, that would somehow brand us with the connotatively-cursing "party school" euphemism. If this social decline was illustrated on a line graph, I predict one, in the near future, could chart a similarly patterned line to echo the other's descent; this imitating line would represent the number of applications admissions receives.

So what's the latest in this transformation from a place of modeled rationality towards an archetypal Stalinist state? Well, for one, if a fraternity was to ever be so bold as to have a party, those "of age" would be forced to consume their poison within regulated cages. Simple acts that were once normal and fun are now disallowed, such as congregating with people who have yet reached this epochal threshold, enjoying whatever entertainment is provided with the rest of the party-goers, and drinking in a non-sardine style chicken-wire cage extending from the floor to ceiling.

Further, the University has now re-interpreted the 21-year-old drinking age to apply to not just alcohol, but to the possession of mugs as well. Yes, it is true; only those "of age," will be permitted to possess liquid-carrying-apparatuses during Houseparty.

Guests must be 18-years old or above, must fork over $20 and only a few are permitted per student. There weren't this many rules in high school. Keep in mind; this is the weekend that is undeniably the most successful marketing device we have as a university.

Of course, I am just beginning to scratch the surface of the recently implemented regulations regarding Greek social life, all of which invariably perpetuate the banal downtown scene. Aside from the unattractive monotony, this has also led to students incurring fines of up to $1,000, as well as $1,000 plus fines for being "kicked back on campus."

Skip's is now closed. The pub is here, yet only tempting to the deep-pocket-possessing. The students seem resolute; we want to drink free, crappy beer in dimly-lit fraternity basements. The fraternity men are seemingly similarly resolute; we want people drinking our crappy beer in our begrimed basements. Unfortunately, the administration would rather transform this previously entertaining school into a socially-void university within a socially-void area.

Speech codes may not be the answer for campus

Regardless of what solution is proposed, campus needs to find a way to tolerate

By Katie Parker
Staff Writer

There has been a recent uproar on our campus about the possibility of administrative speech codes, which could be put into effect in order to facilitate a more empathetic and politically correct campus discourse. Like many recent voices, I find "political correctness" in its strictest form to be more of an annoyance than a necessity. I do believe in the First Amendment, and in freedom of speech. However, I vehemently disagree with the notion that the University campus is devoid of racism and racial intolerance. Regardless of whether or not the recent events, such as the blackface incident, are intentional, they are without a doubt ignorant, and should spark a campus-wide effort on the part of the students and faculty to promote an educational environment that not only reacts, but seeks to correct such acts of intolerance.

However problematic this proposed solution may be, the hearts of the administration are in the right place. As an institution, we should promote an environment that educates its students to understand and take responsibility for the implications of careless and offensive actions. We should promote an environment where students are educated about the historical and social realities of oppression.

Regarding the blackface incident, some facts: blackface comedy is a historical reality, and a vehicle for the demoralization and defamation of African Americans throughout the history of our culture. Recent conservative opinion has shrouded itself in liberal guise by promoting an inaccurate definition of "tolerance"—where "they" have to tolerate "us," if "they" expect us to tolerate "them." This has been illustrated by comparisons of black teenagers who dress up as Caucasians without receiving the same incensed backlash from their community. "Why the double standard?" cry the oppressed conservatives. The simple explanation is this: "whiteface" incidents are harmless because there is simply no history of harm. There is absolutely no history in our culture of any race painting its faces white as a political statement meant to degrade Caucasians.

I do believe in the First Amendment, and in freedom of speech. However, I vehemently disagree with the notion that the University campus is devoid of racism and racial intolerance.

Yes, it is a shame that two students have to be punished and humiliated for what appears to be a fairly innocent and careless act. Unfortunately for them, they have been called to apologize for an offense they did not mean to commit. But, fortunately for them, the fact that the administration forced them to take responsibility for their actions has brought them a step closer to a more developed understanding of African-American culture, and racial tolerance.

We as a campus community should take a few moments to think about the recent incidents that have prompted our administration to consider a drastic action like a speech code. Can any one of us say with any certainty that we have a campus which promotes tolerance and acceptance of all persons, regardless of gender, race or sexual orientation? Can we really assert with any conviction that we are not in need of a more aggressive campaign for tolerance and diversity? I share with many students the concern that drastically limiting our right to express ourselves would be a devastating blow to any campus that attempts to promote individual freedoms, and a speech code in its strictest form would most certainly be a violation of those liberties. However problematic this proposed solution may be, the hearts of the administration are in the right place. As an institution, we should promote an environment that educates its students to understand and take responsibility for the implications of careless and offensive actions. We should promote an environment where students are educated about the historical and social realities of oppression. Call me a flag-burning, herbivorous liberal if you like, but why did we all go to college if not to educate ourselves and broaden our minds?

Whether the answer to this problem is a speech code or not remains to be debated. However, as students we cannot and should not ignore the recent wave of ignorance and intolerance that has swept across the campus.

Moreover, we should commit ourselves to endorse a more civil and open-minded atmosphere so that we can not only preserve our own individual freedoms, but seek to provide these same liberties for the many members of our campus who feel they have been jeopardized.

Slavery suit causes more harm than good

By Ryan Gee
Staff Writer

Well over 140 years ago, millions of people suffered unimaginable horrors under the American slave trade. Africans were kidnapped from their homelands, shipped across the Atlantic Ocean, and, if they survived, were forced to give up their freedom and work under terrible conditions. There is no question that these were crimes of unparalleled magnitude. However, this does not mean that the people of today should either suffer or benefit from reparations, such as the groundbreaking $1.4 trillion suit filed recently against many large companies.

While this suit claims the desire to simply punish companies that in some way aided slavery in America, these businesses will not be the only ones to suffer. When looking at these corporations, we need to remember that it is not Aetna Inc. or FleetBoston Financial that will suffer, but instead the vast amounts of employees who work under these companies, many of who are the African-Americans this suit claims to represent. A company is not a separate entity in it of itself, but the embodiment of the hard work and dedication of countless people. If these corporations are fined the proposed $1.4 trillion, the repercussions of such a staggering financial loss will negatively affect everyone in the company, especially the common workers who have the most at stake in their jobs. Why should these innocents be punished for crimes they themselves never committed?

This suit is not only unfair to such people; it also betrays the very idea of justice in this country. No one alive today actually committed the crimes of slavery. Many of the defendants are probably not even connected to slavery at all; in fact, their ancestors could have been avid abolitionists or hid escaped slaves in their homes along the underground railroad. Regardless of whether you are descended from a freedom fighter or a slave owner, no one has the right to punish you for something your relatives did years and years ago, when you had no way to stop them, before you were even born.

Not only should no one be punished for things they did not do, no one should ever benefit for hardships they never had to endure. Deadria Farmer-Paellman and those she claims to represent were, in all likelihood, never slaves themselves. The idea that anyone can demand compensation for crimes against their ancestors is wrong and selfish. There is no group of people out there, regardless of the color of their skin or their religious beliefs, that deserves money for sins committed so long ago to those you have barely any connection with.

Slavery may be long gone from American soil, but we as a country are still nursing the tremendous wounds caused by such a terrible event. Reparations, however, are not the way to continue the healing process. We will never be able to move on if we keep pointing fingers and placing blame on each other, especially when those we try to condemn are as innocent as the accusers.

Only In America . . .

Prosecutors said that as far back as the late 1980s, Jacobson, director of security for Simon Marketing Inc., embezzled more than $20 million worth of high-value winning McDonald's game pieces from his employer. He then distributed the winning game pieces to individuals who personally redeemed the prizes or recruited others to redeem the game pieces for prizes, some valued at as much as $1 million, according to the indictment.

BUSINESS & POLITICS

Political views come alive at debate

University students discuss political issues that are headlining in the news today

By Matthew Hinson
Business & Politics Editor

A small but interested and informed audience came together to hear the first political debate between the Conservatives Club and the College Democrats last week. They debated the ongoing War on Terrorism. The Conservatives opened the debate with an attack on Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein and his capabilities for mischief making against the United States. Under U.N. rules, they said, the United States would be justified in attacking Iraq as a matter of self-defense. It's not just the right thing to do, the members say, it is imperative to remove Hussein for the security of the United States. The Club stated that America, by removing Hussein, would free the Iraqi people in the same manner that had been done recently in Afghanistan.

The Democrats took a very different line. While applauding U.S. efforts in Afghanistan, they cautioned against quick action being taken by the United States in its search for justice and a safer world. Calling for greater use of diplomacy and "smart sanctions," the Democrats questioned the Bush administration's lack of focus in further prosecuting the war. They posed a question: With the lack of a true coalition, such as that built by Bush's father prior to the Gulf War, and without Arab support or a U.N. mandate, would not the United States be better off in the long run by further using the diplomatic battlefield?

Questions were then fielded by both sides to the opposition. The Conservatives were asked questions about the lack of POW status for captured Al-Qaeda fighters. This is consistent with Geneva Convention language, as Al-Qaeda does not fight for nor represent a state. As for the lack of international support for an expanded war on terror and its implications, the Conservatives responded that a coalition and international support are good to have when possible; however, as this is a fight for national safety, it is not necessary to have international support in order to act. Regarding why the focus of the war seemed to be upon individuals, such as Mohammed Omar (Taliban leader), Osama bin Laden (Al-Qaeda leader) and Hussein, and not on terrorists as a whole or the causes of terrorism, the Conservatives asserted that this is a war on terrorism, so, these people are bound to be attacked as the leaders of terrorists. As to the causes of terrorism (implied to be poverty), the Conservatives suggested that participants in these terrorist attacks and groups seem not to be poor people, but middle class or rich.

The Democrats took questions about their comfort level with U.S. defense capabilities. They responded that one can never feel safe enough. In regard to what they felt the cost of an Iraqi war would be, the Democrats answered that uncertain outcomes make unsure the cost, for a U.S. attack on Iraq might inflame the Israeli-Palestinian conflict. In response to why Hussein would do his best to dodge weapons inspectors if he had nothing to hide, the Democrats offered that there is no legal obligation for Hussein, as leader of a sovereign state, to allow such inspectors into the country; as the inspectors were exposed as CIA operatives, Hussein has the right to expel these spies. As for why the United States should wait to hit Hussein, the Democrats offered a "haste makes waste" defense. The Democrats said we must convince our allies of our focus in this war, expand our intelligence capabilities and use these initiatives instead of military action, as well as using diplomacy and the judicial system to bring terrorists to justice.

The debate ended with closing remarks by both groups. Tom Elliott '03 spoke on behalf of the Conservatives and defended the idea of overthrowing Hussein as preventative medicine. This would be the one sure-fire way of preventing Hussein from bringing to the United States attacks worse than those of Sept. 11 by use of nuclear, biological or chemical weapons.

Peter Hackeman '04 closed for the Democrats, asking for tolerance. Firstly, tolerance for Americans' right of dissent. He decried the recent incident, when Senator Trent Lott (R-Miss.) criticized Democratic colleagues, saying, as quoted by www.washingtonpost.com, "How dare Senator Daschle criticize President Bush while we are fighting our war on terrorism, especially when we have troops in the field". Secondly, he asked for tolerance and decent treatment of others by Americans. He asked, if America's solution to stopping terrorism is to kill those who have killed us, what sort of values does that show America to have? Also, he stated that it was unwise of America to deny the Geneva Convention's POW status to captured suspected terrorists of the Al-Qaeda organization. Despite the legal point under which they can be denied such status (the fact that Al-Qaeda fighters do not represent or fight for a recognized state), Hackeman said that the United States should consider how its own soldiers are likely to be treated the next time some of them are captured, given that the United States is dancing around international protocol.

> "We're certain that there will be future debates; we know that we want to do them, it's just a matter of who wants to work with us. The Democrats are likely candidates, as are groups such as the BCEJ. Come fall, we'll be looking to do as many of these as can possibly be done in a high-quality manner."
> —Michael Boland '03, Conservative Club president

Audience members then posed a few questions. The Conservatives were asked what they thought of Iraqis burning American flags, as it is constitutional here—why should we attack Iraq for similar behavior? They responded that such an act was an expression of hate which we are bound to defend ourselves from. The paradoxical notion of killing Iraqi civilians in a military campaign to free Iraqi citizens was also questioned. They responded stating that the benefits of freeing the Iraqi people and removing the Iraqi dictator outweighed the costs of a few civilian lives. The Democrats were asked, pointedly, to propose a plan of action—if not military attacks to stop terrorism, then what? They answered that reliance on diplomacy and our intelligence services would serve to reduce terrorism without creating the chaos and renewed hatred of America that would follow military strikes in states currently harboring terrorists. Security comes through having mutual respect for one another, said the Democrats.

The debate flowed smoothly, with Professor of Biology Gary Sojka moderating the debate. Both sides presented respectable arguments for their respective viewpoints, and both sides look forward to holding future debates with one another, and, if possible, the newly formed Green Party.

"We're certain that there will be future debates; we know that we want to do them, it's just a matter of who wants to work with us. The Democrats are likely candidates, as are groups such as the BCEJ. Come fall, we'll be looking to do as many of these as can possibly be done in a high-quality manner," Conservative Club President Mike Boland '03 said.

The Our Ukraine Party presidential candidate Viktor Yushchenko holds up a ballot for the hotly contested elections.

Ukranian election results contested

By Michael Gorman
Senior Writer

According to MSNBC, reformers won a slim victory over the Ukraine's Communist Party in recent Parliamentary elections on Monday. The elections very extremely contentious, and highlight the growing divisions in the country nearly 10 years after the collapse of the Soviet Union. The newly elected government includes ex-Premier Viktor Yushchenko. The former banker is credited with producing the first wave of economic growth in the country during his last stint in office.

The results of the elections may be tainted, however. According to MSNBC, election observers remark that the elections were handled in an extremely incompetent manner, and that claims of voting violations were rampant. In some instances, not all of the voters were allowed to cast their ballots in the elections.

The reform parties were continuing to cry foul about the way that the elections were handled. The results and processes have been criticized by both the United States and European states. However, these nations stopped short of declaring the elections unfair. According to CNN, State Department spokesman Philip Reeker said in a statement on Monday night that, "We are disappointed that the government of Ukraine did not move in a proactive manner to ensure a level playing field for all political parties."

The United States concurred with the opinion of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) that the election was a marked improvement over the 1998 Parliamentary elections. However, both agreed that important flaws persist in the system. According to CNN, the United States has suggested a post-election mission to Ukraine in order to determine what changes need to be made to ensure fair elections.

Although Our Ukraine Party candidate Yushchenko won the election, he maintains that the authorities miscounted his actual results by as much as eight to 12 percent. Although the reformers did win the elections, the results only account for half of the Parliament's 450 seats. According to CNN, single-member constituencies will determine the other 225 seats, where the Communists will likely maintain their power. The Communist Party holds a great deal of influence in these constituencies, and the result for the Ukraine will likely be a hung Parliament.

Middle East peace again in doubt

The standoff in Ramallah continues between Palestinian leader Yassir Arafat and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon.

By Tamanna Hye
Staff Writer

Fighting continued this week when two gunmen shot and killed three Israelis and wounded others in a Jewish settlement in the West Bank. As Israeli pressure mounted, Yasser Arafat said he was ready to work toward a cease-fire in the 18-month Palestinian uprising that has already killed more than 1,500 people. Arafat said that, unfortunately, there are massive aggressive preparations being made by the Israeli troops to launch against the civilians, the cities and the Palestinian refugee camps. Palestinian officials also said that their security forces are arresting militants. Such activity is likely to derail the peace process.

Saudi Arabia's foreign minister, Prince Saud Al-Faisal warned that the Middle East violence will spin out of control unless Israel and the rest of the world take to heart the offer of peace from the Arabs. Arafat urged implementation of a proposal mediated by the CIA's director George Tenet. This plan calls for a cease-fire, but Israel is backing a modified plan which was suggested by U.S. mediator Anthony Zinni. A spokesperson for Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon dismissed Arafat's call for a cease-fire and said that Israel was fed up by the declarations and the desires to see action take place.

Saud, speaking for the Arab leaders, condemned the killing of civilians in Israel, but said that it was the work of Palestinians who had lost all hope. A rejection of the Saudi Arabian peace plan, which the 22 nations of the Arab League endorsed a few days ago, would mean a return to violence, the widening of the conflict and the instabilities "that God forbid will happen," reports The Wall Street Journal.

The United States welcomed the Saudi proposal, and initially Israeli officials also welcomed some of its elements. The plan offers Israel normal relations and peace in return for withdrawal from the Palestinian and Syrian land it captured in 1967.

With the Arab League summit over, the Palestinians are doubtful that the summit achieved anything at all. To the Palestinians nothing could be implemented. They believe that it is just all talk.

The plight of the Palestinians symbolizes the hopeless rage that is the progenitor of a new generation of young fighters and suicide bombers. They don't believe that anyone will implement peace, which they so desperately want in their lives. Polls show that a rising number of Israelis call for a new wave of expulsions of Palestinians. Education Minister Livnat called for a reoccupation of the West Bank and Gaza—areas which were assigned to Palestinian control in the early 1990s. The Palestinians will continue to fight the occupation. They feel that once the Israelis withdraw, they can discuss the situation, not before.

United States contemplates options to expand role in Middle East peace process

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has called for the exile of Palestinian leader Yassir Arafat.

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

Recent weeks and months have played host to a torrent of Palestinian suicide bombers, and Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has responded by sending an army offensive into the West Bank and keeping Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat holed up in his Ramallah office. President George W. Bush has repeatedly denounced the suicide bombings—labeling them "simple terror"—and has called on Arafat, for whom he has expressed a personal dislike, to stop them. But on the other hand, Bush is, in the words of The Wall Street Journal, trying to "pull back toward the more neutral stance of the mediator."

The United States and its president have to fulfill two possibly conflicting objectives: easing the bloodshed and maintaining the war on terror.

As MSNBC has reported, one fundamental choice that must be made is figuring out exactly who should be involved. Should Arafat be excluded? Many people, both in the United States and Israel, have concluded that Arafat himself is a terrorist and should be exiled, or even killed. These critics compare him to the Taliban, claiming that both harbor (or harbored, in the case of the Taliban) terrorists. Other analysts retort that if Arafat is excluded, exiled or killed the leader who follows him may be even worse, given how outraged the Palestinians would be. Arafat is also seen by many as, in the words of Secretary of State Colin Powell, "the leader of the Palestinian people," not just as the terrorist-in-chief. Finally, there is a commonly-held belief that Arafat is rather moderate, since he signed the 1993 Oslo accords, through which the Palestinian movement for the first time recognized Israel's right to exist.

Bush has so far refused to label Arafat a terrorist, since "he has agreed to a peace process." Bush has also come out in favor of establishing a Palestinian state. The Bush administration also needs to decide who its representative should be in the region. Right now it is General Anthony Zinni, a special envoy. There is wide speculation that Zinni will be replaced with the high-profile and better-known Powell, in hopes of boosting the cease-fire talks. Of course, personal involvement by a president himself—such as that of Jimmy Carter and then Bill Clinton at Camp David—is not unheard of, but such a move by Bush is not considered likely.

While Israel and many U.S. Jewish advocates want Bush to label Arafat a terrorist, the Palestinians and many Arab states instead contend that Israel is committing the real acts of terror, whereas the Palestinians are fighting a war of liberation. This belief is widely held even in Turkey, according to The Wall Street Journal, a leading moderate Arab nation and post-Sept. 11 ally in the war on terror.

Many U.S. diplomats worry that strong U.S. support for Israel will do much to weaken the war on terror, for several reasons. The continuing Israeli-Palestinian violence has kept the United States from creating a coalition to invade Iraq and topple the authoritarian Saddam Hussein regime. A strong pro-Israel stand taken by the United States could also drive cooperative Arab nations such as Pakistan, Jordan, Yemen, Qatar and Egypt out of the U.S.-led coalition against Al-Qaeda, any potential effort against Iraq nonwithstanding. Finally, and perhaps worst of all, U.S. intelligence officials worry that such a stance by America could provoke terrorist attacks against the United States by Palestinian terror groups, even without Arafat's authorization. As CIA Director George Tenet is quoted in the Senate Armed Services Committee record of March 19, "If these groups feel that U.S. actions are targeting their existence, they may begin targeting Americans directly."

Bison salvage one win against Holy Cross

By Meghann Chipko
Staff Writer

The Bison baseball team has fallen into a midseason slump, losing six of its last seven matchups. Last weekend the Bison faced the Holy Cross Crusaders at home and lost three of the four games, giving them a 1-3 record in the League.

On Sunday, March 31, after losing a double header on the previous day, the Bison got off on the right foot early on. They rallied to win 7-5 in an exciting morning opener.

Kevin Burns '03 was the starting pitcher for the Bison. The Crusaders immediately gave him a hard time, scoring three runs off four hits in the top of the first.

The Bison answered in the bottom of the first with Chris Mahoney's '04 double down the right field line. He was batted home by Eric Fishman '02, scoring the Bison's first run of the game.

The Crusaders got their last run off Burns in the third, but he switched gears over the next few innings, giving up just two hits, and retiring 12 batters during one 14-batter stretch.

In the fourth, the Bison tied the game 4-4 off three hits. Pete Wolf '04 reached on error, Austin Barrett '05 singled and B.J. Batterson '03 punched out a triple to drive home Barrett. Pinch runner Steve Stutzman '04 and Larry Sheetz '02 finished off the series, driving home Batterson with a single.

The Bison continued their offensive streak in the sixth, scoring three more runs off three hits. Jon Campagna '04 hit a double, and Ben Krentzman '03 got a free ride to first after getting hit by a pitch. Campagna ran home from third off the relief pitcher's mistake, and Sheetz capitalized off the high pressure situation by hitting a triple, sending home Krentzman and increasing the lead 7-4.

Gregg Farmery '02 replaced Burns, pitching the seventh inning after the Crusaders threatened offensively. After the weekend, Farmery leads the league in saves with four.

In the nightcap, a less-than-stellar performance by the pitching staff contributed to a rough loss for the Bison.

Holy Cross got an early 5-0 lead off five at-bats thrown by R.J. Grant '03 in the first. The Bison quickly came back with a run in the second.

The fifth inning was exciting offensively for both teams. Holy Cross started off by increasing its lead to 11-1 by driving home six runs off six hits. In the bottom of the fifth, the Bison tacked on four more to make it 11-5.

The Crusaders scored two more in the sixth, and the Bison were only able to come back with one in the bottom of the inning, leaving the final score at 13-6.

Batterson and Ben Stoll '04 each had hits, while Sam Moss '04 went three-for-four.

After a long weekend, the Bison went on to play non-League challenger Towson University. The Tiger's 19 runs was the most the Bison pitching squad has allowed in a game thus far in 2002.

Wolf led the Bison offensively with three hits in the game, but it wasn't enough to counteract Towson's offensive streak. The Bison lost 19-9.

The Bison will square off against Navy four times this weekend, with double-headers against the League rival scheduled at home for both April 6 and 7.

Both tennis squads split contests 1-1

By Caity Selleck
Senior Writer

Both the men's and women's tennis teams went 1-1 for the week, with the men's team falling to Dayton, 5-2, while beating Franklin and Marshall with a score of 5-2, and the women's team losing to league competitor American University, 4-2, while beating University of Delaware, 5-2.

On Monday, April 1, the men's team traveled to Franklin and Marshall. Due to a lack of upperclassmen, the lineup was composed entirely of first-year students. The Bison rookies took a strong lead over Franklin and Marshall, winning the doubles point and winning the top four singles slots. Scoring points for Bucknell in the singles slots were Nick Denefrio, playing first singles with scores of 2-6, 6-4, 6-4, at second, Joe Menezes, with scores of 6-3 and 6-1, at third, Leland Tien won his matches 6-2 and 6-1 and in the fourth slot was Gerald DiChiaria with scores of 6-0 and 6-1.

"Most of our freshmen have more than fulfilled my expectations for them after what I saw in the fall season, although some have been battling injuries," Coach Bob Hammerlee said. "They are extremely enthusiastic, and tennis is the main thing on their minds. I have been extremely happy with their performances so far."

On Wednesday, March 27, the men's team hosted Dayton and lost 5-2. Winning for the Bison was DiChiaria, in the fifth singles slot with scores of 6-2 and 6-2. The doubles teams of Scott Allen '02 and Todd Jacobs '03, and Alex Davydov '02 and Denefrio scored a total of one point for best two-out-of three for the Bison with scores of 8-5 and 9-7

Bison softballers still in mid-slump

Kelli Haskins '05 only gave up one earned run in seven innings against Army.

By David Cohen
Staff Writer

The University softball team is off to a relatively slow start in the Patriot League, as it lost twice to Army on March 31st. First baseman Kelly Dugan's '02 stellar afternoon at the plate was overshadowed by an effective display of both pitching and offensive execution on the behalf of Army. Dugan's 4-for-7 performance was not quite enough for the Bison, who dropped to 0-4 in League Competition.

Army pitcher Shauna Evans was nearly un-hittable in the first game of the doubleheader. It wasn't until the home half of the fourth inning that Bucknell recorded a hit, which was a Dugan single up the middle with one out. She reached as far as second base in the inning; however, Evans continued to work her magic as she ultimately escaped from the inning unharmed, silencing a minor Bison threat.

Evans' pitching gem was nothing shocking to the Bison, however. She had actually tossed her first career no-hitter the previous day versus Bucknell. Courtney Dohoney '04 was extremely frustrated with the team's inability to hit Evans.

"It was really frustrating because we knew that we could hit her," Dohoney said. "It just wasn't happening. We were trying a little too hard. We were so frustrated with ourselves that we put too much pressure on ourselves. She mixed her pitches well, moving them around the plate and kept us off balance."

Army put numbers on the board in a hurry, tallying respective runs in each of the first two innings. After Bianca Brito opened the game with a double to dead center, Lindsey March sacrificed her to second. Nicki Robbins then drove a single up the middle, which scored Brito from second base. In the second inning, Brito continued her productivity by driving in Chrissy O'Hara via sacrifice fly.

With the score standing at 2-0 in Army's favor in the seventh inning, the Black Knights added two more runs. In the bottom of the inning, the lone bright spot for the Bison, Dugan, struck once again with a single to left. However, Evans completed her two-hit shutout of the Bison with a strikeout to finalize a 4-0 Army triumph.

Dohoney is confident that Dugan has been a constant throughout the season and will help the team turn things around in the future.

"Kelly has been having an attitude this year that she is going to get on base no matter what it takes," Dohoney said. "We all feed off of her and she tends to get us going. Everyone was trying so hard to follow Kelly this weekend but we just didn't have a good weekend."

Army got things rolling early once again in the second game of the twin bill. The Knights recorded three runs on four hits in the top of the second inning. The Bison, however, retaliated with their first run of the weekend in the bottom of the inning.

Following a leadoff single through the right side by Jenna Demetriades '02, Erin Doyle '04 sacrificed her over to second base. Barb Wood '02 then grounded out to second base, which advanced Demetriades over to third with two out. Jennifer Ross '05 then delivered an extra-base hit to left field, scoring Demetriades.

The afternoon belonged to Army, as the Knights struck again in the fourth inning with three runs on three more hits. Lauren Gobar homered to left, highlighting the inning.

In the bottom of the fifth Dugan singled to drive in Ross, who reached base on an error by Army, narrowing the margin to 6-2.

Things heated up in the seventh, as Dohoney sparked the inning with a single to right field. Meredith Gill '03 followed suit with a single of her own, then Lauren Titus '02 loaded the bases with a single up the middle. With Bison superstar Dugan at the plate representing the tying run, Bucknell gained some momentum.

However, Army brought in its ace, Evans, who forced Dugan to fly out and Angela Stackhouse '04 to ground out. With the score favoring Army at 6-3 and the Bison still threatening, Evans sealed the deal with a strikeout and recorded a save while she was at it.

Bucknell fell to 6-14 overall following the game and hosted Towson on Wednesday, April 3 in a double header.

Every year, turfwriters and other horse racing aficionados from around the country select five individuals (three of the equine persuasion and a couple bipedal heroes), to be enshrined in Thoroughbred racing's National Museum and Hall of Fame. It isn't exactly Cooperstown, but the underlying purpose of enshrinement is the same.

This year's ballot features more than just the usual above-average nominees. Two-time Horse of the Year Cigar—who, by the way, was named after an aviary checkpoint, not a tobacco product—became eligible this year, and his nomination was as much a sure-shot as he was in most of his races. The same can be said for the chances of his induction.

It's a shame for the two other horses on the ballot with him, who don't stand a chance, but the coronation will be a fitting final chapter in Cigar's long and intriguing career. And there's no year more fitting than this one to induct a horse who, during his career, was regarded as "America's Horse."

Everything about Cigar was American. Starting with the sharp red, white and blue silks donned by his jockey, right down to his rags-to-riches, American-Dream-at-its-best ascent to stardom, Cigar carried the flag for this country in a manner we could all be proud of.

Eleven years ago, when he skewered his shoulder on a fencepost as a yearling, he turned an abysmal situation into an almost hopeless one. Farmhands who found him that day—shaking and covered with his own blood—weren't sure he'd even survive. But they gave him a chance anyway, and Cigar took it.

It turned out he was a pretty opportunistic character.

Age three is the "glory age" for a Thoroughbred, the age of Kentucky Derby Fever, the age of Triple Crown contention and the only age during which anyone outside of the sport is likely to notice their accomplishments. But Cigar bypassed all of that hype. He was busy lying on an operating table, having his knees reconstructed.

No one figured he'd get very far as a racer, but his owner Allen Paulson saw no harm in letting Cigar run a few races on the turf, a surface easier on the knees than dirt. Cigar was atrocious. He won one race in 11 attempts.

But right before his trainer Bill Mott was considering abandoning the steed's futile career, he gave Cigar a chance on the dirt track.

And Cigar loved chances. He trumped the field by eight lengths. He did it again in his next race. They gave him a chance against the best competition in the country, and he left them all standing too.

He compiled a perfect season (10 starts, 10 wins) in 1995, becoming the first horse to do so since the legendary Spectacular Bid in 1980. The 1995 Breeder's Cup Classic was the exclamation point on his demand for adoration, as he demolished a talented field and crushed the stakes record on a track composed of muddy slop.

That was his 12th victory in a row, and he was edging closer to a record that hadn't been touched in 46 years, the great Citation's modern record of 16 consecutive victories. It was another opportunity for Cigar to do something that few believed was possible.

The sport needed a hero, and Cigar obliged with perfect timing. Old age was creeping up on him, injury was wearing him down and fate had been historically cruel to horses chasing Citation's honor. But Cigar didn't care—he hit the wire for win number 16 in mid-July of 1996.

He retired later that year after a close, and gallant, third-place finish in his last race. It didn't end perfectly, but then, it didn't start perfectly either.

Cigar always had to fight for attention—that will be the legacy he takes into the Hall of Fame this May. Not only was he past the stage in his career that generally garners attention; he had to race in an era when horse racing was almost entirely bereft of public appeal.

The image that lasts is one of the gallant bay courser in his attempt at his 14th straight victory. Instead of keeping the star at home to face a softer field, Mott shipped Cigar across the globe for the inaugural running of the Dubai World Cup, where he'd face the toughest horses from around the world. Cigar had a superabundance of excuses that day in Dubai. He was several time zones away from home, he had an unyielding abscess beneath one of his hooves and he'd have to run on a track surface that American horses weren't accustomed to.

A furlong from the wire, a fresh, healthy Soul of the Matter edged his nose past Cigar and set down for a drive that should have destroyed the star's winning streak right there in that scorching desert evening. But from behind the dark horse's frame, Cigar emerged in front again, and stayed there, just hung there like his life depended on it, until he was under the wire, the winner by half a length.

He didn't have to win in Dubai—he had plenty of excuses. Plenty of excuses not to win 16 races in a row. Plenty of excuses not to become the Hall of Famer that he will soon be. He had excuses not to win any races at all, or even run in any races, for that matter. He had a good excuse to die right where he stood in that field back in 1991. But he didn't take any of them.

Cigar never needed excuses. Only chances.

Women's lacrosse team drowns Niagara 17-9

Senior Melissa Montefusco dominated Niagara with seven goals and five assists.

The Bison women's lacrosse team recovered well from their recent 6-5 loss to Lafayette, as they exploded to a 17-9 victory over Niagara this past Saturday.

Despite a first half battle when neither team led by more than two goals, the Bison came out after halftime with a mission and fired in six straight goals in a little over 15 minutes. The Purple Eagles of Niagara had several opportunities to score, but were stopped by goalie Nicole Kallis '03, who had 12 saves on the day. Recently, she was named Subway's Athlete of the Month for women's lacrosse, as she is currently leading the nation in save percentage at .644 and ranks sixth in the country in goals against average at 7.25.

Leading the way offensively for the Orange and Blue with a stellar performance was senior Co-Captain Melissa Montefusco '02 who scored seven goals and had five assists. She had a hand in 12 of their 17 goals that afternoon.

Due to her astounding execution, she was named last week's Patriot League Offensive Player of the Week. Montefusco now leads the team with 35 points from her 19 goals and 16 assists. Her mark in the assists category places her fifth on the University's all-time single-season list and her career point total of 106 moves her into ninth place on the career chart. In addition to her offensive performance, she recorded a season-high seven ground balls to aid in the defensive attack.

Aside from Montefusco, two other players found themselves as multiple goal scorers in the victory. Andrea Paraud '05 scored four goals and Amy Hasler '04 tallied three goals in the contest.

The win looks to boost the Bison into their game this Saturday at Patriot League rival Holy Cross. The team's high hopes will rest on the remaining league games they have on their schedule.

Hobart snaps men's lacrosse team's 11-game win streak

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

Hobart handed the 20th-ranked Bison men's lacrosse team a 12-11 loss, breaking the Orange and Blue's 11 game winning streak in the Patriot League. The Bison are now in a three-way tie with Hobart and Army for first place in the League. The champion will earn an automatic berth to the NCAA Tournament.

The Bison led the Statesmen for the majority of the game, and enjoyed a 7-5 lead in the third quarter. But Hobart rattled off six straight goals and gave up none for the next 18:06, and the Bison couldn't come back.

"We were in control of the game, but we couldn't finish it," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said. "Physically we were unable to answer when they got ahead."

Dennis Geraghty '03 scored five goals, including three straight in the game's final 2:21 minutes, but it was not enough for his team to catch the Statesmen. Andrew Sanders '03 added two goals and Chris Cara '05 dished out four assists.

"We got away from our game plan of slowing down their run-and-gun style offense," Sanders said.

The Bison struggled with possessions, something that they have had trouble with all season. The team lost the face-off battle 19-7 and got to 11 fewer ground balls than Hobart did.

"If you give a team that many opportunities on offense they're going to cash in," Jamieson said. "Especially if it's a team like Hobart."

The offense was missing two key players, as Wes Fetchet '04 and John Terracciano '03 suffered season-ending injuries the week before the game. Players did a good job filling in for the holes at points, but consistency was a problem.

"We were sporadic on offense," Jamieson said. "The talent is there, but we just need to put it together for a full 60 minutes."

The Bison started the game off with the lead, and even late in the game were able to string together three straight goals to make it look as though the offense was going to get it done. However, the drought in the middle of the game was what ended up costing them the win.

"We have to go back to manufacturing goals," Jamieson said. "We're going to have to run plays and that's not the best way to do it, but with two of our best offenders out, we have to."

Bucknell, Hobart and Army all now have one League loss each, putting them in a three-way tie for first place. If the Bison want to repeat as Champions and earn another NCAA tournament berth, they will have to win their remaining League games and some others against tough non-League competitors.

"We know what we have to do the rest of the year to make the tournament," Sanders said. "We just need to take it to every team we play."

Things won't get any easier for the Bison, who knew going into this season that they'd have a very tough schedule. Georgetown, who they play this week, is undefeated thus far.

In order for the Bison to make the tournament it is important for them to put up a good fight against tough teams like Georgetown so that their power rating, which will determine the League Champion, is at its highest. But the Bison don't approach any game with the sole purpose of competing; they want to win.

"Our guys will go out and play well," Jamieson said. "They like that kind of a challenge."

respectively.

This coming week, the Bison will face both league competitor Navy and SUNY Binghamton. According to Hammerlee, these are two of the Bison's toughest competitors, with Binghamton being comparable to Dayton and Navy being a bit better than that. The Bison are going into their second League match of the season with a League record of 0-1 after their loss against a very tough American University team.

On Sunday, March 31, the University's women's tennis team dropped their fifth match with a score of 4-2 to League competitor American University. Due to poor weather and a lack of indoor courts, the two teams were not able to play their doubles matches. Winning for the Bison were Tanya Sichko '05, in the fifth singles slot with scores of 6-0 and 7-5, and in the sixth singles slot, Samantha Berthod '04, with scores of 6-0 and 6-1.

On Saturday, March 30, the Bison traveled to University of Delaware, taking the match 5-2. Scoring points for the Bison were Nadezda Curcic '05 in the second singles slot with scores of 6-0 and 6-3, Ashely Diers '05, in the third slot with 6-1, 0-6, 6-4, Kristin Inglis '02, in the fourth slot with scores of 6-3, 6-7 (7-9), 6-3, Sichko in the fifth slot, with 6-1, 6-3 and Berthod in the sixth slot with 7-5, 6-3.

> —Bob Hammerlee, head coach

"It's always tougher to play on the road versus at home," Head Coach Rebecca Helt said. "But playing two matches or three matches versus only one match is not unusual for a tennis team. In fact, when teams compete in tournaments, players often play two or three matches a day for two or three days in a row."

The Bison will face the University of Maryland, Baltimore County, and Villanova this week, and will practice hard in preparation for league competitors Lehigh and Lafayette. These two games will help decide the Bison's place in the League, as their League record is currently 0-2 after their loss to American.

Athlete of the Week

By Scott Kloss

Melissa Montefusco '02

Melissa Montefusco '02, our athlete of the week, drove home a career-high seven goals and contributed five assists in a dominating performance, leading the women's lacrosse team to a 17-9 win over Niagara.

"The first half of the game against Niagara was close. It was back-and-forth scoring for 25 minutes and the score was tied at halftime," Montefusco said. "I felt that I needed to step up on offense and once I got started it seemed to just flow. Also, my favorite shot is a low, side-armed skidder. Given the field was wet from the previous night's rainfall, those kind of shots worked really well."

Lacrosse is not the most well-known sport on campus, but with its action-packed, non-stop style of play, lacrosse has won the hearts of its loyal fans.

"My main sport as a kid was soccer," Montefusco said. "In high school, I played for the soccer team, I played basketball in the winter to stay in shape, and some friends convinced me to try lacrosse in the spring. I was hesitant to try lacrosse because I knew nothing about the sport. I would say it was one of the best decisions I ever made. I was looking to play soccer in college and actually came to Bucknell to do just that. [By] the end of my first soccer season at Bucknell I decided to try lacrosse also."

With her 12-point performance over Niagara, Montefusco increased her career point total to 106, moving her into ninth on the Bison career chart in that category. She realizes that she will need her teammates to continue to succeed. With that in mind, she explains her goals for the rest of the season.

"As an individual, my goal is not only to perform to the best of my ability, but to push my teammates to do the same," she said. "As a team, our goal is to win the Patriot League Tournament. We know that we have the skill, strength and determination to compete with all the teams in the leagues and I feel that the Patriot League title is a very reasonable goal."

In order to achieve the elusive goal of Patriot League title, they will have to find a way to conquer Lafayette—a team that already has special meaning to Montefusco.

"My most memorable moment of the season thus far is losing to Lafayette," she said. "They are the defending League champs and we lost to them in a close game in overtime last year. We came out strong against them this year and lost another close game by one goal in the last 20 seconds. The game is most memorable because I felt our team was the better team that day and we just didn't come out on top. I think Lafayette will be scared if we meet them again in the tournament."

Off the lacrosse field, Montefusco is a civil engineering major and a member of Kappa Kappa Gamma.

Elite runners compete in Relays

By Jen Gianis
Staff Writer

A select group of the Bucknell track and field competitors hiked to the University of North Carolina this past weekend to participate in the annual Raleigh Relays, while the remainder of the squad traveled to neighboring Susquehanna for the Susquehanna Invitational. Both meets were successful for the Bison as they gained valuable experience against strong competition and made their marks with quite a few standout performances.

Amongst the top performances displayed by the Bison at the Raleigh Relays was that of Stephanie Bango '02, who cruised to a fifth place finish amongst a field of 20 runners in the 800-meter run. With a finishing time of 2:10.02, Bango qualified for ECACs and reset her own school record. Kelly McConnell '02 finished 14th in the 1,500-meter run with a time of 4:38.38, the second fastest time in University history, missing the record by 5.34 seconds. Maria Garcia '04 placed 22nd in the hammer throw with her 149-6 toss and Tolulope Fayanjuola '05 placed 58th in the triple jump (32-11 3/4").

The distance runners fared well also, as Theresa Dennis '03 placed ninth in the 10,000-meter run with an ECAC-qualifying time of 36:42.85. Becki Marshall '02 placed 19th in a huge field of 5,000-meter runners with an ECAC-qualifying time of 17:19.16.

Greg Costello's '03 performance in the 10,000 highlighted a successful outing for the men's team. Costello finished third in a field of 61 runners with an ECAC-qualifying time of 30:37.90. Bryan Johnson '03 placed 10th in the 3,000-meter steeplechase with a time of 9:17.32. Teammate Nick Mousetis '04 placed 21st in the steeplechase with a time of 9:33.24. P.J. Ward '02 and Michael Euell '02 finished the 1,500 in 24th and 37th place, respectively. Ward finished in a time of 3:57.78, while Euell finished in 4:00.37.

"The Raleigh Relays was a very competitive meet with over 80 schools including teams like N.C. State, North Carolina, Duke, Michigan, Minnesota and Penn State," Head Coach Kevin Donner said. "I was very proud of how our athletes handled the competitive atmosphere. We had some tremendous early-season outdoor performances which will set us up nicely for the Championship meets in May."

The Bison will be spending the upcoming weekend at the College of William and Mary as they participate in the Colonial Relays.

"This [will be] another competitive test for our team and it's our last major travel opportunity before our major meets such as the Penn Relays, Patriot Leagues, and IC4A/ECACs," Donner said.

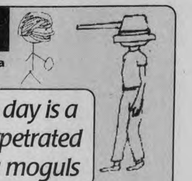
Opening day is a sham perpetrated by media moguls



Sometimes the more things change, the more they stay the same. And other times the more things change, the more chaotic and completely absurd life becomes resulting in despondent and desultory people who mill about in a manic-depressive haze making incoherent babble with amorphous apparitions and foaming at the mouth.

Perhaps that's going too far, but let's look at the facts; it's only opening day and already we've been greeted with shocking statistics to gnaw at like the salivating dogs of summer we are.

For instance, the Roger Clemens who won 20 games last year en route to his sixth Cy Young award was roughed up for eight runs and five walks (surrendering two wild pitches) in four innings against the "Ripken-less" Orioles, who doodled 10 runs in a dandy of a game against the Yankees. For some reason, I get the feeling that Cal Ripken is to the Orioles what Dan Marino was to the Miami Dolphins; the albatross sipping pina coladas in the locker room with the ghost of Bo Jackson ... Bo knows good aperitifs.

Jeremy Giambi, the Latoya of the Giambi family, went 3-4 in Oakland's opener while Jason went 1-4 for the Yanks, leaving a team-high five men on base. I haven't seen anyone as overhyped as Jason Giambi since George Clooney left Noah Wyle in charge of the E.R. Sports Illustrated stated on a cover of their magazine a few weeks ago that Jason Giambi was the "perfect modern hitter." That seems a little outrageous. Did anyone punch a chad for this title? Last stats page I saw, Jason only batted .343 last year... I didn't know "perfection" came dolled out so capriciously in lunchable-size servings.

How about the New York Mets? They scored six runs in their first game of the year. The Mets haven't scored that much since Steve Phillips went home to his wife after landing Roberto Alomar for a troglodytic skateboarder and a Cuisinart to be named later. The Mets are on pace to score 942 runs this year, only 62 shy of the National League record set by the 1934 St. Louis Cardinals!

> For some reason I get the feeling that Cal Ripken is to the Orioles what Dan Marino was to the Miami Dolphins; the albatross sipping pina coladas in the locker room with the ghost of Bo Jackson ... Bo knows good aperitifs.

Let's also take a look at who got the job done for the Mets: Edgardo Alfonzo, who batted .243 last year, had three hits, Jay Payton, who couldn't tap S.O.S. last year, tapped a pitch over the left field fence for the Mets' first homer of the season and Rey "all-leather, light as a feather" Ordonez is batting 1.000 with an RBI. Meanwhile, all the heralded off-season acquisitions the Mets made collectively went 2-17 with nine strikeouts.

Olympic Stadium was about as filled as George W.'s pockets with intelligent remarks carefully constructed for him on 3x5 note cards by his crack squad of damage controllers, with 34,000 Expo fans. Let's also not forget to mention the fact that the Expos WON the game, a feat that hasn't been accomplished since the last time Darryl Strawberry threw out his trash without using the morning paper to conceal the used hypodermics poking through the bag like plastic dispensers of shame.

In Boston, possibly the best pitcher in the American League, Pedro Martinez, was tapped like a keg at a 10-year high school reunion, allowing eight runs in three innings.

Kevin Brown fared no better giving up seven runs of his own in four innings, including a homer to the omnipresent Barry Bonds who, like a hyperactive car-washing midget, just won't quit.

The Cleveland Indians, who, after letting their all-stars walk like Beatles fans across Abbey Road by trading away Alomar and letting Juan Gonzalez bolt for Texas, won their first game over the adequately touted Anaheim Angels, who have learned their "Mo better" blues the hard way.

Speaking of Gonzalez moving to the Rangers, weren't they supposed to be the best offensive team in history? With A-Rod, I-Rod, Palmeiro, Juan Gon, et al, the Ranger offense was supposed to rack up points like an ADHD child playing whack-a-mole. I think they've managed to sputter out five runs in two games, which, in fairness, is more runs than the Tampa Bay Devil Rays will score all season.

Sure, Randy Johnson and Curt Schilling both pitched shutouts in their first games of the seasons. Barry Bonds homered twice against the Dodgers and racked up five RBIs to lead the league in both categories. And of course, Rickey Henderson is pouting on yet another team (this will be his 14th). But would we really want EVERYTHING to turn over on its head? This ain't no Pee-wee Herman league ... this is baseball. We have to represent... Represent?! That's today's magic word!! Hu-HA!

Celebrating opening day year round

It's springtime across our great nation and that only means one thing—primetime for my favorite sports. While the winter offered the hardcore sports fan hockey, basketball and the Olympics, it is April when the real fun starts. For baseball and soccer, new regular seasons have just begun; for pro basketball and hockey, the playoffs are about to begin and for college basketball the fun has just ended. From this point forward, optimism abounds.

This is most true in baseball, where they are a real powerhouse. Minnesota, meanwhile, has another year of existence for which to be thankful. Along with a newly energized fan base, the Twins have become America's Team and look to return to the playoffs for the first time since 1991.

Arizona is out to prove that last year's World Series title wasn't a fluke while Chicago fans are hoping that their Cubs can end ninety-four years of suffering with a Series win. The Mets, fresh off a disappointing season, retooled in the offseason in hopes of making it back to the Series, while Atlanta is hopeful for another division title and a chance for redemption in the playoffs. The bottom line: Opening Day breeds optimism and it's contagious.

Major League Soccer is the other sport to, although very quietly, start their season in early April. Now in its seventh year, MLS knows that this is an important year in the league's history. Unlike baseball, MLS was able to follow through on contraction, cutting down the bad branches in hopes of new growth. By folding its two Florida franchises, Miami and Tampa Bay, MLS helped its depth and skill level by making every team more solid at every position.

All 10 teams have the chance to win the MLS Cup, including new look New England who picked 2000 and 2001 MLS Scoring Leaders, Mamadou Diallo and Alex Pineda Chacon in the contraction draft. The new season will bring unknown results—ones that MLS hopes will be positive. With the recent player movement and the upcoming World Cup, anything is possible in MLS this year, and for that all American soccer fans have the right to be excited.

In terms of new seasons, the NBA and NHL also begin new seasons in a week or two—a new season called the playoffs. For hockey, the Stanley Cup Playoffs are the ultimate test of ones will and desire. No longer is the regular season important, for it has no bearing on the games besides what team receives the right to host the pivotal game seven (if necessary). Even though Detroit is running away from the pack in the West, they have to win the same amount of games as Los Angeles, Phoenix or Colorado on the way to Lord Stanley's Cup. Every team that earns the right to continue its quest in the playoffs starts each round in the same place—tied 0-0 and in search of four wins out of the next seven games. It's a new season- anything goes.

Pedro Martinez kicked off Opening Day for the Boston Red Sox.

No team knows this better than the New Jersey Devils, who currently sit in seventh place in the Eastern Conference standings. Coming off of two straight Stanley Cup Finals appearances, the Devils have underachieved all year but will be looking to make up for it in the playoffs. If the playoffs were to start today, they would face Philadelphia in the opening round's most intriguing match-up. A heated rivalry already, this series would enable the Devils to have a shot of redemption, while giving the Flyers a chance to finally shed the label as playoff failures. The playoffs could also be a time of redemption for the Rangers, but only if they can qualify first. With the acquisitions of Pavel Bure and Tom Poti, the Rangers are ready for a long playoff run—but they must first make the second season.

In the NBA, the story is the same. In the East, the New Jersey Nets must show that their regular season success was not a fluke, while Toronto and Philadelphia look to regain the swagger that they once had. Vince Carter and Allen Iverson should be back in time for the playoffs, which should give both teams a much-needed lift. In the West, Sacramento and Dallas are both anxious to dethrone the Lakers, while the defending champs look to regain their championship form of the past two years. In Utah, the Jazz look for one more title run—something that has eluded them to this point.

To make early April even more exciting, we were treated to the month long spectacle known as the NCAA basketball tournament in which Maryland and undefeated UConn were crowned men's and women's champs respectively. In college hockey, the Frozen Four has gotten underway with Minnesota, Michigan, Maine and New Hampshire making up this year's field. In golf, the Masters is only a week away. With all that is happening, April is an exciting and optimistic time for all sports fans. Whether your favorite team has finally started or ended its season, all fans wait with great anticipation. The excitement is contagious—catch it at a sporting event near you.

Bucknellians support a healthy lifestyle

By Rachel Gold
Staff Writer

Fifteen University students will attend a rally and candlelight vigil for eating disorder awareness on Saturday, April 20. The students, mostly females involved with the Women's Resource Center (WRC), will travel to The National Mall between Seventh and Fourth Street in Washington, D.C. to participate in this worthwhile cause. The National Association of Anorexia Nervosa and Associated Disorders (ANAD), the oldest eating disorder organization in the United States, endorses the all-volunteer organization responsible for the vigil. The organization, "Voices Not Bodies," includes former and current sufferers, family members and friends.

"We felt that it was an important cause and wanted to offer our support. This is the first year that a group of students from Bucknell will be attending the vigil," said Jessica Friedman '02, a WRC peer educator.

On their website, "Voices Not Bodies" offers a horrifying statistic about the widespread and harmful effects of eating disorders: "Approximately seven million women and one million men suffer from eating disorders in the United States. As many as 20 percent will die as a direct result, making eating disorders the deadliest of all mental illnesses."

The speakers and artists who will be telling their stories at the Washington vigil have all been deeply affected by eating disorders. Sculptor Lanette Barber uses art to express her emotions about eating disorders. Photographs of several of her pieces will be shown. Kate Dillon modeled as a teenager while suffering from anorexia. After recovering from her eating disorder she made a comeback as a "plus-size" model and will speak about her experience.

Country singer Cynthia French will talk about her life as a recovered anorexic and bulimic. French has written an autobiographical novel about her experiences. Joy Kasmarick will share her battle overcoming compulsive over eating. Barb Michal, founder of Halt Ephenedrine Abuse Today (HEAT), a group dedicated to educating the public about the dangers of ephenadrine to the consuming public, will speak about the sudden death of her 24-year-old son due to ephenadrine.

> "We felt that it was an important cause and wanted to offer our support. This is the first year that a group of students from Bucknell will be attending the vigil."
> —Jessica Friedman '02, a WRC peer educator*

There are numerous warning signs of anorexia nervosa as well as physical and psychological repercussions. Most people have friends, family members or acquaintances that have, or still do, suffer from devastating eating disorders. University students attending the "Voices Not Bodies" vigil hope to help promote the importance of having a positive body image and a healthy lifestyle. Those who attend will remember the victims of eating disorders and celebrate those who survived.

It is not an easy task to accept yourself and others, as "Voices Not Bodies" hopes to promote, but the vigil is certainly a step in the right direction. If you are interested in attending you can contact the WRC.

Students volunteer to help inmates

By Kelly Korecky
Staff Writer

Many students at the University choose to give back to the Lewisburg community through volunteering. Often students offer their time tutoring after school, coaching a youth sports team, or working in the local hospitals, nursing home, and childcare centers. However, one less traditional locale where you will find 15 unique University students volunteering this semester is at the Lewisburg Prison Project (LPP), a non-profit agency aimed at helping assure prisoners' rights and human treatment. Although the full-time staff consists of two attorneys and a project administrator, LPP relies on its volunteers to assist with various tasks such as office work, paralegal work and fundraising.

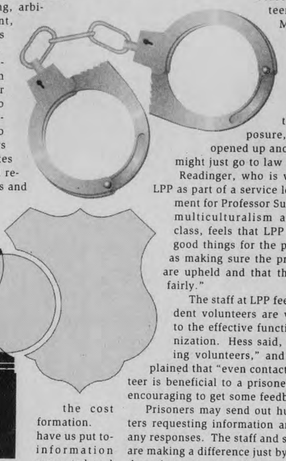
According to Angela Trop, LPP administrator, the student volunteers are "so important to us because they do a lot of the work that we couldn't do on our own." Trop, who began working for LPP as a volunteer in August 2000, explained that funding for the project is limited, so the unpaid work done by students is very much appreciated.

The LPP was founded in 1973 by a group of concerned citizens who decided to investigate rumors about the mistreatment of prisoners at the Lewisburg Federal Penitentiary. Although the Project was initially run out of a community member's dining room, the organization grew and is now a federally recognized non-profit agency.

According to Trop, the goal of the LPP is to "ensure civil rights for prisoners." The staff and volunteers at LPP do not deal with requests regarding parole, original sentences and related issues. Essentially, the staff counsels, assists and visits prisoners who write to LPP when they encounter problems within prison that they perceive as illegal or unfair. Although the organization initially focused on problems within the Lewisburg penitentiary, the geographic coverage of LPP now includes four Federal Corrections Complexes, 11 Pennsylvania State Prisons and 34 county jails in the middle district of Pennsylvania. From these facilities, LPP receives over 500 requests for legal advice and/or information from inmates per month.

Currently, Trop and the two attorneys David Glassman and Wendy Hess, handle the bulk of inmate letters and requests; however, student volunteers are also encouraged to research some factual information, since they cannot provide specific legal advice to inmates. The student volunteers first read through the letters from prisoners and then sort them based on the nature of the request.

According to Glassman and Hess, the letters often deal with complaints regarding inadequate medical care, violence by inmates or corrections officers, harassment and religious discrimination. In addition, prisoners may also complain about limited access to courts and legal material, living conditions, mail tampering, arbitrary rule enforcement, visitation difficulties and punitive transfers.



The LPP not only responds to letters from inmates regarding their civil rights, but it also prepares and distributes legal bulletins to thousands of prisoners across the United States on topics such as legal research, access to courts and law libraries, disciplinary hearings, racial/religious discrimination, assaults and medical rights. The LPP produces these information packets at their own expense and only charges inmates for printing the information.

"They often have us put together packets of information that the prisoners requested and send them out," volunteer Gregory Readinger '02 said. In addition, the students also do anything from filing and documenting cases to visiting inmates at the area prisons.

Cyrus Mody '04, who has been volunteering at the LPP since the beginning of the school year, visited the Northumberland County Prison in Sunbury recently and met a prisoner there. "It was my first time being in a jail but you can definitely see the tension between the guards and the prisoners. It's almost like it's straight out of a movie. It was eye-opening to say the least," Mody said.

Although Mody explained that visiting the prison was one of the most interesting parts about working at LPP, he also enjoys working in the office. Mody said dealing with the prisoners' requests "teaches you not to judge people and shows you how far negligence of human rights can actually go without people knowing about it."

Mody feels that working at LPP has been a very educational experience and hopes to continue working there next year. "Law wasn't even crossing my mind when I first started to volunteer," Mody said. Mody was originally considering a career in economics and international business, "but through this exposure, it's definitely opened up another avenue. I might just go to law school."

Readinger, who is volunteering at LPP as part of a service learning assignment for Professor Sue Ellen Henry's multiculturalism and education class, feels that LPP "does a lot of good things for the prisoners as far as making sure the prisoners' rights are upheld and that they are treated fairly."

The staff at LPP feels that the student volunteers are very beneficial to the effective functioning of organization. Hess said, "We love having volunteers," and Glassman explained that "even contact from a volunteer is beneficial to a prisoner because it is encouraging to get some feedback."

Prisoners may send out hundreds of letters requesting information and not receive any responses. The staff and students at LPP are making a difference just by responding to these inmates; even if they cannot provide immediate or direct legal assistance, they may direct the prisoner to a resource where s/he may find the requested information.

Mody explained that although the staff handles hundreds of cases a year, "there are some cases we just can't take on because we don't have the funding or the man power to do it all." However, the LPP is able to deal with many civil rights issues that plague the nation's prisons.

Hess explained that during law school she worked at the American Civil Liberties Union where she dealt with prisoners' letters, and she believed it was a compelling aspect of civil rights. Hess moved from Baltimore to work in Lewisburg because she felt the LPP provides a unique service, especially with the publication of legal bulletins for prisoners.

Hillel celebrates Passover with the University community

By Meredith Atkinson

University celebrated one of the holiest holidays in the Jewish religion on April 27. Students from several communities on campus attended the dinner. There were about 70 people at the event.

The annual Passover seder marks the beginning of eight days of eating unleavened bread. The holiday lasts eight days because it took the Jewish people that amount of time to leave Egypt and cross the Red Sea.

Passover is observed to remind Jewish people of their forefathers who were freed from slavery in Egypt. It is also a time when people free themselves from old habits, similar to how God took Jews out of slavery.

During Passover, Jews eat matzah (unleavened bread) because Jews did not have time to let their bread rise as they were leaving Egypt. Similarly, Jews cannot eat items such as crackers, pasta and cookies during these eight days.

"Passover is one of the three major festivals in Judaism, the other two being Sukkot in the fall and Shavuot, the giving of the Ten Commandments, in the early summer. This is a holiday that marks not only the liberation of a people who moved from slavery to freedom, but is a metaphor for all individuals and groups who have in some way been enslaved and who have found the ability to move towards liberation," Rabbi Serena Fujita said.

"We also mark at this particular time the hope for the liberation of both Israel and the Palestinians at this very dark moment in both of their histories, and we pray for peace and liberation in the Middle East as well as in all parts of the world," Fujita added.

Typically, the seder plate is placed in the middle of the table and has several symbolic items placed on it. For example, the egg on the plate symbolizes the Jewish person, the bitter herbs symbolize the bitterness of the times and the salt water symbolizes tears.

There were elements of Wednesday's dinner that were very nontraditional, such as the placing of an orange on the seder plate. Fujita chose to place on orange on the plate because years ago a rabbi noted that "there will be women rabbis when there is an orange on the seder plate."

"The seder was educational and politically correct, but I miss my family and home because of the traditions that we keep," Sara Radbill '04 said.

Jon Spivak '05 said he liked "the new politically correct Haggadahs."

Jeffrey Wodlinger '05 felt the seder was a good learning experience.

"Many students who attended were Jewish, but many were other students who were interested in learning about the holiday and our customs. I hope this is a step in the right direction toward increasing tolerance among students of different backgrounds and I look forward to attending different cultural traditions that other groups celebrate," Wodlinger said.

Acclaimed poet reads his witty work

Irish poet Paul Muldoon reads highly-acclaimed poetry.

By Julianna Pietak
Staff Writer

The highly-acclaimed Irish poet Paul Muldoon recently came to campus to give a reading of his poetry to a large audience made up of University students and faculty. Muldoon not only holds many titles within the literary world, such as honorary professor of poetry at Oxford University, but has also been hailed by The Times Literary Supplement as "the most significant English language poet born since the Second World War." The University was able to witness the caliber of his works first-hand when he spoke on Monday, April 1.

Muldoon's work is often described as modern and contemporary. However, the extent to which his works fulfilled these descriptions surprised even those familiar with Muldoon.

"I came expecting to enjoy it," Lacy Gonzalez '04 said. "I didn't expect it to be nearly as witty and amusing as it was." The performance was characterized by Muldoon's humorous and thoroughly enjoyable nature, whether in his comments about his poetry or in the wordplay of the poetry itself. This wittiness was not limited to the language of his work, however. The evening was filled with comments such as, "I'll try to keep this down to about 45 minutes so you all can get good seats for the basketball game."

Muldoon began the night with a reading of "Vicoe," a poem set in Central Pennsylvania featuring settlers who hoped to build a utopian society there. From there, the poems took a broad range of topics and forms. Many dealt with animals, termed "fauna" by Muldoon. Others had a historical nature. All were brought to life by Muldoon's simple yet expressive reading of the works.

"It was very interesting to hear Muldoon read his own work—to hear where he placed inflections and what tone of voice he used," Alyson Walker '04 said. "Muldoon was a captivating and fascinating speaker."

The subject matter of the poems was simple yet expressive. Though dealing with 'every day' topics, such as trains, paintings and hot water bottles, Muldoon's words seemed to bring them to life in a way beyond the ordinary. Described as "deceptively simple," this characterization seemed to hold true to all of his work. Appearing mundane on the surface, Muldoon's words gave the poems depth beyond this plain appearance. Coupled with genuine humor and wit, this made the reading not only an interesting and educational one, but a truly enjoyable one.

Poetic music honors Alberti

Opera singers remember the acclaimed poet in "Rafael Alberti: Voice of the Sea"

By Krista Reisdorf

Bucknell Hall echoed with the beautiful sound of a Spanish opera singer Tuesday night at the "Poetry in Song" concert.

Baritone Fernando Latorre and pianist Itziar Barredo Cavero honored the work of Rafael Alberti (1902-1999), one of the most well-known Spanish poets of the 20th Century, with the concert "Rafael Alberti: Voice of the Sea."

Fernando Latorre graduated from the Conservatorio Superior de Música in Bilbao, Spain. He has performed in Italy and Spain, and was in the opera "El Cid" with Plácido Domingo.

Itziar Barredo Cavero is the piano accompanist for the Conservatorio Superior of Bilbao, and was official pianist for the National Voice Competition of Young Musicians in Spain. She has performed with a variety of singers in Spain, Austria, France and the United States.

The duo began with three poems from Alberti's collection La Amante, which means "The Lover." Latorre's face was passionate as he sang "the air would bring me, my lover, to you" in "Si me fuera y no volviera."

The evening continued with a group of lullabies from the prize-winning Marinero en Tierra. The piano style of Cavero was exciting and unpredictable—soothing and slow one moment, and fast and harsh the next.

A staccato style brought the poem "Al puente de la golondrina" to life, and Latorre sang "Cuba dentro de un piano" with a wistful look on his face as the poem recalled memories of Cuba.

The blend of poetry, song and instrumentals was unique and impressive, and the beauty of the performance overwhelmed both Spanish-speaking and non Spanish-speaking audience members.

"It was incredible to hear the words of the poems expressed through piano and voice," Meghann Peace '04 said. "The talent and the passion of the musicians were able to break down the language barrier and touch all who heard them."

"Monster's Ball" attacks irony

Courtesy of Reuters

Halle Berry and Billy Bob Thorton star as Leticia and Hank in "Monster's Ball," a poignant film that questions the power of desperation. Berry won an Oscar for her provocative role as Leticia, the poor black widow of a man who Hank recently helped put to death.

By Jessica Cortese
Staff Writer

In the movies, salvation comes in many forms. For Hank Grotowski (Billy Bob Thorton), a second-generation corrections officer living in the South with only his racist father and a son he is unable to love, salvation comes when he falls in love with a poor black woman, Leticia (Halle Berry) in "Monster's Ball." Unfortunately for Hank, she also happens to be the widow of a man who he recently helped put to death, a fact of which they are not aware when they initially meet.

This film attacks the cruel irony of life head on when these two failed parents find solace in each other in a most dramatic way. Director Marc Foster makes every use of the R rating by refusing to deny the viewer a glimpse of what really happens when people lead unhappy lives. He doesn't pander the viewer with pretty shots and soft lighting, but instead shows the characters at sharp angles and through the harsh magnification and distortion of mirrors.

Movie Review
★★★★ 3.75

Berry's Oscar-winning performance is moving and strangely provocative. She, like the film itself, is uncompromising in her truthfulness. The brutality and honesty shown in the actions and emotions of both Leticia and Hank as they face and survive their demons is somehow both depressing and uplifting.

This movie questions the extent that power desperation has over the lives of those who try to be good people by contrasting it with the redemption of someone who can only be seen as bad. The storyline results in an ambiguous and thought-provoking moral message.

Film festival brings a native French atmosphere

By Allison Crotzer
Staff Writer

The Campus Theatre will soon be giving viewers another way to expand their knowledge of foreign film. Thursday, April 11 marks the start of a week-long festival of new French cinema, or "Festival du Nouveau Cinéma Français."

The festival gives the community and students the opportunity to experience a full-length feature film in French and in a movie theater. The experience hopes to mimic a genuine trip to the movies in any French-speaking country around the world with the exception of added subtitles.

"This is an event that will interest the entire francophile community, including our students, many of whom have been, and others who are planning to, study abroad," Renée Gosson, Assistant Professor of French and Francophone Studies, said.

The idea for the festival came from Eric Faden, assistant professor of English & film studies and owner of the Campus Theatre. He applied for a Society for French American Cultural Services and Educational Aid (FACSEA) grant and then contacted the French and Francophone Studies Program at the University.

"Dean Garrett, Professors Kingué, Westbrook, Dobelbower and myself, of course, loved the idea of bringing recent French films to Lewisburg and Bucknell," Gosson said. "All our professors of French at Bucknell are dedicated to integrating authentic cultural realism into our classroom, be this restaurant menus, tourist brochures, music or film."

Additionally, Lycoming College's French program and Susquehanna University's Department of Modern Languages, as well as the University's English Program and Association for the Arts, greatly contributed to the festival.

Events include the opening reception at 7 p.m. on Thursday, followed by a short film with live musical accompaniment provided by Lewisburg resident Rick Benjamin and then the feature film, "Harry, un ami qui vous veut du bien," or "With a Friend Like Harry."

Friday, Saturday, Sunday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday feature showings of "Le Pacte des Loups," or "Brotherhood of the Wolf," which was an acclaimed hit in France earlier this year. The film is based on a historical legend about a beast that killed villagers in France two centuries ago.

Other scheduled films include "La Veuve de St. Pierre," or "The Widow of St. Pierre," labeled as a dark tragedy, "Irma Vep," an anagram for "vampire." In addition, the comedic films "Le Goût des Autres" ("The Taste of Others") and "Dîner de Cons" ("The Dinner Game") are scheduled to be shown.

A full schedule of events can be found at www.thecampustheatre.com. General admission is $6, but the student rate is $5, with the exception of Monday night's free showing of "Le Goût des Autres" in Vaughan Literature Auditorium.

"Just call me McDonnell"

New Res to be named McDonnell Hall in November '02 dedication

Yu-Ling Huang—The Bucknellian

New Residence Hall, which opened in the fall of 2000, will be named McDonnell Hall in recognition of contributions from trustee Jim McDonnell and his wife Libby to the University.

By Michelle Dombeck
A&E Editor

The New Residence Hall, called New Res by both students and faculty members, will soon be receiving its official name. Named after Jim and Libby McDonnell, the dorm will be called McDonnell Hall. The McDonnells have been strongly affiliated with the University, so it was fitting to name this dorm in their honor.

"Jim is on the Board of Trustees, and even though the McDonnells' daughter attended school here a number of years ago, he's remained loyal to the University," University President Steffen Rogers said. "During the Capital Campaign, the McDonnells also contributed $5 million in unrestricted funds."

Unlike most buildings on campus, which were named before their construction began, the New Residence Hall did not have a substantial donor and has remained unnamed, until now.

"The New Residence Hall had no principle donor until the McDonnells came along," Rogers said. "The naming of the dorm is our way of showing our appreciation for all they have done for Bucknell."

The New Residence Hall will be officially named McDonnell Hall next November. Some students feel that it may take a little while to become accustomed to referring to "New Res" by its new name.

Julia Woodard '05 is a current resident of the New Residence Hall. She feels that even though students may continue to call the dorm New Res, the building needed to be named at some point.

"Because this is the first building I've lived in at the University, I think I might always call it New Res. It's hard to break old h abits, but it's great that they're finally naming the building," Woodard said. "After all, in 20 years, this building won't exactly be 'new' anymore."

Another resident of the New Residence Hall, Christy Morgan '05, feels that although there may be some initial confusion with the dorm's naming, the situation shouldn't be too bad.

"I think that the students who are accustomed to calling it New Res will still refer to it as New Res, but the incoming students [Class of 2006] will call it McDonnell Hall." Morgan said. "It might confuse some people in the beginning, but I am sure that everyone will get used to it eventually."

Houseparty an improvement, though some problems persist

New policies yield mixed success but administrators pleased with reduced incidents

By Carmen Mauriello
Senior Writer

The University aimed to make major improvements with the establishment of several new policies for this year's Houseparty. Instead of achieving these goals, the biggest change of the weekend came in the weather. Snow and biting cold persisted throughout Houseparty, but 4,000 students, guests and alumni still enjoyed the weekend's festivities.

Despite stricter mug and guest policies, the perennial problems of underage drinking and alcohol-related incidents continued. Still, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro said there was a trend toward increased responsibility and fewer incidents, leaving him "cautiously optimistic" that there will be a Houseparty next year, though he said there will likely be further regulations.

Two Steps Forward, One Backward

Administrators and Interfraternity Council (IFC) members felt that the enforcement of mug and guest policies this year was a step in the right direction. Recognizing that lax enforcement was a major problem, Roy Baker, associate dean of students and director of fraternity and sorority affairs, said that the new mug policy had many positive effects.

In past years, students were able to bring their own mugs to the event. Baker said this often led to underage drinking because there was no way for Public Safety officers or security guards to tell if the mugs contained alcohol.

But under the new policy, the only mug allowed on Houseparty grounds was the official mug distrib-

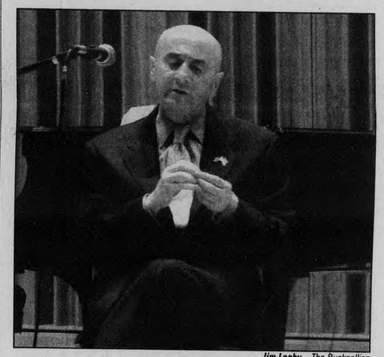
Dick Grasso of the NYSE speaks on campus



Jim Leahy—The Bucknellian

Chairman and CEO of the NYSE Dick Grasso spoke last Wednesday about the effects of Sept. 11 on the financial world.

By Jim Leahy
Managing Editor

On Sept. 17, Chairman and CEO of the New York Stock Exchange (NYSE) Dick Grasso stood on the bell platform at the NYSE not with corporate or world leaders but with rescue workers, American heroes. That Monday morning, before allowing representatives from the Port Authority Police Dept. (PAPD), FDNY, NYPD and EMS to ring the 9:30 bell to begin the week's trading, Grasso, the exchange's chairman and CEO, addressed the floor: "Today America goes back to business. And we do it as a signal to those criminals ... that they have lost." Then, following a two-minute moment of silence in memory of all those who were missing or dead, the bell rang and the floor erupted in applause.

In a talk given Wednesday night in front of a standing-room-only lecture hall at the Sigmund Weis Music Building, Grasso spoke about the effects of Sept. 11 on the NYSE and financial markets, the Enron collapse and the tight job market, among other issues. Adjunct Management Professor William Gruver mediated the discussion, asking Grasso a series of broad questions that touched on numerous issues.

Grasso began his NYSE career in 1968. Beginning as a clerk, he gradually worked his way up within the organization, moving into numerous leadership positions along the way. In 1988, he was appointed president and chief operating officer, and in 1991, he moved into the executive vice chairman's position. Finally, in 1995, Grasso became the first member of NYSE management to become chairman and CEO in the 209-year history of the NYSE. He is also a member of the board of directors at Home Depot—the company Ken Langone founded-and is the father of a first-year student here at the University.

Parking petition pays dividends

Student-led initiative results in addition of 230 parking spaces for fall 2002

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

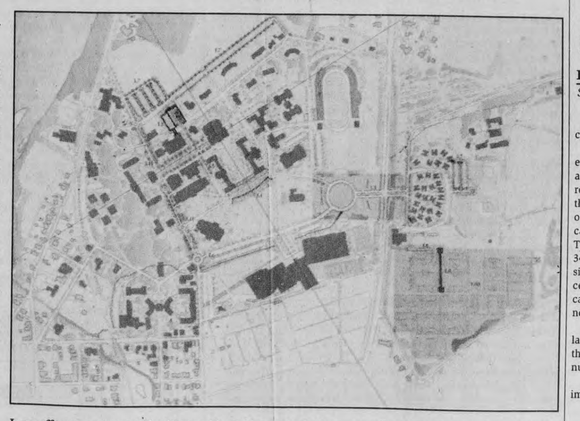
A student parking petition has sparked a change in the amount of parking spaces available on campus.

Last November, Morgan Lloyd '03 collected almost 400 signatures in an effort to show the University it should increase the amount of student spaces on campus. As a result, 230 new spaces are scheduled to be added next summer.

The main point of the petition argued that, according to Public Safety records, the number of registered student cars exceeds the amount of student spaces. Lloyd maintained that the number of allotted spaces was unfair to females because fraternities have proximate parking to their houses, forcing women to park in poorly lit lots far from their dorms. Confusion over student and staff spots was also addressed.

"I was prompted to write this petition because I live uphill where the parking is atrocious. The nearest lots are always full. My friends all complain about parking and I was tired of complaining with them, so I decided to try and do something,"

See PARKING, page A3



In an effort to compensate for 84 unusable parking spots due to construction, the University pledged to add over 200 spots by next fall. Most spots will be added in an expanded parking lot behind Fraternity Road, although spots will be added in the Faculty Court lot and in front of the new athletic center once construction is finished. Ultimately, the University wishes to have a more pedestrian friendly environment, with future parking lots existing primarily on the perimeter of campus.

Admissions targets enrollment at 910

Class of 2006 applicant-pool is second largest in University history

By Aly Rentrop
Staff Writer

The Admissions Office recently released information regarding the incoming Class of 2006.

Dean of Admissions Mark Davies announced that the target number of enrolled students for the class is 910 out of a total 7,757 candidates who applied this year. This statistic represents the second highest figure in the University's history, exceeded only by the Class of 2005 applicants, numbering roughly 8,000. The University has also accepted 342 students from the early-decision applicant pool, while 37 percent of regular—decision applicants were granted admission and notified as of March 25.

"We're very optimistic about the quality of the class."
—Mark Davies, dean of admissions

The Class of 2006 will be similar in size to that of the previous year, which numbers 913 students. Despite this consistency, Davies explained that a long-term goal is to reduce the total number of students enrolled in the University to approximately 3,300.

In terms of the new class's qualifications, the Class of 2006 shows an improvement both in SAT scores and overall gradepoint averages.

"We're very optimistic about the quality of the class," Davies said.

Piper Murray '03, an admissions office intern who interviews prospective students, commented on her impression of those she has interviewed.

"I've had the pleasure of speaking with numerous candidates and have

ISR searches for web-management and design system

By M. Robert Ellis
Features Editor

Information Services and Resources (ISR) recently began a search for a new Web management system that will facilitate University Web page management and design on campus.

Currently, University Webmaster Roberta Sims and an ISR committee are researching and evaluating different options with demonstrations of systems beginning this week, with the average cost of a new system ranging from $50 to $60 thousand.

The main reason a new system is being researched is because it would allow the school to more easily manage its Web pages.

"Currently the school has over 200,000 handcrafted pages that it has to manage. The new system would make the creation and updating of these pages much more efficient," said Eugene Spencer '76, associate vice president of ISR.

The current Web management system requires everything from the actual building of the page to the updating to be done manually. The goal of the new system is to simplify this process.

"With the new system, multiple templates could be set up and then files could simply be uploaded and placed on the page," Sims said.

One of the purposes of the new system is to allow everyone on campus to create his or her own Web page.

"The new Web management system would be available for everyone from the departmental level down to the personal level," Sims said.

Another goal is to let people who have no previous experience in creating to build their own home pages.

"We want to allow everyday people to create their own Web pages. The new system would simplify the creation process to make this possible," Spencer said.

ISR wants to make the system as automated as possible while still keeping it personalized.

"With the new system it is much easier to focus on the information displayed and not the design of the page. However, there will still be vast amounts of flexibility in the design area as well," Sims said.

The system will also still allow people that know how to create their own Web pages to do so.

"We are looking for something that will make our Web management more efficient and easier and faster for everyone to use," Sims said. "The new system should also take care of all display issues and broken links. We want something that will almost seem automatic."

The University has welcomed record numbers of new students the past two years, a testimony to excellent admissions practices. Above, a student escorts a tour group through Bertrand Library.

been overwhelmed by the maturity of the students and unique experiences they have had. Time and time again, I come out of an interview impressed by the academic strength and extracurricular involvement of the students," Murray said.

In preparation for the arrival of the new class, the admissions office is hosting its annual Open House, which is scheduled for this Saturday. The Open House provides accepted students and their families with an opportunity to see all that the University has to offer, beginning with a welcome assembly which will be held at 9:15 a.m. in the Weis Center, followed by Academic Sampler Sessions at 10:15 a.m. Students will have the opportunity to attend 40-minute sample classes representing a wide range of courses offered and taught by University professors.

Following these sessions, a Campus Life Fair will be held at 12:30 p.m. in Gerhard Fieldhouse, where many of the student organizations and clubs will be represented. Mini-tours of University facilities will also be held beginning at 12:30, where visitors can tour a variety of buildings on campus. A buffet lunch will accompany the fair in the fieldhouse.

Beginning at 2 p.m, "Meet the Students" Panel will be held, where visitors will have the opportunity to see a range of different student presentations. Visitors will also have the chance to see the residence halls and the Residential Colleges.

The Admissions Office expects over 600 students and their families will attend the Open House.

"We think it is one of the best events this campus does because the faculty, administration, Dining Service, Physical Plant and students are very involved in making this day successful," Davies said.

The admissions office has been working very hard to perpetuate the successful future of the University, offering an abundance of tours, interviews and group sessions to prospective students and their families. Over the last several weeks, Admissions has also been holding accepted student receptions twice each day to welcome prospective students.

"Admissions certainly helps orchestrate what the Bucknell campus is about, but it really is the total campus experience that helps students decide that this is the right place to spend the next four years," Davies said.

Yu Ling Huang—The Bucknellian

The addition of over 200 parking spaces next semester will remedy the loss of parking as a result of construction around campus.

Lloyd said.

After receiving a large amount of support from Greek organizations as well as the general student population, Lloyd presented the nearly 400 signatures to faculty and administration members, including Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, Vice President of Student Affairs Charlie Pollock and University President Steffen Rogers.

Nearly four months later the University has responded with plans for expanded parking as well as a University Parking Committee, which includes students, faculty and staff representatives, as well as input from student leaders who have recently met with University representatives concerning parking issues.

"After submitting the petition to faculty members I had doubts as to whether any action would really be taken, but when I spoke with Charlie Pollock he mentioned the parking committee, so when I heard that I knew there was hope for more student parking," Lloyd said.

A major concept of the Campus Development Plan, endorsed by the campus community and Board of Trustees in 1998—1999, is to convert the academic center of the campus to a more pedestrian friendly environment. This goal requires moving parking to the campus perimeter and closing roads to through traffic.

According to Dennis Hawley '72, president for Facilities, the net additional parking that will open up for the fall semester is approximately 230 spaces.

In accord with "perimeter" parking, the University has decided to expand the uphill "farm lot" parking further back into the farm field. Eventually, the University plans to acquire the land behind fraternity row and continue expansion.

Approximately 133 spaces will be added uphill to a new lot along Seventh Street behind Phi Kappa Psi Fraternity. This will compensate for the 84 spaces eliminated in the parking lot between Dana Engineering and Olin Science that will be turned into new green space with pedestrian paths, plantings and seating areas.

"[The University] claims that the loss of these spaces will be made up for in the new lots. It's important for students to note that the new lot near the current farm lot will be for both student and staff and the numbers are not yet decided," Lloyd said.

The Recreation and Athletic Center will open in phases through the summer and fall of 2002 and will be complete by March 2003. As the construction winds down, parking will become available in that area of the campus.

"There will be 30 spaces returning in front of the new entrance, along with 58 spaces in the Seventh Street lot across from Smith Hall. Fifteen spaces will be available near the Annex, as well as 86 spaces in the 'Faculty Court' lot near Route 15 now used by contractors," Hawley said. "Planning is also underway for adding a small lot of approximately 12 spaces along St. George Street behind the Purchasing Office.

The assignment of new spaces and potential reassignment of existing spaces for student, staff and visitor parking will be coordinated by the University Parking Committee.

"Although administrators stress the point that any new parking is going to be on the perimeter of campus, I think any additional parking will help a great deal. I just hope that when they work out the distributions of student/staff spaces they give enough to the students because the problem is only getting worse each year," Lloyd said.

Ferraro "cautiously optimistic" about Houseparty future

uted to of-age students at registration, along with a 21-and-over wristband. Baker said this made enforcement easier, as the only students that were allowed to be drinking were those with the official mug and 21-and-over wristband.

"There wasn't as blatant carrying around of alcohol as past years on Fraternity Road," Baker said.

While the mug policy was strictly enforced on Fraternity Road, Baker and Ferraro acknowledged that some fraternities bent the rules. Baker said that four or five fraternities have been charged with breaking Houseparty rules for offenses which include serving underage students and serving cans of beer and champagne.

Baker said that there also were breakdowns with the new guest policy. The policy was supposed to limit the number of guests a Greek student could host to four and the number a non-Greek could host to two.

However, he said that some students got around this by registering the maximum number of guests at the registration tent and then waiting until the workers changed shifts and registering more guests. He said that these violations weren't picked up at the time because the records weren't computerized. Looking back he has found multiple violations.

Still, Baker said there was more accountability for guests than past years because strict wristband enforcement required them to register. He noted that guests were involved in fewer incidents than past years.

Ferraro and IFC President Aziz Megji '03 also stated that the strict wristband enforcement had positive effects in controlling the Houseparty environment.

A Hard Precedent to Break

Two major problems during Houseparty were student attitudes about the event and the complacent enforcement of new policies by the fraternities.

Baker partly blamed the University's previous mug policy for the event's reputation as a free-for-all for alcohol.

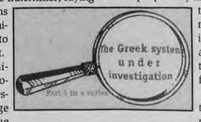
"The reputation of Houseparty got to be that it was an event when the alcohol policy wasn't enforced," Baker said.

He said that this year the University attempted to change that student mindset by instituting stricter policies and reiterating that underage drinking would not be tolerated. However, Baker, Ferraro and many IFC members found it very difficult to crack those preconceived ideas.

Megji believed that many students thought the new policies would only be enforced on paper, which led to numerous students violating the rules and getting caught.

"Some students tested the waters with the new policies but found out we were enforcing them strictly," Megji said.

Baker was frustrated by the lax enforcement of some fraternities, saying that their violations undermine the University's ability to regulate the event.



"The fraternities that [have violations] send a message to underage students that we won't enforce the rules," Baker said. "We can issue wristbands, mugs and set policies, but its got to start inside the fraternity house where the alcohol is being served."

Still, Baker said that most of the fraternities complied with the rules.

Although Delta Upsilon (DU) was not found in violation of the policies, DU President Chris Sharpe '03 said that the fraternities definitely could have had better compliance. He also noted that they had several factors working against them. First, he said the free-for-all precedent makes it hard on fraternities, since some upperclassmen fraternity members may want to run their parties like they were run in the past.

> "Some students tested the waters with the new policies but found out we were enforcing them strictly."
> —IFC President Aziz Megji '03

Secondly, he said that there were less fraternity parties—specifically on Friday night—which diverts more people to those fraternities that are holding parties. He said it is harder for fraternities to control these larger groups.

Sharpe also said that the behavior of non-Greek students at parties was a major problem. He said that many underage students stole mugs or tried to find other ways to get alcohol.

"Greek students could do a better job at setting an example, but the non-Greek student body also is at fault for not following the policies," Sharpe said.

Baker said that alumni and guests were also the source of problems. He said many alumni refused to heed the new rules and were responsible for several incidents, including property damage at Sigma Chi. Guests, a perennial source of problems, also were involved in many incidents, said Baker, but less than in past years..

Christmas in April

Though most students braved the snow and cold, the weather did have a significant impact on the event. Students said it had the biggest effect on Saturday afternoon, when many fraternities hosted outdoor barbecues and bands.

John Martin '03, a non-Greek student, said that there was low attendance at most of the Saturday afternoon events. He said Jimmie's Chicken Shack, a popular rock band that played at Phi Kappa Psi on Saturday afternoon, drew a big crowd, but the cold took something away from the show.

"People just aren't as enthusiastic about being outside when it's cold and snowing," Martin said.

Adam Vidoni '04 said the weather also impacted some evening events. He said that in past years Lambda Chi Alpha, Kappa Delta Rho and some other fraternities would have people pouring out onto their back decks, but he said the cold made people stay inside. Vidoni said this resulted in many parties being overcrowded and in long lines to get into some fraternities.

Baker agreed that the cold made many students flock inside the fraternities. He said the large crowds were problematic at some fraternities because people wandered throughout the house and sometimes caused damage.

Show Me the Money

The IFC's higher registration fees appear to be fairly successful in recouping part of the cost of Houseparty.

The fee for guests was raised from $5 to $20. Also, alumni had to pay $10, up from $5, while the student fee was raised from $1 to $5. Despite the higher fees, Megji estimated that 3,100 students and 900 guests registered for this year's event—comparable to last year's numbers.

He estimates that enough money was raised to achieve the policy's two primary aims: reimbursing Bucknell Student Government (BSG) in full and reimbursing IFC for its initial investment on food, alternative beverages, security and other expenses.

Still, he doesn't believe enough money was raised to pay the student workers at the event, which he expects the IFC will take a $3,000 loss to cover. He said that the IFC aimed to have this expense covered by the registration fee money, but he said fewer guests came than the IFC expected.

Also, Megji said the money raised will not be able to cover the IFC's cost for Greek Week.

None of this money will go back to the individual fraternities, which Megji said was unfortunate because they spend large amounts of money to host parties.

No Big Changes for Students

Many students commented that the new policies didn't have a major effect on Houseparty.

Many students said the mug policy was enforced very loosely, varying somewhat from fraternity to fraternity. Marc Dickinson '02, a non-Greek who visited four fraternities, said he saw many underage students being served and cans being used. Gabrielle Thiry '02, a member of the Kappa Alpha Theta sorority, made similar observations at the seven fraternities she attended, while Leslie Niswander '05, who visited three houses, said the enforcement wasn't strict.

Vidoni, who visited three fraternities, also observed violations of the mug policies; however, he believes that the mugs did reduce underage drinking by making it more difficult for underage students to get alcohol at parties.

Thiry agreed that it was somewhat more difficult for underage students to get served, but she said that this might have had adverse side effects.

"I think people opted to pre-party more," Thiry said. "People drank just as much, they just drank in different places."

The students said that some other problems relating to the mug policy were that many mugs were stolen or lost, and some underage students carried liquor in their water or soft drink bottles.

Many students felt that the wristbands were enforced more strictly. Several said that they were frequently checked at the door of fraternity houses and also when they were getting alcohol.

Going into the event, Niswander thought the new policies might make the weekend too strict, but she said she didn't find this to be the case.

"I actually had more fun than I thought I would," Niswander said.

House Party 2003?

Ferraro said this year's Houseparty fell well short of the administration's incident-free goal. He said the major incidents included one student being hospitalized with alcohol poisoning, another student being very close to hospitalization, a student attempting to counterfeit Houseparty wristbands and a guest being involved in a fist fight. In addition, he said there were problems with frontloading, excessive drinking and underage drinking.

Despite these incidents, he said the event was "relatively well-maintained," noting that there were less major incidents than past years. Also, he said that he observed more responsibility in students.

"I really found students trying to be thoughtful and trying to make it work," Ferraro said. "It can't be all external controls. Students must learn to control themselves. I saw some serious lapses, but I saw more students trying to do the right thing."

Also, Ferraro said that he was pleased with the measures taken by the IFC to make the event safer.

Ferraro plans to meet with the deans, IFC, Public Safety, students, professors and medical staff in coming days and send out a campus email next week assessing the event.

Ferraro said he is "cautiously optimistic" that there will be a Houseparty next year. But if the event is to continue, Ferraro said that there must be changes.

He said the this year's policies resulted in less underage drinking and incidents on Fraternity Road and other public areas, but he said that new policies would likely be geared toward preventing breakdowns in the fraternities.

"We improved the public area this year, but we have to find how we can spread that improvement from the public area to the private area and make the fraternities still safer," Ferraro said.

He said that the mug policy might need to be modified.

Ferraro also said that more moderation must be incorporated into Houseparty, saying that excessive drinking was a major problem at this year's event.

"If it's going to be successful, it must be organized toward safety and moderation," Ferraro said.

Garrett Carlough '04, chairman of the Houseparty committee, said that the IFC is very open to working with the administration about its concerns.

"The IFC is 100 percent committed to letting the House Party tradition go on," Carlough said.

University seeks second dean of faculty

By Sarah Gudenkauf
Senior Writer

The University is searching for a second associate dean of faculty (ADF) to work alongside current ADF Beth Cunningham. The new ADF will be hired on a trail basis for the 2002-03 school year. Following the trial year, the second ADF will be proposed as a permanent position with a four-year term.

Dean of Arts and Sciences and Professor of Psychology Eugenia Gerdes described the increasing need for the position in a press release as a result of the addition of many faculty positions and accompanying programs.

Although both ADF positions will work together with many shared responsibilities, the new ADF position will have its own set of primary responsibilities. Gerdes included in these responsibilities faculty development activities, new faculty orientation and mentoring, involvement with the Faculty Advisory Committee on Teaching, helping to produce the Talking about Teaching newsletter, representing the College of Arts and Sciences on the Faculty Development Committee as well as working with the common learning coordinator. Overall, the second ADF position will work to ensure faculty development and funding for the University.

Both ADF positions will work in conjunction with the Associate deans on staffing, curricular issues, development of teaching and faculty advising. They will also work with each other on replacing faculty, finding temporary faculty, assisting with tenure track searches and organizing of the merit review system.

Professor of English and Chair of the Faculty Michael Payne and thinks that the addition of a second ADF position will have many benefits.

"It has been increasingly obvious during the past several years that the workload of deans has hugely increased. Bucknell has careful and thorough procedures for the hiring, evaluation and retention of faculty, which soaks up a great deal of the deans' time, as it should. But we are also a university with a vigorous and complex governance system," Payne said. "There seem to be two immediate benefits that can be expected from the addition of this position: Faculty and students should be able to expect easier and more immediate access to the deans and a more efficient handling of issues that come before them."

Payne also believes that the deans play an integral role in the operations of the University that reach beyond the administration.

"The deans have a key responsibility in sustaining Bucknell's reputation as an academically serious institution, but also as a community that is friendly and supportive of all its members."

Associate Dean of Arts and Sciences Elaine Garrett is chairing the screening committee of faculty who will select the new ADF position holder. Questions about the position should be directed to either Associate Dean of Arts and Sciences Beth Cunningham or Gerdes.

Houseparty 2002: A step in the right direction

Last weekend thousands of University students, alumni and guests participated in Houseparty. Despite a the cold weather and a few downfalls, the weekend as a whole was an improvement upon past years. The Bucknellian praises the campus community for working together to make Houseparty a success.

This year, two new important rules were implemented: the limitation of the number of guests a student could have and only students 21 and older could carry mugs, which were distributed by the University. Students, alumni and guests were also charged a higher fee than last year.

Although these rules attempted to solve problems, students still found ways around them.

For example, non-Greek students were only permitted to bring two guests and Greek students could bring four. Although this was a good attempt to decrease the number of guests, students simply had other students sign up their guests so they could have more than the allotted amount.

In fact, approximately the same number of people attended Houseparty as last year. However, the purpose of limiting the number of guests was not only to decrease the amount of non-University students, but also to make it easier for a student to keep track of his/her guests.

The new mug system made it easier for Public Safety to identify under-21-year-olds drinking beer. Students under legal drinking age found ways around the system by putting hard alcohol in their 20 oz. soda bottles.

However, in any situation people will find loopholes through the rules. At least restrictions like these helped to limit the amount of underage drinking and random guests.

Although some students might argue that the regulations did not provide a safer Houseparty, only one student was taken to the hospital.

Last year, no students were taken to the hospital and even though that number increased this year, we have to remember that there were still thousands of students who acted responsibly throughout the weekend.

This year the University took the first steps in making sure that students realize that Houseparty is not just a weekend when they can do whatever they want.

Students cannot think that the University is just going to ignore all normal rules for one weekend and permit students to act in any way they want to.

As illustrated this year, the University must enforce rules in order to provide a safe and enjoyable weekend. In order to make this event a success, all University students must abide by University rules, as well as rules established by individual fraternities.

Houseparty is a University tradition that should be not be lost. Greeks and other members of the University community put a lot of effort into this event and that effort definitely showed. Although Greeks traditionally plan the weekend, it should remain open for all students to enjoy.

Company A serves area

To the Editor:

People who have experienced losing a job often find themselves in rough financial situations, especially if they are unable to find another job within a certain amount of time. Those who find themselves in this type of hardship need a place to go, particularly if they have families they are unable to support because it can take a while for people to get back on their feet. People in these financial situations often need to turn to Haven Ministry, a facility located in Sunbury which provides emergency shelter, caring and nurturing for families and individuals in the Central Susquehanna Valley. Haven Ministry provides basic necessities while it guides people in finding new jobs and managing their money.

Management Company A, A Place to Lay, along with many past management companies, has decided to help Haven Ministry for its service project. Haven Ministry is an important organization in the surrounding area because of the individual attention it gives people. We also feel that this place is in need of the most help. Furthermore, Haven Ministry does not have a large staff and it is also a non-profit organization, so they are always in need of any kind of help they can get.

Because Haven Ministry cannot afford to have a lot of upkeep performed on the building, we thought that our human labor would be very valuable to them. Our company decided that they very much need to have work done inside and outside of the building. By painting one of the rooms, staining outdoor benches and doing some gardening, we will help make Haven Ministry a nicer place for those staying there and we will help make it look more beautiful for those passing by. Through the sale of Bucknell fleece blankets, we have been raising money for our project at Haven Ministry and have also been accepting donations from local businesses. All of us in Company A are very excited about our project. We have put a lot of time and effort into making our project successful and we are looking forward to making a difference in the community.

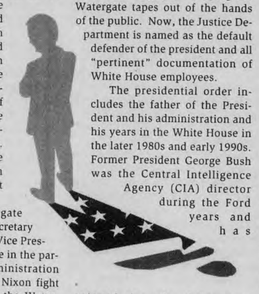
Information about government activities necessary for democracy

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

Bill Moyers, former member of the Johnson administration in the 1960s produces the "NOW" program for public broadcasting. A segment was aired about the watering down of the Freedom of Information Act by the present administration. Without this legislation we would have never known about such governmental atrocities like the My Lai gunning down of civilians by American troops during Vietnam, the use of unknowing civilians as lab experiments by injecting them with radioactive plutonium in the 1940s and the bloody particulars of our involvement in the overthrow of the democratically elected government of Chile in 1973. Moyers stated that Lyndon Johnson regretted signing it. The government did not really want the light of day to come to these and other actions performed in our name. This is even more true now because we are in the era of the Patriot Act.



In the post-Watergate era, current Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and Vice President Dick Cheney were in the pardon-tainted Ford administration where they witnessed Nixon fight against the release of the Watergate tapes and materials. Today, they are involved in the dilution of the effectiveness of any act that provides public information; so much for an informed democratic polity. Rumsfeld and Cheney quote national security concerns as the excuse, as Attorney General John Ashcroft gets the Patriot Act approved by a compliant Congress in the aftermath of the events of last fall's attacks.

Since the present administration took office prior to the Sept. 11 events they have taken measures to protect presidential documents from scrutiny. In fact, they have made provisions that all presidential papers and documents are protected by secrecy edicts for indefinite extended periods. Going on future presidents will not have to pay for defending from challenges to these Presidential orders. Nixon had to pay for keeping the Watergate tapes out of the hands of the public. Now, the Justice Department is named as the default defender of the president and all "pertinent" documentation of White House employees.

The presidential order includes the father of the President and his administration and his years in the White House in the later 1980s and early 1990s. Former President George Bush was the Central Intelligence Agency (CIA) director during the Ford years and has enjoyed the role of "spy" or "spook" as CIA operatives like to call themselves. Elder Bush served his country well, bringing the CIA back from its embarrassments in Chile and elsewhere, but as vice president re-hired Panama's Noreiga after Carter fired him for abuses against his own people. So as we try to ask what have we done to be so hated by the rest of the world we are hamstrung by our own lack of knowledge.

If our democracy is to continue, should not we be adequately informed on government activities? On Moyers' program implications of government policies were graphically and openly presented. Israeli copter pilots were assassinating Palestinian suspects from the air. The helicopters were American state-of-the-art Apache's so effectively used in the Gulf War as tank busters. What other impacts have our nations policies provided weaponry and training for? What new and inventive horrors will we find out about in 50 years that our government is doing as this is written? These new presidential orders endanger our ability to know, threatening U.S. citizens in this global society as surely as terrorism. The rest of the emerging democracies in the world are watching eagerly.

Moyers stated that Johnson loudly complained about the Freedom of Information Act and didn't eagerly sign it. Now that we are busily gutting it of its effectiveness we now are learning just how important information can be. Why do you think the Israelis are restricting journalists in their operations in the occupied territories? They have learned well from their American friends in intelligence that public information undermines public support of dubious government actions. Sealing access to documents will solve that problem quite well. Perhaps it should be called the Blind or Impaired Patriot Act.

Only In America . . .

A female murder suspect who was incarcerated at the Hernando County Jail in Florida, committed suicide by hanging herself, left a suicide note with instructions telling her lawyer to sue the prison. She asked for her lawyer to sue the prison for failing to prevent her from killing herself, and she added that all the money gained from the lawsuit should go to her children.

Successful career or motherhood?

By Maren Johnson
Opinions Editor

Women are constantly fighting for their right to choose. They want to be able to make their own decisions about their own bodies, but according to the latest cover of Time magazine, they have a new choice to make and the decision is all too often being made by their own bodies. This new choice is baby vs. career. According to the article in Time, the option of having children alongside a successful career is not as plausible as once thought.

In the time it takes to establish oneself in the corporate world—and guess what, it still takes longer for most women—our biological clocks are winding down at an astounding rate. The glaring stat highlighted in the Time article declares that age 27 is when a woman's chance of getting pregnant starts to decline. That's a mere five to six years for many of us who are thinking of entering the workforce next year.

So what? You think, I can have kids until I'm 50 with fertilization technology. Not according to these new findings you can't. Apparently, for all the stories we hear about over the hill moms, most women in their mid-30s to 40s have trouble conceiving despite advances in invitro fertilization science.

It looks as though we have been catapulted back to the 1950s ladies; better start changing your major to MRS while you still can. It is undoubtedly discouraging to think that half of our own school is composed of potentially successful career women who will have to make the choice between a family and a career. Of course there are plenty of women, even here, who do not plan on ever having kids, but most of the women I know want the family and the career, myself included.

It saddens me to think that I have friends who want to be professors as well as mothers, since tenure candidates who also want to bear children any time before 50 are considered highly undesirable (and that includes institutions such as our own). It seems that pregnancy and children are deemed a detriment to a female academic's focus. So what's it going to be: Mom or Ph.D.?

One way to alleviate this situation and allow for more career moms would be more family-friendly corporate values; a concept touted by Time and myself, but not half as easily done as it is proposed. Most companies don't want to be paying women to have babies. Why not have the dads stay at home? There's still the issue of maternity leave and the fact that until women are deemed worthy of men's wages it's tough to make ends meet on mom's salary alone.

All in all it seems that this is just another discouragement to ambitious women everywhere. Unless society can evolve enough to realize that women are an invaluable part of the workforce, but must also produce our progeny we will be faced with this tough decision sooner than we think. So much for the "Sex and the City" myth of fun, successful women frolicking on their own well into their thirties. It looks like Miranda's latest addition is more of an aberration than a reality.

Black-only ceremony planned at MSU

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

Forgive me for straying outside the "Bubble," but this one is just too good not to share.

According to the Detroit Free Press, Michigan State University (MSU) is planning a special "Black Celebratory" graduation ceremony for its black students this May. A supplement and not a replacement for the general graduation ceremony, its purpose, obviously, is to honor black students who have earned a degree. Apparently they deserve special recognition because it's harder for them to do well because they're black. Get it?

The problem, of course, is that this kind of ceremony is racist, divisive and it promulgates a ridiculous double standard.

"What would happen if some students tried to organize an all-white graduation? All hell would break loose. They would be labeled bigots," one MSU senior aptly wrote.

Racial classifications are wrong-in graduation, in admissions, in employment, and most any other conceivable way. It's who you are on the inside, right? We, as a society, have rightly decided that those differences just shouldn't matter anymore. Yet some just won't let them go.

The richest lesson, I think, comes from the celebration's supporters' response to growing criticism. One administrator defended the program by saying that MSU "is seeking ways to reinforce, congratulate and give special recognition for the accomplishment they've made, given that they are students of color." There could be no clearer explication of the condescension of the race-hustling Left than this one simple sentence.

It would be easy to dismiss this destructively silly "special ceremony" for black graduates as an example of multiculturalism gone awry—but that's not really what it is. In fact, this type of program is a perfectly logical extension of multiculturalism as it is preached (and I do mean "preached") on today's college campus.

Forsaking the potentially worthwhile mission of simply promoting racial and ethnic harmony and cooperation, "multiculturalism" sows division, convincing people that in order to "know" themselves they must obsess over race. Further, this insistence upon drawing and maintaining bright-line distinctions between different ethnicities—focusing not upon their current status as equal members of society, but upon the period in history when they weren't—has turned multiculturalists first and foremost into peddlers of victimhood. Tragically, minority students can internalize this message.

Case in point, celebration supporter Nikki O'Brien told the Press that, "The response of critics is indicative of white privilege, because they don't really understand why [graduation] is a significant accomplishment for black students." This is a truly amazing statement. Why is it such an accomplishment for black students to do whatever it is that their white counterparts managed to do? Who told these poor students that being black puts them at a disadvantage?

One could make the argument that what's worth celebrating is the fact that socioeconomically disadvantaged students get through college, because it means that they have overcome whatever challenges their poverty may have presented and have acquired some upward mobility. That would be reasonable. Then make the ceremony a celebration of poor students getting their degrees. Include poor whites, Hispanics, blacks and everyone who wants in. Make it universal and colorblind, for to assume that "black equals poor" is racist, condescending, and wrong as a matter of fact.

This ceremony, and the multiculturalist fervor that spawned it, assumes that blacks have made no progress in the last 40 years; that they should not expect to make it on their own; that they are still victims and thus have an excuse if they fail; and that educational success and economic opportunity should be thought of as the exception, not the rule. Being black does not automatically put you at a disadvantage in anything you do, and that includes getting an undergraduate degree.

The only thing left, I suppose, is to consider the nonsensical thought processes that led to MSU's decision and see if there's any trace of such thinking on this campus. Impossible!

Political labels distort actual beliefs

By Katie Parker
Staff Writer

Several of the recent University forums and debates have become public spectacles, pitting true "Conservatives" against true "Liberals" for an all-out battle. The public comes to watch and cheer, maybe throw some peanuts, and leave with a completely distorted and skewed view of what conservatism and liberalism actually are. We have begun to categorize people into clear-cut, defined boxes, where true beliefs and personalities are suffocated under the label "Liberal" or "Conservative".

In one of my recent classes, I was asked to argue the conservative side of an argument about gay and lesbian adoption. Having liberal views about this issue, I was uncomfortable with this task, and resorted to stereotyping what I thought was the typical "Conservative" viewpoint. I confused conservatism with close-mindedness, and ended up in a two-hour lunch conversation with a self-professed "Conservative" that I had subsequently offended in that class. We discussed the "typical" conservative platform (not his personal viewpoint) on every issue from gun control to small government to freedom of speech and I was left with a shocking yet undeniable realization: I agree with conservatism on a few points.

So why has it recently become so distasteful to be "Conservative" on this campus? Why are so many people who share these views desperately trying to avoid this label? Many of the students and faculty allies of the University's Conservatives Club have launched a series of brutal and ungrounded attacks on so-called "Liberal" groups at the University. And here's what should shock you the most: it's all in the name of "true Conservatism".

If you're a true Conservative, you believe that pornography is offensive and wrong. If you're a radical Conservative, you believe that the "one in four" statistic is offensive and wrong. If you're a true Conservative, you believe that some of the messages in "The Vagina Monologues" are problematic. If you're a radical Conservative, you feel the need to reinforce the fact that most of literary history has been one long "Penis monologue" by degrading the integrity of a feminist play. If you're a true Conservative, you believe that welfare is inherently flawed and needs serious reform. If you're a radical Conservative, you believe that the "living wage" breeds bottom-dwellers. If you're a true Conservative, you believe that the government should regulate less so that people preserve their individual freedoms. If you're a radical Conservative, you believe that hanging a banner from your fraternity challenging the school's effort to limit underage drinking is an effective method of embarrassing the administration into handing your "social life" back to you on a platter.

If you're a true Conservative, you believe that welfare is inherently flawed and needs serious reform. If you're a radical Conservative, you believe that the "living wage" breeds bottom-dwellers.

The problem is that these few radicals are also the loudest and most inflammatory. By using the conservative platform as a soapbox for their personal views, they appear to represent the whole, not just a small percentage. The close-minded methods in which these few students and faculty consistently challenge and insult other's beliefs or positions actually hamper their effort to address any issues on this campus. Often, we are so flabbergasted by their narrow-minded and condescending language that it becomes impossible to see any logic that may exist in the argument.

True conservatives believe that restrictions on free speech or free press deprive us of our First Amendment rights. This position presupposes the idea that we, as Americans, have the right to be responsible and civil with our language, and should choose to do so in order to preserve a civil discourse without government intervention. In effect, these students and faculty members, who feel the need to abuse their right to free press by using it to insult and degrade other members of this campus, are the perfect examples of why regulations have been considered in the first place. Should you choose to be more responsible and ethical with your speech, you might seek to preserve our liberties instead of deprive us of them.

U.S. considers reducing assistance to Russia

By Gretchen Schrock
Senior Writer

The American government has suddenly called Russia's bluff in a deadly poker game that has endured since the Soviet Union began to crumble. After years of careful negotiation on arms control in the chemical, biological and nuclear senses, it appears that the United States has won by its assertion that Russia's willing compliance with treaties banning chemical and biological weapons is faltering. However, the Bush administration, when it realized that it possessed the winning hand of cards, claimed its prize despite the future harm that this victory may cause in terms of decreased national security.

This past week, Washington decided to curtail many new disarmament projects and cut additional funding to some existing programs in an effort to convince Russia that without further cooperation on its part, various disarmament treaties, especially the Cooperative Threat Reduction Act, are in serious jeopardy. "This is a signal of our seriousness about compliance on arms control and the need to meet all obligations under the chemical and biological weapons conventions," the New York Times quoted one senior administration official as saying.

Each year, the American government, in accordance with the law, must certify whether Russia is "committed" to complying with its treaty responsibilities. Unfortunately, for all involved, this year, the United States was unable to guarantee that commitment, thus forcing the administration to postpone new initiatives or cancel new financing for programs aimed at the reduction of each side's nuclear, biological and chemical arms.

What did Moscow refuse to accomplish that prompted the White House to follow such a harsh course of action? First, the Russian government declined to share a bio-engineered strain of anthrax developed by its national scientists, which it had repeatedly promised to do. Then, a complete history of decades of secret work on biological and chemical weapons was not provided to the Americans. Lastly, the failure to acknowledge that, under Soviet rule, "fourth generation" chemical weapons agents, which are significantly more lethal than most advanced nerve agents produced by the United States, certainly irritated the American leadership. All of these disappointments culminated in the resolution to chastise the Russian government through a lack of certification that will also adversely affect the American governmental sector by threatening approximately $450 million in programs managed by the Defense Department and $70 million run by the State Department.

As a result of this hard-line stance towards Russia, which is attributed to critics within the White House who believe that the United States must acquire a firm hand towards Russia in regards to weapons of destruction and the implementation of arms control treaty conditions, American national security will be somewhat eroded. The Cooperative Threat Reduction Act assisted countries in the former Soviet bloc in the destruction of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons and associated infrastructure, and the determent of theft or spread of such weapons outside their borders. Why would the Bush administration view a verbal warning to Russia as more beneficial to this country's defense than a relatively decent, though not spectacular, level of weapons disarmament? One would assume that one bomb diffused, which would save numerous lives, is better than nothing at all.

"It's in our country's interest to stop the spread of weapons of mass destruction from leaking out of Russia in any way we can," said Rose Gottemoeller to the New York Times, a former assistant secretary of energy for nonproliferation under President Bill Clinton and now a senior associate at the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. "So undercutting these programs is tantamount to shooting yourself in the foot."

One would assume that after the horrific events of Sept. 11 and the ensuing war in Afghanistan that the Bush administration has realized that it only takes one bomb in the wrong hands to wreak havoc on civilized society and thus, any concerted action, no matter how minor, towards the goal of complete national disarmament and the destruction of smuggling networks maintained by potential terrorists would be welcomed. In addition, the government must recognize the diverse economic, political and social barriers that still exist in Russia hinder full compliance and actively assist Russia in attacking these problems. Instead, President George W. Bush and his advisors prefer to hop around on their wounded and bleeding feet, dearly clutching their winning hand of cards in the vain hope of discovering some kind of superior reward.

Attitude about alcohol fails to consider realistic solutions

Houseparty weekend serves as an example of how the administration sacrifices school spirit in favor of strict enforcement

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

"Houseparty Weekend" is a phrase that conjures an image of hordes of Hawaiian shirt-donning students, rocking Bermuda shorts and flops, bouncing around from one live band to the next. The combination of the nice warm sun, the joviality of live music and perhaps even a cocktail or two, is known to intoxicate the spirits of the masses. It's a glorious occasion indeed.

Unfortunately, this year, Sigma Alpha Epsilon's (SAE) band that played at Theta Chi battled extreme frigidness and a small audience, while the band that played at Delta Upsilon (DU) Saturday afternoon was forced to deal with the same conditions.

While no Houseparty will ever be a failure—as they will always be more fun than the average weekend here—this one will not be memorialized as a success. The Friday night snowstorm and persistent Antarctica-styled temperatures were not exactly conducive the event.

Obviously no one can blame the administration for planning it this particular weekend. However, I can assure them that this would never happen if we held it, as most schools do, the last weekend in April. Even mid-April is perfect weather 99 percent of the time.

The mug system was a failure. Giving 1,000 students the exact same mug, serial coding it with your wristband was an untenable endeavor. Speaking for most of the over-21 folk I know, holding on to their mug for the weekend was nearly impossible. I purchased two, which were both stolen within an hour.

Kappa Delta Rho (KDR) and SAE were not allowed to host parties at their houses. Of the remaining nine, every single one was fined $500 for not having their properties cleaned by the morning. There were obviously many other fines, but it just seemed funny that every single fraternity would fall victim to the same punishment. Let me remind you that while the pleasure (yet financial burden) of entertaining the campus is levied upon the Greek system, the school does not help finance anything; instead just profiting off the aftermath. As social chair of KDR, I can inform you that we spent over $11,000 on last year's weekend.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro made clear that if this Houseparty was like the last one (apparently there was too much drinking last year) than it would be the last. I figured what this really meant was there would be no more regardless. However, upon reflection, I don't see how this event would not have been able to appease the administration.

Ferraro also said that we should be happy that the administration still allows us to have the occasion in the first place, as it is a thing of the past and virtually no other schools allow similar events.

I can assure everyone that Wake Forest's Hoopa Week, Villanova's Novafest, Richmond's Beach Week, Carnegie Mellon's Spring Carnival, Colgate's Spring Party weekend, Cornell's Slope Day, Lafayette's All College Day, University of Pennsylvania's Spring Fling, Dartmouth's Winter Carnival, Hamilton's Spring Weekend, Franklin and Marshall's Spring Arts weekend and Pennsylvania State's Spring Arts weekend are all still in effect, and still much more lax than our own Houseparty Weekend. Tulane and Loyola get off for the entire week of Mardi Gras. Boston College gets off for "Marathon Monday," during which the students party all day during the running of the Boston Marathon. Plus, while our athletic tailgating scene is non-existent, large school's such as Penn State and Boston College is like a Houseparty in itself, week-in and week-out.

Dean of Students Richard Ferraro made clear that if this Houseparty was like the last one (apparently there was too much drinking last year) than it would be the last. I figured what this really meant was there would be no more regardless.

The point is, most schools have times when they lay off the student body a little bit, whether in the name of school spirit or the general aura of springtime. Either way, these are celebrated times for the student body, and the traditions should live on.

A study that will undoubtedly add undeserved wind to the administration's sails came out this week, making clear the obvious: college students drink a lot. The National Health Institute, who produced the study also determined an even more obvious fact-of-life, "Though common on many campuses, alcohol abuse does not run rampant among all college and university students." It goes on to explain (really) that heavy drinkers drink the most.

The study proposes such solutions as harsher enforcement of the drinking age, establishment of Friday night and Saturday morning classes and an increase in the number of alcohol-free dorms. They avoid making sensible suggestions, such as lowering the drinking age—the only way to ever cure underage "binge-drinking."

Yale, Western Washington University, Hampshire and Swarthmore all defy a provision of the 1988 Higher Education Act that mandates loss of scholarship if a student is convicted on drug charges. They do so by reimbursing him or her if this were to happen. While I am not suggesting we do something similar with alcohol, I think its clear that our current overzealous attitude towards booze is unwarranted—after all, this has not even come in response to a major problem.

Last year, tragedy struck Colgate when students were killed in a drunk driving accident. They didn't respond by making the campus dry, but through stricter drunk driving penalties and the implementation of a "drunk bus"—a shuttle running 24/7. I have been there before and after, and can say this has been the most positive move towards the safety of the student body.

Here, we should aim to foster drinking in a controlled atmosphere, which is already existent in bars and fraternities. It would not be unreasonable to serve alcohol at Uptown—it would certainly help with their lagging attendance. It would be logical to allow males to use the safe ride system. It is not sensible to further demonize alcohol use.

Despite world pleas, violence continues in West Bank

By Matthew Hinson
Business & Politics Editor

Fighting continued this week in the West Bank as Israel continued their offensive into the West Bank, despite pressure from the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations to withdraw from the captured territory. Ariel Sharon, Israeli Prime Minister, quoted by The London Times online, claimed that, "This battle is a battle for the survival of the Jewish people and the state of Israel," and would not end until the Palestinians ability to engage in terrorist activities was destroyed.

In a further development, Sharon has not consulted Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, known as a moderate on the Palestinian issue, upon the advisability of continuing attacks on Palestinian territory. In retaliation for renewed attacks, Palestinian suicide bombers and militia have struck back with vengeance. Wednesday, an ambush on an Israeli patrol in the Jenin refugee camp, combined with a bus bombing near the city of Haifa, killed or wounded nearly 50 people, and strengthened Israel's resolve to continue their campaign against Palestinians in the ceded lands.

Secretary of State Colin Powell is touring the Middle East in a bid to end fighting in the West Bank.

World opinion has turned very much against Israel. The United Nations has called upon Israel to withdraw from conquered areas, including the office complex in Ramallah, where Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat has been under house arrest and surrounded by Israeli troops for the better part of the past fortnight. The London Times online quotes Kofi Annan, Secretary General of the United Nations, as saying, "We call for an immediate, meaningful ceasefire and an immediate Israeli withdrawal from Palestinian cities, including Ramallah, and specifically including Chairman Arafat's headquarters." Annan also called for Israel to open up to international humanitarian organizations in Palestinian areas, and called for both sides to declare a ceasefire.

The European Union has condemned the attacks, and has symbolically called for its members to suspend trade relations with Israel in disapproval of the attacks on Palestinians. In addition, the EU will consider sanctions against Israel in meetings next week. In a more positive development, Germany has begun outlining a plan for peace between these warring factions. The proposal calls for a ceasefire, withdrawal of Israeli troops from Palestinian lands, the recognition of a Palestinian state, and talks about borders and the status of Jerusalem, which both sides want as capital of their nation. This plan also calls for international peacekeepers to take position in a buffer zone between the Israeli and Palestinian-controlled areas.

Even normally stalwart allies of Israel such as Great Britain and the United States have expressed outrage at this latest Israeli attack. The House of Commons debated the Israeli question for an hour and a half Wednesday, with Prime Minister Tony Blair (Labour) stating that, as bad as the situation currently was, it could escalate quickly if a political solution were not quickly found. Blair called for the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Palestinian territory while condemning Palestinian suicide-bombing attacks on Israeli citizens, but his main concern seemed to be that international pressure be brought to bear, to help end the conflict.

"But the sad, simple truth is that the hatreds are too deep, and the wounds too raw, for the two sides to be able to resolve this alone," Blair said. In addition, Britain's Foreign Secretary Jack Straw was quoted in The London Times as saying, "Like every other country Israel has a right to security, but the Israeli Government must respect international law, including international humanitarian law."

The United States, historically the largest benefactor of Israel, has also called for an Israeli pullback. The violence so alarmed President George W. Bush that he dispatched Secretary of State Colin Powell to the region to try to end the violence and revive the peace process. Powell visited several Arab states, asking them unsuccessfully to condemn the suicide bombings publicly. Powell will also visit with Sharon and Arafat in a belated attempt by the Bush administration to rekindle the desire for peace between the battling factions. Despite the administration's reluctance to deal with Arafat, who is seen as weak and an undesirable peace broker, Powell is expected to speak with him about the creation of a Palestinian state in exchange for an end to the violence.

The U.S. government is quite divided between hawks and doves. Powell has been seen as for negotiated peace, including the deployment of American troops as observers if necessary, while others such as Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld are reluctant to place American troops in the region, and who seem more concerned about the developing situation with Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

Going on two weeks of renewed violence in the region, the death toll stands as of Wednesday, at 55 Israelis dead and 230 Palestinians, with hundreds more on both sides wounded.

Hussein begins month-long oil embargo

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

In a move engineered to show solidarity with the Palestinians battling Israel, Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein has placed a 30-day embargo on his country's oil exports. Hoping to provoke a situation reminiscent of the 1970s oil crisis, Hussein called on other Arab nations to follow suit.

Courtesy of Reuters

Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein has declared a month-long oil embargo on nations supporting Israel.

The embargo, which will not affect exports to Iraq's Arab neighbors, has not been matched by any other nation, even fellow "axis of evil" member Iran and America's nemesis Libya. The reason is rather obvious — even for the nations that have expressed sympathy for Iraq's position, without oil exports, their economies would be crippled. The reason Hussein can afford the embargo is, ironically, actually the "food for oil" program imposed on him by the United Nations. The constraints of the program have resulted in a backlog of funds in the account, which will be more than enough to tide Hussein and Iraq over through the next month.

Crude oil prices have risen, but as The Wall Street Journal has reported, that may not really have been Hussein's primary intent. Instead, he may be trying to "present himself as a hero to those on Arab streets." In doing so, he would hope to pressure OPEC to not raise production to make up for lowered supply — which it has traditionally done in response to previous Iraqi embargoes. But as nice as the added revenue would be, such a move now might make OPEC appear to be supporting the United States against another Arab country.

On the other hand, OPEC leaders are worried about their market share, which has been declining due to countries such as Russia and Mexico exploiting their petroleum reserves in times when OPEC cuts output.

The United States believes that Saudi Arabia might come to the rescue — the nation has quietly increased its production in such situations in the past, according to The Wall Street Journal.

The Hussein embargo is also having some distinct impacts on domestic politics within the United States. It may increase support for the Bush administration's plan to begin drilling for oil in the Arctic National Wildlife Refuge. It also may provide, at least in the eyes of Bush and other Republicans, more evidence of why the United States needs to topple Hussein. As Bush told The Wall Street Journal, "Iraq is a problem, and again, another reason why it's a problem we witnessed today."

The president has also refused to rule out tapping the tapping the strategic petroleum reserve or reducing gasoline taxes, though his aides say he would rather not do either, according to the Associated Press.

The reason for such actions is Bush's worry that a spike in oil prices could endanger the country's as-yet fragile economic recovery. As he put it: "Bad energy policy, or the failure to have energy policy, or the fact that we're dependent upon unstable countries is a reason why I do not believe that we're out of the economic woods yet."

The only way Saddam Hussein will lift his embargo before the 30 days are up, he says, would be if Israel withdraws to its 1967 borders. Like the OPEC-wide embargo of the early 1970s, Hussein's action is in response to U.S. support for Israel.

Chairman and CEO of the NYSE speaks at the University

While helping modernize the NYSE and moving it into the 21st century, Grasso's defining moments came on the morning of Sept. 11. His leadership through the tough moments of that day and following week are what many remember. Newsweek, in recounting the events of Sept. 11, did a story about Grasso and N.Y. Fire Commissioner Tom Von Essen. In the article, Jimmy Cayne, chairman of Bear Stearns, said, "If you had to point your finger at who was the captain of the ship, it was Grasso."

On Tuesday morning, Grasso was having breakfast with the management of AmerisourceBergen who were celebrating a large merger when a co-worker located in the south tower of the World Trade Center called to let him know that there had been a crash in the other tower. Grasso decided to evacuate the employees from that location because he "remembered the 1993 experience (the bombing)." The next several hours were spent welcoming survivors into the building for some refuge.

The tragic events of Sept. 11 at the Pentagon, in rural southwestern Pennsylvania and at a once developed site only three blocks from where Grasso at 11 Wall St. caused the New York Stock Exchange to shut its doors for the longest closing since 1933 — four full days. The global markets came to a standstill and everyone waited as New York reeled.

Throughout the week, as rescue workers sifted through the rubble at the World Trade Center, Grasso directed the resurrection of the Exchange. He had to mobilize recovery of the Exchange's computer systems, make sure it was adequately connected to the outside world, ensure that its approximately 4,400 workers could make their way to Lower Manhattan. He was quoted on Sept. 15 in The New York Times as asking reporters "Is this not just another one of those moments when America has been challenged, and will rise again?"

One of the biggest problems faced by the Exchange was how to communicate with the outside world. When the building at 7 World Trade Center collapsed, it fell on top of a major Verizon switching hub that served much of Lower Manhattan, including the Exchange. Without this hub, broker-dealers who do business on the floor could not communicate with the floor. Grasso said, "regardless of how many multiple sites you have, if you lose the ability to communicate, the market doesn't work."

The market had lost the ability to communicate. However, through the "most remarkable show of corporate cooperation," the market was able to restore its communication in less than five days.

Once described by The Economist as "the public face of the American bill market," Grasso saw his Exchange trade a record volume of 2.3 billion shares on Sept. 17. Grasso said in The New York Times after that first day of trading, "that to be able to transact 2.3 billion shares is a testament to the fact that the infrastructure is strong. More important, 2.3 billion shares sold means somebody bought those 2.3 billion shares ... our economy will be tested by this heinous act but it will be fine."

Grasso also spoke about business ethics in terms of the failures of Global Crossing, Enron and Anderson Consulting — concerns that have been big in the news in recent months. He called what has been going on, a "shameful chapter in an otherwise extraordinarily successful novel." He told the crowd that they should never compromise their positions for a short-term gain. Stressing integrity, he said, "colleges should imbue a belief in students that failures can start over again but failures who compromise their integrity can never be forgiven."

The job market was another issue that Grasso touched on. He said that when marketing "Me, Inc." a student should always be willing to "accept a job sweeping floors at a firm like Goldman Sachs over a better job at a company like 'Misery, Inc.'" because it is important to be working at a prestigious and reputable firm. He also added that students should want employers "to want you or want to stop hearing from you" when going through the job search process.

When asked about the two leaders he had met over the years that stuck out in his mind, Grasso responded with former British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and former President Ronald Reagan. He said that Thatcher's privatization of many of Britain's industries helped move that nation along and that Reagan preserved capitalism by killing communism. He also spoke highly of Chinese President Jiang Zemin and his efforts to privatize China.

Student reaction to the talk was very positive. Grasso received a standing ovation following the presentation and most students left talking highly of him. Nikhil Menon '03 was indicative of this. "(I) admire him for sticking with the NYSE for 34 years, starting out as a clerk and working himself up in the ranks to the top," Menon said. "The talk had a great mix. Mr. Grasso gave really great advice to the students on finding jobs and achieving their goals in the workplace."

Grasso's leadership of the NYSE has helped the Exchange grow and prosper in the last seven years. He has also helped it persevere in the face of adversity following the attacks of Sept. 11. His message to the University was one of hope for the future. This holds true for students looking for jobs — keep looking and keep your integrity when searching.

William Dixon lauds democracy in political science lecture

By Matthew Hinson
Business & Politics Editor

The James A. Gathings Political Science Lecture, named for a longtime political science professor at the University, was held on campus this past week hosting speaker William Dixon '73, professor of political science at the University of Arizona. Dr. Dixon gave a lecture entitled, "Democracy, Diplomacy and the Changing Face of International Conflict." Speaking to a small crowd of students, faculty and non-University members, Dixon, who became interested in international affairs while attending the University in the politically charged atmosphere of the early 1970s, outlined theories as to where the world is likely to go in the future due to the success of democracy.

Dixon said that the most significant change in the world in the last 50 years has been the increased power of the United States, creating a "new world that almost none of us has experienced before." This unipolar and hegemonic powerhouse is unprecedented in history, besting Great Britain, Spain, and even Rome at the height of their empires. To illustrate this, Dixon stated that the United States spends more than six times as much money, confirmed by the Center for Defense Information. At a proposed $396 billion for defense in fiscal year 2003, the United States buries its nearest competitor, Russia, which spent $60 billion in the year 2000.

This great status leads to three conclusions: first, it is unlikely that the United States, with such power at her back, can stay out of world affairs, even if she wanted to, which has been witnessed in the Bush administration's initial reluctance to be involved in Middle Eastern affairs, but becoming forced to as the administration realized that it was in the United States' best interests to be involved. Secondly, this power disparity between the United States and other nations will likely lead to an extended Pax Americana, with no wars being fought among major powers for the next generation at least. Thirdly, the U.S. hegemony will eventually be challenged, as has been every hegemon since the Roman Empire, with Dixon naming China as the likely successor.

Dixon also stated that it was his belief that the number of democratic states would continue to increase in the world for the foreseeable future, following a trend started in the 1950s, and that this will have a profound effect on how countries deal with one another. He outlined a theory called the Democratic Peace, which states that democracies do not go to war with one another. The reason: democracies have mechanisms, such as voting and compromise among legislators, which solve problems without resorting to violence, which are absent from other forms of governance. Therefore, when applied to international relations between democracies, these nations are more likely than other types of regimes to seek a peaceful resolution to disagreements.

Dr. Dixon closed by concluding two things: The United States ought to embrace this increasingly democratic world and work to ensure its development, both to ensure peace in the world and because democracy is intrinsically a good system, and that a rise in democracies around the world will tend to increase international peace.

An enlivened audience then proceeded to challenge what Dixon had put forth. He was challenged on the grounds that all established democracies that have had the opportunity to come to blows with one another have similar Western values - countries such as the United States, Britain, Australia and nations of Western Europe. To this, Dr. Dixon replied that the theory of Democratic Peace has been upheld even when differing values are allowed to exist - an example would be the relationship of India with Western Europe — all democracies, and having quite different cultures and beliefs, but remaining cordial. Also addressed was the tendency of leaders to engage in war in order to solidify their power at home, no matter if the nations are led by democracies or not. Dixon replied that this would not continue if all nations became truly democratic and recognized each other's leaders as the legitimate voice of their people — these nations would find other ways to solve their differences.

A later question spoke to the recent trend of people to pledge allegiance not to a state, but to a religious or ethnic group, and what this might mean for world peace. Dixon said that, until recently, states had held the monopoly of force., and the theories behind his lecture had been based upon this. This recent trend was dangerous and disturbing, for even were an organization like al-Qaeda democratic, it would not have made its actions more desirable or peace-oriented.

Scheetz and Co. ship Navy off with three losses

By Meghann Chipko
Staff Writer

The Bucknell baseball team performed impressively this past weekend, overcoming cold, snowy weather along with delays, a tough losing streak and Patriot League rival Navy.

After the Bison's 3-1 series with the Midshipmen, shortstop Larry Scheetz '02 was named the Patriot League Player of the Week (for the week ending on April 8).

Scheetz had an 8-18 week (.444), four doubles, five runs scored and four RBIs, going 6-11 (.545) with two doubles on the weekend. Scheetz also drove in the run on Saturday against Navy in the bottom of the seventh that sent the game to extra innings. The Bison went on to win the game 4-3.

On Saturday, the Bison won both of their games. The morning game showcased pitcher Chris Lackett '02 with his first start of the season.

Offensively, neither team got going until the bottom of the fifth when Ben Krentzman '03 hit a double down the right field line for the Bison. The Bison had runners on second and third after Ben Stoll '04 reached on an error, then stole second. Chris Cipolloni '04 stepped up to send Krentzman home with a single. Phil Bunting '05 smacked an RBI single to bring home Stoll and increase the lead to 2-0.

Both pitchers had good showings in Saturday morning's game. McDevitt for Navy threw a four hit game and allowed only one earned run. For the Bison, Lackett only allowed five runners to reach base and retired 12 of the last 14 that he faced.

The Bison earned their first shutout since April 22 of the previous season.

The team also won in the nightcap on Saturday, defeating Navy in eight innings after several brief snow delays.

Sunday morning, the Bison lost a heartbreaker in an extremely offensive showing for both teams. Both teams had ten hits each, but the Midshipmen came ahead in the end.

Navy started off the scoring in the top of the second after scoring two runs off three straight hits.

In the bottom of the third, Phil Bunting '05 hit a single then was drove home by Scheetz's double down the left field line.

In the fourth, the Bison tied the game up 2-2 with a lead-off homer by Krentzman.

Navy took the lead again in the fifth with a pair of runs. They were in position to score again in the sixth with runners on both second and third and the game on the line. Under high pressure, Coach Depew switched up the pitchers, and Cipolloni made a beautiful catch and throw to third to allow the Bison to finish off the inning unharmed.

Though the Bison scored to tie the game 4-4 in the seventh, and the game was pushed into extra innings for the second time in the weekend, Navy went on to win the opener 6-4.

The Orange and Blue were a little luckier in the nightcap. Sean Magee '02 pitched his career first complete, four-hit game, picking up a victory for the Bison. After the win, the Bison's season record is now 13-20 and 4-4 in the Patriot League.

Neither Magee nor the Midshipmen's starter Matt Cooney allowed a hit in the first three and a half innings. Scheetz had the first hit of the game in the bottom of the fourth, hitting a double down the left field line. Following Scheetz, Fishman hit another double, eventually driven home by Krentzman two batters later with a single.

Navy cut Bucknell's lead to just 2-1 after they scored in the bottom of the fifth.

The Bison retaliated in the top of the fifth when Scheetz hit yet another double, his third on of the weekend, scoring when the next batter, Fishman, reached on an error. BJ Batterson '03 picked up an RBI, hitting home Fishman.

The Bison held the score there, at 4-1, when Magee retired five straight batters for Navy to collect the win.

The Bison look forward to challenging Patriot League rival Lehigh this weekend.

Softball can't get bats in motion

By David Cohen

The Bison softball team continued to struggle on the field as it was swept by Holy Cross last weekend. The struggle with batting combined with nine fielding errors in two games on Sunday afternoon resulted in a 6-3 loss in the opener of the doubleheader and a 1-0 defeat in the nightcap.

In the first game on April 7, the Crusaders struck first, throwing two runs on the board in the second inning. After allowing consecutive doubles by Liz Curll and Christine Clark, the Orange and Blue settled down and recorded two outs. However, what could have ultimately been a harmless inning turned quickly to disaster as a Bison miscue on Nikki Vitti's groundball to shortstop allowed another Holy Cross runner to score.

With the Crusaders clinging onto a 2-0 advantage, the Bison defense held Holy Cross in check for the next two innings. However, the demise of the Orange and Blue surely commenced in the fifth inning when Holy Cross exploded for four runs. The Crusaders capitalized on three Bison errors in the frame.

Caitlin McCarthy reached on an error to open the inning and Mary Beth Ryan followed with a sacrifice bunt to move McCarthy to second. Back-to-back errors by the Bison allowed a run to score before Curll was hit by a pitch to load the bases up with just one away. Bison hurler Kelli Haskins '05 got Clark to pop up to first base for the second out of the inning, but Alycia Fitzpatrick smacked a double into left centerfield for three runs batted in despite being gunned down at third for trying to stretch the hit into a triple.

The Bison did not go down without a fight, displaying the heart that we have seen all season long. In the bottom half of the inning, Barb Wood '02 jump started the Bison's retaliation with a one out pinch hit single up the middle. Jenny Ross '05 followed suit with her own single through the middle as well, which was followed by a Meredith Gill '03 ground ball to the shortstop, who overthrew third base attempting to nail Wood on the force. Wood scored on the play to put the Bison on the scoreboard.

In the bottom of the sixth, Erin Doyle '04 and Jenna Fitch '04 reached base on fielding miscues by the Crusaders, taking second and third, respectively, on a passed ball. Jenna Demetriades '02 then broke the inning wide open with a triple to right field to score two runs and get the Bison back within three runs at 6-3.

"My mentality going up to the plate was to stay calm, see the ball and hit my pitch," Demetriades said. "She was pitching me outside the whole game so I knew I'd have to take it opposite field. I just kept my weight back and went with the pitch."

The rally was short lived, as Holy Cross struck out the next two Bison batters to end the inning. Demetriades, who finished the first contest two for three with a triple and two runs batted in, was frustrated with the team's inability to consistently score runs and with the team's failure to be flawless defensively.

"If I knew what we could do to get on the winning track, I definitely would tell you and be doing it, but I just have no idea," Demetriades said. "Right now we are not hitting or fielding up to our potential. The failure to perform those two aspects of the game well is extremely detrimental to the success of the team."

Demetriades is determined that the Bison did not fall to a better softball team last weekend, but that the players didn't perform as well as they could have.

"Holy Cross is definitely not a superior team, but they outplayed us this weekend. With a struggling offense the team needs to be solid on defense, but that just didn't happen," Demetriades said.

Haskins scattered six hits, struck out five and walked only one in seven innings of work.

In the nightcap, the Bison's Brandi Porter '03 and Holy Cross's Christine Palmeri were engaged in a pitcher's duel, scattering five hits each over seven innings. Palmeri, came out on top in a true dogfight, striking out eight and walking none. Porter struck out six and walked two.

The lone run in the game came in the third inning when Ryan reached base on yet another Bison fielding error. After being sacrificed to second base, Ryan scored on a Curll single to right field.

The Bison's best opportunity arose in the bottom of the sixth inning when Lauren Titus '02 led off with a single up the middle, Wood reached base on an error and Demetriades loaded the bases on another fielding miscue. However, Palmeri shut the Bison down from that point on, recording a strikeout and forcing a groundout to short.

The losses dropped the Bison to 7-19 on the year, following the sweep by Holy Cross, and 1-7 in Patriot League play.

"We have a lot of League games left," Demetriades said. "So hopefully this week will pull things together and something will give. We know we can play better—it is just a matter of coming out to the field and actually getting the job done."

Junior Brandi Porter's '03 magnificent pitching performance wasn't enough to keep the Bison in the game.

The women's golf team captured second place in the Bucknell Invitational, losing to St. Francis by only three strokes. The men's team placed 18th at the Navy Invitational.

Jess Hetrich '03 shot a 10 over par 80 on both days of the tournament and finished first overall for the women. Hilary Mainka '02 was the only other golfer to crack the top 10 for the Bison, finishing eighth with an 84-stroke effort.

On the men's side, Dan Gale '02 had the best showing for the Bison, shooting a 137 on 36 holes.

"We practice as much as we can," Gale said. "We're hoping to do better this weekend and most importantly in Patriot Leagues where we want to be our best."

Poor weather has made practicing very difficult for both teams as rain and cold have prevented them from getting out on the course. The weather has also influenced how the greens are when the teams do get to play.

CECILY CAIRNS CLASSIC CORNER

Not even Disney can script 'em like this

The world of sports movies has always been a hotbed for cheesy, too-good-to-be-true plotlines. And if the Disney Corporation happens to be at the wheel, one could imagine things getting even more putrescent. After all, Disney films in general are just a collective mire of melodramatic fluff—add the sports backdrop, and you get movies like Angels in the Outfield and Air Bud. Cute, but not exactly dripping with credibility.

I mean, what will they try to pass off next? A boxing chimpanzee? A seven-year-old kid who is struck by lightening and can suddenly kick an 80-yard field goal? A 35-year-old chemistry teacher (who never made it past the minors, only threw 87 mph in his prime and hasn't pitched in 12 years) trying out for a major league club and making it? Even Disney wouldn't conjure up that type of lunacy, right?

Well, the good news is, they didn't.

Fate beat them to it. For once, Disney can label a flick as "based on a true story," and put the emphasis on true instead of based. The story of Jim Morris didn't have to wait long before Hollywood recognized it as a gold mine of feel-good inspiration. And it isn't hard to see why.

Morris grew up with the kind of dreams that most people give up on by the time they're 12—he wanted to become a major league baseball player. In his case, maybe it wasn't that farfetched; after all, he was dominating enough at the time to catch the fancy of the New York Yankees, who drafted him right out of high school, as well as the Milwaukee Brewers, who drafted him after he turned down the Yankees to play baseball in junior college.

So a 21-year-old Morris made his bid for The Show in the Brewers' minor league system. But his high-80s-at-best fastball didn't exactly blow the socks off of his opponents, and to make matters worse, injury reared its ugly head and felled the aspiring hurler. As it does for so many starry-eyed professional dreamers, the dream died at "almost."

Or maybe it just went into a coma.

At age 35, Morris had long since given up on that dream and had found his own place in the world, in Big Lake, Texas, as a teacher, husband, father and coach. There was no reason to dwell on a past that didn't work out—the present wasn't exactly dismal. He refocused his efforts on inspiring his high school squad, the Reagan County Owls, towards a league title. He kept them on their toes, hurling his best at them in batting practice. His players, after a while, noticed that his best was pretty hard to hit.

Morris had the sense, and the experience, to recognize that optimism in this situation would defy logic. Pitching arms aren't like wine—they don't improve with age on a linear basis. At least not as far as the radar gun is concerned. Fortunately for him, the high-schoolers standing on the other end of his batting practice bullets didn't have the experience to realize that.

So they made a deal with him, a classic bet: if they won the league title, he had to stir his dream from its decade-long hiatus. They won. Morris was stuck. And so, the 35-year-old walked onto the field at Howard Payne University, as a has-been, as a never-will-be, as a laughing-stock, to try out for the expansion Tampa Bay Devil Rays.

Doug Gassaway, a Devil Rays scout, asked Morris how many kids he had brought to try out, assuming that he was just a coach—like all the other 35-year-old guys there—dragging a group of promising 18-year-olds to show their stuff. Morris' explanation drew a few laughs, but they let him throw anyway.

And from this point in the story on, fate seems to toy with our credulity.

The old man tossed his first pitch for the smirking onlookers. 94 mph. Gassaway shook the radar gun—must have been some sort of glitch. He asked for a second gun. 96. 97. 98. Both guns.

And just like that, Morris' dream slipped out of its coma.

After a little more time in the minor leagues, flying through Double A, soaring through Triple A, Morris finally got the call. On Sept. 18, 1999, he took the mound at The Ballpark in Arlington in the eighth inning as the oldest major league rookie pitcher since Diomedes Olivo in 1960. He faced one batter, Rangers' shortstop Royce Clayton. He burned four pitches—four strikes—over the plate and recorded his first major league strikeout.

The newfound paradise only lasted a few games; injury reclaimed his arm in the spring of 2000. It was anything but a disappointment, though—it wasn't like anyone expected him to be Warren Spahn. He didn't need to be. No one—not even Morris himself—expected a thirtysomething who had been on the shelf for a decade to get within a stone's throw (let alone a 98 mph stone's throw) of the major leagues.

But somehow, Morris did just that.

It was an ending even Disney couldn't have fabricated. Only fate could schedule a finale like that—the reunion of an athlete and his long lost dream. Morris was the flagship for late-bloomers, the duke of second chances. Baseball's Seabiscuit.

So maybe he was one-in-a-million. Maybe pitching arms aren't analogous to fine wine. Happy endings, however, are.

The best ones take a little longer to materialize.

Bison battle to 1-1 week

Suzanne Raffaele '03 broke the tie which led the Bison to victory over the Monmouth Hawks. She led the scoring with three goals.

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

Coming off of a 17-9 victory over Niagara on March 30, the women's lacrosse team opened up its first week of play in April with two games, and the team went 1-1.

The Bison hosted Monmouth on April 2 in non-League action. Despite a quick lead by the Hawks, who netted two goals within the first two minutes of the game, the Bison came up with four unanswered goals in four minutes. Senior Co-Captain Melissa Montefusco '02 started the scoring with her first and only goal of the day with about 20 minutes of play left in the first half. The Bison entered halftime with the score tied at four.

The Orange and Blue came out of the break firing and with 1:17 into the half, Laura Seiboth '04 assisted Suzanne Raffaele '03 and broke open the half with a tie-breaking goal. The Bison never fell after that and quickly extended their lead 36 seconds later when Amy Hasler '04 scored on a pass from Montefusco. The same two found each other again to close the scoring and seal the victory for the Bison at 9-6.

Raffaele led the Bison scoring with three goals, followed by Hasler and Meredith Wright '04 who each tallied two goals. Montefusco dominated the assist category with a game high of four. Nicole Kallis '03 made 18 solid saves in the net on 35 of Monmouth's shots.

"The Monmouth game was especially great because that was the first time we have beaten them since I have been here," defender Erin Curtis '02 said.

Last Saturday the Bison traveled to Worcester, Mass., to take on the Holy Cross Crusaders in a big Patriot League match, but suffered their second heartbreak in League play, losing 10-9 in overtime.

The game against the Crusaders consisted of five ties and five lead changes. The Bison trailed by a score of 5-4 after a goal by Montefusco going into halftime. The second half consisted of 15 minutes of the two teams trading goals before ending the half tied forcing an overtime decision. The Crusaders netted the winning goal at 62.22 in the game.

Leading the way in scoring again for the Bison was Raffaele with five goals. Hasler netted two goals as well as two assists to aid in the Bison's stellar play. Kallis registered 12 saves in the net.

Despite having their hearts broken by Lafayette and now the Crusaders, the Bison are only growing stronger and have a desire to keep their season going.

"With our loss to Holy Cross this past weekend, making the tournament is no longer entirely in our hands. But, our fight for a spot in the playoffs is far from over," Montefusco said. "All we can do at this point is focus on what our team needs to do in order to make the tournament, which is win our remaining League games against Colgate and Villanova. Not only that, but we also have two remaining non-league games which are just as important. The rest is beyond our control."

"We were in a similar position last year and ended on a four-game winning streak. Unfortunately, things did not go our way. I have complete confidence that our team will bounce back from Saturday's loss because we have in the past," Montefusco added.

Coach Jim Cotner said.

At the Patriot League Championships at Army, the teams will face strong competition from Colgate, Lehigh and Navy. This weekend, the men will travel to Lafayette where they hope to perform well to build on success at the Championships on April 20.

Six players have shown strong results without team captain Nick Leibowitz '02, who is out with a broken collarbone. At Towson, Abbie Valentine '04 shot a low score of 74 while Gale shot a score of 77. Tyler Braun '05 shot a score of 76 and Charles Markey '04 shot a score of 77. At the recent Navy Invitational Tournament, the top five finishers for the Bison were Gale, Valentine, Scott Leeder '04, Markey and Alex Dolle '05.

The women's team competed at William and Mary recently even though the team had to face poor weather conditions. The team experienced strong finishes from Jaime Hays '05 and Caitlin Sullivan '05, who shot scores of 83 and 90, respectively.

At the Bucknell Invitational, Bridget O'Mara '02 finished with "The young kids gain more experience at tournaments like these," Head Women's Golf Coach Kevin Jamieson said.

The women take great pride in what they do despite not being recognized as a varsity sport.

"The Patriot League does not recognize women's golf as a women's varsity sport and it's a shame because we would have a good product to show, yet there is no one to show it to. There is no chance to win a title," Jamieson said.

The team still keeps a positive attitude and performs well at invitational tournaments. The women's team will close out its season at the James Madison Invitational and the men will look to get at the top of their games for the Patriot League Championships in two weeks.

Tennis teams approach critical junctures in their seasons

By Catty Selleck

The women's tennis team went 1-2 for the week with a win against Villanova while falling to Patriot League competitor Army and University of Maryland Baltimore County. The men's team went 0-2 for last week, with loses to both Binghamton and Navy. Both teams are now heavy into their season, with games key to their positions in the League played this week.

On Sunday, April 7, the women's team had a tough fall to Army, 5-2, with Nadezda Curcic '05 and Tanya Sichko '05 scoring the Bison's two points. Curcic took the second singles slot with scores of 6-2 and 6-2, and Sichko took the fifth singles slot with scores of 6-1 and 7-5. Ashley Diers '05, held a tight match, forcing Army's third singles player to a third set. Diers, who has battled a back injury for much of the season, has only been able to play in a certain number of matches. "We've carefully selected the matches that Diers, one of our key players, will participate in; her practice schedule is also limited at this time," Head Women's Tennis Coach Rebecca Helt said.

"In general, our weakness is still our doubles play and our strength is in our singles right now. We look like a completely different team when we play singles than we do when we play doubles."

On Saturday, April 6, the Bison took Villanova in a close match, with a score of 4-3. This was quite an upset victory, since last season the Bison lost 7-0 to the same team with a very similar lineup. Curcic took the second singles slot with scores of 6-3, 6-3, Sichko went 6-1 and 6-1 in the fifth singles slot, and Samantha Berthod '04 went 6-0 and 6-3 in the sixth singles slot. The Bison also won the Erin Lee '04 contributed to the Bison's strong showing with her first place throws in the hammer and discus.

The women's track and field team finished second in the Colonial Relays hosted by the College of William and Mary. The men's team improved as the meet went on and finished third out of 16.

Erin Lee '04 led the way for the women's team, capturing the gold in the hammer and discus throws. Her discus throw of 145-10 was the second best throw in University history.

"I was very pleased with the discus throw," Lee said. "It's been a goal of mine to be on the top 10 list, and I'm really excited to have moved up to number two as a sophomore."

Stephanie Bango '02 was just one second off the school record that she had set a week before in the 800-meter run. Her time of 2:11.48 placed her first out the 40 competitors, helping the Bison in their second place effort.

Other individuals who fared well on the second day included Abigail Bouzan-Kaloustian '04, Laura Schaffer '04, Elizabeth Pendelton '05 and Shannon Maher '02.

Bouzan-Kaloustian finished third in the pole vault (9-6 1/4), Schaffer was fourth in the discus (129-9), Pendelton came in fifth in the discus (126-4) and Maher soared to a fifth-place finish in the high jump (5-3).

Kelly McConnell '02 turned in another stunning performance in the 1,500-meter run, finishing the race in a time of 4:38.28

The women's team also had several successful relays. The 1,600-meter, 3,200-meter and 4 x 1,500-meter relays all placed second, while the 400-meter and distance medley relays both finished fourth.

"We knew it would be tough because other schools concentrate on sprinting more than we do and there are more of those events," Lee said. "But a lot of people stepped up and we did really well."

Leading the men's side was Noel Powell '04, who scored a victory for the Bison in the long jump with his leap of 29-3.

Bryan Johnson '03 placed second overall and was the top collegiate finisher in the 3,000-meter steeplechase with a time of 9:13.05.

Also helping out the Bison was Adam Jacob '03 with a fifth place finish in the pole vault. Jacob set a personal record with his jump of 14-3.

"I've been jumping a lot higher in practice, but I was pleased that I did the best I'd ever done in a meet," Jacob said.

August Siciliano '05 finished sixth in the discus with a throw of 142-3, and Mike Mellas '05 finished seventh in the triple jump with a 42-11 3/4.

"A lot of guys did some good things this weekend," Jacob said. "I'm very happy with how we performed."

The men's team also fielded several impressive relays. The 4 x 1,500 relay team scored a victory with a time of 16:00.14, while the 400-meter and 800-meter relays both finished second.

The Bison will host their first outdoor meet of the season on Saturday in the Bucknell Open.

Polo plays final games at Freas-Rooke Pool

Team overcomes Villanova, but falls to rival George Washington and Princeton

This past weekend, the Bison women's water polo team hosted the Collegiate Water Polo Association Southern Division League games.

The Orange and Blue were edged out by League rival George Washington (GW), 9-8. On Saturday afternoon the Bison beat Villanova 8-5, but lost to no. 13 Princeton 11-6 in the last games ever to be played in Freas-Rooke pool.

Co-captain Adrienne Schober '02 played strong but couldn't help the Bison overcome George Washington and Princeton.

The stands were full and rowdy on Friday night for a huge game against League rival George Washington. In a well-played game by both teams, the Bison came up one goal short against GW, dropping a 9-8 decision.

With a one-goal lead two minutes into the third period, the momentum seemed to be in favor of the Bison, but GW rallied to put three goals in by the end of the quarter to have a one-goal lead going into the fourth.

Late in the fourth, goalie Lindsay Chesterfield '03 sent a perfect pool length pass to Meg Blitzer '05, who netted her third goal of the evening and tied the game at eight. GW answered Blitzer's goal with a steal and a score with only 10 seconds left on the game clock

"Co-captains Brooke Rea '02 and Adrienne Schober '02 led the team throughout, each playing exceptional games," Head Coach John Zeigler said.

In the goal, Chesterfield's 11 saves came as one of her best performances this year. Blitzer's three goals and tremendous contribution as a first-year student were a bright spot throughout the evening.

"She rose to the occasion and played amazingly well," Katie Hartigan '05 said.

The Bison will get another chance at George Washington at Southern Invitationals.

Saturday afternoon, the Bison took on Villanova and came out on top, 8-5, in an important game.

With the game tied at two going into the second, the Orange and Blue scored twice—the lead would never change hands again. In the fourth quarter, the Bison defense shut out the Wildcats and added two goals to create the 8-5 final score.

"Balanced offense and aggressive defense helped us win a critical game against Villanova," Zeigler said.

Seven different Bison tallied goals or assists, and goalie Chesterfield's 14 saves kept Villanova from putting many points on the board.

With another great game, Schober had three assists, a steal and two ejections drawn. Scoring two goals each were Blitzer, and two-meter standouts Rea and Cody Keffer '05. Hartigan and Eileen Ketterer '05 also added goals.

Rounding out the weekend with the last varsity competition in Freas-Rooke pool, the Bison came out ready to take on the Princeton Tigers. The Orange and Blue came out strong, scoring in the first 19 seconds of the game. Princeton then answered with two goals in the first, taking the lead after one at 2-1.

The Bison offense struggled in the second quarter, as Princeton scored five goals and shut out the Bison.

After the half, the Herd rallied to cut the deficit and come within three goals. Princeton outscored the Bison in the fourth 4-2, to come out on top with an 11-6 victory.

"We played solid defense in the shallow end, holding Princeton to just two goals in two quarters," Zeigler said.

Throughout the game, the Bison never gave up their intensity and played good transition defense and man-down defense, holding Princeton to just one advantage goal.

Scoring for the Bison were Rea and Kelly Hofstetter '04, each with two goals. Also, Blitzer and Keffer each added one. Ketterer and Schober each had two assists, and Chesterfield turned out another solid performance in the goal with a 12-save performance.

"I really feel that this weekend showed our impressive team chemistry and our ability to deliver solid four-quarter games," Schober said.

The consistency was a strong point for the Bison who had to play a lot of games in a short period of time.

"We played three games with four-quarter intensity and no real lapses in play. We have come together offensively and are not only looking for two-meter shots, but also making great cross passes, opening up our outside game," Zeigler said.

"We played three games with four-quarter intensity and no real lapses in play. We have come together offensively and are not only looking for two-meter shots, but also making great cross passes, opening up our outside game."

The Bison record stands at 7-14 with 12 games to go in the season.

While looking forward to Southern Championships in two weeks and Eastern Championships a week after that, the Bison will compete this weekend at Grove City College in games on April 12 and 13.

Me like sports

Baseball ROCKS! So we danced

Baseball is not a sport. As much as the "establishment" and "big brother" want you to think baseball is a sport, I'll let you in on a little secret, it's not. Baseball is not a sport, it's not a game, it's not even a competition; baseball is a way of life. Baseball inspires, baseball conspires and baseball never tires of turning its fans into fanatics.

Baseball is the one-stop shop for everything your soul needs. It has pain (Tampa Bay Devil Ray fans), heartbreak (Oakland A's fans), confusion (Montreal Expos fans), amphetamine-riddled racist hicks (John Rocker fans), excitement (Diamondback fans) and a sense of humor (Kansas City Royals fans).

I am a baseball purist in the sense that when you love a team, you have to feel the love. You have to cry at every ball, laugh at every strike and spontaneously orgasm at every home run. Every game is an emotional roller coaster ride of mayhem and complete and utter distraction from everyday life. When baseball season rolls around, long-time friends give way to fantasy baseball and ESPN's gamecast.

Baseball is a place where batters sleep with pitchers' ex-husbands. Baseball is a place where Roger Clemens throws a broken bat shard at Mike Piazza in the World Series because Mike cheated on Roger with Pedro Martinez and tried to lie about it. Baseball is about Mo Vaughn taking a year off from the sport, not because of a ruptured tendon, but for maternity leave because he recently gave birth to a cross-breed of Rickey Henderson and Jason Giambi; a child with the attitude of Bee Arthur circa Golden Girls and the smile of Joan of Arc meets Alec Baldwin.

And the master of ceremonies at this three-ring circus of the baseball world is the New York Yankees. That's right, the New York Yankees; everybody's favorite punching bag. The weebles of the baseball world—they wobble but they just won't fall down. Not a season goes by where one form of Yankee bashing isn't topped by another and yet another in an endless stream of complaints like Jan from the Brady Bunch complaining It's always the Yankees! Yankees! Yankees!

And why not? Why not harass the beast; poke at it with a broken stick from behind metal cages of bitterness, resentment and anonymity. It's fun to harangue those who are more successful than you. They deserve it ... they're successful and I'm not. They were stupid enough to be good, don't blame me.

And all of a sudden it becomes the blame game. Fans pointing condemning fingers at other fans. You're not a real fan. You're a front runner. You're a bandwagon whore. And dumb Yankee fans defend themselves the best way they know how, pounding the ground with their fists and grunting like apes.

The smart Yankee fan just knows to keep silent. They know that the jealous rage will pass in due course, they just have to give their aggressors time. Because somewhere deep down, whether you believe that they deserve the praise they get or not, you understand that it must not be easy rooting for a team that has a payroll nearly 20 percent of your own.

Because, the fact of the matter is, the Yankees are the closest thing to a dynasty that has been established since Babe was swatting at flies in the dugout between drags from his cigar. The Yankees have won four of six World Series championships, defeating the likes of Tony Gwynn, Mike Piazza and Randy Johnson ... oh wait, they didn't beat Randy Johnson. My completely unintentional mistake.

And I wish I could say it was just non-Yankee fans who booed and hissed at Yankee fans who walk down the street with their Jeter-jerseys and Giambi-pastrami sandwiches, but let's face facts, the Yankee fans whine too.

In one of the Yankees' games this week, a slump-riding Giambi stepped to the plate only to be booed by Yankee fans with shouts of "Tino!" ringing in his ears. Color me reactionary, but is Jason Giambi not, and I quote, "the perfect modern hitter?" Was he not supposed to revolutionize the way the New York Yankees play baseball? Is he not the future of your team?

Or what about George Steinbrenner's hissy fit after the New York Mets acquired Roberto Alomar for practically nothing?

How about the lawsuit that's being filed against the cable network that was supposed to air 150 Yankee games this season. They're complaining that they want the channel available on basic cable. Quite frankly, I think that space can better be used showing 24-7 Iron Chef episodes and old music videos from the 80s hair bands.

Did you know that during spring training, Andy Pettite's child showed up at the Yankee dugout sporting a Mets cap and a smile? No one seemed to take notice until a picture was taken and poor little Pettite, Jr. had his picture sent up to Brian Cashman and Steinbrenner himself who were remarkably upset at this.

They had a "serious conversation" with Pettite to discuss the matter. As it turns out, the reasonable explanation for the hat is that the child's little league team back in Texas are called the Mets and just so happen to have the same orange and blue uniforms as their New York counterparts. Suffice it to say, the petite Pettite will no longer be allowed to visit the dugout with said hat.

And because I'm a newcomer to the sport, its completely unimaginable for me as to what baseball would be like without the Yankees at the fore. It would be inconceivable. And thank god they started out 7-2. I feel comfortable knowing that a team that can toss around the amount of money they do (upwards of $130 million) can defeat the Devil Rays (salary cap lies somewhere just over $30 million), the Baltimore Orioles and the Toronto Blue Jays.

And one day, when we realize that the New York Yankees were the biggest thing to come out of the Big Apple since Al Roker or the Rockettes, maybe we'll finally question a team that has the ability to spend money like Robin Leetch at a dime store. And maybe we will all stop whining and embrace our differences. Or maybe Brian Giles will cast a wicked spell on Alex Rodriguez who will magically be transformed into an oompaloompa with Parkinson's disease. Tune in next week to see the Gary Sheffield-Bucky the Bison hybrid who smokes like a chimney and lays like a water buffalo.

Minor League baseball offers sport in truest form

NATIONAL

Rob Schmuecker

All too often, baseball fans are caught up solely with box scores, salaries and labor agreements. If baseball hasn't fully lost its purity in the past decade, the recent talks of contraction has definitely soured what was once America's pastime. With Barry Bonds hitting five home runs in three days and new Yankees slugger Jason Giambi being booed at home in the Bronx, the spotlight has been taken off the game and placed squarely on the players.

That is why I love minor league baseball so much. Sit through one Single A baseball game and you will know why it is so special. A feeling of raw enthusiasm and excitement surrounds the whole stadium as every 20-year-old player dreams of making it to the big leagues. While only a handful of players will ever participate in a major league game, playing in 3,000-seat stadiums and earning less than most college students will in their first year out of school is of no determent to their enthusiasm. Minor league baseball players travel in buses and stay in low rent hotels because they love to play the game and they dream of being able to play in the World Series—a dream almost every red-blooded American boy dreams of. Think about it—while you and I are forced to find a profession in the "real world," minor leaguers are able to play the sport that they love—and get paid for it.

They are not caught up in the stats or their salaries—they just love to play the game. That is what makes it so exciting and so special for all minor league baseball fans. We know that the players aren't busy worrying about endorsement deals or TV coverage. They play for fun and to improve themselves. Without all the excessive attention to the players, the game takes the spotlight. The emphasis is on fundamentals, hard work and what it takes to be a big league ball player. There is no better place for young baseball players to learn baseball smarts than in the minor leagues and there is nothing better, in my opinion, than discussing with a friend the different situations that arise every inning during a game. With a runner on first with no outs, down by one run in the eighth inning, do you take the bat out of your clean-up hitter's hands by making him bunt, or by attempting to steal a base? With a lefty at bat, do you bring in a lefty pitcher and play the percentages late in the game or do you take your chances and save your bullpen for when you really may need it? Every decision counts because every game is important.

Managers care about teaching the game to the young players, but they also care about winning. And don't think for a second that the players don't want to win. They are still young enough to want to win every time they play, but they are old enough to realize how fortunate they are to be playing the game period. Humans are competitive by nature and baseball players are no different. The enthusiasm surrounding the stadium is intriguing and sucks you in.

I got hooked about two years ago after watching my New Jersey Cardinals play the Oneonta Tigers in N.Y.-Penn League (Short A) League action. The Cards play only 20 minutes from my home in Northwest Jersey, yet I hadn't been to a game since their inaugural 1991 campaign at the age of 11. I was too young then to realize the joy of minor league baseball, but I certainly saw it in my next trip to Skylands Park.

Since then, I have made it to eight more local stadiums and seen up to 15 games ranging from independent leagues to Single A to Double A. I have visited six stadiums in New Jersey, two in Pennsylvania; four with major league affiliations and four with independent status. This year I plan on seeing six more stadiums in New Jersey, New York and Pennsylvania. Every stadium, every team and every league has a different story to tell—something special you can feel when you arrive at the park.

When I saw a Williamsport Crosscutters game last year, I sat behind a chain link fence in what was the minors' second oldest stadium. We saw Williamsport clinch their first pennant in 20 years. At the Camden Riversharks' home opener, I witnessed the pride and joy of a town thankful to have baseball that they could call their own (instead of relying on Philadelphia teams from across the river). In Trenton, I saw the dual number-threes retired on the outfield wall—belonging to Nomar Garciaparra, when Trenton was an affiliate of the Boston Red Sox, and Tony Clark, from their current affiliate, the Detroit Tigers.

But it's not only the teams and the stadiums that make it special. It's the players as well. Current major leaguers such as Matt Morris and Adam Kennedy as well as Dallas Cowboys QB Chad Hutchinson have called New Jersey their home in the past, and now it's home to future stars such as Justin Pope. Williamsport was the home to Kerry Wood, Scranton-Wilkes Barre to Randy Wolf and Scott Rolen, and Harrisburg to Vladimir Guerrero. My friend (an avid fan long before I became one) has seen all of them play and has vivid memories of them all before they made the big leagues. It's like watching a movie with a young actor before he makes it big; the stories you can tell your grandchildren.

Over the past two summers I have seen current big leaguers Adrian Brown and Francisco Cordova at Williamsport, Carlos Baerga at Camden and former big leaguers, turned minor league coaches—Howard Johnson, John Kruk and Steve Balboni. Most importantly, I have seen the future of baseball—the future that is presently untapped and pure.

And that is why I wjll keep on running back to minor league baseball, which has all of the excitement, energy and tension of America's pastime bottled up for the low price of $6. Oh, that's another reason-the minors are much cheaper than the majors—I can attend five minor league games for the price of one Mets game. While the majors offer more flair and receive more attention, minor league games are just as good for a fraction of the price.

Prove the pen is mightier than the sword.

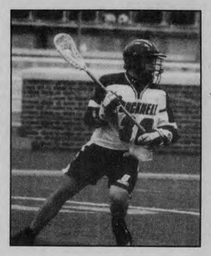
Athlete of the Week

By Scott Kloss



Chris Cara '05

Cara had three goals and five assists for the Bison last Saturday.

Chris Cara '05 delivered a career high eight-point performance, leading Bucknell to a 13-7 victory over Patriot League foe Lafayette on Saturday, earning him Athlete of the Week honors. Cara, a 5'7" attacker for the men's lacrosse team, concluded the game with three goals and five assists—a feat not possible without teamwork-oriented teammates.

"I owe these (the points) most to my teammates getting open and finding a good spot on the field for me to get them the ball. Once I dodge my man I usually can find somebody open, and they'll put it in the back of the net," Cara said.

Often, being a first-year student on a sports team means rookie jokes and being constantly picked on. Not on Coach Sid Jamieson's team.

"As Coach J[amieson] said in the beginning of the year, 'You are not freshmen out there on the field. I will play anyone that deserves to play.' So I guess I listened to him and stepped it up a little. It feels good to be playing well, but I have much to learn and don't really feel that I am lighting it up that much. My teammates have been getting open and all I have to do is get them the ball. I've been accepted by my teammates and not haggled much," Cara said.

Cara doesn't have to look far for inspiration. His family—his dad especially—provide the backbone and constant motivation to strive.

"The person who I look towards for inspiration would have to be my father. He has helped me through so much with lacrosse and my life. When I first starting playing lacrosse in fifth grade I wasn't too good and wanted to quit, but my dad told me I would have to tell my coach (who was around 6'3 and 300 pounds and very intimidating). So I didn't quit and I am very glad about that," Cara said. "Also, throughout all of my years of playing lacrosse, my dad has been there to have a catch with, shoot around in the backyard and of course tell me what I did wrong in a certain situation. He has helped me greatly and I thank him."

Cara's goals are to do his best, but more importantly, to make it to the NCAA tournaments to "show people what we are made of," Cara said. In order to obtain this elusive goal, the men's lacrosse team will have to fight hard the rest of the season.

"We have three games left in the season (Colgate, Penn State and Lehigh) and I hope that we will win all of these games," Cara said. "The Colgate and Lehigh games are both huge because they are both Patriot League games and we need to win those to stay tied with Hobart and Army. The Penn State game is even bigger because if we pull that one out, we'll have good chances of beating out Army and Hobart to get to the next level, which is the NCAA Tournament. That would be a huge accomplishment for our team."

Off the "lax" field, Cara studies business management. The men's lacrosse team will host Colgate on Sunday, April 14 at 1 p.m.

The Bison men's lacrosse team snapped a two game losing streak and improved to 3-1 in the Patriot League, beating Lafayette 13-7 away from home. A few days earlier the Bison traveled to Georgetown where they lost 13-7 to the fifth ranked Hoyas.

The Orange and Blue came out of the gates strong, rattling off three straight unanswered goals in the first six minutes, but Lafayette came back and grabbed a 5-4 lead.

"It was worrisome that they could come-back early," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said. "We made some poor decisions and maybe were a little bit over-confident."

The Bison then showed that they too could start a streak of goals, going on a 6-0 run. In the final 12 seconds of the half the Orange and Blue put a dagger in the Leopards, scoring two goals. Chris Cara '05 set up Andrew Sanders '03 with 11.8 seconds remaining, and Cara put one more in with only 3.9 ticks left to take an 8-5 lead going into halftime.

"We worked the ball well, and the crease was wide open," Cara said. She finished the game with a career-high eight points on three goals and five assists.

The Bison weren't done putting the Leopards away. Rob Lane '03 and Patrick O'Hearn '05 scored two goals in the third quarter and the Bison held Lafayette scoreless in the period.

"I just think we realized that we needed to elevate our game and play the kind of game we are capable of playing," Sanders said.

"This was just one more of those times this year when we showed that we can play with anybody when we come together and play our game. We just need to somehow find a way to put together that kind of performance for a full 60 minutes."
—Andrew Sanders '03

Cara has been tearing up the competition, leading the Bison in scoring with 41 points and getting to the goal against any team they play.

"Chris has tremendous field vision," Jamieson said, "and then he has skills to free himself up. He has things that coaches can't coach."

The Bison have received much help from their younger players as six of the team's 13 goals were from first-year students. The team has needed the help because of the loss of Wes Fetchet '04 and John Terracciano '03 earlier in the season.

"Our attack suffered a great deal because of the injuries," Jamieson said. "But we're starting to find the players to fill those roles and we're vastly improved."

The Bison were trailing only 6-5 with seven minutes left in the third quarter when undefeated Georgetown put the game away, scoring six unanswered goals.

"This was just one more of those times this year when we showed that we can play with anybody when we come together and play our game. We just need to somehow find a way to put together that kind of performance for a full 60 minutes, " said Sanders who had a goal and two assists in the game.

Once again, Cara led the team in scoring with a goal and two assists.

"We played really well and everyone played with intensity and up to our potential," Cara said.

The Bison still remain in a three-way tie with Army and Hobart for the League title. The determining factor as to who wins outright will be the strength of schedule and how the teams do against the teams they play. The Bison have played a very difficult group of teams and have been competitive in most of them, which should help their cause.

Next up for the team is a very important League game against Colgate, a team that has given a lot of top-notch teams problems this season.

"They're the kind of team that you don't want to play," Jamieson said. "They're very athletic and they're a lot like us."

The Bison are confident that they will benefit from playing challenging teams and will be able to come out on top.

"If we stick to our goals of scoring more than 10 and holding them under 10, we'll win this game," Jamieson said.

second and third doubles matches with scores of 8-1 and 8-3 respectively to score an additional point for the Bison. So far this season, the Bison have struggled with their doubles play, and have had problems securing the very important first slot in doubles play.

"In general, our weakness is still our doubles play and our strength is in our singles right now," Helt said. "We look like a completely different team when we play singles than we do when we play doubles. We will continue to work on and experiment with doubles teams in order to win the ever important first match."

On Friday, April 5, a very good UMBC team swept the Bison. Sichko won one of her sets at second singles 7-5, but that was the closest slot of the match.

The Bison faced two very important League competitors this week, Lehigh and Lafayette. "Our place in the League will depend heavily on these two matches, against Lehigh and Lafayette," Captain Kristin Inglis '02 said.

The men's tennis team lost a rough match to League competitor Navy on Sunday, April 7, swept 7-0. The second doubles team of Alex Davydov '02 and Nick Denefrio '05 were the lone winners of the match for Bucknell with a score of 8-6.

On Thursday April 4, the Bison fell to SUNY Binghamton with a score of 5-2. Scoring points for the Bison were Joe Menezes '05 in the third singles slot with a score of 6-7, 6-4, and Scott Allen '02 in the fifth slot with scores of 6-3 and 7-5.

On Tuesday the men's team defeated Towson 5-1 with Davydov and Todd Jacobs '03 picking up crucial wins. Scott Allen '02 rounded out the victories for the Orange and Blue, winning 6-2, 7-6 (7-0) in the number six singles to ensure the win.

Archaeological discovery in the minds of University students

Hands-on experience is the key to successful learning, but so is one-on-one student/faculty interaction and sizing up opportunities. Have you ever had the chance to help a teacher sort through pieces of 2,000-year-old glass from Jordan? Did you even know that the University's Classics Department offers this opportunity? University student Bonnie Wright '02 has taken advantage of this after being inspired by Professor Janet Jones, and has expanded her horizons by studying in Aqaba, Jordan, St. Lucia, in the West Indies and in Cyprus and Athens, Greece.

Jones, a classical archaeologist and glass specialist, has been teaching at the University for 12 years and has participated in archaeological digs in the Middle East. In addition to digs in Jordan, with the Roman Aqaba Project (Aila) and The Humayma Project, Jones has excavated in Gordion, Turkey, at King Midas's capital city. She returns there to study every other year. In high school, as an exchange student in Turkey, Jones went to Izmar for a year and still keeps in touch with her exchange family. While in graduate school, Jones excavated Neolithic artifacts at Gritille Hoyuk, in southeast Turkey.

"At Gritille Hoyuk, I discovered a necklace of turquoise beads lying just as it had dropped 5,000 years ago—the string was dissolved, but the beads were still intact. I felt a strong connection to the person who dropped it in the Neolithic," Jones said.

As a glass specialist for Aila, Jones receives shipments of glass from the Roman through Islamic periods and encourages her students to help her sort through the finds. Jones strives to inspire her students to see what it would really be like living in ancient times—without electricity, maps or even matches.

"I couldn't do this work without my students. Students from a variety of majors have worked with me on the project. Most of the students are not even classics majors. Students love to put in hours of work just for the fun of it," Jones said.

Wright, who came to the University as a potential education major, took Jones's Ancient Cities class her sophomore year. Since then, she has established her major as classics, with a concentration in archaeology. Wright was among many volunteers helping Jones sort through the ancient glass from the Aila Project, but Wright's enthusiasm separated her from the rest. In the summer of 2000, Wright was accepted to participate in the seven-week excavation season at Aila (Aqaba), which she found out about through Jones. In Aqaba, Wright participated in finds' analysis, pottery registration and bone cleaning. In her one-week break, Wright traveled to Egypt. She also traveled to Petra, Jordan, featured in "Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade."

"The dig in Jordan was the best. I learned a lot about people—living in such a small environment, being down in the dirt together everyday, with so many people you have to learn to accept everyone," Wright said.

Wright's interest blossomed from this point on. During winter break 2001, again informed by Jones, Wright traveled to St. Lucia, where she visited a colonial sugarcane plantation to be surveyed, drawn and mapped out. In the summer of 2001, Wright went to Cyprus for Hellenistic in Dhali.

"We took extra field trips to the sites in the area. It was a great program because it was oriented with having you not only concentrate on your site, but seeing what else is there to explore," Wright said.

Wright has just returned from fall semester abroad in Athens under the "College Year in Athens" independent program. She took four classes including: Sites and Monuments of Athens, which held all its classes on site at the Acropolis, inside the Parthenon, or at the Agora, the ancient market place and political center of Athens, Ancient Greek Athletics, with weekend trips to sites like Delphi, Isthmia, Nemea and Olympia, Ancient Greek, a course in the language and Ancient Greek Painting. Wright also volunteered at the American School of Classical Studies doing librarian/organizational tasks, as well as at the Athenian Agora, helping in the records department organizing registered artifacts and updating trench notebooks with new photographs.

When an opportunity arises Wright takes it. After seeing a flyer in the school's student center, Wright signed up to write a research paper for the Pierides Museum of Cypriot Art in Athens. During her 10-day break from school, Wright flew to Cyprus to do a week's worth of research, at the Cyprus American Archaeological Research Institute (CAARI), on Cypriot glass from the Hellenistic and Roman periods. From her previous trip to Cyprus, Wright knew her way around quite well. She worked on her paper and stayed with friends while there.

After her short, yet productive break, Wright returned to Athens and continued her research at the American School of Classical Studies, as well as the British School of Classical Studies. At this point, Wright was ready to present her research paper to the Pierides Museum. Ironically, it turned out that a local student from the University of Athens presented a similar paper at the same time—except her lecture was in Greek.

"Ancient history is great, but I also love the camaraderie. I now have friends around the world," Wright said.

Wright continues to help Jones with her diagnostic glass and plans to attend the University of Pennsylvania for a year studying Greek and Latin in a post-baccalaureate program in classics. Afterwards, she will attend graduate school.

Sorority women support breast cancer walk/run

By Katy Zachry
Senior Writer

Their motto is "Painting Bucknell Pink" and that is exactly what they are doing. From wearing a pink ribbon on their clothes to hanging a pink banner in the LC, a group of about a dozen sorority women have come together to support a universal battle: the fight against breast cancer. Led by senior Dena Ebert, in conjunction with the Women's Resource Center (WRC), this impressive group will see the fruits of its labor Sunday, April 14 at 1 p.m., when the first breast cancer walk/run commences.

Janice Butler, director of the WRC, is excited for this event.

"It represents a collective effort by sorority sisters to raise consciousness and funds for an issue that can have devastating consequences for women and their families," Butler said.

The idea for a breast cancer walk/run came from a sorority discussion panel hosted by the WRC last year. Representatives from each sorority took part in a discussion about current campus issues. They also remarked that many of the chapters' philanthropy events take place off campus and go unrecognized by the community.

"We wanted to create an event that would take place on campus, unite Greek women and be hosted by the sororities for the community to participate in," Ebert said.

To begin the endeavor, Ebert formed a planning committee, bringing together at least one representative from each sorority. Since January, this group has met every week to organize and plan the walk. In addition to these students, there have been other groups and organizations supportive of this first-time effort.

"Panhel has played a fundamental role in promoting the event. The sorority women have also been very receptive towards the idea, so word of mouth has been an important aspect, too," Ebert said.

The University community, as well as students and faculty, are highly encouraged to participate in the cause. Not only is this event a chance to unite different groups on campus, but the group sees it as a way to educate and raise money for breast cancer.

"Just about every person on this campus has been affected in some way by breast cancer, and it's something that we all relate to," group member Brandi Herman '02 said.

"I think people will see this as an appropriate way to raise awareness and money for a worthwhile cause."

The fee to participate is $20 and all proceeds go directly to the National Breast Cancer Foundation. Faculty members have been notified of the walk/run and registration forms have been distributed. As for students, a registration table has been set up at the Greek Carnival, as well as in the LC. In addition, there will be a registration table opening at noon the day of the race.

"Since this is the first year of the event, we have tried to be reasonable about the amount of participants. I'm hoping that we have at least 250 participants, but I think we may be able to top that figure," Ebert said.

"There's been a lot of rallying done for this event. If sororities are not making it mandatory, they are strongly suggesting their sisters go. It gives Bucknell women a chance to say 'We're standing up for women's issues as a whole and not as just one sorority,'" Herman said.

A different Vera Bradley bag, each from the breast cancer series, will be awarded to the participants who take first, second and third place. There will also be a raffle for prizes donated by local merchants and businesses and sophomore Garry Thaniel has offered to DJ the event.

Butler has been a part of this grassroots movement since its beginning stages and is impressed by the group's efforts.

"The organizers have put a lot of thought and care into the organizing of this event. They should be very proud of the hard work they contributed, and I'm sure that preparation will pay off with a successful walk/run on Sunday," Butler said.

Ebert hopes for the event runs smoothly not only for the University, but for its cause as well.

"If everything goes well, I will feel very proud and relieved," said Ebert. "It is my hope that it will become an annual tradition and that it will also trigger an education of breast cancer throughout the community."

Steiner discusses beauty and modernism

By Rachel Gold
Staff Writer

Professor Wendy Steiner, chair of the English Department at the University of Pennsylvania, gave a lecture titled the "Problem of Beauty" in the Bertrand Library on Monday. Steiner discussed the issue of beauty by showing numerous slides of famous paintings created during the modernist period, as well as discussing well-known literature on the topic.

Steiner has published many books about the issue of beauty such as "Venus in Exile: The Rejection of beauty in Twentieth Century Art," "The Scandal of Pleasure: Art in an age of fundamentalism" and "Pictures of Romance: Form against Context in Painting and Literature."

> "Modernism has turned woman and beauty into a subject in their own right. We need to find a way to present women in art without presenting them as objects."
> —Professor Wendy Steiner

"Modernism has turned woman and beauty into a subject in their own right. We need to find a way to present women in art without presenting them as objects," Steiner said.

Steiner spoke about the general ambivalence toward beauty, which has turned beauty into a sexual fetish. She believes that women have become the focus of idealism and value.

"The role of the image of a woman throughout the history of art echoes the viewer's pleasure and one can not have art without a viewer," Steiner said.

Steiner explained that the inspiration for her first book came from her experience visiting museums in Paris. She had visited the Musee d'Orsay and had viewed endless paintings of women—women in the nude, upper class women, lower class woman and other types of women. However, when she ventured into the Pompidou center she found not a single painting of a woman.

"The Pompidou center is a modernist museum in Paris full of 'form and concepts,' but at the cost of completely eliminating any images of beautiful women," Steiner said.

During the modernist period, Steiner believes that the valuable concept of a woman was abandoned. The "beautiful or even ugly woman" completely disappeared, but reappeared in "lower art," such as photography, film and advertising. The woman was completely removed from "high art." In modernism, Steiner feels there are four "importantly intertwined artistic manifestos which are form, fetish, woman and ornament."

Throughout modernism there was an impulse towards purity, known as "art neavoux." Steiner's slides were full of famous paintings such as "Monet's Olympia," which she explained was considered to be "scandalous for representing a nude woman who could be looked at unflinchingly which the beauty of art was capable of creating."

Steiner showed Picasso's painting that changed the position of the viewer. The standard works of modernism dealt mostly with futurism and conceptualism. She showed slides of Magrid's "La Belle Captive" and a painting of a highly accessorized woman titled "A decorative figure on an ornamental background." When the screen went blank, Steiner laughed as she pointed to her head: "A blank screen appears in front of you because we will now talk about literature which does not require visual images, but lots of good stuff up here."

"In literature it is the ideology that empowers beauty," Steiner said. She discussed the issue of the "ornamental woman" in John Milton's "Paradise Lost." Adam explains his 'fall' in terms of Eve's over-powering beauty. Adam declares: "Nature bestowed on Eve too much ornament." Therefore all higher knowledge in her presence falls. In "The House of Mirth," Steiner discussed Zelda Fitzgerald's ruin of her own life by trying to achieve aesthetic beauty.

In one of her articles for a popular women's magazine of her time, entitled "Paint and Powder," she wrote: " A woman must posses a taste for the decorative. To be successful competitors in the game of life a woman must wear embellishments as superficially as a Christmas tree wears ornaments."

Steiner explained that it is not surprising that feminism rose at this time when the "temptation to be a beautiful woman" seemed overwhelming. A famous article of the time warned women against advertising, political views and art which tried to conform them into the "ideal."

Steiner concluded her lecture by asking the audience: "Can art ever respect the female form as beautiful?" She explained that this seemed to be the question of the 1990s. She questioned the audience: "where are we now?" Steiner explained that everyone experiences beauty at some point in his or her life and when you experience it, it feels terrific.

"It's a self-actualization process, when one recognizes what one values they come to a conscious realization which can be wonderful," Steiner said.

Steiner finished by contending that it is "really hard to talk about the aesthetic of meaning, but one cannot create a picture of a woman without dealing with the concept of beauty."

Muslims react to Sept. 11

By Meredith Atkinson
Features Editor

After the Sept. 11 attacks, there was a tremendous amount of confusion on campus. Among the uncertainty was how the community would react to students of Muslim and Middle Eastern heritage.

Preventing any prejudice has been a priority for the University, and based on the responses of many students, the efforts were successful.

"I think the faculty and students here at Bucknell reacted very positively to the acts of violence and this really reflects how community-oriented Bucknell is, and how we truly are a family," Tammana Hye '04, member of the Muslim Students Association (MSA), said.

Hye went home to New York City the weekend after the attacks and saw the heart of the devastation first hand.

"I realized that it was up to the few Muslim students to show what Islam is all about, and that our faith condemns the killing of civilians. Fortunately I have had the opportunity to speak to many people on campus, both inside and outside of the classroom. And I thank God that I have not experienced any prejudices personally," she said.

"Personally, my friends were more understanding than ignorant. The faculty was also very supportive—they often called me personally to see how I was doing," Ahmad Hassan '04, president of the MSA, said.

Khalid Al Ghamdi '05, a Muslim student who is a member of both the MSA and the Middle Eastern Association just moved to the United States from his home in Saudi Arabia upon enrolling at the University, and feared that after the attacks, the prejudice would be rampant. Immediately following the massacre, his fears were realized when one of his friends immediately assumed that the attacks were made by 'an Arab' before anything was known about the perpetrators.

"It was an especially hard situation for me because it was my first month here and I was still recovering from homesickness. I thought I would never survive here because most people assumed that Muslims and Arabs are terrorists, and that they are bad people, which is not true," Al Ghamdi said.

Al Ghamdi gives the University a lot of credit for alleviating any prejudice that could have resulted from the incident, commenting "... the school took care of everything and campus meetings that we had after that sad incident were really helpful because they helped to clarify things about how international students have nothing to do with this."

Al Ghamdi also noted that some of his friends on other campuses had been accosted and insulted by their peers and that many were arrested and questioned by the FBI.

Since the attacks, the Muslim community on campus has stood together and supported each other. There is a mosque in Sunbury that many Muslim students use for worship, in addition to a prayer room in the New Residence Hall.

Play to tell a unique love story

Kalidasa's "Shakuntala" will come to life with its multicultural cast next week

The cast of "Shakuntala" not only learned a great deal about Indian culture but also much about themselves while working on the play.

By Kristen Habacht
Staff Writer

In the fifth century, Kalidasa wrote a play about friendship, history, duty and, above all else, love. That play was "Shakuntala" and it will be brought to life in the University's Harvey Powers Theatre from April 12-15. Directed by Professor of Theater Gary Grant, "Shakuntala" has proved its timeless charm.

Although set in India, "Shakuntala" is performed by a multicultural cast. "It is a unique opportunity to work on a play that can affect us deeply and also to work with a cast that is from many different cultural backgrounds," Grant said. "Each of us brings our own unique understanding to the play."

"Shakuntala" is a love story told in such a classical style as to seem like a myth. The characters live in two different worlds—one of the royal court, and one of a holy ashram, or monastery. The two worlds collide when King Dusyanta falls in love with a hermit girl named Shakuntala. They are separated from one another and a curse is placed on the king that makes him forget Shakuntala and his love for her. Through his search for the truth, he balances his sense of duty with his need for love.

To bring Shakuntala and her tale to life, a talented team of actors, technicians, costume designers and puppet masters has been working to bring fawns, elephants, lions and nymphs to the reconstructed stage. As the creatures of the ashram come to life, so do the characters, not only through the actors, but also in unique costumes.

For "Shakuntala," costume designer Mary Kokie '02 has worked non-stop on her research and studies of Indian dress throughout the centuries. With flowing shirts, intricate beading, bright colors and natural fabrics, the costumes of the tale are practically a play in themselves.

The cast of has worked for months to help make the play more than just a reading of text. Through acting, puppetry and dance performed by Sofia Abraham '02, the performers have not only learned more about Indian culture, they have also learned more about themselves.

"[The play's] magnificence lies within the portrayals of lives from an ancient Indian culture," Don Porter '02, who plays Dusyanta, said.

"This play is an amazing visual spectacle and it was a fantastic opportunity to work in a culture different than our own," Hillary DePiano '02 said.

The experience that "Shakuntala" provides is a rare one in which a world of sages, nymphs, kings and queens is representative of both the universal theme of love and a timeless culture.

Opera Company delights audience

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

In addition to the beautiful display of vocal talent, the Bucknell Opera Company incorporated several elements of humor into its performance this past Saturday evening. The Weis Center housed the show that included the skits "The Telephone," "Again" and "Bon Appetit." The performers blended their classical operatic voices with modern humorous scenarios to produce a fun atmosphere. The enamored audience responded with both appreciation for the music and laughter for the amusing settings.

"The Telephone" depicted the story of an attempted proposal. Kyle McGee '04 sang the part of a young man trying to peel his girlfriend away from a phone call in an effort to ask his urgent question. Jennifer Clarke '86, a special guest artist, played the oblivious girlfriend. The duo coupled excellent singing with a particularly comical acting style that appealed to the audience.

The second sketch, "Again," used characters from "I Love Lucy" to make a study of repetitive human behavior. Rachael Crane '03 played the real-life version of the abused Lucille Ball, while Michael Bodnyk '05 played the temperamental Ricky Ricardo. Amanda Robie '03 and Eric Loveland '03 completed the act as Ethel and Fred Mertz. Vintage costume and comedic acting (Bodnyk serenaded Crane with a rendition of "Babaloo") entertained all.

"I liked the costumes in 'Again,'" Taylor Harchak '05 said. "They were very believable."

The final act, "Bon Appetit," shed a hysterical light on Julia Child's French cooking show. Amalia Martin '02 wowed the audience with not only her delightful voice, but also with a delightful portrayal of Child.

"After the third song of the opera, I will never look at Julia Child the same way again," Taylor Chase '05 said. "The evening was a wonderful opportunity to appreciate the talent that goes into opera singing, and the humor of what you can do with that art."

"Mulholland Dr." has hidden genius

Courtesy of Reuters

Naomi Watts and Laura Elena Harring star in this entertaining film.

By Jess Cortese
Staff Writer

"Mulholland Dr." is really two movies in one. For the 100 or so minutes it runs, it reveals the story of Rita (Laura Harring), a woman who is in a car accident, loses her memory and becomes friends with a budding starlet (Naomi Watts), who tries to help her remember who she is.

The scene is not Hollywood as most viewers imagine it—it's director David Lynch's Hollywood—a dark, twisted place filled with mobsters who, for example, kill people if a particular actress is not cast in an upcoming film.

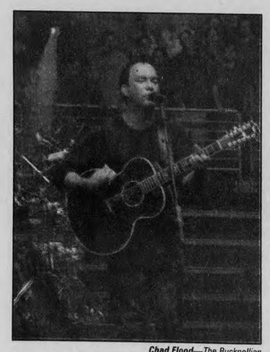
Movie Review
★★★★ 3.75

The story is entrancing, but exaggerated. The long, flowing shots, the silent pauses, and Watts' acting are all over the top. The film has a disquieting effect as the story unfolds and pieces of Rita's past seem to fall into place.

Then Rita opens a small blue box, Lynch's idea of a Pandora's box and BANG! Suddenly we're jerked out of the dream world and seeing what really happened, and it is more than even the most creative moviegoer could imagine. Apparently, Hollywood is even more twisted than we had ever dreamed.

The second half of "Mulholland Dr." is full of hidden identities, jealous lesbian lovers and a nice geriatric couple that laughs annoyingly in order to drive a certain blonde bombshell crazy. The string of events leading up to the accident are disturbing at best and incredibly hard to follow. Don't be surprised if you walk away from this film more than a little confused, but give it some time and it might just work itself out. There isn't a moment in the first half of the film that isn't intentional, and it really does all fit together in the end. I'm not ashamed to admit that it took me a while to realize the genius that went into "Mulholland Dr.," but now that I have, I can't wait to see it again.

DMB concert thrills fans



Chad Flood—The Bucknellian

Dave Matthews Band (DMB) entertained the crowd with both new and old hits last Thursday

By Chad Flood
Senior Writer

I have been a fan of the Dave Matthews Band (DMB) since 1998, when I saw it perform for the first time and realized that these five musicians from Virginia were something special. On stage, these were not the same rockers that I had seen on MTV crooning female-favorites like "Satellite" and "Crash Into Me." The members of the band were true performers in every sense of the word.

Concert Review

Last year's tour to promote the band's latest release, Everyday, left many diehard fans with a sour taste. This new album was not the DMB that they had grown to love—this was full of overproduced radio songs, with none other than pop mogul Glen Ballard at the helm.

When information about the band's upcoming release began to surface, its fans saw a ray of light. Tentatively titled Busted Stuff and set for release on July 2, DMB's new effort is to include several songs from last year's Internet-released Lillywhite Sessions, as well a handful of completely new tracks. The album tour kicked off in Washington, D.C. on April 4.

Unlike last year's debacle at the University of Virginia, this year's kickoff show at the MCI Center surpassed all of my expectations. I did not have very high hopes going into the evening, as I realized that the band had been off the road for the past eight months and it usually takes a few weeks to get back into the groove of performing for live crowds. This year, a few weeks turned into 10 minutes.

The band opened up with a spirited version of "Too Much," and the energy of this first song held until the band took its final bow. The set was varied, with a majority of the songs coming from the new album.

Tunes that have been out of rotation since the summer of 2000, such as "Busted Stuff" and "Raven" made their returns, each reworked with an edgier feel. Later in the set, DMB used one of its trademark live mixes, performing "Big Eyed Fish," "Bartender" and "Grace Is Gone," in sequence, letting each song flow into the next.

In addition to these songs, a tune debuted entitled "Where Are You Going," a slow melodic love song destined to be the album's first single. Longtime fans would not have been disappointed by this performance either—old school favorites like "What Would You Say," "Drive In," "Drive Out" and "Rapunzel" also graced the set.

The highlight of the night came during the encore, however, when they appeased fans' wishes and played the first live version of "Don't Burn the Pig" since August 1999. DMB closed the evening with a powerful rendition of "Don't Drink the Water."

After the show ended, I saw something I never thought that I would see. The street in front of the arena was packed with happy fans, just hugging and 'slapping five' and reminiscing about what they had just witnessed. As we made our way back to the car, preparing for our long drive back to campus, one thing was certain in my mind—DMB was back, and better than ever.

Chorale concert approaches

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

Spring is officially here and to mark the occasion, the University Concert Chorale will perform its Spring concert this Sunday at 2:30 p.m. in the Weis Center for the Performing Arts. Dr. William Payn will be conducting and David Cover will act as accompanist.

The program will include three late 20th Century works—"Jubilate," "Lux Aeterna" and "Requiem."

"The Rutter 'Requiem' is probably the Chorale's most favorite of the three, perhaps because it speaks rather poignantly about peace and hope," Payn said.

> "The singers have enjoyed the process of learning the music. It is all quite challenging, but at the same time accessible to the listener."

"I love 'Requiem,'" Lara Hanson '04 said. "A requiem is a mass for the dead and they are usually very solemn, but the words he uses are uplifting, full of joy and peace. My favorite song is a solo that says 'Blessed are those that die in the Lord ... for they rest from their labors.' It brings beautiful words of peace in a time of national sadness and distress."

Two singers, Lee Cromwell '05 (tenor) and Rachael Crane '03 (soprano) will have the opportunity to perform solos. "The singers have enjoyed the process of learning the music. It is all quite challenging, but at the same time accessible to the listener," Payn said.

In addition to instrumental and brass ensembles, an organ is being specially provided for the concert by the Allen Organ Company and Robert M. Sides Family Music Center. The concert is free and open to the public.

Webmail service to replace Telnet

ISR researching a web-based service to facilitate off-campus email access

Yu Ling Huang—The Bucknellian

The University is considering replacing the Telnet email service with a more user-friendly, Web-based program.

By Matt Ellis
Features Editor

Information Service and Resources (ISR) recently began looking at adding a webmail email system as another option for students to receive email.

Presently, the University has a Telnet service which uses the pine email program. Web-based and Telnet services are similar in that they both allow easy access to email when the user is away from his or her primary machine.

The difference is that the pine email program, which the Telnet service relies on, has a fairly old architecture that many find difficult to connect to and use.

"The primary difference is probably the obvious one. Telnet/pine is a text based interface, which for some people can be difficult to manipulate. Webmail is performed in a Web browser, which most people are quite familiar with," said Jeremy Dreese, engineering computing systems integrator.

A Web-based email service also has many other advantages over a Telnet service.

"An additional advantage is user-friendliness. People generally tend to be very comfortable using a Web browser, and this certainly makes using webmail a much easier method of checking email," Dreese said.

Another advantage of a Web-based email service is increased security.

"Telnet is not a very secure protocol by nature. It sends all traffic in clear text format, including passwords. However, the webmail solution we plan to provide will use a secure Web server, which means that all data sent between the local machine at which you're checking your mail and our webmail server will be encrypted," Dreese said.

The security system used is similar to the ones used by many Websites that accept credit card transactions.

A Web-based service will also make it much easier for students who are home on break and abroad to check their email.

Carnegie home sweet home for history and humanities

History and humanities to occupy Carnegie after geology relocates to O'Leary

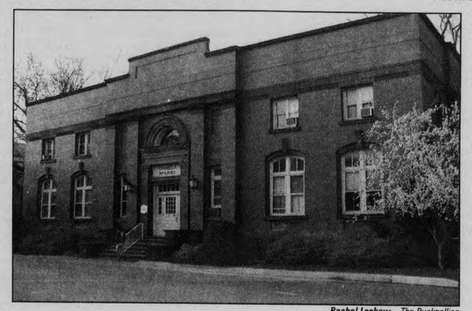
By Sarah Gudenkauf
Senior Writer

With the completion of the O'Leary Geology and Psychology Center, the Carnegie building will have new occupants. The department of history and the comparative humanities program will be taking geology's place. Both programs are looking forward to the move, which will take place before the start of the fall 2002 semester.

The new space was considered carefully for the best suited department to make the transition.

"We identified all departments whose space needs could be met with the space available in Carnegie, and history was one. When Beth Cunningham [associate dean of the faculty in Arts and Sciences] spoke to each department on behalf of the Space Committee, history indicated the greatest interest in taking advantage of the opportunity," said Stephen Bowen, provost/vice president of academic affairs.

The history department is currently located in Marts Hall, its home for more than 20 years. The move will give the department the opportunity to expand its offices and facilities.



Rachel Laskow—The Bucknellian

The Carnegie building (above) will be renovated over the summer in anticipation of its new tenants. Improvements include adding a student lounge, seminar room and library.

"When we were offered the chance of the move we were keen on the idea. It gives us more space to do more things for and with our students. It also gives us a place of our own and we hope that this will be important in building a history identity," Associate Professor and Department Chair Richard Waller said.

Carnegie will be renovated to include a seminar room and a student lounge, as well as a library with a reading room. The history department will also increase its technical abilities with computer and VCR accommodations. Additionally, the renovations will include a secretary's office separate from the expanded faculty offices.

Waller is enthusiastic about the move. "We hope that the impact will be considerable—both for us and for our students, we see

Students gather for third diversity discussion

Committee for Campus Diversity held its final summit to address campus concerns

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

The Committee on Campus Diversity (CCD) held a third and final diversity summit on Tuesday to discuss educational and developmental ways in which the University can improve diversity issues on campus. Student leaders suggested ideas in two major areas: education and organization campus.

Some students proposed that interaction between organizations would educate members of different organizations, as well as create more diversity.

Jack Philips '04, co-president of Catholic Campus Ministry (CCM), believes one problem is that there is not a lot of interaction between groups on campus. He proposed that organizations participate in activities together, similar to how CCM and Kappa Sigma recently did community service together.

Michelle McCotter '03, a member of the Gospel Praise Choir, suggested that students and faculty need a common purpose and place to come together, such as a planned activity.

In terms of education, one student said that a division is created between liberal arts students and engineers. In order to bring those students together, she suggested that engineers should be integrated into the liberal arts program by taking more liberal arts classes, such as a foundation seminar.

Another student suggested that cultural anthropology should be a required class for all freshmen to take because it teaches a little bit about each culture.

Tricia Bushnell '04 believes that development within students will eventually lead to education.

"Many students discussed classes and programming that should be offered in order to get education out. However, we can throw as much information at people as we'd like; that doesn't mean they will learn or comprehend it. Instead, I think we should focus on development. If we do, education will follow. We need to focus on developing students as people, not as students," Bushnell said.

At the end of the summit, students proposed student-centered action steps that can be taken to increase diversity on campus. Some of the steps included the development of the Presidents Council (a group composed of leaders of multicultural organizations), improvement of curricular programs, recruitment of members to organizations and improvement of personal relationships between students.

According to Vice President of Student Affairs Charles Pollock '70, the summit gave the CCD fresh insight into how students perceive the campus and how students, faculty and staff can address problematic

Black Arts Festival returns to University

A tradition that was started in early '60s is revived after a 20-year absence

By Krista Reisdorf
Senior Writer

The University will host a Black Arts Festival this Saturday, April 20 and Sunday, April 21.

According to Khadija Shariff '03, who was actively involved in the planning of the festival, the last Black Arts Festival was in the early '80s.

"The Festival was started back in the late '60s by the Association of Blacks for Progress," Shariff said. "It went on for a while and then died out. We've seen pictures in the archives of guests such as Spike Lee or Angela Davis. But it's definitely been a while since the last one."

> "It will unify the African American community and inform the campus. It's a good time for the event to come about."
> —Khadija Shariff '03

After re-introducing the festival into the University community, the students involved hope to keep it going and make it an annual event.

"It was initiated by the Black Alumni Association and they've taken on the responsibility to put it together," Shariff said. "We're going to basically try to continue it."

The festival will offer activities involving everything from dance to film to poetry and in the wake of racial issues on campus, those involved are looking forward to a good time.

"This festival is not a response to the racial issues, but all the harassment and such has put a black cloud over what happens on campus," said Eloiza Domingo, director of multicultural affairs and co-sponsor of the event. "I think the festival will be great and is coming at an opportune time."

Shariff agrees, stressing the im-

2002 Spotlight Profiles

Jim Hostetler

Associate Director of Construction & Design of Physical Plant

By Michelle Dombeck
Arts & Entertainment Editor

Some people in the University community have a greater impact than we realize. Jim Hostetler, associate director of construction and design, is one of those people. This humorous man, once called "the meanest man in Lewisburg" because of his gruff appearance, is more than just a University employee. Hostetler plays a major role in the many construction projects happening around campus, but also devotes much of his time to the University's outdoor program, impacting the lives of students on a personal level.

Many construction projects are being planned, including renovations to the Forrest D. Brown Conference Center (Cowan) and Vedder Hall. A new engineering building is being considered as well. But what is most noticeable on campus now is the construction, including the new Recreation and Athletic Center (RAC), the Bostwick renovations, Theta Chi structure renovations and the O'Leary project.

"There are millions of dollars of construction underway right now," Hostetler said. "It's amazing."

Part of Hostetler's job is supervising a large number of people.

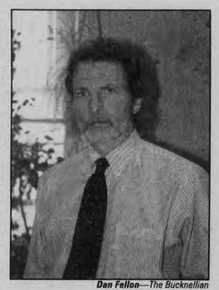
"Directly working with me, I've got four project managers and three drafts people, two Computer-Aided Design operators and an office assistant. Beyond that, we're responsible for all the construction personnel," Hostetler said. "So at second-level management, we've got hundreds of people working on-site for us from different companies. But I want to stress that I'm not the only guy that's building things on campus. We've got a couple of other Phys-Plant people working on other projects, tens of small projects."

Bob Rapp, a project leader at the Physical Plant, feels that many Physical Plant workers enjoy their jobs because of Hostetler's professional style.

"We all like what we do and we enjoy our jobs. So does he. He doesn't tell us how to run our projects," Rapp said. "We all have our own style, and he gives us that freedom to run a project as we see fit, as long we're keeping our projects on time and under budget and provide a good job for the University."

Rapp also feels that Hostetler is demanding, but in a positive manner.

"He's a perfectionist. He pretty much expects excellence out of us and I'd like to think we give it to him," Rapp said. "When I was interviewing for this job, one thing that Jim told me sticks out in my mind. He said he wanted us to be so good that other colleges came to see how we do things—to see the best college project management group there is."



Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

Hostetler balances a busy schedule of campus construction oversight while serving as an advisor to the BOC.

Project Manager Lance Lippencott agrees that Hostetler is an excellent professional.

"Jim's construction management skills have benefited the University over the past 15-plus years by providing excellent facilities in which we conduct our daily business," Lippencott said. "Realizing that he's still going to be here when the last contractor leaves at the end of a job, Jim's attention to detail ensures that our facilities will be well maintained and operate with a minimum amount of fuss."

Besides Hostetler's meticulous attention to detail, he also knows to keep his work upbeat.

"Jim has a fabulous vocabulary which he combines with his humor to help turn difficult situations into something a bit lighter, helping people to work through the problems," said Dennis Hawley, associate vice president for facilities. "When the Weis Center was built, there were disagreements as to the design of the circular staircase. When the form-work was stripped from the concrete, there was a photo taken of Jim standing on one foot under the stairs holding them up with one hand, with construction workers standing on the stairs. This picture captures Jim's approach and spirit for his work."

In addition to excelling in his professional life,

John Hardt

Athletic Director

By Andrew Burr
New Editor

They say it won't be long now—not long at all—although many consider the specter of completion still worlds away. For some students, the mounds of earth, the cranes and scaffolds, the busy shuffle of construction workers have been here as long as they have. Indeed, the entire campus anticipates the first evening the sun disappears behind the new recreation and athletics center, tree-lined and sharply dressed in brick and glass.

For Athletic Director John Hardt, sitting behind his desk in Trailer #5, that day cannot possibly come soon enough.

"It's really not that bad," he says jokingly. "Unlike my previous office, at least the heat and air-conditioning work."

Surprisingly, Hardt seems genuinely excited about the rustic accommodations, excited just to be there, this close to opening day.

"I call it a Rising Tide opportunity," he said, alluding to the expectation that the new facilities will provide better service and more opportunities for the entire community. "We had fallen so far behind the curve in terms of athletic facilities—now I think we've come from behind the pack in the Patriot League all the way to the front."

The front, of course, is where Hardt is accustomed to being. Coached by his father as a boy, Hardt developed into a fine wrestler as well as an All-American in high school football. Although he was recruited to play ball by such reputable institutions as Yale and Stanford, Hardt decided to stay closer to home, enrolling at the University of Iowa. Some 20 years later, Hardt considers his choice of schools one of the best and most important decisions of his life. Not only was he part of the Hawkeye's 1982 Rose Bowl team—an experience only a handful of collegiate athletes will ever experience—but through strong friendships with faculty members, he also refined what he calls the foundation of his personal philosophy: a commitment to both academic and athletic excellence.

Coming from a family that stressed academic and athletic success, Athletic Director John Hardt has found his home at the University.

"John understands the Bucknell approach to athletics and that we have a desire to win—but not at any cost," University President Steffen Rogers said.

Senior Associate Director of Athletics and colleague Tim Pavlechko can also appreciate the standards Hardt sets for his student-athletes.

"He is very student-centered—the scholar-athlete is his primary focus. John wants to give students the opportunity to be the most successful that they can be while still managing college athletics the right way."

With the merging themes of education and athletics so important to him both as a boy and a young man, Hardt wasted little time forging a career path that included such principles. Fresh out of law school, Hardt would spend the next four years of his life working for the NCAA as a compliance representative, dealing with issues like drug-testing and Title IX while simultaneously helping to pioneer the field from the ground up.

After four years with the NCAA, Hardt found himself back in college—except on the other side of the fence this time. He embarked on successful ventures, first at Syracuse University as director of athletic compliance and then at Michigan State University as associate athletic director for administration and compliance, although he regards both positions as yield signs on his journey more than permanent stops.

"I've always wanted to work on a college campus with students and faculty," Hardt said. "The step that probably most prepared me to become an athletic director was the time I spent at Michigan State. I didn't want to become pigeon-holed as a compliance specialist and they recognized that."

So in February 2000, with the knowledge and experience of three different collegiate athletics programs squared away, Hardt became the athletic director (AD) here at the University. It was a step he was ready to take, the step he had been waiting years to take.

Matthew Kasdan '03 and Nate Sorber '02

By Kristen Jancuk
Senior Writer

When reflecting on influential figures of the past year, it is impossible to ignore the efforts of Nathan Sorber '02 and Matthew Kasdan '03. These students put tremendous effort into improving relations between the Lewisburg community and the University with an impressive new tactic: running for office.

Sorber, former president of the Bucknell Student Government (BSG), ran for mayor as a write-in candidate, hoping to promote increased communication between Lewisburg and the University. He feels that in the past there has been a negative portrayal of the University in the community and wanted to show Lewisburg residents "the greatness of the University."

"Nate Sorber made so many lasting impacts on the BSG," said Amir Sadaghiani '03, current president of BSG. "He has spent the last four years working to make the University a better place for students to live and learn and I feel so fortunate to have worked with him."

Although he lost to incumbent Lewis L. Hendricks, Sorber feels his actions promoted more student awareness about and involvement in local politics. "This is our home—we are a part of Lewisburg," he said. He feels it is important for students to become involved in local issues that affect them and to have a voice in the community.

Nick Scott—The Bucknellian

Sorber and Kasdan took major strides in aiding town-gown relations with ambitious Borough Council and mayorial campaigns.

Sorber hopes that his run for office has inspired other students who want to become leaders, either at the University or beyond. He stresses the importance of being open-minded and encourages everyone to take into consideration the different opinions and perspectives on every issue.

"Nate is one of the most unique people that I have met here at Bucknell," said Ryan Karchner '02, Sorber's campaign finance treasurer. "Rarely is there a dull moment when he is around." The two met as first-year students in the Social Justice College and have been friends and roommates ever since.

Karchner said both Sorber's resilience and his willingness "to go far beyond the call of duty" have influenced his many accomplishments. He was surprised by Sorber's decision to run for mayor, but knew that he would carry through with the idea.

A senior, Sorber will be leaving the University in May. Because of his positions on BSG, Sorber said he has gotten to know many students during his four years here and it has the best part of his college experience. He believes the students here are hard-working and passionate and form a great student body.

Also interested in improving relations between the University and the Lewisburg community, Kasdan ran for the two-year Ward III Borough Council seat, a race that resulted in a tie. Kasdan's opponent however, Peter Bergonia Jr., utilities supervisor at Physical Plant, was selected for the position in the tiebreaker. Despite the loss, Kasdan hopes to gain more student support concerning town-gown relations in the coming year.

"The increased support at these types of meetings would not only show residents living in Lewisburg that students want to become more active in the community but that there can be a working relationship between these now separate bodies as well," he said.

Kasdan feels that during the last year he has played an important role in drawing student attention to the negative relationship between the students and community members. "[The students] have made more of an effort to get involved, voice their opinion and take a stance on this topic," he said.

Roger Perry-Stovall '02

By Alyson Walker
Senior Writer

It would be difficult to find a list of the top 10 students who have had an impact on the University campus without it including Roger Perry-Stovall '02, the former president of Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc (KAP).

Perry-Stovall joined Kappa Alpha Psi his sophomore year, and his first semester after being initiated into the fraternity, became president, an office he has held until last semester. Under his command, KAP has increased by many students. Membership has increased from three to eight students.

Philanthropy activities have been increased as well. He predicts that in the spring, KAP will find itself in the top five of groups for philanthropy and service. Perry-Stovall has tried to increase and vary the community service of KAP while improving the traditional programs through greater publicity.

The Kappa Kan Drive collected around 2,000 food items, and the Dinner and Dates Auction proceeds increased to approximately $3,000 and had a more active audience participation this past year. KAP actively supports multiple charities and organizations, such as Bucknell Brigade, Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition, and Susan G. Coleman Breast Cancer Foundation. This past weekend, senior members participated in the "Painting Bucknell Pink" 5k walk/run for the National Breast Cancer Foundation.

Rachel Laskow—The Bucknellian

While at the University, Perry-Stovall has played an integral role in improving Kappa Alpha Psi Fraternity, Inc.

"Programs like Step Afrika and Black Greek 101 would not have been possible without Kappa Alpha Psi and Roger," Maria Lopez '02 said.

One of Perry-Stovall's contributions to KAP has been to regain the connections and relationships with other organizations which had previously deteriorated. He's also made KAP a greater force in the InterFraternity Council.

"Because we're a smaller organization, we try to do the work equal to all the other organizations, and I think we've been able to keep up. The fact that we're so small in numbers, but people know who we are, and that we do the work of fraternities much larger than us, and that's how we like it—that's the thing I'm most proud of here," Perry-Stovall said.

Some accomplishments that Perry-Stovall noted that he has not reached include getting a house for KAP. He put together a proposal, which is currently being worked on. He hopes that the next president will be able to finish that project.

"My goal is to do the best I can while I'm here, but even more so to prepare the people behind me to do better, so I'm hoping our next president does as well as the others that I've tried to mentor," Perry-Stovall said.

Not surprisingly, Perry-Stovall is both a math and a writing tutor.

"I always try my best to teach because in my time here, I've learned a lot. I was bitter my first few years, but it's been a tremendous experience. I've learned a lot through experience, more so that anything else, and I felt it would be a waste if I didn't share those experiences or knowledge that I have gained with other people," Perry-Stovall said.

Eloiza Domingo, director of the Office of Multicultural Affairs, has known Perry-Stovall since June 2001 when she came to the University. She sees the teacher in Perry-Stovall.

"I came into this University thinking that I knew it all, that no one—especially not a student—could teach me anything more. In one particular meeting for the KAP Homecoming 2002, we were discussing a lot of issues and plans for the event. It was during that meeting with Roger that I realized how much he had taught me in such a short amount of time," Domingo said.

Perry-Stovall, a math major, plans on entering into business. "The fraternity made me realize that business is what I want to do. I want to get my MBA at some point." He's also currently looking at joining the Peace Corps after graduation.

"Roger has been very successful and will continue to portance of cultural education.

"The main reason the Festival began in the '70s was for African-Americans to be educated and aware of their own culture and bring them together," she said. "Now in the light of the racial issues, it's important for African-Americans to learn about their culture and educate other students."

Shariff believes this cultural education will work on various levels and benefit many.

"It will unify the African-American community and inform the campus," she said. "It's a good time for the event to come about."

Domingo said there may be a struggle for participants, since it is the first time in a while the event is occurring and also due to other activities on campus this weekend. However, considering activities such as Busta Rhymes this weekend, the festival may be an adequate introduction.

"I think with everything going on this weekend, this event will be a great catalyst," Domingo said.

Shariff believes that the interest is increasing on campus, but the attendance of cultural events is still not what it should be.

"I think the campus offers a lot, but it's kind of problematic," she said. "There is enough opportunity, but at times there's not enough effort to make it interesting. Often people are forced to do it and there is often a low turnout of white students at these events."

Shariff said all involved have tried to make the festival interesting with the various activities and hopes this will boost participation.

"What we're doing is no different from what the campus does," she said. "The main purpose is just to get people to come."

Domingo believes the Festival will be beneficial in general.

"This is a great way to close out the year," Domingo said. "It's very positive.

only positive aspects."

Assistant Professor of English John Hunter, who is involved with the comparative humanities program, is looking forward to the move as well.

"It will be a place of our own in a newly fixed up building and that can only be good." Hunter's office is presently located in Vaughan Literature building, with the language and English departments.

Hunter chose his new office in close proximity with the history department because he believes the historians would be logical new neighbors and he anticipates enjoying sharing the space them. He also hopes that moving from Vaughan Literature will help to further distinguish the comparative humanities program from other departments.

"It will allow us the space to begin to forge an identity for ourselves. Even though the program has been on the books for two years or so, it is still not widely known within the University. I see one of my most important tasks as publicizing the program both inside and outside the University. Moving to Carnegie will be a part of establishing a presence on campus," Hunter said.

The area vacated by the history department will be used to consolidate programs that are scattered across campus. Faculty in the French department will all share space in Marts Hall. Some of the professional administrative staff, currently at several locations across campus, will be moved to Marts Hall to be closer to their colleagues as well. Any space in Carnegie that is not needed by either the history department or the comparative humanities program will be used for offices for faculty and staff for whom space cannot be found elsewhere.

"It would be an easier tool for people to use when they are off campus. It would also facilitate checking your email from all about the campus," said Eugene Spencer '75, associate vice president of ISR.

The only disadvantages of a Web-based service is it allows less personal control and it could be a little slower.

"Some people prefer a tool that resides on their desktop and that they can customize for their own purposes. Web based tools tend to be a bit slower and don't allow as much local control, like how your mailboxes are displayed," Spencer said.

Currently, a team of six people in ISR volunteered to help select a webmail product.

"We started by finding out what products were available, primarily by investigating what other universities use, as well as searching the Web for available products," Dreese said.

ISR then downsized a list of nine products to a list of four by evaluating them based on the different criteria that they needed to meet.

"After we narrowed the list to four we installed the products and did some preliminary testing of them to narrow the list down to two products," Dreese said.

Recently, ISR asked for volunteers from subsets of the faculty, staff and student communities to evaluate the two remaining systems on usability.

"The two systems we are testing right now are the IMP and EMU webmail systems. I think that IMP system has a much better look to it than EMU. Either system is a step in the right direction for the school to take. Most other schools across the country are using a webmail system," student tester Christian Decker '04 said.

"After we receive feedback from these groups, we will choose a product based on several factors including cost, usability, vendor support and ease of administration, among others," Dreese said.

The new system will hopefully be implemented by the fall semester.

aspects of the campus climate.

"Most broadly, the Committee heard a pretty good case for reconsidering its own membership. The CCD was created three years ago, comprising entirely of administrators who sit in key positions to implement a new Diversity Plan. There would be outreach to students and faculty, but only administrative membership," Pollock said. "Bucknell may be at a point today where members of all the large stakeholder groups should sit on the committee, emphasizing broader responsibility for diversity and climate at Bucknell."

Bushnell thinks it is important that more than the people who attended the summits need to educate themselves.

"Unfortunately, we are programming and creating ideas for a silent audience. The people at the Summit Meetings are those that realize education is needed and have already taken steps to educate themselves. Without input from the audience we hope to reach, how will we ever know if they will come?" Bushnell said.

According to Pollock, the CCD will now process the input from the summits and the forums held during Diversity Week to refine its plan of work and the University's plan of work in the diversity and climate area.

"I've always been drawn to this type of institution—the brand of athletics at Bucknell is special," Hardt said. With the University's definition and standards for scholar-athletes so similar to his own, Hardt knew almost immediately that the match was a good one.

Since the athletic director's arrival two years ago, the athletics program has continued to thrive. According to the University, "In the most recent study released by the National Collegiate Athletic Association, Bucknell's graduation rate of student-athletes for a four-year period (91 percent) was the highest in the nation, and Bucknell's annual rates have ranked in the top ten nationally every year except one. Since 1970, a total of 98 Bucknell men and women have been named to national Academic All-America teams. This is the third highest total among all NCAA Division I schools."

Additionally, the University has captured the Presidents' Cup, awarded annually to the Patriot League school whose varsity athletic teams demonstrate the highest level of success within the league, for eight of the past 11 years. The University currently holds the lead for the Cup again this year and anticipates its ninth Cup following the spring varsity season.

Inevitably though, with the triumphs have come challenges. The fears of many in the University community were confirmed last May when the administration decided to eliminate two male programs, crew and wrestling, from its varsity lineup following this year. Backlash from students and alum was immediate and persists even now, as Title IX and the University's true motives for eliminating the programs continue to be questioned by skeptics.

Hailing from a family that is "very active in the sport of wrestling," Hardt was a wrestler himself in high school. He inherited a pre-existing gender equity plan when he became AD at the University, drawn up by former president Bro Adams in the mid 1990s. By the time Hardt took office, many requirements of that plan were already nearing the phase of implementation.

"Gender equity is very important to me and as a practical matter, we still have some work to do," Hardt said. "This are the most difficult set of issues I've had to address in my professional life—the last thing I wanted to do when I took this job was to take away opportunities."

Another "issue of opportunities" Hardt and the University are considering centers around merit aid. The University does not currently offer merit-based aid to students who do not demonstrate financial need—a trend which is becoming obsolete, even among more prestigious institutions. Encompassed in the merit aid debate is the question of athletic scholarships, a direction in which the Patriot League seems to be headed.

To keep playing fields within the League even and fair, Hardt would like to see the University give serious consideration to the question of athletic scholarships. Specifically, he feels the men's and women's basketball programs are in jeopardy, without the use of merit aid, of falling out of competition in the League.

"I'm pleased the issue has garnered the attention and debate an issue of this magnitude deserves," Hardt said. "I advocate a level playing field in the Patriot League, and we do not have that in men's and women's basketball. Ultimately, I think the University should review the issue for all varsity sports here."

Despite the tough days, the conflicts and struggles about wrestling and merit aid, Hardt says its all been worthwhile.

"This opportunity turned out to be everything and a little more—I couldn't be more pleased," he said.

succeed due to his strong will and unquenchable desire to achieve," Jesse De Los Santos '02 said .

Domingo describes Perry-Stovall as "incredible." She refers to him as a professional and a talented leader; he "exemplifies the composed and knowledgeable student leader."

"I saw in Roger a lot of knowledge and wisdom that challenged the ability of most student affair professionals. Likewise, during the planning of Homecoming, I was able to witness him in other meetings with various administrators. During these meetings, Roger remained calm and collected and was able to very fluently and effortlessly navigate his way through issues and problems," Domingo said.

Perry-Stovall admits that he's challenged administrators in many different ways. "I just feel that some people look at administrators as other than human, and they are human. So not to disrespect anybody, I call administrators by their first names. The fact is that we're adults, and sometimes at this school people get treated like children, and we're not. It's just little things like calling administrators by their first names to make sure that they recognize me as an adult, and I'll do the same if you treat me with respect," Perry-Stovall said.

"Roger has challenged the University in many ways, and a lot of people don't understand how important he's been to Bucknell," Lopez said.

By far, KAP has been the most important activity for Perry-Stovall. "The fraternity has been my life here only because my friends are those in the fraternity, and it was the easiest thing for me to invest in because I was able to see that everything I invested in it was exactly what came out—so that the more I put into it, the more I got out of it," he said.

Besides KAP, Perry-Stovall loves the University for the community. "Without a doubt, I've made my best friends here. A lot of people think that Bucknell is a homogenous place and that you find a lot of people of the same breed, and I realized a long time ago that admissions does a really good job in finding special people," Perry-Stovall said.

"It just takes a little effort to see how diverse this place really is. You may not see the color, but I think the diversity is not nearly as bad as people think. I do feel the diversity is here. You just have to go a little bit below the surface to get at it."

Perry-Stovall feels that his greatest accomplishment is allowing himself to learn and go through a wide array of emotions, rather than denying his feelings.

"Roger has excelled more than most students because he has allowed himself to hurt, to succeed, and to grow fully during his short time here at the University," Domingo said.

Most importantly, Perry-Stovall hopes that he's left an impression upon the University. "No matter where I go, I need the place to leave a mark on me, and hopefully, I'll leave a mark on the place so that both of us change equally or to some degree. I just hope that I did that here - I feel that I did," he said.

Perry-Stovall will miss the University, especially being close to the people he cares about. "I feel like I got here yesterday, I really do. The years really flew by," he said.

The University will likewise miss Perry-Stovall. "I will definitely miss him simply being here on campus and being a very strong, valued, and integral part of this community. In his work, he challenged Bucknell to be better and challenged others to become more than what they were. That quality and drive will be missed immensely. When Roger leaves, Bucknell will feel it."

Hostetler is an avid outdoorsman.

"I've gone kayaking, hang-gliding and ice-climbing. I also mountain bike, hike and climb. I've climbed on some of the highest mountains in this hemisphere. I've been to Alaska, on Denali, during one of the worst hiking seasons ever in '92, when 11 people died," Hostetler said. "Recently, I've been to Ecuador and Peru, climbing high peaks there."

Hostetler's outdoor interests have led him to become the advisor to the Bucknell Outing Club (BOC), as well as co-founding the BuckWild program for first-year students.

"I'd like to see my legacy connected with the students and the outdoors program, whether it be the outing club or BuckWild," Hostetler said. "That'd be the highest flattery I could get."

Even though Hostetler is very busy with his professional role at the University, he still has time to help the BOC thrive.

"Advisor Jim knows no limits when it comes to aiding the Outing Club. He got the Outing Club its office, will lend out his own personal canoe and invite officers to his house for barbeques," BOC Hiking Chair Nicole Blank '04 said. "Jim's a wealth of information, able to speak on most outdoor sports or refer individuals to more knowledgeable others. As an advisor, he tries to make himself available to officers, even with the busy construction schedules."

Hostetler has some ambitious goals for the University's outdoor program as well, including putting in a ropes course at Cowan, installing a new climbing wall at the RAC center and developing a program that would allow students to translate their outdoor skills into practical skills.

"I would love to see the outdoor component of the University expand as much as possible. Students today are looking for alternate ways to have fun," Hostetler said. "In our outdoor programs, we do a lot with supervision and training. I'd like to see us develop a curriculum where our students can get a leadership certificate. They would learn things like group dynamics, risk assessment, safety and team building. Those sorts of skills would serve them outside of the University and outside of an outdoor surrounding."

In between building things, climbing and developing the University's outdoor program, Hostetler also finds time for other activities. A voracious reader, Hostetler is on the board of the Lewisburg public library, the Lewisburg Cemetery association and the Board of Appeals for Union County.

"Jim is a renaissance man." Lippencott said. "He excels in anything he attempts."

Diversity summits lack effective solutions

After the blackface incident in November, the Committee on Campus Diversity began to hold summits to discuss options to increase diversity and diversity awareness on campus. These summits developed due to the "alarming results" of the Campus Climate Report. It is important for students to realize that part of the college education is to absorb different experiences, which is why diversity is an important part of the University. However, it seems that the summits are addressing the wrong ideas and approaching the diversity issue with too many assumptions.

At the most recent summit, educational development and club interaction were two prominent topics. Some of the educational suggestions included additional curriculum requirements, crossover between arts and science and engineering classes and the role of Residential Colleges. For example, one of the debated topics was that engineering students should be required to take more arts and science core curriculum courses, such as foundation seminars.

Certainly this would force engineering students to take a broad introduction to liberal arts, but engineers apply to be engineering majors because they want to learn engineering. This is not to say that engineers should not take liberal arts courses, but not at the expense of the professional degree education which they seek.

Another suggestion was to deliberately place an Asian-, African- or Latin-American student on each residential hall. Therefore, if someone had a question about these cultures, they could just walk down the hall and ask them. Yet by singling people out based on their ethnicity, they erase the conception of the "Bucknell Family." This type of strategy is merely labeling theory, which any sociologist will tell you is a dangerous weapon that serves only to increase stereotyping.

These ideas suggest a method of forcing diversity and diversity awareness upon the student population. However, forcing diversity is not an effective solution, as backlash will inevitably curb any advances made.

Club interaction was another hotly debated topic at the summit. One suggestion was to provide an economic reward for student groups to interact. A common idea was to have a "mass meeting" of all clubs to discuss their individual interests and problems. Also, the Bucknell Student Government club recognition categories could be used as a means of contact amongst organizations.

There are a number of problems with these suggestions. First, many of the potential benefits of such club interaction would only affect those involved in organizations (a minority of students on campus), exposing only a limited number of people to this diversity.

Secondly, just because two groups are given incentives to interact does not necessarily mean that the individual members of those clubs will interact. Rather, the position holders and executives of these groups will be the ones who participate, which is again, not an effective tool to diversify the University.

One of the underlying problems with the diversity summits is the fact that they assume that this campus is not diverse. However, the Campus Climate Report directly contrasts the reality of some organizations and events present on campus.

To provide a recent example, the attendance at the third annual Bucknell Poetry Slam two weeks ago was as diverse as similar weekly events in downtown New York City. One could argue that this is the exception rather than the rule, however, that would disavow the existence of other great on-campus diversity programs and events such as the equally well-attended "Vagina Monologues," the main-stage play "Shakuntula" or the Counterweight and its political debate series.

If one considers the physical size of organizations on campus, one sees that there are approximately 1,000 students involved in 130 organizations, or an average of eight students per organization. Most on-campus clubs are created to provide a voice for various interest groups. The diversity of the campus is depicted in the diversity of the voices that are present. Clubs have low enrollment, not because students lack a caring for diversity, but because they feel that the voices around campus are strong enough. Conversely, the more students that become involved in these groups, the worse that bodes for campus diversity, because that means that people feel their voice is unheard.

Yet supposing that an even greater voice must be present on campus, a practical first step to increase diversity awareness would begin with the Presidents Council, a previously-established group of leaders from different multicultural organizations. The fact that the Presidents Council is virtually unknown on campus is an issue that can easily be remedied by publicizing the Council and expanding it to include leaders from all student organizations, or even those not yet involved in organizations. From there, the Council could evaluate the true campus climate and hopefully recommend better suggestions for diversity awareness.

Drilling in Alaska vital toward Mid-East process

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

Professor of Geography Richard Peterec is right about something. Right now, oil is playing too large a role in our Middle East interests. In order to properly play the role of both mediator and mentor, we must become a little less dependent on frail alliances with corrupt governments, and more dependent upon our own resources. To not do so only hampers efforts to achieve peace in the region.

The Artic National Wildlife Refuge (ANWR) is home to many answers and solutions, all with no discernible consequences. Drilling here should begin as soon as possible. The only roadblocks are Northeastern suburban yuppie senators who have never been to ANWR (led by Massachusetts's John Kerry), but have been assured that drilling there is something to avoid.

Just ask the Inupiat Eskimos who live in the only village within ANWR—they welcome such exploration; or the local caribou population, who have shown to live more favorably by an already existent pipeline in Alaska. Alaska Senator Frank Murkowski introduced this energy bill that would permit such usage.

ANWR is 19.5 million acres, which is equivalent to the size of North Carolina. 92 percent of this cannot be touched because it is considered a National Park. The other eight percent was set aside by the 1980 Democratic Senate for future oil production. Drilling here would require 2,000 acres, which is about one-hundredth of a percent of the refuge—the same size as Dulles Airport. However, this small little patch of land is expected to be able to churn out one million barrels of oil a day for 30 years.

The environmental costs of the project are non-existent. If one were to look at Alaska's Prudhoe Bay for reference, they would observe a caribou population that has tripled since development began—they enjoy mating by the warm pipelines. A U.S. Geological Survey has said that such drilling would result in little or no harm. However, the land that is considered so sacred by the likes of Joe Lieberman, are hardly enticing. The area is barren, 40 degrees-below-zero during the winter, completely without sunshine for two of those months; and in the summer it's a wretched-smelling swampland. No wonder they only pull in 200 tourists a year.

While the majority of the Senate supports it, as does the American Federation of Labor and Congress of Industrial Organizations, its clear that both sides of the Senate are open to good ideas, except for the few impassioned limousine liberals who promise to filibuster.

Consider the domestic benefits. Wharton Econometrics has predicted that opening ANWR will create 736,000 new jobs and is expected to add $325 billion to the economy. While complete energy independence seems impossible, having an increased domestic production would provide wiggling room come oil crises.

13.9 percent of U.S. oil consumption comes from the Persian Gulf. Saudi Arabia provides 8.5 percent while Iraq provides four percent. ANWR could supply over 60 percent of this Persian Gulf demand for 30 years.

What Saudi Arabia and Iraq see from this oil exportation ends up financing the suicide killers (to borrow Andrew Sullivan's phrase) that consistently ravage the Israelis. It has become well known that Hussein pays out $25,000 to any family who has a son or father willing to kill himself for the purposes of murdering many more. As my father has pointed out, by relying on this oil we are helping finance Hussein's Murder Inc.

Israel has now entrenched itself in the fight against militant fundamentalist Islam—an enemy that has made it very clear that they consider there to be no difference between Zionists (Israelis) and The Great Satan, America.

G.K. Chesterton has said, "Right is right, even if nobody does it. Wrong is wrong, even if everybody is wrong about it." Right now, Israel stands along in the world. They are a lighthouse shining the virtues of democracy and freedom within a sea of tyranny and corruption. And we are their only ally in the world.

While the correlation between some moonscape terrain in northern Alaska and the turmoil in the Mid-East may not be obvious, it remains important. By continuing to subsidize the murder-focused Hussein regime, we are assisting in the killings of innocent Israelis everyday. To not change this is cowardly. Bush should acknowledge this and begin demanding opening up ANWR every single day. After all, what exactly is the difference between funding these suicide killers through oil imports and buying the German goods during the 1940s that financed Hitler's death trains to Buchenwald and Auschwitz?

Winston Churchill spoke of British Prime Minister Clement Atlee as "a sheep in sheep clothing." If these lofty liberals promising to filibuster this important energy bill continue to disregard Middle East implications for the sake of erroneous environmental special interests, they are also sheep in sheep clothing.

Article attacks Conservatives Club

To the Editor:

I am writing in response to the article "Political labels distort actual beliefs" (April 12) by Katie Parker. When I saw the article I was intrigued because I agree that far too often political beliefs are blinded by labels, but as I read on I encountered several disconcerting things.

I view Parker's article not as intelligent criticism (which I certainly welcome) but as a long series of ad hominem attacks on the Conservatives Club and its members.

As a member of the Club I felt the need to address some of Parker's false claims. There is nothing "brutal" or "unfounded" about the claims the Conservatives Club makes. In the Counterweight, student writers put forth thoughtful, researched articles representing a wide spectrum of conservative viewpoints (which are not always part of the "typical conservative platform").

What I find most distressing is that Parker put words in our mouth. We have NEVER claimed that the living wage "breeds bottom dwellers." Instead, some members of the Club have simply put forth the argument that such a living wage is economically unfeasible and that there are more efficient ways to achieve "social justice," like through earned income tax credit challenging the school's effort to limit underage drinking" as being "radical" and "conservative" in nature.

I fail to see how that has any connection to the Conservatives Club. I would politely refer you to the last issue of the Counterweight in which individuals in the club argued both for and against lowering the drinking age, so a club position on the matter was hardly established.

"Radical" is a strong word to throw around, especially when we simply disagree on some issues. Parker accused us of using the free press to "insult and degrade other members of this campus." I would ask that she adhere to her own advice.

Allison Kasic '05

its. I encourage you to look for the article on the living wage that will be in the next Counterweight.

In reference to the "Penis Monologues," our purpose was vastly misstated. We were simply trying to show, in a humorous way, some of the ideas in the play that we "find problematic." We were not trying to "reinforce" any facts about literary history.

She made dangerous accusations, labeling an entire group based off of a "few individuals." She made reference to "hanging a banner from your fraternity. They can be considered offensive. Regardless, "The Vagina Monologues" are real stories, of real women. They represent women coming to terms with difficult issues surrounding sexuality and identity, and they are shockingly realistic in that they don't pretend to understand or resolve these issues. The contradictions for these women have been set in place by society, by family, by lovers—they are not fabricated or manipulated to serve a self-aggrandizing feminist end. We are not supposed to be comfortable with their message, nor are we supposed to affirm it. We are merely to recognize its inherent contradictions as real and true representations of confused sexuality, torn identity, and internalized sociocultural expectations.

This play forces its audience to participate, in that we are forced to recognize the sharp contradiction in our cultural views about female sexuality and in some cases, allow audience members the opportunity to try and resolve that division.

Finally, look at the recent forums of debate that have been opened as a result of the University's decision to support the production of this play. Because it has been so hotly debated, every member of the college campus now knows about V-Day Bucknell, which should hopefully increase the turn-out (even if its by sheer morbid curiosity) next year. Its controversy has ultimately rendered it successful. Increased audience participation will ensure more money available for donation to women who need help, and therefore the ends will justify the means.

All in all, V-Day Bucknell is an organization that is striving to end violence against women. Despite the "Penis Monologues," despite the recent attacks that it has undergone, despite the smug shout-outs from the Counterweight, surely not one of its adversaries is daring to assert that it doesn't support a worthy cause. Surely not one would dare say they would like violence against women to continue. V-Day Bucknell welcomes both your participation and support in the crusade against violence, should you be willing to contribute, and surely, that is your right to choose.

Conservatism not easily defined

By Charles Mitchell
Staff Writer

Recently, many self-anointed campus pundits have attempted to define exactly what "conservatism" or "a conservative" is. Funny thing is, most of the people trying to accomplish that heroic task are those with a fundamental distaste for conservatism and conservatives. That's like me sitting here and trying to describe stewed tomatoes to you. I could say they are a goopy red gunkish substance that many people don't like—and that would not be inaccurate. But in characterizing stewed tomatoes as such, I'm not communicating an entire side of the story to you—that is, why some people like these things that others view as repugnant. That same thing is happening with the popular portrayal of conservatism on this campus. Those who can't very well see its appeal are describing it to you in their terms.

But believe it or not, conservatism is not some strange debilitating disease endemic to the American South. Actually, it's a belief system to which many people adhere—including the guy who got basically half the popular vote in 2000.

Conservatism, though, is not easy to describe. People can believe a lot of things and still consider themselves conservatives. For example, former Pennsylvania Governor Tom Ridge used to spout off quotes from the Declaration of Independence like he was Tom Jefferson's estranged half-stepbrother, but he's pro-choice, whereas most conservatives are pro-life. There is a similar divergence of opinion among conservatives on countless other issues: the drinking age, the death penalty, the appropriateness of Confederate flags, gay rights, pornography, alcohol policy, and many others. Many liberals prefer to gloss over these immense differences between conservatives, painting them as one monolithic block of ideological clones.

So what makes someone a conservative? A dirty pickup truck with a gun rack? Well, not so much. Actually, Former President Ronald Reagan summed it up well: "We who live in free-market societies believe that growth, prosperity and ultimately human fulfillment, are created from the bottom up, not the government down. Only when the human spirit is allowed to invent and create, only when individuals are given a personal stake in deciding economic policies and benefiting from their success—only then can societies remain economically alive, dynamic, progressive, and free. Trust the people. This is the one irrefutable lesson of the entire postwar period, contradicting the notion that rigid governmental controls are essential to economic development."

If you substitute "conservatives" for "we who believe in free-market societies" and consider the statement in terms of the whole society, not just the economy, you've basically got it. Conservatism is a truly empowering ideology—leftism can only claim, incorrectly, to be such an ideology.

It is conservatives who believe that people do things better and make better decisions than the government does. But liberals maintain that if they gave you a tax cut, you wouldn't know what to do with the money. You should just let them find a program to spend it on for you.

Conservatives are the ones who believe that people can achieve for themselves—liberals would rather give them government handouts.

Conservatives argue for equal status for women, while liberals lament our supposedly "patriarchal society" and prefer affirmative action and quotas. Conservatives see true empowerment as letting the most-qualified candidate for a job, whether male or female, prevail, instead of putting on a play about sex organs.

Conservatives choose real, non-utopian goals: cutting taxes to produce economic growth, not eliminating violence against women by 2005.

Conservatives stand for academic honesty. Liberals, on the other hand, propagate misinformation such as the "one in four" statistic.

Conservatives are in favor of free speech, arguing that when confronted with speech with which you disagree, however vehemently, you should simply meet it with more speech, rather than demanding that your opponent be censored. This, not mere lip service, is the true test of one's commitment to free speech.

Finally, conservatives do not label their opponents "closed minded" simply because they disagree with them. Instead, in an open-minded fashion, they evaluate their opponents' arguments, instead of resorting to name calling ("Nazi Party," "racists," "sexists," "woman haters," "radical conservatives," "homophobes"). If the allegedly "open-minded" campus left did the same, intellectual debate and discourse would be the better for it.

Simplistic foreign policy full of contradictions

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

The nature and course of the Bush administration's position in the politically charged Palestinian/Israeli debacle still being dictated by President George W. Bush's too narrow and over simplified doctrine. The you are with us or against us in the war on terrorism belief system is too clearly and narrowly drawn for the murky world of international diplomacy. Even Benjamin Netanyahu the man most likely to return to the leadership of Israel after current Prime Minister Sharon stated last Tuesday. "American foreign policy is being determined by Saddam Hussein." Sharon is only following the Bush doctrine when he is bulldozing through Palestinian neighborhoods looking for his definition of terrorists. We can only hope that the charges of Israeli atrocities in Palestinian territories are unfounded.

Unfortunately, Netanyahu is cynically correct in his statements and sadly correct in his beliefs. Iraqi oil and particular domestic politics restricts US maneuvering choices and inhibits our international prestige in the region. Also at stake is any momentum left over in our "declared crusade" against international terrorist organizations worldwide. Why should not Israel see our actions as a signal to do likewise within their sphere of influence? Can the actions of the United States be infallible in terms of what terrorisms' definition actually is?

Perhaps an answer can be found in current events that are steeped within oil politics in Latin America. President Hugo Chavez of Venezuela was overthrown on Friday by the right-wing Venezuelan military and the oil oligarchy of that OPEC member country. Chavez was no friend of U.S. foreign policy but was popularly elected. Chavez was held against his will by the military for a day and a half and then reinstated as President after a popular uprising of the poor majority that traditionally supported him early Sunday morning. Where was the official condemnation of the terrorists within the Venezuelan military that overthrew a fairly elected government? Where is the characteristically clear definition of terrorism of the Bush Doctrine?

Oil markets were rather jovial when markets closed on Friday when news of the coup broke over the financial press. Oil prices leveled off and Wall Street was looking forward to a more favorable business like approach from the new oil man in office in Venezuela. Chavez' reinstatement will only strengthen his posture toward US policy toward his regime since there was little outcry against the forces against him in the coup. Reality will be that oil supplies from OPEC and Venezuela will probably be tightened to support prices at current levels with an eye to increasing them.

Where was the official condemnation of the terrorists within the Venezuelan military that overthrew a fairly elected government? Where is the characteristically clear definition of terrorism of the Bush doctrine?

Are our government officials in this country using a selective definition process in regards to terrorism in this Latin American instance? These Venezuelan military men were acting in a terrorist manner when they acted against their own government. If our global campaign against terrorism is to be seen as legitimate our definitions must be fairly balanced. Not using a balanced approach will expose our soldiers and policies to ridicule, danger, and world wide suspicion of our motives. We cannot selectively consider outcomes as favorable to business in one area doing nothing and using strict definitions when it goes against economic interests in others. In these matters we must be seen as above reproach. Chavez stated that he will not be vindictive against those against him during the coup. Unfortunately, the many who died in the overthrow haven't the ability to be as forgiving. Where are the United States demands for the heads of those who terrorized the Venezuelan people? Selectivity, is definitely a part of our war on terrorism.

Saddam Hussein and OPEC had a good weekend considering that oil prices may go up. In addition, the cost of the embargo against Iraq is 10 billion per year perhaps we should add that to the price of gasoline as well. Like Netanyahu says, "Hussein is still dictating US foreign policy in the Middle East. Muddled policies with stellar efforts from Colin Powell are still muddled policy efforts wasting Secretary of State Powell's abilities. The Bush Doctrine simply is unworkable in its present form and should be abandoned. It's price tag is too high. Black and white, right and wrong, evil and good, definitions are too simple in the gray "foreign policy" environment.

Capital punishment debate fueled by recent report

By Gretchen Schrock
Senior Writer

The supposedly sturdy bastion that protects the American government from the bullets of oscillating public opinion is reinforcing itself against the imminent threat posed by a 14-member commission from Illinois and their 207-page report. How could the well-trained and supplied army of the federal government perceive these bipartisan commissioners as a possible menace to their array of public policies?

At a time when capital punishment is a relatively minor controversy on a national scale, the recommendations of this panel, which Governor George Ryan established to propose solutions to a failing system, question the entire notion of execution as the ultimate penalty for heinous crimes. More importantly, with 13 death row inmates exonerated over the past decade in the state, Illinois signals how the administration of justice in this country can be unfair and inaccurate. Rob Warden, director of the Center on Wrongful Convictions at Northwestern University, stated to the New York Times, "This report makes it abundantly clear that the system doesn't work and cannot work."

Its proposals entail a sweeping overhaul of the application of the death penalty in Illinois and the proposition by a narrow majority for its complete abolishment statewide. Specifically, it wants the prevention of unwarranted executions, the avoidance of coerced confessions, the reduction in the number of factors making a criminal act eligible for the death penalty, the submission of all such cases to a state board for review, and the establishment of a statewide DNA database and an independent forensics lab. In addition, according to the commission's opinion, murderers who are deemed mentally retarded and criminals whose convictions are the result of the testimony of a single individual should not be punished by way of the death penalty.

However, the most controversial measure outlined by the panel is the suggested removal of the death penalty as possible punishment in cases that involve hijackings, contract killings, drive-by shootings and the murders of children, the elderly, ambulance workers, or teachers. The potential impact this recommendation may have on the debate surrounding the continued implementation and use of capital punishment is enormous.

If execution, even by means deemed relatively humane, unlike the electric chair of years past, is considered an unjust sentence for crimes involving the premeditated murder of a generous and kind grandmother, why is it still perceived as acceptable for punishing those involved in the slayings of police officers, firefighters and witnesses in criminal proceedings? Either capital punishment is judged an inhumane and unjust penalty for all murderers or it is not.

This incertitude is evidence of a greater problem—is execution of a criminal, regardless of his act, moral? The answer is obvious when one realizes how unfairly the condemnation to death is administered. In Illinois alone, many of the approximately 160 people currently on death row deserve clemency. It is widely known that defendants that are poor, ill-educated, or of minority status are sentenced to capital punishment more often than those that are wealthy, well educated or white.

Thus, how can anyone support the continuance of an inherently biased system, whose deterrent to crime, once rendered, is irreversible? One cannot give someone his life back after one has taken it away, simply saying that there were trial court errors or the prosecutors and defense lawyers made mistakes and that the person once considered guilty is indeed innocent.

The U. S. government will undoubtedly have to fight the anti-death penalty proponents, who will be strengthened by the ammunition of the Illinois panel, and defend their position in favor of capital punishment. Yet, how can a government, which prides itself in equality for all men and women, condone the employment of an apparently prejudiced system? While no justice mechanisms will be consistently perfect, as a result of its subordination to human nature, it remains that the government must ensure to the best of its abilities the protection of every citizen from the tyranny of injustice.

V-Day discussion brings issues to forefront

By Katie Parker
Staff Writer

Although this will officially be my third article lamenting the level of disrespect that exists in our present campus discourse, I want to address several of the misunderstandings that have surfaced regarding V-Day Bucknell.

Unbeknownst to most students (and some faculty), V-Day Bucknell is part of a national organization whose main objective is to raise money, supporting programs to end violence against women. The national organization, V-Day, and its subsidiary, V-Day College Campaign, establish similar programs to the one at the University on college campuses nationwide. V-Day calls for these programs once a year, around Valentines Day, to raise awareness for their campaign by sponsoring a number of events, the centerpiece of which is "The Vagina Monologues." Most of the programs also remain active year-round, sponsoring other events to raise money for specific programs in their area, such as Susquehanna Valley Women in Transition, supported by V-Day Bucknell.

Contrary to popular belief, V-Day is not about the celebration of women, nor is it about the vindication of women. It is not made up of liberal, rabid feminazis who burn their bras in effigy while singing Janis Joplin over a cauldron of Slim-Fast. Rather, it is a group of energetic, intelligent individuals (not just women!) who, like any other campus group, promote awareness and support for their specific cause. However, V-Day Bucknell has recently fallen under public and private criticism for its methods, its message and most inaccurately, its exclusivity. So let me address these issues below:

An argument has been made that "The Vagina Monologues" are an offensive and ineffective vehicle for an organization that appears to promote and embody many feminist values and beliefs. Granted, "The Vagina Monologues" are problematic. They are contradicto-

Professors' activism helps entire campus

By Josh Fisher
Staff Writer

Nobody is going to argue that professors at the University are not clustered slightly left-of-center. Indeed, "conservative" professors in the humanities and social sciences are uncommon, and regardless of any political leaning these perspectives are equally valuable to the student in his or her own personal development. But it is certainly debatable whether these words, liberal and conservative, really encapsulate all possible political and philosophical ideologies, all possible schools of thought on any given topic and the actions students and of the faculty.

These dichotomizations and polarizations of political and philosophical thought are unnatural, counterproductive and most of all antithetical to the purpose of higher education.

A university should endeavor to make of you independent thinkers, committed to service and activism, with the courage to follow your own convictions and the willingness to accept responsibility for your actions; a university should educate you beyond the confines of your immediate experience so as to comprehend cultures, ideas, societies, traditions and values other than your own; a university should allow you to transcend your preestablished notions of the world in order to gain new perspectives on life; and a university should alert you to the extraordinary and vibrant diversity of ideas, where professors and students alike are free to offer their voice to the chorus, whether in harmony or in dissonance.

But actions speak louder than lecture notes.

Paul Susman of the geography, Charles Sackrey of economics and Saundra Morris of English regularly devote much of their time, effort and money to the cause of a living wage. Susman along with John Peeler of political science, Allison Draper of chemistry and Janice Butler and Coralynn Davis of women's studies invest an incredible amount of time and effort into coordinating the efforts of the Bucknell Brigade in Nicaragua. Doctor Don Stechschulte from Student Health Services goes above and beyond by not only traveling to Nicaragua and offering his services many times a year, but also by engaging students in intellectual political and philosophical debate.

Tom Travis, professor of international relations, leading by example, proposed last week that the full professors allocate a percentage of their rather large salary increase to the Living Wage Campaign in order to benefit those University staff members who make less than the amount needed to achieve a minimally decent standard of living.

In my opinion, and in the opinions of the supporters of this proposal, University President Steffen Rogers and the University Planning and Budget Committee (UPBC) pushed this salary-hike through because they thought it more imperative to maintain competitiveness in salary for the professors than to worry at this moment about the livelihood of the rest of the so-called "family." But as Travis said, "I feel uncomfortable receiving so much money when I know that many Bucknell employees do not even earn a living wage from the University." Regardless of any and all political labels or rhetoric, the spirit of this proposal is the fundamentally a personal sacrifice for the higher principle of social justice.

So, in defense of our "radically liberal" professors here, it's a good thing that they actually care, it's a good thing that they actually act on their personal beliefs, because the administration and the trustees are surely not ready to.

University students still kids

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

It seems that nowadays everyone tries to be so mature. You find it in the way they dress, the way they act, and just the way they go about their daily lives. Given that I am a freshman, I remember hearing the call to becoming an adult so quickly after arriving on campus. Eighteen years and I am suddenly supposed to leave my home to make a new one in Lewisburg where I don't know anybody. I have to leave behind the friends I have had for years and introduce myself to complete strangers in hopes of finding in them what I had with friends in the past. I have to force myself to do my homework on my own. I have to get myself to the Caf (or Terrace Room) for meals. I have to get up for those 8 a.m. classes. I have to do too much on my own.

The other day I wanted to rid myself of the burden of being mature. So I stopped being 18, put an away message up on AIM, stepped away from my computer, put on some "play clothes" and searched for some playmates so I could head to Kidsburg, better known as the playground in town.

Yet, everyone was trying to act so responsible. They said they had a test to study for, homework to finish, or a movie to watch. They were all too afraid to release the child within. So, stop for a minute and forget about how much work you have to do, who cares if you don't have a job after graduation, sign off AIM, stop playing Snood or Spider Solitaire and take a moment to stop growing up and realize just how much like a kid you truly are.

Case number one: It's 1 p.m. You've had classes since 8 this morning, eaten two meals and checked your empty mailbox (twice). You're practice doesn't start for another couple hours. What do you do? Most likely we can find you curled up in your bed taking a nap. Very much like the ones you took in kindergarten.

Case number two: You sit in the back seat of a car and on the floor you see a dollar and three quarters. For pure circumstantial reasons, let's say you can only choose the dollar or the three quarters. What do you take? Since you know how hard it is to make change of a dollar, you choose the three quarters because that is three fourths of a wash and one step closer to some clean clothes. A young child would also take the quarters as well because they do not know their value, but do know that three is more than one.

Case number three: How excited do you get at the mere mention of a trip to the Freez?

Face it you are a five-year old with a driver's license. So do me a favor, take off your shoe, check the size and stop trying to act your age and starting acting like the number you find inside.

THERE'S NOT ENOUGH ART IN OUR SCHOOLS.

NO WONDER PEOPLE THINK

LOUIS ARMSTRONG

WAS THE FIRST MAN TO

WALK ON THE MOON.

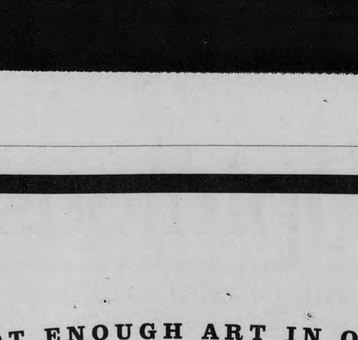
It's a long way from the Apollo Theatre to the Apollo program. And while his playing may have been "as lofty as a moon flight," as Time magazine once suggested, that would be as close as Louis Daniel Armstrong would ever get to taking "one small step for man."

But as the premier jazz musician of the 20th century, giant leaps were a matter of course for Satchmo. No person before or since has ever embodied — and revolutionized — jazz the way Louis Armstrong did.

Armstrong left his footprints all over the jazz world. And he usually did it in lace-up oxfords.

Take solos, for instance. It's impossible to imagine jazz without them. But they actually didn't become an established part of the jazz vocabulary until Armstrong helped popularize them. Seventy years later, his solos are still revered for their audacity and virtuosity.

In the 1950s, when his popularity became too big to be contained within our borders, he accepted an invitation from the State Department to act as an American goodwill ambassador around the world. And when he became the last jazz musician to hit #1 on the Billboard pop chart, he beat the Beatles to do it.



Instead of a giant leap, Louis Armstrong delivered one giant free-form crazy jazz groove for mankind.

Not bad for a kid whose first experience with a trumpet was as a guest in a New Orleans correction home for wayward boys. If only today's schools were as enlightened as that reformatory was.

LOUIS THE FIRST.

Ask almost any parent, and they'll say arts education is very important to their child's well-being. Virtually every study shows that moms and dads like the effects the arts have on their children. They like that dance and music and painting and drama teach kids to be more tolerant and open. They like that they allow boys and girls to express themselves creatively. And they appreciate that the arts help promote individuality, bolster self-confidence while also improving overall academic performance.

Which makes it so surprising that the arts have been allowed to virtually disappear from our schools. And our children's lives.

THIS IS WHAT HORNS ARE FOR.

A little art is not enough. If you think the hour or so of art your kids are getting each week isn't nearly their fair share, it's time to make some noise. To find out just how to get involved or for more information on the ways your child can benefit from arts education, please visit us on the web at AmericansForTheArts.org. There's plenty of brain to go around. Give more to art.

Why is it so hard for a 30-year-old to think about retirement? When you're young, retirement planning is pretty far down on your list of concerns. Say, somewhere between the melting polar ice caps and dishpan hands. And that's completely understandable. But by planning early and sticking to that plan, you can increase the money you'll have to enjoy retirement, and potentially decrease the years you'll spend working. Failed coup in Venezuela: U.S. implicated

By Tamanna Hye
Staff Writer

Earlier this year when Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez promoted his favorites to the board of the state-owned oil company, Petroleos de Venezuela (PDVSA), many dissidents in the company began to take action. The Confederation of Venezuelan Workers (CVW) linked hands with them against Chavez.

Then on April 9, a strike was called by the CVW and many opposition leaders ranged against the leftist administration. The pressure built with the strikers desiring the removal of Chavez. The government responded calmly, but there was plenty of anxiety behind the scenes. Not only opposition leaders and unions, but also military men, came out against the president.

On April 10, an army general appeared on television to denounce Chavez, as well as to call him a lying traitor. It had become increasingly clear that since the start of this year the army would have no problem staging a coup, or helping others foment one.

The revolt finally happened last week, with the military removing Chavez and placing him under arrest, with the intention of deporting him. Chavez was replaced by Pedro Carmona, head of Venezuela's chamber of commerce. Also expunged were all members of the Supreme Court and National Assembly, with elections for all offices planned for later in the year. Carmona promised reform of the economic and social policies of the country.

In response to these events, thousands mobilized in support of Chavez. Carmona resigned after only one day in power. Chavez returned in triumph to the capital of Caracas, to reclaim his role as president. Chavez claims he is chastened by the experience, and will work with business leaders and the military to better serve all the people of Venezuela.

Venezuela is the world's fourth largest oil exporter, and oil provides more than half of the government's revenues. When Chavez came to power he committed himself to dismantling what he called the rotten elites of society and he managed to get rid of many old union bosses who had ties with other parties.

However, he failed to replace them with leaders loyal to his own political party, the Movimienta Quinta Republica (Fifth Republic Movement). The union bosses are, consequently, no friends of Chavez's, and were striking against him. The strike became much bigger and more dangerous than Chavez could have anticipated.

Venezuelan President Hugo Chavez addresses his country after his restoration to power in the aftermath of a failed coup.

Of more interest is how this will affect Venezuelan relations with the rest of the world, as well as how it will affect Venezuela's oil industry. The United States depends heavily upon Venezuelan oil supplies, especially now with the Middle East in so much turmoil.

No doubt the strike, coup, and reinstallation of Chavez has brought disruption to the country. Venezuelan officials say that the oil production has fallen by 20 percent and the country's refineries have been operating at less than half their normal capacity. There are also rumors that the country is on the brink of suspending oil exports completely.

If this were to happen, then the United States would be in trouble, as the United States imports a large percentage of the more than two million barrels of oil Venezuela produces daily. Chavez says that this is all media hype and that no such thing is likely to ever happen.

The United States has been accused of aiding the failed coup. It has been revealed that the United States had high-level contact over the past few months with Venezuelan opposition parties, some of whom called for the removal of Chavez.

While denying any and all involvement in the coup, the United States was quick to recognize the new government even before it was clear that it held power throughout the country — in fact, at least one military base revolted against the coup, in solidarity with Chavez.

The United States, defender of freedom and democracy worldwide, has always had an antagonistic relationship with the left-leaning Chavez, who won re-election in the last presidential election in 1999 with 60 percent of the vote.

Also, past actions of the U.S. government have revealed a willingness to remove elected leftist leaders, especially in Central and South America.

Democrats came out against the administration's reaction to the failed coup. The Orlando Sentinel quoted Senate Majority Leader Tom Daschle (D-S.D.) as saying, "I'm very concerned about what message it sends about our support for democracy there and around the world. You know, I think that we've got to be supportive of democratic principles, even when they choose to elect people we don't like."

This possible involvement by the United States is likely to further unravel the unity of the U.S. government that began with the attacks on the East Coast on Sept. 11.

Powell leaves Israel, failing in bid to renew peace talks

By Matthew Hinson
Business & Politics Editor

U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell has departed Israel, just 10 days after arriving to try to forge a cease-fire between warring Palestinian and Israeli forces. While extracting from Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon a promise to withdraw forces from some cities in the West Bank, no cease-fire has been declared, nor any plans for peace talks planned.

Powell met with both Sharon and Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat over this past week, hoping to relieve tensions between the two sides and work on how the violence that has plagued this region for so very long could be finally ended.

Israel demanded that Arafat stop the Palestinian suicide bombings, which have increased in frequency as of late. The Palestinians wanted an Israeli troop withdrawal from the West Bank (which they invaded a month ago in an attempt to stop the suicide bombers), and better treatment for Arafat.

Despite Arafat publicly coming out against violence once again, the blame has mostly, at least in the eyes of the U.S. administration and much of the U.S. media, been attached to the Palestinians for failing to agree to an immediate cease-fire.

Powell himself called for Israel to loosen its grip on Arafat, to better allow him to speak decisively to Palestinians throughout Israel. Also in question is the fate of Arafat himself, who is still being held under house arrest in his offices in Ramallah, the compound being surrounded by Israeli troops.

Courtesy of Reuters

Secretary of State Colin Powell met with Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat over the weekend, but failed to restart peace talks.

In contrast with the U.S. populace of whom the majority seems to side with Israel, as witnessed by this past weekend's rally in Washington, where thousands gathered to show solidarity with that nation, Powell tried to be even-handed.

Just before leaving, Powell criticized both sides for having failed to come to the table. The Washington Post quotes Powell as saying to the Israelis, "The question is whether the time has come for a strong, vibrant state of Israel to look beyond the destructive impact of settlement and occupation, both of which must end."

Powell told the Palestinians, "The question is whether violence and terrorism can be renounced forever and whether your sights can be set squarely on peace through negotiations. Terrorists and purveyors of violence must not hold the Palestinian dream of independence hostage and prevent the emergence of a Palestinian state."

Powell and the administration claim not to be disappointed with the results of the talks, feeling satisfied that Sharon will keep his word about withdrawing Israeli forces from the West Bank in the near future, which is seen as the first step in reviving peace talks.

Despite Powell's failure, President George W. Bush has promised to push onward with more attempts to resolve the situation and called on both sides to do more to try to achieve peace.

"All parties have responsibilities. These responsibilities are not easy, but they're clear. We will continue to remind folks they have responsibilities in the short run to defuse the current crisis," The Washington Post quotes Bush as saying to cadets at the Virginia Military Institute.

As Powell departed, conflict continued in the occupied areas of the West Bank.

Al Gore returns to politics

Courtesy of Reuters

Al Gore returned to politics this past week, speaking to fellow Democrats in Florida, and possibly researching his chances at another run for president in 2004.

By Matthew Hinson
Business & Politics Editor

Former Vice President Al Gore has officially thrown his hat back into the political ring. Attending a state convention of Florida Democrats in Orlando, Fla., Gore came out swinging against President George W. Bush's handling of health care, the environment and the economy.

While not declaring his candidacy for the 2004 presidential election, Gore's reborn partisanship showed him truly to be a man of the Democratic Party. Making a public appearance in Florida is seen as a clear sign of Gore's testing the waters for another election bid. Gore clearly differs greatly enough with the administration to make his months-old pledge of solidarity with the Bush administration over terrorism policy mean less and less.

"Here in America, patriotism does not mean keeping quiet, it means speaking up," The Orlando Sentinel quoted Gore as saying to the 2,500 people gathered. Gore certainly did just that.

The former vice president exhorted his fellow Democrats to unseat the Republican Florida governor and brother to the president, Jeb Bush, in the November elections. He is challenged by Florida Senate member Daryl Jones as well as former Attorney General Janet Reno on the Democratic side, and does not face any serious Republican challengers.

Gore was well received by the crowd. Rank and file Democrats still support the former vice president, who won the popular vote in the 2000 election, although the party heads are divided over another Gore run for the presidency. Gore seized the opportunity to speak about his role in the Clinton presidency, and the successes achieved by that administration.

The Orlando Sentinel quotes Gore as saying, "We put America's financial house back in order. I don't care what anybody says. I think Bill Clinton and I did a damn good job."

Such strong rhetoric and passion from the longtime politician left colleagues wondering where such enthusiasm was in the 2000 campaign, where Gore, fearing to tie himself to a presidency tainted by scandal, appeared stodgy and reluctant to take credit for the accomplishments of the Clinton era.

The big question is: will Gore really run? Other Democratic candidates are mobilizing for the campaign, including Senate leader Tom Daschle (S.D.), Senator Joe Lieberman (Conn.), who ran with Gore in 2000, Senator John Kerry (Mass.), and possibly House leader Dick Gephardt (Mo.).

Gore certainly has the popular support to run again, but does he have the clout anymore? Surely this will be decided within the next few months as the 2004 campaign for the presidency begins to heat up.

Bucknell sweeps, Lafayette weeps

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

A brief team meeting may have been just what the doctor ordered to get the Bison back on track.

By David Cohen
Staff Writer

Angela Stackhouse '04 was "en fuego" on April 14 in Bucknell's sweep of Patriot League foe Lafayette at Metzger Field. She recorded eight RBIs and clubbed two home runs to help the Bison improve to-10-22 overall and 4-8 in League play.

In the opener, the Orange and Blue recorded eleven hits in the first four innings of play on their way to an early 3-0 advantage. Despite a Lafayette pitching change in the fifth inning, the Bison continued to put on an offensive clinic, scoring eight runs in the inning. Stackhouse's grand slam home run highlighted the inning, breaking the game wide open. She not only capitalized on all of her plate appearances, recording four hits in four attempts, but she also drove in five runs while she was at it.

"All week I felt confident in my swing," Stackhouse said. "I had a lot of confidence in myself and my teammates to get it done. It was crucial that I played well because the team's morale is up, and we can go into our remaining League games with confidence."

Barb Wood '02, who was two-for-three from the plate and had two RBIs, has played a pivotal role for the Bison both at the plate and as the team's third baseman this season. Captain Kelly Dugan '02 reflected on how imperative Wood's presence in both the lineup and on the field has been this year.

"Barb has really stepped it up at third base this season," Dugan said. "She sets a great example for our promising freshmen, who will be ready to adapt into Barb's role in the near future."

Lafayette's Jackie Fitzgerald started on the mound for the Leopards and fanned four batters, while reliever Amy Magos struck out two versus the Bison. However, the day belonged to the Orange and Blue's Lauren Box '03, who struck out two and recorded a shutout victory on the mound.

In game two, Bucknell effectively put runs on the board early, as it scored three runs in the first inning, playing long ball. Stackhouse struck once again, blasting a two run shot. A Jenna Demetriades '02 solo shot was soon to follow.

In the third inning, Stackhouse continued to put on a hitting display as she drove in Lauren Titus '02 on a single up the middle. A Lafayette wild pitch proceeded to allow another Bison runner to cross the plate in the inning, providing the Orange and Blue with a 5-0 lead.

The Leopards rallied in the bottom of the fifth on a two-run homer by Kelly Wise. However, it was too little, too late as the Bison held on for the 5-2 win.

Brandi Porter's '03 dominance was evident once again on Sunday, as she threw her second career one-hitter and fanned nine Leopards. Lafayette reliever Magos struck out four batters in the final five innings, but it was ultimately Porter who shined in the end, receiving the victory. Both Dugan and Stackhouse are convinced that the team's offensive improvement can partially be attributed to its pitchers' ability to shut other teams down.

"We were joking calling Brandi 'robo-pitcher,'" Dugan said. "As soon as we start getting runs she mows them (the opponent) down. Before this weekend we struggled offensively and we didn't give our pitchers the proper run support. It was nice to get it done for them last weekend."

"Both of our pitchers threw extremely well," Stackhouse said. "Because of this, we had more confidence in our fielding to make plays as well."

Eight remaining games against Colgate and League powerhouse Lehigh provide the Orange and Blue an excellent opportunity to remedy a slow start to the season. According to Stackhouse, morale is high for Bucknell.

"It was crucial that we played well because the team spirit is up, and we can go into our remaining League gas with confidence," Stackhouse said.

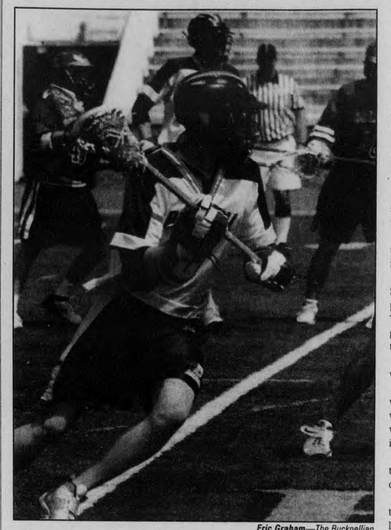
Bison beat Colgate, stay tied for first



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The Bison defeated Colgate 15-6 to stay atop the League standings.

By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

The Bison jumped all over League-rival Colgate, coming out to a 3-0 first quarter lead en route to a 15-6 win in Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium. With two games left the Bison are tied with Hobart and Army for first place in the Patriot League.

Ten of the Bison's 15 goals came from first-year students, including three from Chris Cara '05, who has now tallied 15 points in his last two games.

That's the best we've played together all year," Cara said. "We dominated them in ground balls and faceoffs, which really helped us."

Because of injuries and the hot weather the Bison knew that depth was going to play a critical role in the outcome of the game, and the underclassmen rose to the occasion.

"We were subbing freely on attack and in the midfield," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said. "Physically we weren't getting tired like Colgate was in the second half."

Patrick Christenson was another first-year student who stepped up for the occasion, recording his first ever collegiate level hat trick.

"My teammates were getting me the ball in open spots and I had the easy job of shooting it," Christenson said.

The Bison had an outstanding day offensively, making 42 percent of the shots they took. Once they got the early lead they were able to take their time and take advantage of good shot selection.

"We've been working hard on shooting," Jamieson said. "It's a thing that a lot of teams take for granted, but we realize that we have to practice it to be good at it."

At the other end of the field the Bison were equally impressive. Justin Sussman '04 played a phenomenal game in goal and Kevin Smithies '02 prevented Colgate from even having the chance to be in a position to shoot. The Bison out-hustled the Raiders, getting to almost twice as many available ground balls and did a good job of riding, hindering Colgate from even getting the opportunity to be on offense.

"Our efforts are starting to bear some fruit," Jamieson said. "Clearly we're a lot better in areas of possession than we were earlier in the season."

The Bison met their goal of holding their opponent to under 10 goals while scoring over 10, and nearly had that accomplished in the first half with the score 9-1 going into the locker room. The lead enabled the Bison to work on some plays that they had been practicing. With under a minute left in the first half, Jamieson called timeout to set something up.

"It was basically a simple back screen," Jamieson said. "We were able to get a good screen, a good cut and a good shot, and the goalie had no chance."

Next up for the Bison is Penn State, a national powerhouse that has turned into a Bison rival. The implications of the game are great as Hobart lost to Penn State earlier in the season, which means that if the Bison can put together a win it will help them in the power ratings that will determine the winner of the Patriot League.

"We're right there for the League title," Jamieson said. "It's going to come down to the last two college games of the season."

Penn State offers full scholarships to their athletes, and traditionally has always been able to beat the Bison in lacrosse. But the Bison know that they have come a long way, and that history has no bearing on the outcome of this one.

"We're going to have to play good defense and slow them down and play smart," Christenson said. "If we do that we'll win."

Water Polo team goes 3-1, heads to championships on winning note

By Barb Morgan
Senior Writer

This past weekend, the Bucknell women's water polo team traveled to the Grove City Invitational for its last weekend of competition before the championship season begins. The Bison went 3-1 on the weekend, and now stand at 10-15 going into Southern Championships this upcoming weekend at Villanova.

"This past weekend was great for us because it gave us a chance to play the week before championships, and we were able to work on setting up a controlled offense and many different defenses in preparation for tough games at Southerns," Captain Brooke Rea '02 said.

Friday night, the Bison took on Penn State Behrend, and in a 16-5 victory, 10 different players were involved in scoring. The Bison offense tore up the PSU defense throughout this game, developing a nine-goal lead by the half. Leading the total team effort were Rea, Kelly Hofstetter '04 and Meg Blitzer '05, who each scored three goals in the game. Blitzer added an assist, to total four points for the game.

Also joining Blitzer with four game points was Katie Webber '04 and Cody Keffer '05, both contributing with two goal and two assists. The team best of three assists came from Eileen Ketterer '05. In addition to recording their highest offensive output yet this season the Bison also recorded 25 steals during the contest. Leading the defensive end were Meredith Stevens '02 and Ashely Aiken '05. Aiken turned in seven steals, while Stevens had five.

On the second day of competition, the Orange and Blue went 2-1 earning wins over Washington and Jefferson and Gannon, before failing to Slippery Rock in their last game of the weekend. Against W and J, the Bison came out on top 13-3, dominating the game from the first whistle.

"Another fast Bucknell start helped fuel a strong overall game for Bucknell. Bucknell only gave up one goal in the first half to keep W and J from mounting an offensive challenge," Head Coach John Zeigler said.

Webber and Keffer led the scoring with three goals each. Hofstetter and Ketterer also proved active on offense tallying three points, with one goal and two assists each. Continuing the dominate on defense, Aiken recorded five steals in the game along with a goal and an assist. In the goal, Lindsay Chesterfield '03 had seven saves and allowed only three goals.

In the next game of the long day against Gannon, the Bison pulled together for an 11-5 victory.

"After a slow first period, Bucknell played well offensively to outplay a scrappy Gannon team for a strong win," Zeigler said.

Blitzer found the back of the goal four times in that game to lead the Bison. Classmate Keffer tallied a team high of five points with one goal and four assists. In addition to her goals and assists, Ketterer also registered four steals and recorded two ejections drawn. Chesterfield again recorded a seven-save performance in the goal for the Bison.

"Defensively, we reacted well to what Gannon was trying to do offensively and shut down their primary two-Meter threat," Zeigler said.

In the last game of the day, the Bison fell just short against Slippery Rock at 9-8. Hofstetter led the team with four goals and two assists, while Rea joined the scoring effort with three goals. Also scoring for the Bison was Keffer, who in addition to her one goal also recorded one assist. In the cage, Chesterfield made eight saves in the closely battled game.

Ending the weekend 3-1 was encouraging for the Bison, who are looking for a strong performance this weekend at Villanova.

The Bison will battle once again against League rival George Washington on Friday night in Philadelphia. After losing close games to the Colonials all season, the Bison are prepared and ready to take them on one last time.

"We as a team learned that it can be anyone's game—it's not about who's better, but who wants it more. That is the attitude we need to have against GW. We can and will get things done this weekend," Ketterer said.

Zeigler is also looking forward to a great weekend of water polo at Southerns. "We are playing very solid water polo, particularly defensively and we are ready to play our best polo of the year this weekend," he said.

Where have all the nicknames gone?

The American Pastime just isn't what it used to be. I'm not talking about high ticket prices, selfish players, unsatisfactory pitching or the abominable lack of parity. I'm talking about nicknames.

This sport was founded on nicknames—it used to be that everyone who was anyone had a nickname, from 1884's 60-game winner Charles "Old Hoss" Radbourne to 1976 Rookie of the Year Mark "The Bird" Fidrych to ultimate-hitter Ted "The Splendid Splinter"/"The Thumper"/"The Kid"/"Teddy Ballgame" Williams. There was a time when even the nobodies had nicknames (other than "whatshisname" or "that middle relief pitcher"). Ah, those were the glory days of baseball.

Assigning a nickname for each player was never difficult—there were several methods by which an individual's teammates, coaches or fans could construct a creative moniker.

There's the ethnologically-driven variety, which utilizes a player's geographical orientation or heritage in order to select his future title. We had "The Staten Island Scot" (Bobby Thomson), "The Georgia Peach" (Ty Cobb), "The Golden Greek" (Harry Agganis) and "The Flying Dutchman" (Honus Wagner). One didn't even need an exciting heritage to garner an ethnic nickname—the New York Giants' Emil Meusal was dubbed "Irish" Meusal, not because he actually was Irish, but because he looked the part (he was really Alsatian). There was "Germany" (Herman Schaefer), "Jap" (Will Barbeau), "Big Serb" (Johnny Miljus) and "Swede" (Charles Risberg). The refreshingly politically incorrect "Chief" was also a popular nickname (J.T. Meyers and Charles Bender, among others).

Drawing by Cecily Cairns

Occasionally perceived psychological imbalances were combined with a player's genetic background in order to compose a nickname, producing such pleasantly quirky titles as "The Mad Russian" and "The Mad Hungarian." The former belonged to the eccentric and defensively-challenged Cubs outfielder Lou Novikoff, who was allegedly afraid of the ivy at Wrigley Field; the latter to accomplished Cardinals and Royals closer Al Hrabosky.

Sadly, the tradition of regional nicknames could never fly in today's society of hypersensitivity and political correctness. But if those didn't cause a small string of riots, then surely a few of baseball history's grandest disability-focused nicknames would launch some sort of uprising if they were to appear on a baseball card in this day and age.

How about Mordecai Brown? As if it wasn't bad enough that his name was Mordecai (and his middle name was Centennial), he was known in the world of baseball as "Three Finger," because—you guessed it—he only had a fraction of his original fingers. It never seemed to bother him and it's arguable whether or not his lack of an index finger, thumb and pinky was really a disability; Brown amassed a 2.06 ERA in 481 career games.

If you weren't disfigured in a corn shredder accident, the nickname police might just focus on a birth-given misfortune. Take Don "Ears" Mossi, for example. Mossi, who was also called "The Sphinx," was as well known for his large ears and unfortunate looks as he was for his superior pitching.

Ernie Lombardi, who was on the receiving end of Johnny Vander Meer's back-to-back no hitters, was affectionately known as "Schnozz." It isn't hard to guess what his prominent facial feature was.

While a lot of guys were named after whatever exaggerated feature they had, White Sox' Walt "No-Neck" Williams earned his nickname on account of the unusually abrupt connection between his chin and his chest. William Hoy lacked the ability to hear or speak, which instantly earned him the brash but affectionate nickname "Dummy."

And then there's a whole slew of fellows who received distinction for their stature: "Midget" (Eddie Gaedel), "Chubby" (Al Dean), "Fat Freddie" (Freddie Fitzsimmons), "Fat Jack" (Jack Fisher), "Stubby" (Frank Overmire), "Skinny" (Hal Brown) and "Twig" (Wayne Terwilliger), to name a few.

Or one could be bestowed with an animal nickname, like John "Spider" Jorgeson, Harry "The Cat" Brecheen, Harvey "The Kitten" Haddix (called "The Kitten" because he looked so much like Brecheen), Greg "The Bull" Luzinski, Bill "The Stork" Travers, Harry "The Horse" Downing or Bill "Moose" Skowron.

If all else failed, a nickname could be earned on the playing field. Bob Ferguson's dazzling outfield antics earned him the moniker "Death to Flying Things." Frank Baker, who was as much of a longball hitter as one could possibly be in the deadball era, was simply known as "Home Run." Sometimes it was a question of style—Phil Neikro's wicked knuckleball prompted some to call him "Knucksie," and "Sliding Billy" Hamilton, a notorious base-thief, was always getting his uniform dirty.

If you weren't good at something, one could always rely on infamy to get a cute nickname. Hugh Mulcahy eventually became known simply as "Losing Pitcher" after he led the league in losses in 1938 and 1940 (amazingly enough, he was elected to the All-Star team in 1940).

And perhaps the most memorable of them all, "Dr. Strangeglove" was a laughably appropriate designation for the Pittsburgh Pirates Dick Stuart. Although solid at the plate, "Dr. Strangeglove" was a designated hitter waiting to happen (unfortunately he retired well before that rule adjustment hit the American League). Every ball was an adventure with Stuart at first base—he led the league in errors during all of his first seven seasons.

As baseball's history ticked through the last couple decades of the 20th century, nicknames began to fade away. Sure, there are a few great remnants of the grand old tradition—Randy "The Big Unit" Johnson, Roger "The Rocket" Clemens, Fred "Crime Dog" McGriff, "Slammin'" Sammy Sosa—but the glory days are long gone.

I say we reinstate the tradition of mandatory nicknaming. If everybody works together, we can ensure that every player has one—no political correctness, no tiptoeing around the obvious, no fear of stumbling into areas of emotional "sensitivity." Just good old-fashioned ballpark humor. Really, it could save the game.

It's not like Bud Selig has any better ideas.

Noel Powell '04 set the tone for the Bison, placing first , second and third at the Bison Open.

By Pat Evans

The Bison men's and women's track and field teams dominated the Bison Open on Saturday in Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium, earning a combined 14 first-place finishes on the afternoon for a total of 34 top-three performances.

"Our organization was very good and we competed hard," Head Coach Kevin Donner said. "We had fast times, and I'm very pleased with how things went."

For the men's team, Noel Powell '04 led the way with one first, one second and one third-place performance. Powell won the 200-meter dash in 21.89 seconds, and leaped to a second-place finish in the long jump with a mark of 23-9, a mark that bettered the former stadium record. In addition, he came in third in the 100-meter dash in 11.14 seconds.

"I've been jumping pretty well," Powell said. "It wasn't my best jump ever, but I'm happy."

Other winners from the men's team included Travis Etters '02, Greg Costello '03, Eric Furst '03, Adam Kaufman '03 and Bryan Johnston '03. Etters placed first in the 3,000-meter steeplechase with a time of 9:32.6, while Costello was victorious in the 1,500-meter run with a time of 3:57.29. Breaking the tape in the 800-meter run in a season-best 1:54.27 was Furst. Kaufman's hammer throw of 168-6 1/2 earned him the win, and Johnston captured the 5,000-meter run in 14:41.45.

"Our leaders have been doing well influencing the younger players, and helping them out a lot," Powell said.

On the women's side it was Stephanie Bango '02 setting the pace. Her 800-meter run in 2:10.03 was just a tenth of a second off the University record that she set earlier in the season at North Carolina. The time was impressive considering the slippery conditions that the weekend's rain brought to the competition.

"Everyone did a good job, and some of the personal bests were particularly good especially when you consider the weather conditions."

Other Bison winning their respective events were Theresa Dennis '03 in the 1,500, Kiley MacDonald '05 in the 100-meter high hurdles, Edwina Bourn '03 in the 400-meter high hurdles, Maria Garcia '04 in the hammer throw and Angie McFarland '05 in the shot put. The 1,600-meter relay team was also victorious with a time of 3:54.33.

Next up for both squads is the Bucknell Quadrangular on Saturday, which will feature Kent State, La Salle and Robert Morris.

"Both of our teams have their work cut out for them," Donner said. "If we could pull off a win, that would be fantastic."

Tennis teams set sights high

By Caity Selleck

The men's and women's tennis teams went 1-1 and 2-2 for the week respectively. The men are in the running for a spot in the Patriot League Championships, while the women are hoping to improve their record with an already strong current record of 11-9.

The men's tennis team hosted both University of Maryland Baltimore-County and League competitor Lafayette at home this week. On April 15, the Bison were swept by UMBC, 7-0. Nick Denefrio '05 had the closest match, holding his opponent to a third set.

On April 11, the Bison hosted Lafayette, and took the match 5-2. Winning for the Bison were Leland Tien '05 in the third singles slot with a scores of 6-2, 6-2, Joe Menezes '05 in fourth took the match 6-2, 7-6, Gerald DiChiara '05 took the fifth slot with scores of 6-3, 7-6 and Todd Jacobs '03 took the sixth singles slot 6-2, 6-3. Winning two out of three doubles matches for one point for the Bison were Jacobs and Scott Allen '02 in the second slot and Tien and Menezes in the third slot, both with scores of 8-1.

The Bison will face League competitor Army this weekend, for one of the deciding matches for placement in the Patriot League championships. The Bison now have a record of 1-2 in the league. A place in the top four in the league is needed for placement in the championships.

"In order to make it into the post-season and do well there, we have to work on finishing off our points in matches and being consistent," Head Coach Bob Hammerlee said.

The women's team traveled to Maryland to face both Towson and Loyola. On April 14, the Bison fell in a tough match to Loyola with a score of 4-3. Scoring points for the Bison were Nadezda Curcic '05 in the second singles slot, who took the match 6-4, 6-2, and Ashley Diers '05 in the third singles slot with scores of 6-3, 6-1.

"We did achieve one of our biggest goals of having a winning season. Last year we were 5-13. This year, we finished 11-9 with the same schedule."
—Rebecca Helt, head coach

On April 13, the Bison swept Towson on their home courts, 7-0, with all players winning except for the first doubles team.

The Bison also faced two Patriot League competitors last week at home.

On April 11, the Bison swept Lafayette 7-0, taking all matches except for the first doubles. On April 10, the Bison lost to Lehigh, 5-2, taking them out of the running for Patriot League championships. Scoring points for the team were Sichko in the fifth singles slot with scores of 7-5, 1-6 and 10-5. The match went to the 10th win in lieu of playing an extra set. Also scoring for the Bison were the doubles teams of Curcic and Diers in the second slot and Kristin Inglis, '02, and Sichko in the third slot with scores of 8-2 and 8-5 respectively.

Diers has been struggling with a back injury all season, but came back for these important last few games.

"It's been a problem for a while, but I knew I needed to be on the court, especially for our League matches. I've been spending a lot of time in the training room and have been able to manage the pain pretty well," Diers said.

Although the team did not make it to post-season play, Head Women's Coach Rebecca Helt still thinks positively of the season, with only one game left against Bloomsburg.

"We did achieve one of our biggest goals of having a winning season. Last year we were 5-13. This year, we finished 11-9 with the same schedule," Helt said.

Women's lax drops two in five days

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

It was a tough week for the Bison women's lacrosse team, who dropped two games within five days. Despite high hopes, great teamwork and strong spirits, the competition it faced outdid the team on the field. Its first defeat came when it faced the Dragons of Drexel on April 9 in its third nail bitter this season.

The Orange and Blue got on the scoreboard first with a goal by Suzanne Raffaele '03 just 2:29 into the start of the game. Drexel's two goal spurt did not crush the Bison's hopes as they took a 4-3 lead going into halftime on goals by Raffaele, Melissa Montefusco '02 and Laura Nuss '04.

After the half, the Bison took their largest lead of the game when Nuss opened the scoring 2:25 into the second spurt of play. Drexel responded with three unanswered goals to take the lead 6-5. For the next 10 minutes the Orange and Blue played catch up with the Dragons, pulling themselves back with a game-tying goal by Montefusco and then regaining their lead on a goal by Andrea Paraud '05.

Unfortunately, the Dragons began breathing fire for the remaining 10 minutes of play and tied the game before they took the final shot with 31 seconds remaining in the contest and netted it, leaving the score 8-7 in Drexel's favor.

Nicole Kallis '03 recorded 12 saves in net while Montefusco, Raffaele and Nuss acquired three points on the offensive attack, scoring two goals and an assist each.

The team's second disappointment came on April 13 when they lost to League foe Colgate 16-11.

The Bison battled all game, but never once took the lead. They did come close to a comeback when the score struck 9-7 half way through the second half, but this propelled the Raiders to six straight goals in ten minutes.

Despite the loss, individually the Bison had a very accomplished game. On the offensive attack, Raffaele led the team with four goals giving her 100 for her career. Montfusco added a goal and four assists allowing her to break the single season record which now stands at 25. Nuss was again stellar in her offensive play with a three goal performance. Completing the scoring was Amy Hasler '04 who netted two and Andrea Paraud '05 who again connected for one.

In the early part of the game, the score was tied twice before Colgate went on a 4-1 run over the Bison. On the defensive end, Kallis made 15 saves.

The Orange and Blue had to let go of their Patriot League dream, making the second loss of the week harder to swallow. They are in action this Saturday at home against the Wildcats of Villanova at 1 p.m. The contest this weekend will be the last ever lacrosse match for the graduating seniors.

Men's golfers take third at Lafayette

By Andy Tichenor
Staff Writer

The Bison men's golf team finished third overall out of 17 teams at the Lafayette Invitational this past weekend, while the women concluded their season in the James Madison Invitational, finishing 13th. The men will finish up their season this weekend at the Patriot League Championships held at Army.

The women's team took four golfers to the final tournament, and all shot well despite windy weather conditions. Hilary Mainka '02 shot an 81 on the first day and Jaime Hays '05 shot an 83. Jess Hetrich '03 shot an 85 on the first day while Caitlin Sullivan '05 broke 90 for the first time, shooting an 89. On the second day, the wind factor actually helped the Bison as Mainka, who finished 42nd overall, and Hays both shot 86 and Sullivan shot 95. Hetrich led the Bison on the second day with a score of 81.

"The greens were different because they were slow," Hetrich said. "The course was a little hilly." The team concluded the season this past weekend and looks to build on their success in the fall.

On the men's side Nick Leibowitz '02 had a strong showing as he finished sixth overall and shot scores of 72 and 76 respectively. Scott Leeder '04 scored 75 on both days and took ninth place, while Abbie Valentine '04 and Dan Gale '02 tied for 19th overall with a combined score of 151. Alex Dolle '05 finished with a score of 154 total to finish at 36th overall.

"The conditions were pretty good and it was an easier course but still long and demanded good shots," Dolle said. "We would've won if we were a little better on the last few holes."

The Bison will look to take their strong showing at Lafayette and build on it for the Patriot League Championships this weekend at Army.

Crew teams continue to compete

By Krista Killian
Staff Writer

With the completion of the first indoor rowing event at the Sixth Annual Erg Armageddon, both the men's and women's crew teams have continued to demonstrate stellar rowing performances as they begin the outdoor season.

The women's crew team took the Erg Armageddon by storm, as they broke two records and took 15 of the 21 medals awarded at the event.

The men's crew team demonstrated a similar effort, claiming six top-five finishes and four medals for the day. Aaron Bates '03 and Jeffrey Dasch '03 led the men in this strong showing. Bates, a lightweight varsity rower, had a tremendous performance, placing third for the Bison while in the open weight division and Dash placed fourth.

The next endeavor, which allowed both teams to display their prowess, was the opportunity for the teams to participate in the first regatta of the outdoor season, called the "Occoquan Sprints." This regatta is held on the Occoquan Reservoir in Virginia and is very competitive, with the Bison competing against other schools such as William and Mary, Penn State, George Washington and Pittsburgh.

The women's varsity team dominated its events. The varsity four boat and the varsity pairs boat both won gold medals. The women's novice team also did an outstanding job of representing the Bison in a strong showing. The first novice eight boat came in second place, and the second novice boat placed sixth.

Women's novice rower, Charissa Reimer '05 was very pleased with the women's showing at Occoquan. "At this regatta, it was really evident that the winter training has paid off. Our team used race plans that we have practiced all winter. This was very beneficial to our showing on the water," Reimer said.

Both the men and women's crew team placed well at the Occuquan Sprints in Va. last weekend.

At the Occoquan Sprints, the men followed the Bison winning tradition. The men's open weight varsity boat came in second, and the lightweight boat placed fourth. The men's novice rowers came through with a first place finish.

"The Occoquan Sprints regatta was a great way for our team to get an idea of what is to come in the season, and what we have to work towards," Steven Patak '05 said.

Both the men and women's crew teams continue to practice day in and day out, working to achieve the goals they have set for themselves. On April 20, at the Murphy Cup in Philadelphia, the Bison will have yet another opportunity to get out onto the water and demonstrate the talent of these accomplished athletes.

"It will be great, after training so hard, to go out there and have all the work pay off," Lisa Baranik '03 said.

Me like sports

By Aaron DeRosa

Where are you going with my keyboard?!

People, I think we've advanced to the point in our relationship where I'm comfortable discussing something very personal with you. It's time for us to talk about fantasy baseball. Some of you are already laughing because you understand the nature of this beast.

Now, the nom de plume "Fantasy Baseball" may already have negative, and possibly derogatory, connotations, but I assure you this is most certainly not the case. Many, if not ALL, athletes partake in this proverbial communion wafer of the sports establishment, gorging themselves on the tasty morsels of the body and blood of Bud Selig.

Fantasy baseball is actually a highly competitive event that could—and should—be deemed a sport in its own right. It has all the trappings of a sport. It pits one angry, demented loser against others with similar experiences and skills. It requires tactical and strategic planning to ensure success. It often results in physical combat (see later paragraph about gnashing of teeth). There is much gloating and posturing in desperate attempts to make others feel like less of a person. There are many tears. And I always conclude my trades by giving the other trader a nice pat on the butt and a shout of encouragement.

Anyway, I will give a brief introduction to the fantastic and bloodcurdling world of fantasy athletics for those who, as of yet, have no idea what I'm talking about. Basically it works as such: you are a team in a league with seven other owners. You and your opponents each draft 25 actual players from Major League Baseball and they earn you points for their statistics in their real-life games. For instance, if Carlos Delgado gets a hit, home run or an RBI (although not limited to just these stats), and you have him on your fantasy team, then you get points for his performance.

In your league you can trade players between other teams, pull people off the "waiver wire" (which is the pool of unsigned players) and so forth in order to bolster your team. There is a rumor mill that keeps all the league members in touch with each other and at the end of the season, the team with the highest point total wins.

Now one wouldn't think that a game seemingly so innocent could produce such vehement animosity, but the fact of the matter is, fantasy sports are the most cutthroat and vicious of all competitive ventures. Fantasy baseball is a dog-eat-hippopotamus playground for over-indulgent fundamentalist statwatchers who would, without a doubt, jam a shiv through your solar plexus if they thought it would make a trade clear a day earlier. But, I'll tell you, it's the greatest invention since Prozac for cats (taking the "ow" out of "meow").

I honestly don't know what my summer would be like if I didn't have a fantasy team. I would say that 70-90 percent of all summer conversations with friends who are in my league revolve around fantasy baseball and/or possible trade suggestions. It's so great.

Word of advice to fantasy baseball athletes: never go to the kitchen to get a soda and/or chips while another member of your league is standing next to your computer with your team logged on because, chances are, the conniving little bugger has been eyeing your third baseman for the past three weeks and who knows what skeevy wino you'll wind up with when he starts proposing trades with the frenetic diligence of an insect colony servicing its queen.

The best is the waiver wire. Last season, at a friend's house, inevitably the conversation drifted to fantasy baseball and we decided to go check how our teams had fared that night. I logged on first and was discussing the fact that I wanted to sign a player off the waiver wire.

My friend's face went taut and became agitated, trying to divert my attention to other matters. But I was undeterred. Needless to say, there was a struggle, there was biting and gnashing of teeth which ultimately resulted in him pulling the computer's plug out of the wall.

It being a slow Macintosh computer, I thought I stood a chance. I promptly said goodnight, ran to my car, raced home at an average of 50 miles per hour through suburbia, N.Y., signed online and promptly signed the man (Mark Buehrle, for those who care) while an agitated friend sat waiting for his computer to boot back up. It was the most glorious moment of my life.

Last year, the computer drafted Frank Thomas to my team, and for those of you who followed Frank Thomas last year, there hasn't been a bust that big since Anna Nicole Smith last breast fed. Towards the end of the season, I got so annoyed with the league that I posted a message on the rumor mill declaring a firesale of my team and that I'd accept any and all trades that were proposed on a first-come, first-serve basis.

Needless to say, this maneuver was more of a disaster than Tom Arnold's birth. After practically gutting my team, a debate was sparked that lasted for the rest of the season. We argued for weeks on end but no détente was reached. Our league became the West Bank of the fantasy world, each side refusing to budge and credibility strewn about the battlefield like so many slaughtered bodies. I was one .300-batting-outfielder away from commissioning an insurgency strike on my friend's home to pressure him into ratifying a trade.

But it's great, the political posturing, the pathos, the resulting deep-seeded resentment inexplicably intertwined in each and every player movement, the shaming tactics used to embarrass holdout, would-be traders into signing over Alex Rodriguez and their first-born child against their better judgment.

It's all for love of the game.

NFL Draft Predictions

The 2002 NFL Draft is looking very similar to the 2001 NFL Draft- there is one clear-cut number one choice followed by what is anyone's guess. After the success of the Ravens and the Patriots in the past two years, this year's draft will once again be one of defense. Up to 11 defensive linemen could go in the first round alongside a handful of cornerbacks and safeties, while the skill positions may see only six to seven picks in the first round. After a failed attempt last year, I once again offer my mock draft in hopes of redemption. I am not taking i.to account any draft day trades because that would just confuse things greatly. When Commissioner Paul Tagliabue walks up to the podium on Saturday, he will announce the Houston Texans first pick followed by 31 more first round picks—they should go as follows:

COMMENTARY

Rob Schmicker

1. Houston—David Carr, QB, Fresno St. The Texans first pick has basically been set in stone for two weeks now. Like the Browns and Panthers before them, the expansion Texans are going with a QB as their first pick. The only difference is that he will have more protection than either Tim Couch or Kerry Collins did in their first years.

2. Carolina—Julius Peppers, DE, North Carolina. Carolina is in need of everything, so they will take the best player available with the second pick. With Dan Morgan healthy once again, Carolina's defense will be young and exciting to watch.

3. Detroit—Quentin Jammer, CB, Texas. Will the Lions pass on Joey Harrington? Maybe I'm just naïve in thinking that Rutgers alum Mike McMahon will become the star I think he is, but this seems like a sure bet. The Lions secondary was dreadful last year.

4. Buffalo—Mike Williams, T, Texas. Harrington would be the wise choice here, but the Bills just don't seem to get it. They got rid of Doug Flutie in favor of Rob Johnson, who then got benched for Alex Van Pelt. As a result, they will pass on Harrington and upgrade their offensive line.

5. San Diego—Bryant McKinnie, T, Miami. With Drew Brees waiting in the wings and LaDainian Tomlinson on the verge of becoming a superstar, the Chargers need some protection up front—insert the 345 pound McKinnie who is amazingly agile for his size.

6. Dallas—Phillip Buchanon, CB, Miami. The Cowboys have needed help in the secondary ever since Deion retired. Buchanon has the cocky swagger that Deion had early in his career and will be an excellent addition to the rebuilding Cowboys.

7. Minnesota—Albert Haynesworth, DE, Tennesee. With the two big name offensive lineman off the board, the Vikings will go defensive with this pick. Haynesworth has a huge upside and should do well under Mike Tice's guidance.

8. Kansas City—Ryan Sims, DT, North Carolina. Sims was overshadowed by Peppers for most of the year, but really stood out in the Senior Bowl. The Chiefs couldn't be more happy to see him slip this far.

9. Jacksonville—Wendell Bryant, DT, Wisconsin. The Jaguars really wanted to improve their offensive line, but will have to settle for the best remaining defensive lineman. Don't be surprised if they try to trade up to get McKinnie or Williams.

10. Cincinnati—Joey Harrington, QB, Oregon. This is a no brainer. The Bengals really are only a solid QB away from being a decent team. They would be stupid to let Harrington slip any further.

11. Indianapolis—Roy Williams, S, Oklahoma. Defense, Defense, Defense: that is what has been lacking in Indianapolis for a few years now. New coach Tony Dungy will be doing cartwheels over this selection. Williams is just awesome.

12. Arizona—John Henderson, DT, Tennessee. Coming off an injury filled year but full of talent.

13. New Orleans—Charles Grant, DE, Georgia. Converted running back can only get better with experience.

14. Tennessee—Lito Sheppard, CB, Florida. Titans desperately need to upgrade their secondary.

15. New York Giants—Jeremy Shockey, TE, Miami. One of the best two-way tight ends to come out in a long time.

16. Cleveland—William Green, RB, Boston College. Cleveland needs a running game to help take pressure off of Tim Couch.

17. Atlanta—Donte Stallworth, WR, Tennessee. First of a long line of great receivers this draft- great target for Michael Vick.

18. Washington—Jabar Gaffney, WR, Florida. Spurrier convinces Washington to pass on a QB for another former Gator.

19. Denver—Levi Jones, T, Arizona St. Their offensive line was the one sure thing during their Super Bowl runs.

20. Seattle—Kalimba Edwards, DE, South Carolina. Need some line help to complement their scary linebacking crew.

21. Oakland—Larry Tripplett, DT, Washington. Might split time with incumbent Roderick Coleman at left end.

22. New York Jets—Dwight Freeney, DE, Syracuse. Might be moved to tackle as complement to Shaun Ellis and John Abraham.

23. Oakland—Daniel Green, TE, Colorado. Great catching tight end, should be nice third down option.

24. Baltimore—TJ Duckett, RB, Michigan St. Just in case Jamal Lewis can't return to dominance.

25. New Orleans—Mike Pearson, T, Florida. Saints get upgrades on both sides of the ball in round one.

26. Philadelphia—Bryan Thomas, DE, UAB. A nice complement alongside of Hugh Douglas.

27. San Francisco—Mike Rumph, CB, Miami. With the top three corners gone, 49ers must hope Rumph can help their poor secondary.

28. Green Bay—Napoleon Harris, LB, Northwestern. A total steal this late in the round.

29. Chicago—Anthony Weaver, DT, Notre Dame. Bears hope he doesn't turn out like Micahel Zorich.

30. Pittsburgh—Ed Reed, S, Miami. Welcome to the new Steel Curtain- Reed patches up only hole in defense.

31. St Louis—Ashley Lelie, WR, Hawaii. Is the perfect fit to replace Az-Zahir Hakim.

32. New England—LeCharles Bentley, G, Florida. Can never have too much help on the line.

Athlete of the Week

Angela Stackhouse '04

Angela Stackhouse '04 had the cameras flashing with a picture perfect weekend performance, going 9-15 at the plate, including three home runs and 11 RBIs, earning herself Athlete of the Week honors. Stackhouse, a catcher for the University's softball team, brought her "A" game against Lafayette to complete a double header sweep for the Bison.

"I would have to owe those (wins) to hard work at practice everyday and many hours put into practice each week, also to my teammates for encouragement that is given to each other to work hard and to never give up," Stackhouse said.

Riding a tough season (10-22 overall, 4-8 Patriot League), the ladies on the diamond are not folding their tents just yet. This past weekend positioned the team closer to a Patriot League playoff berth.

"We are looking forward to the next two weekends against Colgate and Lehigh, which will determine whether we qualify for the Patriot League Tournament," Stackhouse said. "These next games are important and it will take a team effort to get the wins we need to finish strong in the end of our season."

When you are a rising star with many memorable moments, it is hard to single out just one favorite moment. Stackhouse ranks this past weekend closely to one she had in Florida.

"This is a tie with the game earlier in the season in Florida where I hit my first career home run. The first one is something I will always remember and will be special to me, although this weekend will also be a memorable experience," Stackhouse said.

We all have idols or people we look up to—inspirations that transform the worst of days into euphoria. Stackhouse noted a few prominent figures.

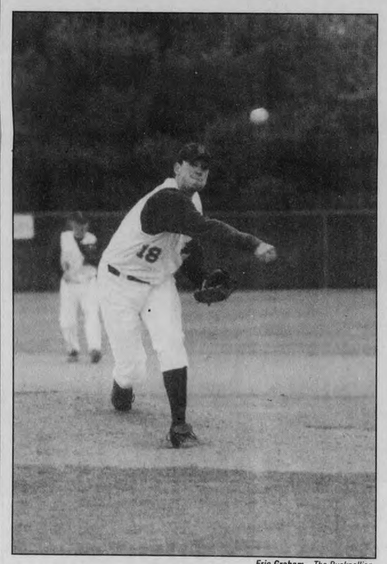
"I have several people I look towards for inspiration," Stackhouse said. "First my parents, for who always gave me support and encouragement, especially through hard times. They have been a great help in keeping me focused on what is important, like having fun and being a team player. The second is senior Captain Jenna Demetriades who has been a great leader and true friend to me for the past two seasons. She is always offering encouragement and pushing the team to better ourselves and play hard."

A team is only as good as its weakest link. While Stackhouse is confident in her abilities the rest of the season, she still hungers for a Patriot League berth.

"As an individual, I would like to continue to hit well for the remainder of the season and provide strong defense behind the plate," Stackhouse said. "As a team, we would like to continue our winning streak and end the season with a better record than last season. We would also like to make the Patriot League Tournament and perform well there. Team unity is another goal, it is going to take a team effort to accomplish what we set out to do this season."

Stackhouse majors in business management. Off the diamond she enjoys spending time outdoors, playing summer league softball and being an active member in the church.

Farmery surpasses Bucknell's all-time saves record against Lehigh



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Zach Allen '03 struck out five and scattered six hits over six innings to earn the win against Lehigh.

By Meghann Chipko
Staff Writer

The Bison baseball team has struggled recently, losing five of its last six games to Duquesne and Lehigh. Despite this streak of bad fortune, there have been many notable performances, and the Bison are confident that they will be able to pull things together for the end of the season.

Larry Sheetz '02 hit his first career pair of home runs against the Dukes, Gregg Farmery '02 earned a save against Lehigh, breaking the University's all-time saves record, Ben Stoll '04 went 3-for-3 in his first game on the weekend and Ben Krentzman's '03 two triples in game contributed to the NCAA-record seven triples between two teams in one game. The last similar occurrence happened in 1992.

However, the outstanding individual efforts of many could not help the Bison overcome their challengers. On April 9, Bucknell traveled to Pittsburgh. The doubleheader dropped the Bison down to 13-22 for the season, losing their first game 13-2 and the nightcap 3-2.

In the nightcap, Cory Nadler '04 had his first start, but he came away with a loss. He threw six innings, holding the Dukes to only three runs.

The Bison got on the scoreboard first after Sheetz hit his second homer of the series in the top of the first. Duquesne took the lead 2-1 after scoring in the first of the third innings.

The Bison retaliated, tying the game 2-2, after Sam Moss '04 singled then went on to score after hits by Sheetz and Fishman. However, they couldn't get going offensively against Duquesne's Vivoni after the Dukes pulled ahead 3-2 later in the game. Duquesne went on to win a close game.

On the weekend the Bison fell further, advancing their record to 14-25 for the season and 5-7 in the Patriot League after Lehigh won its first series over the Bison since 1991.

In the opener on Saturday, starter Zach Allen '03 and Farmery combined to allow only six hits to lift the Bison over the Mountain Hawks 5-3.

"On this weekends game I knew throwing the first game that I would have to give a solid effort and keep us in the game. Their starter, Dave Cerminario, is a good pitcher, so I knew I would have to step it up," Allen said.

Offensively, Ben Stoll '04 went 3-3 and Peter Wolf '04 and B.J. Batterson '03 helped the 10-hit effort over Lehigh pitcher Dave Cerminaro.

"Our hitters handled him well and gave us the opportunity to win the game, which was very positive to see because he is a very experienced pitcher," Allen said.

The Bison got on the board immediately in the opening inning with two runs. Batterson struck an RBI single to start off the scoring, and Wolf capped it off with his run-scoring double. The Mountain Hawks retaliated in the second with one run.

The Bison increased their lead in the third to 5-1 after Stoll hit in two runners, with bases loaded, off a single.

After six plus innings, and five strikeouts, Head Coach Gene Depew decided to replace Allen with Farmery out of the bullpen to finish up the game. Though Lehigh increased their score to three, Farmery did not allow another hit and recorded his 13th career save (fifth of the season) becoming Bucknell's all-time saves leader.

Game two included a one-hour rain delay and an on-fire offensive by the Mountain Hawks. Lehigh went on to win 17-7 in the nightcap.

On Sunday, in both games, the Bison rallied early to gain the lead but could not hold on as Lehigh won the opener 7-5 and the nightcap 9-6.

"With a few breaks and cutting out a mistake or two we could have easily won both games Sunday," Allen said.

With the sweep, Lehigh moved up to second place in the Patriot League as the Bison fell back to fourth place.

The Bison will continue Patriot League play this weekend against Army at West Point.

B.J. Batterson '03 had two hits and batted in a run on Saturday against Lehigh ace Dave Cerminaro.

An abroad perspective: a semester in Kenya

By Brianna Beechler
Contributing Writer

When my plane landed at Jomo Kenyatta Airport in Kenya I was dazed, exhausted and excited. I hadn't slept in two days, and I don't think I would have cared if I had stepped off the plane into Siberia, I was just glad to finally be off that plane. Fortunately for me I didn't step into Siberia, I stepped onto Kenyan ground and embarked on the most exciting experience of my young life. As far as I could see behind me were Acacia trees, in front of me was an airport and the city of Nairobi.

After going through immigration and countless other exercises of people trying to cheat us out of our money, the group of 48 slightly dazed American students got into a bunch of Land Rovers to begin the long drive to our respective camps. The first group of 24 students drove for about an hour and then pulled into its camp. Unfortunately for my tired body, I was in the group of 24 students who continued driving on dusty, bumpy dirt roads for another three hours, until we arrived at our camp, about 10 miles north of the Kenya/Tanzania border. I was exhausted, yet I stayed awake for the entire ride, keeping my eyes and ears attentive to the new sights and sounds.

The next several days were a blur of orientation activities and classes. Two days after we got to Kenya, Kurt, our student affairs manager, gathered us all together at 9 p.m. to tell us the story about the World Trade Center and planes. We were shocked, some immediately panicked and others sat there in disbelief. We had no phone contact and no way to call our loved ones and see if everything was OK with them. Twenty-four American students and countless local staff spent the next several days comforting each other and getting in contact with family and friends in America. This experience, while difficult, helped to bond us; we became a family thousands of miles from home.

We then spent the rest of the semester enjoying Kenya and our new surroundings. We spent the first five weeks of the semester at a camp looking directly at the towering Mt. Kilimanjaro. I spent many showers watching the sunrise over the majestic beauty of Mt. Kilimanjaro. It was however, the only positive thing about taking showers. We had no hot water, so showers were ice cold and pretty much pointless. The Kenyan dust was so prevalent that two minutes after you thought you were clean you were covered in dust. The road into camp was one large dustbowl: I would sink ankle deep in fine, reddish dust each time I took a step on it. Just as I learned to adjust to the cold showers and the dust; I was learning to adjust to the Kenyan culture and environment. I had now seen countless animals, spent times with many native Kenyans, began to understand the conflict between wildlife and people that exists in Kenya.

After the first five weeks of the semester, we were given a week break to travel and see the country. I chose to climb Mt. Kenya, a mountain of about 17,000 ft. In our 'infinite stupidity' the four us young, healthy American students decided it would be cheaper if we carried our heavy backpacks, containing tents, food and other supplies up the mountain, while other more intelligent people hired porters to carry their stuff up the mountain. We reasoned that most people who climb are middle aged and out of shape, we were young fine specimens that could easily carry our own supplies. Well, we were wrong.

The first day we hiked about three miles and gained about 3,000 ft in elevation, camping around 10,000 ft. The second day we hiked about six miles and gained another 5,000 ft. By this time I thought I was going to collapse from exhaustion, and I was seriously regretting my decision to carry my pack. We arrived at the camp about 3 p.m. and then set up camp. I was utterly exhausted and I simply didn't care about anything but sleeping. However, I left with the group at 2 a.m. in the morning. We hiked up over the glaciers in the darkness, with a blanket of stars over the top of us. It was so bright that we didn't use flashlights for much of the hike. I simply didn't think it could get any better, but then around 6 AM we finally neared the top. We were above the clouds watching the sunrise, and off in the distance to the south we could see Mt. Kilimanjaro towering above. It was so beautiful and awe-inspiring I simply don't have words or pictures that can describe that moment. We then began the hike down. Or shall I say that I began the fall down. I spent most of my time descending by falling and rolling a few feet, much to the amusement of our Kenyan guides. After reaching the bottom we spent a night in a hotel before heading back to camp. This hotel advertised warm showers, so naturally I was excited. Apparently warm showers actually means, showers that hover around luke-warm at best.

After break, we spent the last seven weeks of our time in Kenya at the second camp on the southeastern border of Nairobi National Park. After coming from a camp near the southern border we were all a bit shocked to see that Kenya did have paved roads and malls. Even with the paved roads, the rainy season arrived and turned the dirt roads into mud pits. We spent much of our time pulling and pushing our stuck land cruisers out of the thick, black cotton mud, and the other part of our time sliding down hills sideways. I learned a strange lesson here. If you want to go down a muddy hill in a vehicle without careening into the trees on the side of the road, you should always begin going down it sideways. The vehicle will then magically straighten out and you will reach the bottom safely. However if for some crazy reason you decide to begin the descent head on, you will not reach the bottom, but in fact will become stuck or careen into a tree.

As I reflect on my experience in Kenya, I realize how much I learned and what a wonderful experience it was. I got to see first hand the difficulty of conserving a natural resource, and the conflicts between the people of Kenya and conservation. I got to speak with Kenyans about their lives, their problems and their issues. I learned how similar people are, and yet how different our lives are. While I worry about passing classes and what I am going to do after I graduate, many of the people there worry about where they are going to get their next meal, how are they going to survive. It was the most amazing three-month experience that I have ever had. I couldn't have hoped for more, except for hot showers.

Craft Center takes flight

By Meredith Atkinson
Features Editor

Josie Cetta—The Bucknellian

A student works on a project in the Craft Center. Approximately 100 students per week use the Craft Center's facilities each week to create items such as mirrors and picture frames.

Tucked away next to the 7th Street Café, the Craft Center has been described my many regulars as one of the University's hidden treasures. Over the past two years, the University Craft Center has become a much more prominent fixture on campus.

"The Craft Center is a great place to be," April John '03 said.

"It really takes away from the stress of daily life. This is the place on campus I will miss most, the people here are really fun and interesting," Erica Loker '02 said.

The recent success and enthusiasm regarding the Craft Center can be largely attributed to Gretchen Heuges. Heuges began working at the center in September 2000 after running a community art center in Mifflinburg. Since arriving at the University, she has made it her mission to make the center accessible and dependable to students by keeping reliable hours and making all of the machines and tools easy for students to access. She has also enlisted the help of many student advise her on which projects would be successful, and in what students would be interested at the center.

Since Heuges began, a major goal of the Craft Center has been to make it more student oriented. While it has always been open to faculty, community and students, it has only recently begun to lure students, and become a viable alternative on Friday and Saturday nights. Before Heuges arrived, no records were kept regarding the number of students who used the facility, however, the Center has recently been pulling in more than 100 students weekly, reaching a high last week of 158.

Programs at the Center include a range of activities from very simple craft, like making mosaic flowerpots, to very advanced craft, like fine Japanese paper marbling. The Craft Center readily meets the needs of all students. It provides a relaxed and carefree environment with music playing in the background (chosen by the students) allowing visitors to come and unwind.

Professionals are also brought in to teach workshops for those interested in expanding their knowledge in a specific craft. "Workshops are not time consuming, they are taught by experts in the field, and are very product oriented," Hueges said.

In addition to the workshops, the Center also offers classes in fine crafts such as metal smithing, stained glass and advanced pottery. Because the Center buys everything in bulk, they are able to offer students good prices. Most projects cost less than $5 and barely anything exceeds $10.

The Craft Center clientele on campus has also been steadily expanding. "Now that the students are interested, I want the whole campus to understand what a great resource it is." Heuges said.

The Center is frequented by fraternities and sororities, management 101 companies, and the multicultural affairs organization for many of their respective projects. Classes are also beginning to realize how the center could be utilized for their purposes.

This year, a foundation seminar came in regularly to complete one of its projects, and it has been a reliable source of supplying the Capstone Seminar taught by Professor of theater and dance, Paula Davis Larson with materials and space. After Sept. 11, an art history class came in and spent a day there as a way of responding to how they were feeling.

Niki Lloyd has also been incorporating the program into many residence hall programs, and this semester, students came in by the droves to complete 'Bison Blankets' a huge service project in which they made quilts, which were donated to underprivileged children.

The environment at the Craft Center has become distinctly young and fresh. It is organized and modern and designed to accommodate the desires of students with new amenities like a room specifically for pottery.

Today, the Craft Center is a place to expand horizons in a non-academic sense, and seek refuge from busy campus life. "The observation I hear most is: 'it feels like a place on campus that's off campus'" Heuges said.

When I hear the music, it reminds me of my grandmother.

I remember the way she'd make me feel secure. I want that same security when I invest my money. That's why I decided on U.S. Savings Bonds. I like knowing things are where I put

An abroad perspective: a semester in Europe

Watching a street band perform on the Charles Bridge in Prague, Czech Republic.

By William Anton
Contributing Writer

Three out of four years on campus isn't that bad, is it? I guess the story starts when I was a senior in high school and decided to head across the country from Portland, Ore., to Lewisburg, Pa., for four years of undergraduate study at the University. It just may have been that 76-hour bus ride across the United States that implanted the travel bug in me. As if 3,000 odd miles away from home was not enough, after my first two years at the University were completed, I decided to go to Tokyo, Japan for a semester. While I managed to wander back to the University the following spring, my itch for travel was far from satisfied. Sure enough, when summer days had begun to shorten and those annoying adds for school supplies began to show up in every hometown newspaper, I was already wandering across Europe with only a backpack, a couple of friends and a warm Mediterranean breeze to keep me company.

I was a student who used his semester abroad opportunities to his fullest. This was especially true in Europe as I traveled both before, during and after my abroad program. During about six months in Europe, I was able to travel through 14 different countries and the semi-autonomous Gibraltar, not including my brief stay at the airport in Reykjavik, Iceland, as I never technically set foot on the ground there.

Initially my only plans were to meet some friends in Germany and travel. While I had procured a rail pass covering Germany, Switzerland and Italy, I really had no ideas how or to where I would travel. Being my first time to mainland Europe, I guess adventures were imminent, but little did I know that the adventures would start from day one and continue until the day I returned.

Courtesy of William Anton

Anton 'freelance' rooftop camping on the Greek island of Tilos in the Mediterranean Sea.

Without knowing any German, I made it to the central train station in Frankfurt. There I met a couple of students from Dublin who spoke German and later became my friends and guides. I spent the entire evening out with my new friends enjoying a beautiful summer night and matching German hospitality. The next day I was off to Berlin by high-speed train.

Each day brought with it something that to make it memorable. One day it was winding up playing in a competitive pickup soccer match in the central square of Padova, Italy that eventually attracted a rather large crowd of cheering Italians. Another time, it was learning to play the southern Italian card game called "sculpa" on the 18-hour ferry ride from Athens to the Greek Island of Rodos.

As it turned out, a couple months of carrying my life on my back across Europe took its toll on me and a few weeks after I arrived to start my semester in Freiburg, I had to have surgery to repair a hernia. I learned two things from that experience: that the German Healthcare System is wonderful and that I am never going to backpack again carrying my entire SLR camera and its accessories.

In fact, it was during a doctor's visit that I learned about the Sept. 11 Crisis. The affects of the tragedy were felt slightly differently than they were in the United States. About a week later, I was participating in a predominantly Muslim parade expressing support for America in our crisis.

Before I entered the operating room, I managed to sneak away for a long weekend in Prague. This time I traveled solo and while it was lonely compared to my summer travels, there was a feeling of complete freedom and independence. From my temporary apartment, I could look out across the famous Charles Bridge with its art peddlers and performers and then right up to Prague Castle. I spent four days wandering around one of the most historically intact cities in Europe—enjoying its exotic language, heartwarming people and fabulous (and cheap) food.

After my experience in Prague, I was hooked on solo travel and in love with Eastern Europe, so the day my semester ended I left Freiburg headed for Budapest. Although Hungarian is just as indecipherable as Czech language to me, I managed to do quite well there. In fact, I met up with another traveler and spent two days doing a creative photo shoot and cuisine sampling tour of the city. While I tried to learn the history of every place I went, I found that there was so much to learn—that it was all but an insurmountable task. In Budapest, I spent half of a day at a park outside the city studying communist propaganda statues that were prominently displayed in the city before the Iron Curtain fell. It was not your average Western experience.

Anton poses with a group of traveling partners in the Italian city of Venice.

Another problem with learning European history was that it was in a state of evolution even when I was there. In Spain, after the New Year, I experienced the changeover to the Euro first hand. I remember having to argue with a confused Spanish shop attendant who could not figure out the correct Euro change for a Peseta payment and tried to give me change in the old currency. The language barrier did not help much, but I did end up with a candy bar and my change.

This article's purpose, much like the Euro currency, may not have been established sufficiently yet. In sharing my experiences, which have served me well and would not give up for the world, I hope that my fellow students and friends may see the potential of unstructured traveling for an adventurous person. When you take your adventure across the European continent, drop my name—it may just land you a discount. Happy trails!

"Eight out of kids with the most tbushnel common form of leukemia will survive. Two won't. That's unacceptable. To their families. To us. Help us reach our goal and Light the Night," said a poster that was hung around campus weeklong.

On Tuesday evening, April 16, the yellow brilliance of the moonlight shined, accompanied by a sky full of red and white balloons. On this night, the University hosted its first Light the Night Walk, where 250 people came together to benefit those with blood related cancers and their families. The walk raised $7,800 for the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society.

The 3K walk, which began at 6:30 p.m., started and ended between New Residence Hall and Swartz Hall, looping around campus and entering into Lewisburg. Participants who donated $10 received a battery-operated balloon to "light the night." White balloons symbolized cancer survivors and red were symbolic of participants.

"It's been a really good experience. The committee has been awesome in organizing everything," said Erin Zsolcsak '03, a member of the Community Service Team who took charge of the event as the committee-chair person.

In conjunction with the event, The Silhouettes sang at 6:00 p.m. and Sunbury's WQKX broadcasted live from 5 p.m. - 7 p.m. and other entertainment was provided. Following the walk, refreshments courtesy of Wal-Mart, Dunkin Donuts, Weis and Middle's Worth were made available and a 50/50 raffle was held.

After a presentation by the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society in the fall, the University's Community Service Team decided to organize a local event. At the beginning of the semester, Zsolcsak sent out a campus-wide email, receiving 13 responses. Amy Badal, assistant dean of students, served as the advisor, assisted by Joe Santorine, coordinator of the University's recreational services department.

In 1999, after the loss of his two-year-old daughter Elizabeth, Santorine and his wife, Marguerite, have participated in and organized three bone marrow drives adding 1,176 donors to the national bone marrow registry and raising $80,000 to defray the cost of testing.

"Right now, the best course of action is with bone marrow transplants. The key stress here is that they work," Santorine said.

> "It really hit home when we had our first meeting and Mr. Santorine started crying for his daughter who died of Leukemia. You just wanted to cry with him. It brings you this link. . . it was something that opened my eyes and said, 'hey this is what you are fighting for.'"
> —Erin Zsolcsak '03

In 1999, Marguerite Santorine, after her daughter had been diagnosed with leukemia, donated her bone marrow to save her daughter's life. The transplant was successful and the leukemia was beat, yet soon after, Elizabeth succumbed to a massive infection in her trachea that resulted in her death.

"It really hit home when we had our first meeting and Mr. Santorine started crying for his daughter who died of Leukemia. You just wanted to cry with him. It brings you this link . . it was something that opened my eyes and said, 'hey this is what you are fighting for,'" Zsolcsak said.

Every Wednesday, the Light the Night committee met, along with three representatives of the Leukemia and Lymphoma Society from Harrisburg. The committee sent out letters to local businesses, schools and churches within 20 minutes of Lewisburg. They posted fliers at Wal-Mart, set up a table at the LC and eontacted residential hall advisors, sports teams and the presidents of each Greek organization.

"The University students have been very active in raising awareness," Santorine said.

The Light the Night Walk is a national fundraiser for those infected with leukemia, lymphoma, Hodgkin's disease and myeloma. Twenty-eight percent of the benefits go toward patient and community service, 26 percent to research and the remainder is for public health education and fundraising expenses.

Helping bring "to light" a worthy cause, the University anticipates making this walk an annual event.

"The walk will hopefully be an ongoing yearly experience for students to participate in. It's something that is worthwhile," Santorine said.

Those interested in the cause may also contribute by becoming a bone marrow, platelet or blood donor.

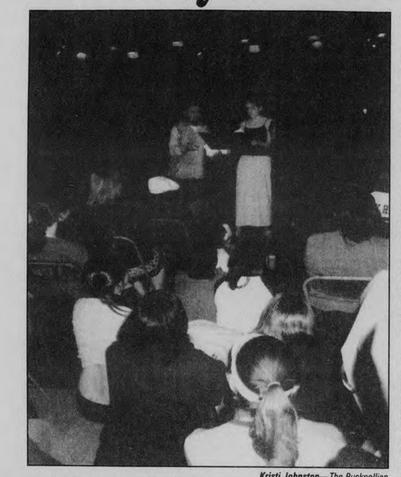
Poetry slam draws crowd



Kristi Johnston—The Bucknellian

Two hundred forty people came to Mirth Grinder's Poetry Slam. Professional Slammer Reggie Cabico got the competition started with freshman Christina McMillan's sacrificial poem.

A&E Editor

Two hundred forty people came to Uptown for the University's second annual poetry slam last week. Although it is still a relatively new art form, the poetry slam has been gaining popularity worldwide in recent years. The slam is a form of poetry that is designed specifically for oral presentation. Slam poems often include unique lyrical and rhythmic qualities and are meant to be read with emotion. The University once again recognized this growing artistic trend, sponsoring its second annual poetry slam last Wednesday, April 10.

Professional slammer Regie Cabico returned to campus to perform and act as emcee for the slam portion of the evening. Joining him were Yolanda Wilkinson and Shappy Seasholtz. Each performed three original poems, demonstrating the power and emotion of performance poetry.

The slam itself was composed of four teams. The FLAG team consisted of Joe Trullinger '03, Josh Fisher '04, Phil Martoma '05 and Kristen Erickson '02. Spontaneous Orgasms, the team sponsored by Mirth Grinder, was composed of Lindsay Betzendahl '04, James Gendron '04, Joshua Tepley '04 and Aaron DeRosa '03. Team D.O.P.E consisted of Josh Beckerman '02, Matt Harlowe '02 , Candacy McCalman '04 and Joe Ned '03. Finally, the Third World Developers were Sophia Schmidt '03, Sarah Rives '02, Dennis Beachy '05, Abraham Nel '02, Morgan Kapp '02, Bill Windle '03 and Han Thurain '04.

The evening's highest individual mark went to Harlowe, who amazed crowds with a poem about the effects of bulimia. His effort helped D.O.P.E. take home second place with a score of 106, barely edged out by Spontaneous Orgasms, who had 107.4. The winning team was awarded an assortment of beach towels, while D.O.P.E. took home "squishy balls." Third place FLAG (104.9) and fourth place Third World Developers (97.3) received Hostess cupcakes.

"I think slam in general is an amazing form of expression that presents a unique challenge for the poets as well as the audience," Michelle Payne '02 said. "And there was so much passion among the slammers. It's always refreshing to see that sort of verve on campus."

There was an open mic competition for those who didn't get a spot on a competitive team. Eleven poets performed their works, including slam organizers DeRosa and Assistant Professor of English Michael Carlin. Christina Macmillan '05, LGBT Director Fran McDaniel and Harlowe also helped make the slam a reality. Organizers, performers and audience members were all pleased with the results of the event.

"The audience itself is ultimately what made this event rock so hard and well," Carlin said. "They were noisy and supportive of the poets, no matter how controversial or strange some of the material performed."

Carlin also commented on the ability of the slam to bring together many different types of people. "Blacks, whites, Asians, straights, gays, lesbians, Goths, jocks, Greeks, video game geeks and a handful of braver-than-average professors — everybody was visible and loud and there to support the same great agenda—that of kickass poetry," he said.

"The crowd was awesome, very supportive and attentive," said Kandy Turner '04, who wowed the crowd with her poem, "Pick-up Truck." "I got a reaction, and that was what I was looking for. I, like everyone, was a little nervous, but I thoroughly enjoyed it—reading and hearing the other poems."

The poetry slam was sponsored by Mirth Grinder, LGBT, Stadler Center for Poetry, the University Association for the Arts, the Bucknell Student Government, Activities and Campus Events, the Office of Multicultural Affairs, The Bucknellian, the University English Department, the President's Office, the Dean of Students' Office and the Residential Colleges.

The Chips drive audience wild

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

The Bison Chips, the all-male a capella group on campus, once again proved why they are popular among members of the campus community. The Chips presented their annual Chipfest concert last Friday, opening with a homemade movie. The Weis Center audience adored the Chips as they impersonated the Crocodile Hunter. Trying to capture sorority girls with low fat yogurt pulled on a string, attempting to hunt the University's own wild squirrels and wearing what can only be described as "racy" outfits, the Chips brought down the house in only the first few minutes of the concert.

Special guests The Dickinson Syrens and The Maryland Treble Makers also were received warmly. Audience members were especially impressed with the Treble Makers, commenting on their unique movement and powerful vocals.

No admiration compared, however, to that that the Chips received from their fellow students. The 13 members charmed the audience with dynamic music, both new and old. In a set that included such songs as U2's "Beautiful Day," Three Dogs Night's "Brandy" and Dire Strait's "Romeo and Juliet," the Chips cite their favorite as Guster's "Either Way."

"The dynamics are incredible, transforming from soft and serene to loud and emotional," Bison Chip Timothy Wojton '03 said. "'Either Way' represents the entire set in one song."

The Chips adhered to tradition, closing with the now familiar "Coney Island Baby." Alumni of the group were also invited to join in.

Colin Brokaw '01 and Jim Ney '01 acted as hosts for the event. "I hear songs on the radio and wish that I could be back [at the University] singing with those guys," Brokaw said. "I sat there in the back and thought, 'Were we ever that good? These guys are good.'"

"Coming to see our son perform with the Bison Chips has been the highlight of being Bucknell parents," Judy Rice, mother of Jordan Rice '02, said. "It's such a great family of guys."

"The guys really looked like they were enjoying themselves. They enjoy singing together. You can tell there's a lot of love," Bob Harris, Bradford Clemens's '03 grandfather, said.

"It's like we have our own fraternity," Wojton said. "We share a close bond. I don't know of any other group of guys that could give the phrase 'appalling and ridiculous' a positive connotation."

Appalling and Ridiculous is the proposed title for the Chips' newest album, slated for release early next spring.

Orchestra concert short and sweet

Final performance of the year features a mix of lively and sentimental pieces

By Julianna Pietak
Staff Writer

The University Orchestra performed its final concert of the semester Saturday, April 13, in the Weis Center. As it has performed several others throughout the course of this year, it promised to make this last one short and sweet, and held this promise throughout.

The orchestra began its program with the "Zampa Overture" by Louis Joseph F. Herold, introduced by the conductor, Associate Professor of Music Christopher Para, as almost unheard of in the present day, but very famous in its own time. In fact, this overture is all that now exists of the opera of which it was once part. The orchestra did an exquisite job bringing to life each of its contrasting sections. The movement from flighty and lively melodies to those that were deeply sentimental made this piece extremely emotional and beautiful.

The next two pieces were almost instantly recognizable as works of Bach. The difference in this performance was in their arrangement—the sounds and instruments used for both melodies were foreign in Bach's time, but have since been applied to showcase the quality of his music.

The first of the two was entitled "Choral Prelude, Sleepers Awake," BWV 645. The orchestration added dimension to this fairly familiar piece, yet did not bog it down with complexity. The orchestra lyrically brought it to life in a simple, yet realistic way. This trend continued in the second Bach piece, "Sheep May Safely Graze," from Cantata 208, BWV 208. Again, the orchestra was able to enhance the familiar melody without losing its essence.

Before ending the program, Para gave a sentimental and humorous goodbye to all the seniors performing in their last orchestra concert. They then went on to their last piece of the evening, Aram Khachaturian's "Masquerade Suite."

"Masquerade Suite" was originally incidental music for a play of its time and, as such, had a dramatic quality throughout. The first movement, the "Waltz," was perhaps the most dramatic of the five contained within the piece. The serene and sentimental "Nocturne" featured a moving solo by concert master Matthew Hoy '02. From there, the piece took on a pompous and almost comical note with the "Mazurka." This was followed by the "Romance," which was slightly melancholy in character, yet still sweet. The final movement, "Galop," ended the "Masquerade Suite" and the concert on a happy note. It was very lively and, again, seemed almost comical in nature.

The whole performance showcased the talent of University students from all departments of the school.

"The orchestra concert this past Saturday was excellent," Sander Hamilton '02 said. "I think it is really unfortunate that so few students attended. In the real world, we will have to pay to see performances like this. Students should take advantage of all the benefits that come with tuition and check out more of the events at the Weis Center."

"Panic Room" too dull and dry

Courtesy of Reuters

"Panic Room," starring Jodie Foster, had potential, but turned out to be unexciting.

By Jessica Cortese
Staff Writer

Fear is a force that can cause normally sane people to do crazy things. In "Panic Room," a millionaire built a room and hid over 20 million dollars in it before he died because he was afraid of being robbed. After recently divorced Meg Altman (Jodie Foster) and her diabetic, bratty daughter Sarah (Kristen Stewart) move into the mansion, fear drives them to hide in the panic room when three burglars break into their new home. Unfortunately for Meg and Sarah, the burglars want the money that is sealed inside the panic room with them.

All of this occurs within the first half hour of the movie and the quick set-up promises a fast-paced suspense thriller that has viewers at the edge of their seats for the remainder of the movie.

However, like most suspense thrillers, this movie doesn't hold up to that promise. Director David Fincher gets too distracted by the complex motives of each of his characters—Meg, Sarah, Meg's ex-husband and the three burglars—to actually keep viewers in suspense.

The characters themselves are typical for a suspense thriller. There are the victims who are scared but strong and resourceful beyond their everyday experience, there are the bad guys who quarrel with one another about what they should do and there are even some unsuspected heroes at the end. The plot, the characters and the acting can only be described as typical. For example, the acclaimed Foster was shown up by Stewart when Sarah enters a near-comatose state due to her diabetic condition.

The story has potential, but everything worked out much too nicely. For example, in the room that has everything from television surveillance equipment to fire-safe blankets and first-aid kits, how believable is it that there isn't a single item of food that would be able to keep Sarah from going into diabetic shock? But there isn't, so Meg must overcome her fear to save her daughter, and the story goes on from there. There are a few exciting plot twists, but most of the movie is as bland as toast.

Underground band to play at Uptown

By Chad Flood
Senior Writer

Students will soon be able to open up, get their aggression out and sing along with one of the fastest rising underground bands in America, Lucky Boys Confusion. Blending their influences of punk rock, reggae and hip-hop, this five-piece band from the Chicago area brings energy, excitement and fun to every show it plays, and will perform at the University on April 26.

"Our live playing has always been a huge factor in the appeal of the band," guitarist Adam Krier said. "It's usually what reels people in."

During 1997, while playing local clubs and bars, the band recorded its first EP, What Gets Me High. Little did it know the success that was to follow.

The next year, the band's first full album, Growing Out of It, was released. Starting a sort of grassroots campaign, the band sold copies of the disc out of their cars and during shows, and the audience quickly grew. Before they knew it, these five suburban kids were performing shows from Milwaukee to Iowa City, and they realized that they were starting to pick up steam.

Luckily, their newfound success has not changed the band's outlook on music.

"When we went to [Los Angeles] to work on the album, we realized we were looking forward to this next phase of working with a bigger label, but that at the same time, we wanted to remember what was back there," singer "Stubby" Pandav said.

Each song Lucky Boys Confusion writes ties together elements of fun with deeper messages, a key factor in reaching out to an intelligent young audience.

"Kids are still hungry for music with a message, even in times of watered down boy bands and testosterone fueled rap-metal clones," Pandav said. "We know who we are and we know what's best for us. We've come so far. We're going to work our asses off to make sure this happens for us."

The show will begin at 9:30 p.m. on April 26 at Uptown, and two other bands will also be included on the bill. It is recommended that fans show up early, as this should be one of the most popular events at the club this year.

The long and winding road

RICHARD PETEREC

The year is 1957; the University is but a shadow of what exists today. The Bison is located in the 7th Street Café, the Bookstore on first-floor Carnegie and administrative offices are in Roberts. Swartz Hall, only half as large as it is now, houses 222 freshman men; construction of the Langone Center is still more than a decade away. Ground is broken for the University's newest building, named after Dr. William H. Coleman, in October.

Prior to Coleman's construction, the academic quad was a very different place. With cement from Bertrand Library still wet, it and Vaughan Literature Building were the only structures there at the time.

Gradually though, with the additions of Marts Hall and Freas Hall in the early 1960s, the University shifted itself from the old uphill quad—Main College (Roberts), East College (Trax), West College (Kress) and Carnegie—to the present-day academic quad.

Coleman, one of the building blocks for the visionary new Academic Quad, was completed and dedicated in late January 1959. Two years later, almost to the day, Professor of Geography and International Relations Richard Peterec taught his first class at the University.

Peterec's affinity for geography was evident at a young age. As a boy, he would collect road maps from nearby gas stations in his hometown of Queens, N.Y. In high school, Peterec first discovered his thirst for the "exoticness of traveling," a theme which has helped characterize him over the years.

The professor used to hitchhike with friends across the country and sometimes up into Canada, simply for the enjoyment of traveling.

"In those days it was safe," Peterec said. "We used to sleep in churches on the pews or in parks covered in newspaper. We'd eat at the Salvation Army."

Traveling aside, education has also always been a priority for Peterec. He completed his undergraduate studies close to home at Queens College, majoring in economics and political science.

He went on to earn his law degree from New York University and earned his Masters from Columbia Business School.

With his education complete, Peterec signed a three-year contract with the Office of Naval Research, much of that time being spent overseas. When the contract expired in 1961, Peterec returned from Africa and was almost immediately offered a position as a professor here at the University.

"Coming to Bucknell was completely by coincidence—I was offered a job for one semester and I ended up staying for a year, then another, then another," Peterec said. "It just happened that way."

What happened, of course, has turned into a 41-year

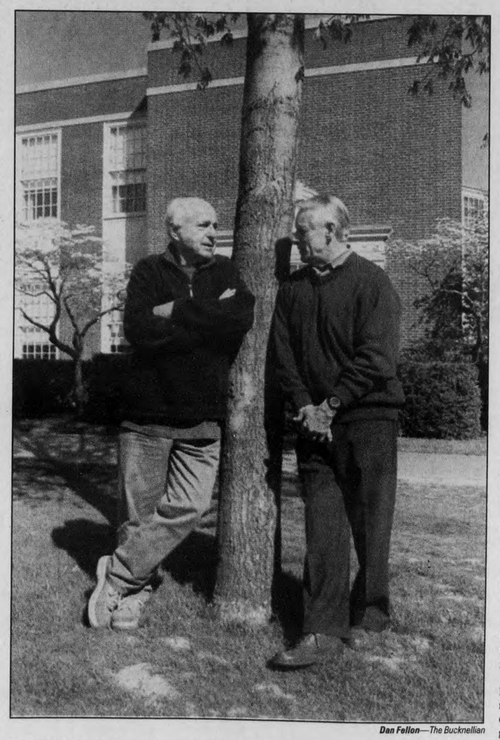
DOUG CANDLAND



Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

Professor of Geography and International Relations Richard Peterec (left) and Professor of Psychology Doug Candland began teaching at the University within one semester of each other in 1960-1961 academic year. Becoming great friends over the years, both men will retire at the end of this semester.

By Sandi-Jo Galati
News Editor

With the opening of the doors to the new O'Leary building for the fall 2002 semester, a new era will begin for the psychology department. Meanwhile, as this semester draws to a close, the proceeding 42-years of social and scholarly dedication will become legendary in the history of the University with the retirement of Douglas Candland, professor of psychology and director of the animal behavior program.

"Doug's contributions are hard to quantify," University President Steffen Rogers said. "He has been a leader among the faculty, but in a very quiet way, and he has tuned out large numbers of students who love him to this day."

Candland earned his Bachelor of Arts degree from Pomona College in 1956 and his Ph.D. from Princeton University in 1959. He began teaching in the department of psychology at the University in 1960.

In 1965, studies of the relationships between biology, psychology and zoology gained increasing interest, prompting the establishment of a new academic program in animal behavior.

"Bucknell had a long history in the study of animal behavior and zoology going back to the 1870s," Candland said. "So we thought it might be time to combine these interests. The faculty and board of trustees agreed, and they constructed a program in animal behavior."

In 1967, Candland became the director of the new animal behavior program, a position that he still holds, having never taken a course in primatology, simply because such courses did not exist.

"I was just at the right time to be that first generation of people who constructed a science of primatology," Candland said.

From this, Candland established what Rogers describes as "one of the finest animal behavior programs in the world."

The animal behavior program, although stressing the biological sciences, holds in high esteem the humanities and character of the undergraduate liberal arts education of the University and that which Candland received from Pomona College.

"Candland thoroughly embraces the liberal arts agenda which Bucknell promotes," said Katie Wharton '02, an animal behavior major. "He is a very well-rounded person and is a lover of knowledge."

His love of psychology and primatology has been furthered by his dedication to research at the University. Candland strongly encourages non-invasive research with the primates located in the animal behavior labs.

"Candland's leadership of the Animal Behavior Program at Bucknell has created a completely unique educational environment for students," said Elizabeth Capaldi, assistant professor of psychology and future director of the animal behavior program. "He has excelled both in the classroom and in his research career."

Candland's research fellowships have welcomed him to sea

Erica Delsandro '02

By Rachel Laskow
Editor-in-Chief

Dan Fellon—The Bucknellian

Throughout her four years at the University, Erica Delsandro '02 has made significant contributions to ACE and BSG. She has also excelled academically, especially through her honors thesis about Virginia Woolfe. Many people who know Delsandro say they will miss her charismatic attitude and friendly smile.

When Erica Delsandro '02 came to the University in fall 1998, she did not expect to be as involved as she was in high school. However, within a few weeks, that all changed.

"I didn't think I'd be this involved at college. I was involved in high school, and I came to college thinking I'd be a different person, try new things, but I took the same route, times two. Looking back, I wouldn't have it any other way. I wouldn't have had half of the experiences I did or met half of the people I know now," Delsandro said.

Not only has Delsandro been involved at the University, but she has aided in the development and improvement of many organizations.

"She moves and leads in quiet ways but her actions have resulted in significant and positive changes for this campus," Assistant Dean of Students Kari Conrad said, who has worked with Delsandro through the Bucknell Student Government (BSG) and Activities and Campus Events (ACE).

During her first year here, Delsandro was on the committee that organized the first Chyrsalis at the University. The event has now become a University tradition.

"It's been rewarding to see Chrysalis evolve," Delsandro said.

Assistant Director of Campus Activities and Programs Kathy Arnett, who has worked with Delsandro through ACE, also sees Delsandro's importance in organizing the Chrysalis Ball.

"She played an integral role in the planning of the very first Chrysalis Ball and has remained loyal to this event throughout her tenure at Bucknell," Arnett said.

BSG is another area in which Delsandro's influence has not only improved the organization, but the University as a whole.

During the spring of her junior year and fall of her senior year Delsandro had the difficult task of heading the Recognition Committee on BSG. This Committee rewrote the guidelines regarding club recognition at the University. Although Delsandro feels that her experience on the Committee was rewarding, she still feels that it challenged her, because of the many considerations that she had when rewriting the guidelines.

Delsandro admits that even though she likes being busy, involved and active, she sometimes feels overwhelmed. According to Delsandro, her interaction with people gets her through each day.

"Sometimes I feel like, When will it ever stop? When I start to feel that way, something always comes through at the same time that makes it all seem worthwhile again. There is a sense of satisfaction that is associated with involvement. And most often, this satisfaction emerges through the people with whom I work and interact," Delsandro said.

The people she works with also feel that Delsandro has influenced their careers.

"For me, she represents everything about the true Bucknell spirit and the mission of this great university. Personally, she motivates me to be the best that I can be as an adviser, for it is students like Erica who are so instrumental in my passion for my job," Arnett said.

In the fall of her junior year, Delsandro decided to go take a break from her busy life at the University and travel to Bath, England for a semester. According to Delsandro, her time in Bath put her on her present academic tract.

"It sparked my interest in Virginia Woolf and introduced me to career paths I had, until then, not considered. Overall, my semester abroad was a priceless experience; I really grew and changed and became much more self-aware that semester," Delsandro said.

Since her return from abroad and her summer of independent study at the University, Delsandro has been working on her honors thesis in English. She is writing on the relationship between the novels of Virginia Woolf and the theories and practices of the art historian Roger Fry, who was a good friend of Woolf's.

"Of the dozens of honors theses and student research projects I've advised at Bucknell, Erica's work is right up there at the top in terms of its originality and quality of thought," Delsandro's adviser and Professor of English Michael Payne said.

Delsandro was invited to present her research at the National Virginia Woolf Conference at Sonoma State University in summer 2002.

"It is interesting to see a project start as one thing and then to watch it evolve to what it is now. I have been invested in it for nearly a full year. [My thesis] has been the most challenging project as well as one of the most enlightening and satisfying," Delsandro said.

Delsandro has also excelled in other academic areas. She has been on the Dean's List for all four years of college and is a member of the Phi Beta Kappa honors society.

"She has excelled by her intellectual endeavors, by which she personifies the mission of this university," Delsandro's adviser and Professor of English Harold Schweizer said.

Despite her constant involvement in academic and extracurricular activities, Delsandro still finds time for social activities.

"She is an intellectual who balances a very impressive academic career with a great social life. She draws people to her, and they want to get to know her. She is a wonderful person, and I am so honored to call her my friend," Katy Zachry '02 said.

According to Delsandro, her biggest challenge here has been to take care of herself and to make sure that she enjoyed what she was involved in.

"I also had to make sure that I was on my to-do list, that I wasn't overlooking my studies or neglecting what is truly important, like my friends," Delsandro said. "I honestly couldn't have made it through these four years without them. I always want to make sure that I gave them the time they deserve in return. The relationships I have made here at Bucknell are definitely ones that I want to last a lifetime."

Delsandro's friend and roommate Christen Braun '02 agrees that despite Delsandro's involvement, she still finds time for her friends.

"Erica is motivated and constantly challenging herself. She is extremely loyal and supportive of her friends," Braun said.

Dustin White '02, Delsandro's boyfriend, also believes that Delsandro accepts challenges and always reaches for high goals.

"She's burning with bright energy, her wisdom is that of a mother, her demeanor that of a curious child. Erica is fearless, and sets her expectations well beyond what anyone expects of her," White said.

Although Delsandro currently does not have specific plans for the future, she would ideally like to get her Ph.D. in children's literature.

"Along with being an exceptional student, Erica has all of the intangibles necessary for success. There is no doubt that she is going far in life," friend Monique LeBlanc '02 said.

Zachry agrees that Delsandro will find success in her future.

"She is going to be extremely successful one day in whatever she chooses as her path. She's so talented, there are many paths from which she can choose," Zachry said.

Delsandro considers the University her home and will miss the people and memories.

"I think my years at Bucknell have definitely been a huge influence in my evolution as a person. The people and experiences that have helped compose my Bucknell career have been integral in creating the person I am today, and hopefully will continue to influence the person I will become tomorrow," Delsandro said.

IFC passes new rush policies

Changes aim to make rush more equitable

By Carmen Mauriello
Senior Writer

The Interfraternity Council (IFC) passed a new recruitment plan on April 16. It contained three major changes to the rush process: lengthening rush by a week, requiring that candidates visit each fraternity twice and instituting a system where candidates rank their top six choices after round one.

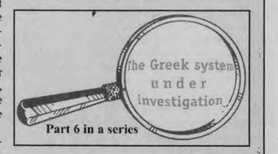
The primary aim of the plan is to make the rush process more equitable, a step toward eliminating the size disparities between the University's fraternities.

"Hopefully, this will give the smaller houses a lot more exposure to a lot more guys," IFC President Aziz Megji '03 said.

The IFC debated additional measures aiming to increase parity among fraternities, deciding not to institute caps on a fraternity's total membership or pledge class but rather to promote the importance of becoming Greek.

The new recruitment plan focused on three particular areas.

First, the IFC decided to lengthen rush from a week and a half to two and a half weeks. This change was made to respect Jewish students who might be going home for Rosh Hashanah, which would have fallen on the same day as bid day.



Part 6 in a series

Second, candidates will be required to visit many more fraternities. In the past, candidates were only required to visit four houses during the first round of rush. This resulted in some fraternities hosting over 90 candidates in one night while others struggled to host 40 to 50 during the entire rush period.

This new policy eliminates the possibility of such a disparity, because it requires rush candidates to visit all twelve fraternity houses twice during the rush period.

Each night the candidates will visit four fraternities, grouped according to their location. They will go through this rotation twice during round one, which will last a week and a half. Round one will conclude with a free night where candidates can visit the fraternities of their choice. Round two was unchanged.

Chi Phi President John Purcell '03 said his fraternity's recruitment process was severely hindered in the fall because only 40 of the 308 rush candidates visited Chi Phi. By leveling the playing field in rush, Purcell said the new policy is a step toward reducing the size disparities among fraternities.

"The policy will give a chance for the smaller houses to get their message out to everyone who's rushing," Purcell said.

Kappa Sigma President Dan Muchler '03 agreed that the policy is a step in the right direction, but he wasn't convinced that it would create more equality among fraternities. He said that one problem is that candidates might go to some fraternities to just sign their rush books and then quickly leave, because there is no requirement for how long a candidate must visit each house. Still, Muchler said the rotation system will make rush less demanding for fraternities.

"This makes it easier on the fraternity side because we don't have

$8 million contributed to University by alumnus

Robert E. Smith '39 donated $8 million, the largest charitable payment in University history, to the basketball arena of the new Athletic and Recreation Center.

Robert E. Smith '39 contributed $8 million to the new Recreation and Athletic Center in late February in order to ensure a state-of-the-art basketball arena. This contribution to the University is the largest single charitable gift to date, and will be used to help fund the new 4,000-seat arena. Smith Hall was named in his honor in 1987.

"It's an almost unbelievable gift-literally the largest charitable payment in the history of the University," said Mark Elliott, director of Planned Giving. "There have been larger pledges, but this is the largest single payment that we've ever received."

Elliott stressed that planning the contribution was a long, but fun process.

Smith specified that he would like the funds to be focused on the arena in order to ensure a superior basketball and intramural sports program. In order to name a facility or a portion of a facility, donors are required to provide half the cost-after an additional $2 million is raised, Smith will have the opportunity to name the arena.

"I happened to play in the first basketball game ever in Davis Gym, and I thought at the time it was Utopia because our previous games had all been played in the old Tustin gym," Smith said.

Tustin, built in 1890, is located behind the Gateways and currently provides space for the theater and dance departments. The basketball teams used to play 14-day seasons in the Tustin Gymnasium and were coached by a student. The gym's stay at the University, although the end is sneaking up ever so swiftly as Peterec prepares for retirement at the end of this year.

"Dick will really be missed around here—his ranting and raving down the hall in Coleman about one international crisis or another keeps all of us engaged, and not a little entertained," said Karen Morin, associate professor of geography.

"Dick's got a terrific sense of humor that has probably been one of the key contributors to his phenomenal teaching career. Even now, his classes are packed and you never see him walking anywhere without a knot of students surrounding him," Morin said.

One of Peterec's most distinguishing features has always been his ability to interact and understand students; not surprisingly, it will be one of the things he misses most about teaching.

"The students keep help keep me young and up-to-date - I've become close friends with several of my students," Peterec said. "One of my favorite things to do is playing cards with students on Fridays, or playing squash or racquetball with the kids."

Richard Peterec (left) and Doug Candland (right) retire after over four decades of teaching at the University.

But much has changed since Feb. 1, 1961 when Peterec began teaching here. While he maintains a good relationship with students, he says there's a lot he misses about the way things used to be.

"The mood of the campus in the late 1960s and the 1970s was much more free-willed than it is now. I look back at the students in that era and they were much more non-conformist. The spirit of the students is what stands out the most—I miss that atmosphere," Peterec said.

> "I still enjoy teaching, just like the first day. I'm older, grayer and heavier, but I still look forward to going into the classroom everyday."
> —Richard Peterec, professor of geography and international relations*

The professor likens the changes on campus to changes in academia in general and the restrictions that have been placed on it. He believes the changes in society over the years are reflected at the University today.

"Bucknell was more of a family then, from the administration on down," he said. "The informality, the camaraderie; it isn't present as much anymore."

> "I am very happy to be twinned with my old companion Dick Peterec. He is older than I am physically, but I have been at Bucknell longer. And I am wiser because I have taken a course from him."
> —Doug Candland, professor of psychology*

Still, entering the last week of such a long and enduring career, Peterec is deeply saddened to think of life without the University. His good friend and fellow professor of 40 years, Doug Candland, will also be leaving the University after the end of this year.

"I still enjoy teaching, just like the first day. I'm older, grayer and heavier," he says jokingly," but I still look forward to going into the classroom everyday."

"There isn't another professor at Bucknell who has been as successful as Dick Peterec in giving students the ability to learn throughout their lives," said colleague Ben Marsh, professor of geography and environmental studies.

"Geography at Bucknell simply would not exist without Dick's extraordinary impact over the years in helping students, professors, and administrators understand the value of geography as a college subject," Marsh added.

Tom Travis, professor of international relations and political science, says he will miss the inspiration Peterec brought to the job.

Peterec deeply cares about students' academic development and their personal lives and has been a good friend to many hundreds of students over the years. He has taken students on numerous foreign excursions, most often to East Europe under communist rule, the former Soviet Union, and the Middle East, opening students to new cultures and ideas and to great adventures. I and the faculty of the international relations program will greatly miss him.

Peterec's secretary, Kim DiRocco, says that she will remember "his warm smile and joking nature. I will especially miss all the excitement that his presence brought to our hallway and the entourage of students that seemed to follow him wherever he went."

"He [Peterec] is the most natural teacher I have ever seen," Candland said. "He's the same person in front of the class as he is privately. And I think that's the secret of his teaching success, that it is authentic."

On the other hand, Candland will be the first to admit that after his many years spent educating at the University, he too is still learning.

"As a beginning teacher I thought teaching consisted of speaking and lecturing. But now 42 years later I feel it is about listening very carefully," Candland said. "Students have much to tell you. They know a great deal. They don't know they know, you just have to listen carefully to pull out what they know."

Candland retires having listened to thousands of students, challenging students to articulate their knowledge and expand what they learn in the classroom into their everyday lives.

"Professor Candland is in many ways the quintessential Bucknell teacher-scholar. He is an international figure in his field, who has reflected substantial glory on the University," said Charles Pollock '71, vice president of student affairs. "Yet above all, he is devoted to his students and to making a meaningful difference in their lives."

Candland's colleagues look to him as a mentor who has established a certain model of excellence for the University.

"His teaching is legendary; his long-term associations with his students provide a model for the rest of us who would have positive impact on the lives of those we are privileged to teach," Sojka said.

After his official retirement, Candland plans to continue his position as editor of the scholastic journal A Review of General Psychology, a job that he confesses currently requires half his time, and all of his other commitments except teaching at the University. Meanwhile, Candland proudly reflects upon the role he has played in the University, continuing to challenge its growth as he does the growth of his students.

> "As a beginning teacher I thought teaching consisted of speaking and lecturing. But now 42 years later I feel it is about listening very carefully. Students have much to tell you. They know a great deal..."
> —Doug Candland, professor of psychology*

"I truly hope that Bucknell continues to do what it does well. I hope financially we work hard to join that group of colleges that make every attempt to fill the financial need of all the students it accepts," Candland said. "There is a continuing challenge to help in ways, however small, to see the place grow as a cultural and intellectual institution which every school must do if they are going to be around for as long as Bucknell has. I am very cheered by what Bucknell has become and is becoming. It represents the lifetimes of many people over 170 years. It has been a great honor to be associated with it."

research at Princeton University, the University of Virginia, Tulane University, Pennsylvania State University and of course his work in the primate labs at the University.

His scholarly ethics coupled with his research findings have established him as a leader in his field and gained him worldwide recognition. Candland's visiting professorships include the University of Stirling, Scotland, Cambridge University, England, University of Mysore, India, University of California at Berkeley and Harvard University. Still, his heart remained close to home.

"Candland is an internationally known and respected authority in his field and he has always been there for this community when we needed anything from a stimulating speaker to a cool head in a crisis," said Gary Sojka, professor of biology. "I can only hope that though retired, he will still be an ongoing presence on this campus and in our extended University community."

Over the past four decades, Candland has been a leader in weathering the many challenges faced by the University community from the days when all students were required to attend chapel, through the Vietnam era and times when the faculty was small enough that they shared a distinctive companionship, one of which he has shared with Richard Peterec, professor of geography and international relations, who is retiring this year after 41 years of teaching.

"I am very happy to be twinned with my old companion Dick Peterec. He is older than I am physically, but I have been at Bucknell longer," Candland said. "And I am wiser because I have taken a course from him."

Candland, however modest about his own accomplishments, withheld no praises about Peterec's impact on the student body.

Candland's legacy of wisdom and dedication to the University will live on far beyond his departure from the academic quad after the May 19 Commencement exercises. It will live on in the animal behavior program he has developed, the faculty members his has inspired the students he has mentored and the friends who remember his gentle smile.

"In my mind Doug Candland is the consummate professional," Rogers said. "I will always remember the silver hair, the soft voice, the presence, the commitment to students and the commitment to his scholarship. He is the full package."

University purchases wind powered energy

By Jen Jenchura
Senior Writer

Seven Pennsylvania colleges and universities announced last Thursday their ongoing commitment to the environment by purchasing wind-generated electricity from new Pennsylvania wind farms. These recent purchases bring the total number of Pennsylvania colleges and universities buying wind power to 25, the most of any state in the country.

The University will purchase one million kilowatt hours of wind energy a year, replacing more than half the electricity it currently purchases from traditional power plants.

"I am extremely pleased that Bucknell University has the opportunity to participate in a totally environmentally sound energy-producing system," University President Steffen Rogers said.

The University currently generates 95 percent of its electricity needs from a highly efficient, low-emissions cogeneration plant on campus, owned and operated by the University. It is called a cogeneration plant because it generates not only electricity, but also steam, which is used to operate the heating and cooling systems for University buildings.

"The wind energy purchase will replace 60 percent of the electricity currently purchased from the utility grid," said Dennis Hawley '72, associate vice president for facilities at the University. "Combining wind energy with cogeneration allows Bucknell to meet nearly all of the campus energy needs in a very environmentally responsible or 'green' manner."

In addition to the University, Allegheny College, Dickinson College, Franklin & Marshall College, Gannon University, Gettysburg College, Juniata College and Swarthmore College have joined the University of Pennsylvania, Penn State University, Carnegie Mellon University and the State System of Higher Education in the ranks of Pennsylvania colleges and universities that have led the way on wind power purchases, by purchasing a portion of their electricity from newly developed wind power projects.

Community Energy, the wind power marketer, announced the sales last week in conjuction with the Pennsylvania Consortium for Interdisciplinary Environmental Policy (PCEIP). PCEIP is an organization comprised of the Pennsylvania Department of Environmental Protection and the Pennsylvania Department of Conservation and Natural Resources.

New rush policies to be implemented in the fall

to host events every day," Muchler said.

Roy Baker, associate dean of students and director of fraternity and sorority affairs, said that the new policy also has benefits for candidates, especially for the dozens who "suicide rush." This is the term for students who enter rush already having determined which fraternity they want to join, and then spend virtually all their time during rush at that one fraternity. But if the "suicide rusher" is denied from his top-choice fraternity, Baker said he usually decides not to become Greek, because he did not visit many other fraternities.

Baker said the new policy gives such a student more options. "It gives a candidate the opportunity to go back to other fraternities if he gets eliminated from the one he originally wanted to join, because he's visited all the other houses," Baker said.

The third prong of the recruitment plan requires candidates to rank their top six fraternity choices after the first round of rush. Megji explained that these rankings will be an invaluable resource for fraternities, who in the past have had difficulties in gauging the interest level of candidates.

"The rankings allow the fraternity to know what guys are thinking seriously about it," Megji said.

He said that this information would lead to better "bid matching," since the fraternities would likely only extend bids to students who have a strong interest in them while not wasting their time on candidates who are likely to go elsewhere.

> Instead of instituting caps on fraternities, the IFC is trying to retain rush candidates by promoting the importance of becoming Greek.

The IFC heeded the recommendations of the Alumni Greek Council and Baker to explore a total membership cap and lowering the pledge class cap, respectively. But after a lengthy discussion at this Tuesday's meeting, it decided not to institute either measure.

Several fraternity presidents commented that caps may be able to create more parity in the long run, but they said the caps did little to solve the short-term problem that some fraternities could be lost if-their recruitment does not improve.

In the short run, Muchler said that the caps would likely diminish the number of rush candidates who become Greek. He attributed this to the common "suicide rush" mentality, saying that the extra students eliminated from the larger fraternities due to the cap would likely decide not to become Greek.

Instead of caps, Megji said the IFC is taking a different approach to creating more equality among fraternities, trying to retain more rush candidates by promoting the importance of becoming Greek.

He said that if candidates place more value on gaining the Greek experience, then many who were denied by their top-choice fraternity would decide to look into another fraternity, instead of abandoning the Greek System. He said this would likely spark more interest in the smaller fraternities.

The IFC is looking into several ways to promote its message. According to Phi Kappa Psi President Brandon Jackson '03, one option is to better communicate the advantages of membership to candidates.

"A lot of freshmen and non-Greeks only see the fraternities as social outlets," Jackson said. "When you join them, you realize there are many opportunities available for you."

He said these benefits might be better communicated through more informative rush events.

Megji said that another option is having more Greek-only events. One such event is the all-Greek celebration the IFC is planning on Fraternity Road on the welcome day of rush.

Baker stressed the importance for the fraternities to uphold this pro-Greek, cooperative mentality in their recruitment drives. He said that in the past there have been problems with fraternities badmouthing other fraternities during rush and discouraging candidates from joining these houses.

He said that the fraternities must instead encourage candidates that they deny to consider joining other fraternities in order for the rush process to become more equitable.

Switchover to A/C problematic

With mechanical problems and uncertain weather forecasts, switchover from heat to A/C in dorms is delayed

By Michelle Dombeck
A&E Layout Editor

The unusually hot weather last week brought the temperatures in some of the University's air-conditioned dorms to levels that were anything but comfortable. The New Residence Hall (New Res), Smith and Swartz Halls all experienced mechanical problems during the extreme heat. Despite this brief period however, the temperatures in most of these air-conditioned dorms should be more comfortable for the rest of the year.

When dorms have air conditioning, the air conditioning in individual rooms is not always on and immediately available.

"The rooms in residence halls with air conditioning are either in a heating or cooling mode—you cannot have heating in one area and cooling in another. So if you are in heating mode and you turn it all the way to the coolest setting you get tempered—not cool—air," said Mike Patterson, assistant director of Physical Plant. "Many of the residence hall rooms have individual controls to regulate the temperature of the air being supplied to the room, but in the heating mode the air temperatures never truly get 'cool' at the coldest setting and in the A/C mode the air temperatures never truly get 'hot' at the hottest setting."

Because the weather was not forecasted to stay as warm as it did, the rooms were not changed to cooling mode.

"In the New Residence Hall it takes us a good half day, if nothing goes wrong, to get the system switched over from heating to cooling so we try not to make that switch until the temperatures are forecast to be consistently at levels that require air conditioning," Patterson said.

New Res has two temperature systems. The common areas of the dorm—lounges, bathrooms, etc.—are on a more expensive four-pipe system, while the individual rooms are on a two-pipe system.

"With a four-pipe system you can switch between heating and cooling with little effort. You cannot do the same with a two-pipe system," Patterson said. "We had problems last week with the changeover from heating to cooling in the system serving the rooms so we never did get air conditioning in the rooms, but with the change [to cooler outside] temperatures, we are back in the heating mode."

The air conditioning was on in the common areas of New Res, though, leaving part of the dorm extremely warm and the other chilly.

"There was no air conditioning when it was hot outside and we really needed it, except for in the bathrooms or lounge where it was like an ice house," said Cari Haimes '05, a New Res resident.

The residents of Smith Hall, a normally air-conditioned dorm, also suffered last week when a part failed. Some of the residents escaped the heat by going outside.

"The temperatures in Smith would be in the mid to high 90s," said Jennifer Prunoske '05, a Smith resident. "People would go outside because it was cooler than the temperature indoors."

Swartz also experienced some start-up problems that left the dorm without air conditioning early in the week. All of the mechanical problems are fixed though, and with the exception of New Res, which takes half a day to switch systems, the temperatures in the air-conditioned dorms should be returning to normal again.

Student participation makes breast cancer walk a success

By Aly Rentrop
Staff Writer

On Sunday, April 14, a group of sorority sisters joined together to "paint Bucknell pink" at the first ever breast cancer walk/run. The idea was initially proposed during a sorority discussion hosted by the Women's Resource Center (WRC) where campus issues were raised, and it was decided that an event benefiting breast cancer would be held. The event was a huge success, raising an estimated $6,000 which surpassed the $5,000 goal. Junior Morgan Paige participated in the walk and commented, "It was great to see so many sororities working for the same cause."

Senior Dena Ebert led the event, along with the WRC who helped with its orchestration. Ebert was responsible for the formation of a planning committee which had representatives from each sorority come together. The committee had been meeting since January to plan for the walk, and other contributors included the Bucknell Panhellenic Association and Dean of Students Richard Ferraro, who helped get the event in motion. In addition, major contributions were made by students and faculty. All proceeds from the walk went directly to the National Breast Cancer Foundation. A raffle for prizes donated by local businesses was also held, and sophomore Garry Thaniel was the announcer for the event.

Junior Lisa Sechrist participated in the walk and was quite impressed with the event as a whole.

"I think it was amazing seeing all the support from students on campus, especially those girls who brought their mothers to join them," said Sechrist.

Due to the success of the walk, Ebert and others are hopeful that it will be held again next year.

basketball court had rounded corners because of a track that encircled it.

"Bucknell rarely lost a home game in those days because there wasn't another court like it anywhere. It led Bucknell to develop the first three-out, two-back zone defense," Smith said. "Now here we are, 60-some years later, and look where we've come to."

Smith's passion and experience with the basketball program was the primary motivation in the contribution.

"This is an amazing act of generosity, and we are incredibly grateful to the Smiths," said University President Steffen Rogers. "Starting in the fall, the result of their generosity is going to be directly appreciated by our present Bucknell students and their gift will impact generations of Bucknell students into the future."

Born in 1917, Smith graduated from the University with a degree in economics and married alumna Margaret "Peg" Farrell '41 in 1942. Smith took over as president of the Beaunit Corporation in 1977, the company responsible for Rayon, Acrilan and Astroturf, which is similar to the FieldTurf installed in May 2001 in the Christy Mathewson Memorial Stadium. In 1988, Smith was named chair of the Board of Trustees, and nine years later received the "Loyalty to Bucknell" award.

"Working with Bob was a blast. I've known him since 1985 and he is one of the first trustees I have met. He's a really great guy-he had an interesting career. And, he is still interested in what students are doing. He seems to be very pleased by the result of the gift," Elliott said.

The Recreation and Athletic Center, scheduled to be completed in December 2002, will open in phases. The Olympic-sized pool and portions of the fitness center will be open during the fall 2002 semester. The building is scheduled to host official events at the start of the Spring 2003 semester.

IFC decides not to enforce BYOB

By Carmen Mauriello
Senior Writer

The Interfraternity Council (IFC) decided in March not to enforce a bring-your-own-beer (BYOB) policy at fraternities. Instead it left enforcement in the hands of the fraternities' national organizations.

Roy Baker, associate dean of students and director of fraternity and sorority affairs, said that a major reason why IFC decided not to enforce BYOB was because it did not fall under the University's risk management policy but rather was a policy of the fraternities' national organizations.

Also, many IFC members said that the trial period of BYOB at fraternities revealed many shortcomings with the policy.

A major shortcoming concerned the logistics of the rule that each student could only bring a maximum of six beers to a BYOB party. The difficulty arose because Pennsylvania law prohibits beer distributors from selling six-packs, so the only locations in the area where students could purchase six-packs were bars.

Also, there was a weak student response to the policy. Phi Kappa Psi President Brandon Jackson '03 said that when his house hosted a BYOB event, only one student brought his own beer—and it was bottles, which were impermissible.

IFC President Aziz Megji '03 said that the IFC encourages the fraternities to comply with their national policies. Still, he said that if the fraternities comply with Bucknell risk management policies and don't have any major incidents, they likely wouldn't be sanctioned by their nationals for failing to comply with BYOB.

Baker said that the University is still looking into the third-party vendor option for supplying alcohol at fraternity parties. He said that it could substantially decrease fraternities' liability in hosting parties.

He said that if the legalities of having a third-party vendor were approved, the University would not require it for fraternity parties but would rather give fraternities the option to select the service. He said many fraternities have already expressed interest in this service.

Students participate in MUN

By Christopher Styers
Staff Writer

In late March, a group of nine University students traveled to the University of Virginia in Charlottesville, Va. in late March to meet with other college students equally interested in the U.S. Government and world events. These students descended on the campus conceived by world diplomat, Thomas Jefferson, for the Seventh annual session of the Virginia International Committee Simulation (VICS).

VICS was modeled after a successful high school conference (VAMUN) and was designed to provide "a truly unique conference experience that [is] unlike any other on the college Model United Nations circuit" (http://scs.student.virginia.edu). From its humble beginnings in 1996, this conference has grown to facilitate 11 committees of 10 to 30 delegates discussing important issues concerning the United States and the world.

For the first time, University students, through the creation of a Model United Nations Club on campus, participated in this event. The Bucknell Model United Nations delegation, advised by Tom Travis, professor of political science, traveled to the University of Virginia. Each member prepared to participate in debates and discussions concerning their focus area.

In past years, the conference has focused on issues such as the Crisis in Somalia (1996), Northern Ireland Peace Talks (1998) and Drafting of the Universal Declaration on Human Rights (2001). Delegates are expected to research their topics prior to the conference, and are provided background guides as a way to prepare their research.

As Dawn M. Bell, staff director of VICS 2002, wrote, "I must stress that preparation by the delegates is essential to a beneficial experience. The intimate committee sessions can only benefit delegates when they come to the conference ready to participate and knowledgeable about their positions."

Some of the topics that the University delegation researched were Emergency Bioethics (Jason Oster '04), the National Security Council (Scott Riser '04), the Committee for Sustainable Commerce (Adam Turbett '04) and the International Conference on AIDS (Rebecca Detrick '04). Diana Gehlhaus '04, the group's head delegate, participated in Secretary General's Good Offices Committee. Her committee discussed the 1988-89 Afghanistan-Pakistan conflict. They also rewrote the Geneva Accords, injecting unplanned events during negotiations.

"We discussed global problems such as AIDS, waste disposal from cities, public transportation and things of that nature. We met five times over the course of the weekend, and each time we came back, it was five years in the future from the time before. So every time we came back, we had new problems to face. We had to deal with new diseases, flooding, global warming and things like that," Turbett said.

In addition to the committees the delegation also participated in the VICS's traditional Opening Ceremonies Banquet and a Delegate Party. Overall, Gehlhaus felt the group had a great time and that the conference was something Bucknell should be represented at every year. However, getting to the conference was one of the group's biggest obstacles.

"We had to overcome a lot of difficulties, and had to raise all the money," Gehlhaus said.

Since Bucknell Student Government did not to help the organization, the club had to raise the money through generous donations and through various fundraising activities.

Major current events across the nation and around the world such as cases in the Supreme Court or developments in European Union take place everyday, but seldom does the opportunity arise between classes, labs and hectic schedules to immerse oneself in examining these events and their impacts

"We had a great time and were thrilled at the opportunity," said Gehlhaus.

The Model United Nations Club hopes to travel to more conferences like this in the future. She encourages anyone willing to spend the time to prepare and do the work to explore this opportunity

"It is something that cannot be experienced within the realm of the Bucknell campus," Gehlhaus said.

Construction schedule full for future

By Jennifer Jenchura
Senior Writer

The physical campus of the University has traditionally been one of its greatest assets. Over the summer, many changes will occur as part of the ongoing implementation of the Campus Development Plan (CDP) which will guide the University's planning and preservation over the next 20 years. Endorsed by the campus community and board of Trustees in 1998-99, the plan coordinates the future of the University's physical resources.

The CDP builds on the earlier efforts from the Landscape Master Plan approved in 1990 and addresses campus sight lines, boundaries, entrances and arrival points, green spaces, projection of new buildings, vehicular and pedestrian traffic patterns and parking.

"One of the most significant outcomes of this planning process was the decision to move toward a future pedestrian campus by gradually relocating parking to perimeter locations and adjusting vehicular traffic patterns," said Dennis Hawley '72, associate vice president for facilities.

The first major step in this new direction was completed in 2000 with the closing of Coleman Road between the new Weis Music Building and Coleman Theatre. The summer of 2002 will witness the implementation of a number of additional CDP initiatives.

The O'Leary Center for Psychology and Geology will open for classes next semester.

"In conjunction with the completion of the new psychology and geology building, the road and parking between Dana and Olin Science will be converted into a new quad or green space with pedestrian paths, plantings and seating areas," Hawley said.

The Recreation and Athletic Center scheduled for completion in December 2002 will open in phases, with portions of the fitness center and the new Olympic-sized pool being ready early in the upcoming fall semester and officially ready for events at the start of the spring semester 2003.

"Other areas of the complex will be under renovation during the fall term and opened as soon as they are completed, including the conversion of the existing pool into part of the new fitness area," Hawley said.

In addition to new buildings, the University is also currently undertaking several renovation projects over the summer, including Hunt Hall, Bostwick Cafeteria and the second half of Coleman Hall.

Coleman Hall and Carnegie Hall are the two academic buildings that will undergo change this summer. The second half of Coleman Hall will be renovated, completing the project this summer. The space taken up by the Geology Department in Carnegie Hall have been reassigned to the history department and humanites program once the geology department moves to the O'Leary Center.

Hunt Hall is the only dorm that will also undergo a complete makeover and will be closed until spring semester 2003.

"Other immediate projects include the replacement of the Freas Hall roof, necessitating the removal and remodeling of the patio above, resurfacing of the stadium track and the extension of the chilled water distribution system to the lower campus residence hall area to provide air conditioning for Hunt Hall and to replace the troublesome Vedder Hall air conditioning machinery, avoiding approximately $100,000 in repair costs to this equipment this summer," Hawley said.

With the new buildings and renovation, there will still be a significant amount of "green space" on campus. The CDP stipulates that the lawn in front of Freas Hall and the grove behind Roberts Hall are considered untouchable and will be preserved with no additional loss of green space through future campus growth.

Closing roads and replacing them with green space also will help compensate for the loss resulting from new buildings. According to Hawley, the road between Coleman and the Weis Center will be permanently closed this summer as a result of the construction of the new music building. When construction is finished on the new geology and psychology building, Vaughan Literature Road from Fraternity Road to the Vaughan Literature Auditorium and the Dana-Olin parking lot from Seventh Street to Vaughan Literature Road will be closed permanently. Most of this area will be turned into green space.

Physical plant is also working on designs for the future projects.

"New projects in the works include a new engineering building, Forrest D. Brown Conference Center at Cowan, and Vedder Hall renovations," said Assistant Director of Construction and Planning Jim Hostetler.

Physical plant has issued a schedule of completion dates for the current projects.

"The dates of completion indicate when the physical plant anticipates the building being occupied and ready for use. However, it could well mean that some construction workers would still be on site taking care of relatively minor items to finish up," Hostetler said.

Senior Reflections

A former colleague of mine who served on The Bucknellian once told me, "Don't let schoolwork stand in the way of your college education."

That cliché has served as the epitome of my four years at Bucknell. Now, I'm not implying that I have spent countless nights downtown or at "the Bar" trying to forget impending schoolwork (ok, perhaps that's a stretch), but as many of my friends know, my experiences in many extracurricular activities have engulfed the majority of my tenure as a University student.

Four years ago, I was sure that my college learning experiences would come from the classroom. Four years and a myriad of experiences later, I couldn't have been more mistaken.

Don't get me wrong-the faculty and classroom experiences I've had at Bucknell have been fulfilling. The close interaction that I have had with various professors on campus has been truly enriching; I will cherish their friendships for years to come. Their guidance and advice have helped me to figure out what I want to do with my life beyond the confines of our picturesque campus. Whether writing a case study with a professor or serving as a teaching assistant to a working company in Management 101, I will leave this school appreciating these working relationships tremendously.

Peter Van Emburgh

For the most part, I believe that the faculty truly cares about the students enrolled in their courses and that they really enjoy teaching. It's a quality that makes this school particularly special and one that is admired around the nation. They uphold a unique balance between actual teaching and their respective research projects.

However, when I bid adieu following Commencement, my academic experiences will surely fade along with my grades for those countless courses. I expect to be flooded with memories of my experiences outside Taylor Hall. I will look back at my leadership endeavors, the adventures with my close friends and my own personal growth and maturation.

Aside from my own personal change, my fellow seniors have witnessed a virtual transformation, in many dimensions, of this institution. Houseparty was so much more relaxed our freshmen year. There were about half-a-dozen fewer buildings (or being built) on campus. There was no Uptown, food trailer by the Library and I certainly don't recall as many gaping holes in the ground that have now become a regular occurrence. Downtown parties weren't broken up with the drop of a hat. And who is still left of our original administration? We're even on our third dean of students. I also recall a time when our tuition stood well below $30,000.

But some things really haven't changed much in four years. I hate to admit that I have fit into the stereotypical "Bucknell mold." The value of the average student's car has risen faster than the rate of the tuition increase. The parking ticket fines on campus have ironically not inflated past the $25-$50 mark ... and neither has the $10 Lewisburg parking fine. Our student-athletes have continued to succeed. We continue to attract more and more of the nation's best students. Our campus community still strives to make this a better place for everyone. Not surprisingly, the culture of the student body is the same.

One of the topics of great controversy at the University continues to be over the Greek system. I was fortunate to have held two leadership positions within the Greek system—I served both on the Interfraternity Council and within my chapter, Sigma Alpha Epsilon. I learned that no matter how many thousands of dollars a chapter raises for an extremely good cause and how many thousands of community service hours are devoted to the surrounding community, nothing can change the minds of a small faction of outspoken faculty members. As a result of being in a leadership capacity, often I was defending my opinion to a group of faculty whose closed-minded views are a mockery of the free discussion of ideas that our academic education at Bucknell is supposed to stand for.

I simply wish that more people would understand why our Greek system serves as a model for other systems to replicate across the country. The academic, philanthropic and community service achievements are models not only for other collegiate Greek systems, but also for organizations on campus.

I will surely reminiscence about my experiences as editor-in-chief of The Bucknellian as I venture into the "real world." Early in my term, I partook in a crash course in Crisis Management in regards to the infamous Holocaust denial advertisement that was inadvertently placed in November 2000.

It was in this position that I also learned how to manage a group of devoted undergraduates effectively. I learned more about the pressures of meeting a firm deadline in the basement of Roberts Hall than I did cramming for a huge research paper. Never did I imagine that I would have been a leader who made decisions that helped lead the campus newspaper to new heights; including the implementation of digital technology, color and new organizational structure.

I enjoyed my interaction with several University administrators while covering the issues at the forefront of the campus community. I sincerely hope that one day the editors, writers and production staff of The Bucknellian will soon earn the campus-wide recognition they so deserve.

The people of Bucknell have made so many of these opportunities worthwhile. My Bucknellian coworkers, my fraternity brothers, close friends, colleagues and even those people you always say "hi" to while passing on the Academic Quad (yet not really recalling how or when you met them) have made my Bucknell experience so fulfilling and memorable.

As I close my Bucknell career, I know that it was all the studying and paper writing that earned me the $120,000 piece of paper I'll pick up in three weeks. But I will also know that there is no liberal arts education that can rival what the Bucknell experience can teach you.

I truly feel that I am more educated and more prepared to face life than when I had arrived to Roberts 1E one hot summer day in 1998. My advice for 2003, 2004 and 2005 is simple. Sure, grades are important. But, under no circumstances, let schoolwork get in the way of your Bucknell education.

Carmen Mauriello

I went out in search of a quiet bench last Friday night, hoping to clear my head after a very stressful week.

I started my quest by Roberts Hall. No dice. Several students were outside smoking and talking. Then I trekked toward the library. Again, no, as a funk band was warming up at Delta Upsilon. Going through the quad, I again was denied, as couples were overlooking Freas Hall, listening to the distant beats from the Busta Rhymes concert.

More denials followed. At the Weis Center, people were pouring out of the Wynton Marsalis performance. Freshmen were milling around by New Res. Students were playing disc golf by the observatory. Several Phi Kappa Psi brothers were hanging out at their house's steps.

I wasn't frustrated by these disturbances, but rather enchanted. I realized that these things were all part of the Bucknell experience, an experience that is different and unique for everyone.

But what was my Bucknell experience?

This is a question I had never explored at great depth, but my quest—which turned into a long stroll around campus—helped me put things in perspective.

Many places around campus are cemented in my memory of Bucknell. As I walked past New Res and the Weis Music Building, jackhammers buzzed in my ear, dreadful memories of my year in an abysmal Swartz dingle that overlooked the two buildings' construction.

Then there's The Bucknellian office in the basement of Roberts Hall, where I spent many a sleepless Wednesday night laying out the sports section. But I have no regrets for missing dozens of Wednesday night parties and Thursday classes, as what began as tedious newspaper work became my passion, propelling me to a career in journalism.

Speaking of The Bucknellian, campus organizations were also an important part of my college experience. The Bucknellian enabled me to get to know Bucknell, debating the issues that affected students in editorial meetings and interviewing outstanding coaches, athletes and students. It also brought me innumerable crises and frustrations; but, in learning to resolve these, I gained valuable managerial skills and formed bonds with my colleagues.

Even more central to my development has been the club ultimate frisbee team, the Mudsharks. What began as a way to stay in shape grew into a way of life, as I adopted the team's spirit of individualism and eccentricity. Frisbee dominated my afternoons, weekends and the friendships that I made. I wouldn't change one thing about it.

> True, it is hard—nearly impossible—to get this entire campus to stand hand-in-hand behind an issue, but it is very common for students to fight for issues involving their cliques. This is how Bucknell students get involved on campus, how they form lasting friendships, how they have fun and how they mold their Bucknell experiences.

I learned perhaps the most from my involvement in Students for Asian Awareness at Bucknell (SAAB). Coming from a predominantly white, Christian area, I never dreamt of being exposed to the diverse group of students that became my friends within SAAB. I had a great relationship with the members: they were always receptive to teaching me about their cultures and I loved celebrating their traditions and customs.

Academics have been the focus of my time here, and my success in this sphere has been integrally linked to my professors. I've had many outstanding professors who inspired and challenged me to reason, analyze and apply ideas; I draw heavily on the knowledge I gained in their classes. I've also had a few mediocre professors that neither inspired nor challenged me; I forgot their lessons the day after the final.

But overall, I've been astonished by the professors' deep concern for our development as students, and as people. I'd like to thank some professors who have had a profound effect on me, in particular Gregory Krohn, Michael James, Cynthia Hogue and James Lee.

The biggest part of my Bucknell experience has been interacting with my fellow students. As a freshman, I was very cynical about Bucknell students. I stereotyped them as self-serving, money-hungry conformists that would never unite behind a cause.

I was wrong.

The student body does resemble a high school with its pronounced clique dynamic. However, most students have a very strong attachment to their clique or cliques, be they a Greek organization, dance troupe, varsity sport, a cappella group, political club, diversity organization or comedy improv.

True, it is hard—nearly impossible—to get this entire campus to stand hand-in-hand behind an issue, but it is very common for students to fight for issues involving their cliques. This is how Bucknell students get involved on campus, how they form lasting friendships, how they have fun and how they mold their Bucknell experiences. It results in a variety of experiences, viewpoints and causes—i.e. diversity, the opposite of my original stereotype of conformity.

My cliques have served precisely that function for me. I've made the majority of my friends in The Bucknellian, SAAB and frisbee, as well as made my biggest contributions to this campus and had my best times.

Looking back on last Friday, I'm glad that I didn't succeed in my "quest" and free my mind of thoughts. These recollections helped me become more at peace with my Bucknell experience.

As I prepare to graduate in less than a month, I remember a time when I had never even heard of Bucknell. I had applied to countless colleges, and Bucknell was simply another school in the stack—they all looked the same to me. Right before I made my college decision, my parents suggested we take a trip to Bucknell, "just to see what it's like." I reluctantly agreed, even though I was sick of the college trips, taking the tours and all that other fun prospective student stuff.

Krista Reisdorf

Four years later, I see in Bucknell what I saw the day I visited—a gorgeous campus, a close community and an unforgettable experience. Only now I have gained so much more—the memories.

I realize I'm going to miss the times when I would walk to "the Caf" with 20 of my hallmates—a "herd of freshmen." I remember when the coolest thing to do was to sprawl in the hallway of my dorm for hours and talk to my friends. I can recall the first time we all left for Fall Break, and it felt like we would never see each other again (even though it was only for five days).

Now I'll have to adjust to the fact that these people won't be around every day. Instead of simply a quad or a hallway between us, there could be thousands of miles. Nevertheless, I will take these moments with me, remembering them and learning from them.

Being a part of The Bucknellian has been one of those defining moments in my Bucknell career. When I became the Arts and Entertainment editor, I felt that I found something completely new that challenged me. At first, I didn't take my interest in the newspaper too seriously.

However, I soon found myself getting easily sucked in and actually enjoying my work. With the help of the staff and the support of Adviser Jim Lee, I realized the newspaper was more than a "hobby" or "club" to me. I loved the writing, I loved the deadlines—I even loved the stress. In the end, my position at The Bucknellian was one of the leading factors of my decision to attend graduate school for journalism.

Leaving Bucknell and heading off to Syracuse University will be one of the hardest things I have ever had to do. As I go, I want to thank Jim Lee and Rachel for their constant support, Kristi for taking my place and doing a fantastic job, The Bucknellian staff for keeping up the good work, Fr. Marty and CCM and my Scoobies for keeping me sane. I know that Bucknell has prepared me for the future and I am confident that I can survive in the "real world"—even if it means leaving the "bubble."

I'm not really sure where these past four years went, but I think that if I reach deep into the recesses of my memory I might be able to pull out a few valuable tidbits for posterity. I'm pretty sure I just got back from Playfair yesterday and now they're telling me I'm (gasp) graduating in a couple short weeks. It seems as though for every one thing I've learned in class (yes, mom and dad, I do go and I even manage to pay attention now and then) I've learned three times as many things about life. And here it goes...

No matter what happens or where you end up your senior year you will always have some strange cosmic connection with your freshman hall. I happen to live with two of them. I guess I didn't get very far. Join everything, quit later if you don't like it. If nothing else, you'll meet people, and you may even find something you like. If you want to meet guys, do not be an English or anthropology major. Trust me, I speak from experience, your classes will have a very poor girl to guy ratio. Go to lots of frat parties sophomore year.

By the time you're a senior you start to feel really old when you're up to your ankles in beer sludge. On that same note, if you go to frat parties your senior year, think twice before you roll your eyes at the freshman and sophomore girls wearing tube tops and black pants and grinding with the senior guys; you were that girl two years ago, and soon enough, they will be you. Vera Bradley and Burberry plaid are for your grandmother.

> I'm pretty sure I just got back from Playfair yesterday and now they're telling me I'm (gasp) graduating in a couple short weeks.

Go abroad, you will realize that you are the only person under forty sporting these items. If you already realize this, go abroad anyway lest you should start to think that Bucknell is representative of "the real world." Going out and drinking are fun, but so is staying in, watching movies and eating nachos in your pyjamas with your girlfriends.

It is a lot harder to try to catch up at exam time than it is to just get your butt out of bed and go to class (this one took me a little longer to learn). Take lots of pictures, more than you will ever want look at; they help you remember what you did last weekend and someday you can show your kids that you were not a complete loser, despite what they may think.

"Top Gun" is the "Casablanca" of our generation; if a guy wants to watch it with you, that's not all he wants. If you're going to drink cheap wine, and you might as well, at least spring for the jug; it has a small degree of class that the box never will. There is never a bad time to order Domino's. Advil and Tums solve everything. And finally, if you live in a downtown house senior year (and I highly recommend it) and that house doesn't already have a name, give it one and force people to use it; that way, when you're feeling nostalgic for those days that seemed to go by all too quickly you can call up your old friends and say, "Hey, remember that one time at Twin Swings ..."

Committee should choose better-liked performers

Last Friday, hip-hop singer Busta Rhymes performed at the Fieldhouse in front of few University students.

Although Busta Rhymes provided a different concert than what University students are used to, the Concert Committee should try to get performers that appeal to more of the student body.

According to the Concert Committee, it conducted surveys at the beginning of the year to find out what performers interested students. This survey was conducted through email and at the Activities Fair for first-year students.

Students who do not see anyone they like will simply delete the email; the only students who do reply are the ones who feel strongly about a specific person on the list.

Because it is important that the Committee knows what students want, it should conduct its survey in a more proactive fashion.

For example, members of the Committee could go into the Bison or the library and ask students for suggestions. This way, the students are not forced to select a performer from the list. If the Committee is more actively in touch with getting students' opinions, it will be more likely to choose a performer that more students enjoy.

Also, by directly talking to students, the Committee will get more responses and have a wider population to base its selection on.

The Committee should also try to focus less on getting a large-name band and instead concentrate on getting a performer that students will enjoy seeing.

For example, Rusted Root played at Susquehanna University on Saturday night. The venue was full of students.

Although Rusted Root is popular, it does not have a Billboard hit at the moment. Still, many students know who Rusted Root is and enjoy its music.

Another example is Dispatch. Last year hundreds of University students went to see Dispatch play at Uptown.

In fact, nearly the same amount of University students attended the Dispatch concert as the Busta Rhymes concert. And this is most likely attributed to the fact that Uptown was filled to capacity. Although Dispatch is not as well-known as Busta Rhymes, it still appeals to college-aged students.

Money is most likely not an issue. Students would be willing to pay more than what they paid for Busta concert if there was a higher demand.

At the last few concerts, students were literally giving tickets away for free.

On the positive side, although the Busta Rhymes concert was not as successful as the Committee may have hoped, it still provided students with a new type of concert at the University.

The Committee should get a wide variety of performers that appeal to a large number of students.

Professor misses point

To the Editor:

Professor of Sociology Alex Riley is a Sociologist, and his response to "The Vagina Monologues" illustrates that he lacks skill in understanding dramatic art. What he sees as ideological "contradictions" are actually produced by his confusion, and what we in English studies call a faulty reading.

Riley contends that the play is "about" ending violence to women (and he claims that it does this poorly because it shows men and heterosexuality in ways he disapproves). He has confused the play itself with the social purpose to which its author has dedicated it. The play is about women and their experiences. "The Vagina Monologues" as a social phenomenon participates in an annual campaign to publicize the problem of violence against women, and to raise funds for organizations that work with abused women.

Since the play is about women, attention to men is marginal. If it was difficult for Riley to endure 75 minutes of stage time in which men were not central, he can console himself with any of the thousands of selections available from the 2,500-year-old male-authored and male-centered Western literary and dramatic tradition.

Riley strangely assumes that audiences exit theaters determined to enact the scenarios they have just seen performed. By his logic, we should avoid performances of Hamlet (which also "fails to show a single healthy heterosexual relationship") lest we become inclined to stab our elders through tapestries. He is most troubled by the monologue in which the victim of a childhood rape overcomes her traumatic past by engaging, at 16, in sex with an older woman. During the V-Day Forum, he claimed that "outrage" would ensue if the relationship shown represented sex between an older man and a much younger girl. Apparently, Riley has never heard of the novel "Lolita," considered a classic of modern fiction.

Riley misleadingly implies that vast numbers of men and women were "alienated" by the play. Yet for all three sold-out performances, audiences responded with laughter, cheers, and standing ovations. It seems the play alienated only Riley and a handful of students, none of whom need ever subject themselves to it again.

I suggest that Riley stick to his own discipline. If, however, he feels the need to interpret more drama, I invite him to audit any of the fine courses offered by the Department of English at Bucknell. Perhaps "Introduction to Literary Theory" would be a good beginning.

Debate is good for students

To the Editor:

My first, and liberal/leftist, inclination is to write an emotional, reactionary response in opposition to articles similar to Charles Mitchell's and in support of pieces like Katie Parker's last one. Because of my strong political and moral beliefs, I find that articles written by "conservative" members of our community often elicit in me a strong reaction. Almost everyone will admit that it's difficult to objectively read an article challenging personal beliefs.

But after some time, I came to the conclusion that I do not want to contribute a letter for the "liberal" side or the "conservative" side. I decided to try to look at all the controversy created by different political, religious and moral beliefs from a different angle.

From my perspective, one of the greatest problems on this campus is apathy—the complete indifference that comes from having no opinion. In my four years here, I have seen the birth and development of many ideas by many organizations, but never before have I witnessed the political discourse surrounding the conflicting ideologies of "conservative" and "liberal" sparked by the establishment of the Conservatives Club. The mere fact that the Conservatives Club exists is an irritation to many on campus. But I would like to applaud the Conservatives Club for maintaining, and expressing, their ideologies in a student body where "leftist" organizations are abundant.

Since the founding of the Conservatives Club, the instance of political dialogue has increased, and many people who never before have articulated opinions have been prodded into "picking a side," some even forming their own side. Because of my personal political perspective, I won't say that the Conservatives Club promotes the "correct" point of view, but they promote a point of view. They challenge many people on campus to defend what they say they believe. They've prompted discussion around many controversial subjects inside the "Bucknell bubble"—a place within which many of us spend four years believing learning happens only in class.

So I would like to congratulate not only the Conservatives Club, but also V-Day Bucknell, FLAG & B, Sirens, BASE, the Bucknell Brigade, SAAB, FCA, the BISON Volunteers, PULSE and the countless other organizations and individuals that have articulated opinions, embraced causes, and acted. Your efforts combat everyday apathy and served as a catalyst for some of the most interesting, intellectually-challenging discussions and experiences I've had.

Room selection is process flawed

To the Editor:

I am a rising senior here at the University. I received my room pick of 118 from the lottery, and the three girls I planned to live with also received poor numbers, the lowest being 66. We realized quickly that our dream of a Gateway was shattered so we decided to aim for single rooms in Trax or Kress, as those dorms have traditionally been for upperclassmen.

However, when I looked at the computer to get an update after Choosing Healthy Options in Community Environments (CHOICE) and Quiet Hall room selections, I was shocked to find that virtually all of Kress was taken, and over one half of Trax was taken. Roberts, Trax and Kress constitute "prime housing" at the University. Behind the Gateways, they are the best dorms for upperclassmen on this campus.

CHOICE is a great option for many students on this campus. However, after walking around halls during my three years here, I know not everyone abides by the rules of CHOICE halls. I believe that some students opt to live on CHOICE halls to guarantee themselves prime housing. Frankly, if I were a rising sophomore wanting housing in RTK with my friends, I might think reconsider signing up for CHOICE.

CHOICE programs should be allotted one hall in each dorm, or even two halls in different dorms. If students really care about living on CHOICE and Quiet halls, than it should not matter where on campus those halls are. The program should not be able to monopolize one and one-half of the upperclassmen dorms.

As a rising senior, I believe I deserve good housing. I lived in a Roberts triple freshman year, a small Roberts double sophomore year, and a Trax single for the second half of my junior year. I feel that I should be able to live in a single with my friends after having "paid my dues" in my underclassmen years. The fact that CHOICE and Quiet Halls have monopolized the prime upperclassmen housing has impeded my ability to live in Trax with my friends.

I realize that everyone cannot receive their individual first choice housing. I accept the fact that my friends and I did not receive a Gateway. However, as seniors, I feel that we should be able to live together in traditionally upperclassmen housing, with other upperclassmen. CHOICE and Quiet halls are great programs which are perfect for many. However, I believe that a monopoly on prime upperclassmen housing is unfair, especially to rising seniors who want to live there.

'Hooking up' a sad substitute

To the Editor:

Weeks after reading the article, "Whatever Happened To Dating," (Kathie Dibell Briley, March 2002 Bucknell World) I cannot shake my sadness over the current substitute for dating, the practice of "hooking up."

This is not a diatribe about modern youth. We live in a sexually overheated society with rampant abuse of sex in the family, in government, in business, and, most recently, in the church. Students have reasons to be cynical about sex.

Nor is casual sex a modern phenomenon. One-night stands and short-term liaisons are as old as humankind. What is different today is the loss of moral restraint that once enabled young people to get to know each other without the pressure of sex. As Director of Psychological Services Eric Affsprung says in the Bucknell World article, "Developmentally, young women mature faster than young men. Dating allows women to control the pace of intimacy. Without the dating structure, you lose the support for students who don't want to be sexually active. Ideally, dating could encourage young men to behave responsibly toward women, to be gentlemen, and that's a word we're embarrassed to use."

"Hooking up" reduces sex to another activity on a busy schedule. In Briley's words, this substitute for dating "connotes no affection, no commitment. No phone calls afterwards. No roses."

That young women often hope to "hook up" with a husband contributes to the poignancy of their situation. I have seen a student devastated upon realizing that her partner wasn't ready to focus on her alone, to say nothing of roses, marriage and naming the children.

Given the clash between female yearning and male nonchalance often seen in "hooking up," dating appears more sensible than quaint. "It's such a shame," says one Bucknell female in the article. "Dating here seems ideal. You go out to dinner and have a conversation with someone you don't know so well, just to get to know them better. No strings attached. It's exciting. It's intriguing. It just doesn't happen all that often."

Amazingly, many students at Bucknell reject expedient sex in favor of building real relationships. They inspire me to believe that Bucknell should continue to support them as well as to help those who are "on the fence" to make good choices. Romance may be in short supply, but it isn't dead; "gentleman" remains a high tribute to real masculinity; and dating, not "hooking up," offers the most hope for our students and for our mission as a first-class university.

Parking problems need to be addressed

To the Editor:

We are writing because we are deeply dissatisfied with the University's parking and ticketing system. We recently received two tickets totaling $50 for parking in faculty spaces—there was at that very moment, no where else to park. The car stayed there for two days, and amassed a ticket each day—thankfully, on the second day, we noticed the situation. What makes this situation so trying is that 1) Public Safety would have continued to assign the car a ticket daily without notification , 2) the only no-parking sign is poorly placed—right below the stop sign where you turn into the lot and 3) $50 is an exorbitant sum for what was effectively a single instance.

A few weeks ago, everyone received a campus email that desired to dispel the myths of the University's ticketing practices. The email said, among other things, that the money acquired from parking tickets is spent toward the University—that it is needed and necessary revenue. We find that problematic to say the least. We do believe that our tuition ought to defray such costs—notwithstanding that in order to register a car on campus, you must pay. We are not denying that it takes tremendous costs to run a university. However, that initial fee should be enough, and moreover, paying to have a car on campus should ensure you a parking spot.

We have heard of a petition that will allow for more parking spots and while this may solve the ticketing problem in the future, it remains a problem right now. We ask that Public Safety notifies an offender upon ticketing so that the vehicle may be moved to avoid further charge. No-parking signs should be clearer and placed at a short distance from the actual parking spot.

Not to sound whiny, but $50 is a lot of money—we are working students! Not to mention that Public Safety could be doing much more constructive things with their time, such as trying to find a parking spot at noon on a weekday.

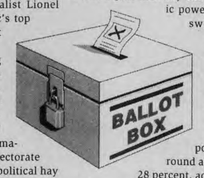
French election results provide lesson

By Michael Boland
Senior Writer

In the first round, dozens may run and anyone can receive votes. But only the top two vote getters move on to the second round, and the winner of this vote becomes president of France. The first round is complete and the results shocked the world.

Extremist Jean-Marie LePen, the exceptionally unlikable National Front candidate for president, stunned everyone by taking second place in the first round with 17 percent of the vote, second to incumbent Jacques Chirac. LePen took enough votes to knock Socialist Lionel Jospin, who was considered Chirac's top challenger, out of the race and out of politics forever.



LePen's politics are disturbing and his offenses too numerous to document here. To give you an idea, he has called the Holocaust a mere "detail of history" and counts Saddam Hussein among his "friends." If not a racist then he is a racial demagogue, persistently inflaming the electorate against French immigrants to make political hay from the recent explosion of violent crime in France. Look up some of the stuff he's said in the past and advocates today—I promise, it's quite distasteful.

Fortunately, LePen is such a maniac that even the Socialists have backed conservative Chirac in the second round. If preliminary polls are any indication, Chirac should win with over 75 percent of the vote. France is in no real danger.

In this context, we should be glad of the entire LePen episode. It provides, I think, two happy political lessons that apply even outside of France.

The first is that even the French can grow tired of the ineffective bureaucracy that typifies European-style governance under post-WWII welfare statism.

According to the Organization for Economic Cooperation & Development, France suffered from nine percent unemployment in January 2002, higher than any other "Major 7" economic power. A crime wave has swept the nation and the French are gripped by fear and feelings of powerlessness. Chirac is mired in scandal, distracted from governance by ethical questions from his political past. The first-round abstention rate topped 28 percent, according to the Interior Ministry, far higher than France is used to seeing. "This vote is the first to sanction the political class for not listening," one prominent French pollster told the New York Times.

Big government—whether monarchial, fascist or democratic socialist, inevitably tends towards stagnation, unresponsiveness, fossilization and unwieldiness. It's an old lesson, and the French are learning it all over again.

More interesting, though, are the implications for how we think about our own politics. Maybe because it's usually coming from the Left, but I've always found it curious that people will argue against the death penalty (for example) on the grounds that every other "civilized" nation has abolished it, or "that's not how they do it Europe." Similar arguments were made against the impeachment of President Bill Clinton ("the Europeans are laughing at us over this!") and are often employed to support state-run universal health care (as in, 'we're the only Western nation that fails to provide health insurance') or daycare. We are told to quit supporting Israel so much and coddle Saddam Hussein and Yassir Arafat—you know, like the Europeans do. The same goes for Castro's Cuba. Europe seems to have no problem with him—so why don't we just lighten up already? The list goes on and on.

But what if all the other countries are wrong?

Hopefully this little lesson in French politics will remind us that even enlightened, sophisticated, cosmopolitan Europeans make bad political choices that ought not be copied.

That principle in hand, we can evaluate specific policy proposals, like capital punishment or universal health care, on their respective merits rather than transplanting an imagined legitimacy that supposedly comes from "Europe doing it."

As we've seen this week, Europeans make mistakes too.

Police too strict

By Tom Elliott
Senior Writer

"I am sick and tired of dealing with you Bucknell brats!" exclaimed one Lewisburg police officer as he enthusiastically broke up a downtown party last Wednesday night. Acting in their usual pontifical manner, the other officer proclaimed to a different group of students a very similar sentiment; "You spoiled brats really piss me off!"

Naturally, the standard procedure ensued: everyone is forced to leave the premises immediately; the party attendants who are now mingling in the street are informed they must go home or be arrested; followed by citations for the home-renters. In this particular instance, two citations were given for the same exact incident because two different lease-signers went out to speak with the officers, instead of just one.

"I really didn't appreciate being prodded by the policeman's flashlight while he was directing me off the sidewalk," said partygoer Amy Mascia '04. Two other female students told me of similar unwanted flashlight attention.

It seems that in most towns, once a noise complaint is called in, officers will respond and request that the ruckus be ended or contained within a short period of time or else consequences will arise. In Lewisburg, there is no warning. There is no, "get this party quiet or cleaned out in 20 minutes or else ..." Instead, as soon as there is (supposedly) a noise complaint, officers pounce on the party, slap citations on the student-leasers, clear everyone off the property, clear everyone off the streets and then wait until people congregate at another downtown house so they can do it all over again. Watching them operate illustrates a mentality that is vastly different than the one of the officer who claimed to be sick of dealing with us.

These officers think that we "Bucknell brats" have unlimited bank accounts; able to pay off exorbitant fine after exorbitant fine. The administration certainly feels that way, as they have "kicked back on campus" most students who previously held perfect records with the school, yet were deemed unfit to live downtown as a result of a Lewisburg officer who determined a social gathering to be overly boisterous. This fee is usually over $1,000 per student in the house.

This all brings us back to the unpractical idealism that guides administrative policy. Friends I have at other schools find it ludicrous when they hear of students here being suspended or expelled as a consequence of a few unlucky alcohol violations.

After Houseparty Weekend, Dean of Students Richard Ferraro had some very troubling remarks that clearly illustrate what I am trying to say. In a very predictable inability to praise the weekend for its overall smoothness or lack of significant problems, Ferraro let it be known that he was still unimpressed because, "this year's Houseparty fell well short of the administration's incident-free goal." In the same vein, I am sure the administration has been frustrated by its inability to entirely end any urge a student may have to drink by providing alternate options such as a Bingo night or a "foam party," as well as replacing Harvard as the number one liberal arts university.

If you are as big of a fan of the Public Safety Log section of The Bucknellian as I am, than you will know that there has yet to be a weekend since your arrival at this university that has been "incident-free." To demand such for the one weekend that is inherently prone to the most drinking is inescapably asinine.

Through forums and the like, Ferraro has also announced that once you are 21, you are only allowed to drink if you follow his guidelines. For instance, "anything that determines when you drink, such as a card or dice" is prohibited. Playing poker while sipping on some beers with a few friends will invariably be construed as a "dangerous drinking game." Also, Ferraro is against "drunkenness at any age." Adults on campus are no longer allowed to cross the threshold into that "extra happy" decorum. You could be a 45-year-old father visiting your son in his fraternity house, yet would technically be bound by a three-to-four beer limit.

A tenured professor who wished to remain anonymous recently told me of a time when this university was much different. He said that every Friday afternoon after classes were let out, students would hang around the Carnegie building and drink beers with their professors, discussing current events. There was even a story of a somewhat wild keg party in a professor's office. Under Professor of Biology Gary Sojka's reign as president, a keg party was once broken up downtown, and the kegs were then moved to the quad by the administration; so the students could continue their partying without having to pursue an available Saint Catherine's Street residence. Of course, only those of age were allowed to drink.

Nowadays, this would obviously not happen. Instead, the administration adds insult to injury and appends even more financial duress to the party-hosting students. I know I am not alone when I long for the days when we college students were treated like adults. We can only hope that the future will not force us to choose between either flashlight-happy officers or our current Big Brother-styled campus.

National sovereignty can be effective

By Michael Niebauer
Senior Writer

National sovereignty can be such an effective tool in diplomacy enabling it to work for their individual national interests and those of their people. Powerful nations have the ability backed by the "rule of law" to do this more effectively than less organized oppositional groups.

History is full of examples of this and it is well known that those that win disputes write the official historical record. Let's play label the dispute. There is a country that celebrates its democratic roots and its proud respect for private property and individual liberty.

Early in its history it declared its independence from a fading European monarchy; even before independencet relations with the indigenous tribes were violent and for the most part predatory in the continuous pursuit of land.

In spite of a professed, deep and ongoing religious tradition this nation's undeclared attitude toward the native populations was one of eventual eradication, genocide in fact.

The few victories of the indigenous tribes were described by the press of the time as massacres of the innocent. The military of this sovereign state used all means necessary to subdue the attacks by those dismissed as savages and less than human to achieve victory. Actions including isolation, imprisonment, forced marches and the breaking of treaties with many tribes through the years drastically reduced the native population.

In time, the devastated remaining tribes were isolated on to reservations since they became dependent on enemies and became strangers in their own land. To this day, these reservations are sites of some the worst poverty in this country. Of course the country is this one.

Change the names from the United States to Israel and the indigenous tribes from Native Americans to the Palestinians. The analogy is flawed but useful because the conduct of the parties involved have fortified themselves with religious doctrine to justify their actions. Reason seems to be in short supply.

The idea that we in the United States are supposed to be the fair brokers for peace in the Middle East may be a flawed assumption. The failure of Secretary of State Colin Powell's peace initiative shows this to be true since President George W. Bush's calls for ending the incursions into the occupied territories were initially ignored by Israeli forces.

The intractability of the United States as peace broker may come from our tradition of incursion within our own sovereign borders. The Israelis surely understand that we need them as a forward base and democratic ally in the strategic (oil rich) Middle East.

The Palestinians know that their position is difficult and exacerbated by U.S. funding (militarily and economically) of their enemies.

The Palestinians also know that some U.S. aid is going to many of the new settlements within areas they traditionally owned, negating our credibility as peace brokers. The Powell mission was troubled since Bush started too late and that our history shows (past and current) that the Israelis are only doing what we have done in the past.

It is just so disturbing that the tanks and helicopters used to stop the suicide bombers were from the United States and the media was not allowed to cover operations in real time. Benjamin Netanyahu believes Israel was just following our lead in the war on terror.

Whether its is the Apache Nation verses The Untied States or the Israelis versus the Palestinians sovereignty disputes over territory, they are both are historical nightmares. After a time the winner writes the history every time.

The United Nations must be the fair broker for peace in the Middle East. Since we are in fact traditionally partial toward Israel over Palestinian interests, this view is confirmed since the United States is officially against the awarding of jurisdiction of an impartial international criminal court. This court would consider war crimes charges on a case by case basis.

The United States is against this because it would restrict our national sovereignty and the ability to act in our own national interests. Being a powerful superpower has its advantages as long as you can write the historical record. History can be a curiously fascinating tool. Deny it at you peril.

America's corporate culture

By Josh Fisher
Staff Writer

The American Dream: You are a typical family, living in a typical house, in a typical neighborhood, in a typical U.S. city. You're working 11 hours a day shifting papers; your office has a beautiful view of miles and miles of concrete, sport utility vehicles and pavement. There are perfectly cropped squares of paint-colored green sod, and not a tree in sight to block the view of your new Mercedes. You go in every day and do the same thing, because that Mercedes just didn't do it for you.

You want more. When you come home your kids scream for Nikes, and the TV is on for eight hours a day. They want more. You eat a lot of takeout. You aren't so much a family as five strangers sharing a roof, water and power ... what's on TV? You feel like you're Pavlov's dog ... what is this new product called the American Dream? You can probably pick one up at the mall.

The edge is closer that you think.

A heavily manipulative corporate ethos drives our culture. We are controlled in the most insidious ways; our emotions, personalities and our deepest personal thoughts are picked apart and studied by advertising experts so they know exactly how trick you into needing their product. They believe that any place our eyes could possibly come to rest ought to be filled with some company logo or product message. We haven't quite woken up to the absurdity of it all. At some point a continuous corporate message was woven into the fabric of our existence, our designer lives. All the wrong people seem to have the power of suggestion...

We became a vegetative corporate-driven culture, a TV-addicted nation, the savage anomie of a society entranced and entrapped in a living lie. America is TV, an ethereal place created out of fantasy and want. Brands, products, fashions, celebrities, and entertainment are our culture now. We're supposed to listen and watch, like soldiers on the front line our mission is to buy what they say, because it's good for the economy. TV tells us that if we want a successful life we should wear their clothes and buy their shoes. The human spirit, prideful contrariness, and fierce independence have been oddly tamed.

We spend a quarter of our waking lives staring at the TV, but we don't bother to vote–stuck in tedious jobs, when we're bored we shop. This plenitude is like a powerful narcotic, it is American culture's perverse burden—most Americans have everything they want, but it's still not nearly enough. Our affluence is only surpassed by our detachment from reality. The mind control runs so deep that the myopia is steep.

Somewhere along the line, the American nation transformed into a multi-trillion dollar brand name, no different than McDonalds or Microsoft. America sells an image too, splashing its logos all over every bumper of ever car; and all of a sudden when you buy American you are buying "freedom forever." America used to be a government for the people and by the people, but now it is some corporate agenda, subverted and bowing to the power of these corporations as a matter of basic survival. Somewhere along the line, capitalism finally gunned down democracy. It's time to un-swoosh America.

Sitting on the shore of Lake Managua in Nicaragua, I was watched the sun set in the distance. As I looked closer, though, the water was a very nasty brown. In the 1970s Kodak had dumped their chemicals in this lake, and now the water is so high in mercury that the ecosystem is barely life-supporting.

I had a powerful and frightening epiphany: our University's best and brightest will be the ones making these decisions in the future. I hope you are the ones to engage in what philosopher Immanuel Kant called "beautiful acts" rather than "moral acts"—I hope you bring your conscience to work with you not because you feel duty-bound to, but because it feels right and good. You've got your whole life to do something, and that's not very long.

A magical experience for first-year student

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

They say that your first year of college is tough, but on the brink of the end of my freshman year, I beg to differ. All you really need to know is how to do magic. Unfortunately, it's not a class that the University offers, but rather a skill that you just have to pick up along the way.

The first thing you need to do is blink your eyes or snap your fingers and you will see just how fast your school year will go. I'm amazed that I'm closing out a year that started what seems like yesterday. From a weather perspective, yesterday could have been Aug. 24, the day in waiting which became a day filled with nerves, fears, tears and eventually relief. I could have sworn that I just got back from the freshmen picnic that I went to on that scorching afternoon with my roommate and her already acquired friends from field hockey. I was amazingly so quiet around them.

Next, you need to know the magical powers behind the BUID, which is more essential than an American Express Card. This white piece of plastic although not very durable, can get you anything on campus that your heart desires from textbooks, to Bucknell sweatshirts, to dinner at the Bison (just remember it needs a price tag—the BUID fails to work if you are in need of a significant other).

There is, however, a small price to pay if you do go "swipe happy" in the bookstore and that is the expression of shock on your father's face when he gets the bill. Ways to avoid such things require quickly exiting the room and entering the nearest car, key recommended. This magical card may also add as a conversation starter because everyone wants to see your picture to see just what you looked like back in your senior year of high school, although it's probably exactly the same as you do now.

Another magical element is the wonders of laundry. In my house this was a thing of magic, I'd leave my dirty clothes on the floor of my room in a pile and one day they would be gone only to come back clean. Yet, I soon had to see just where these clothes went and sadly discovered that at the bottom of four flights of stairs in the Vedder basement you find these white contraptions called "washers" and "dryers," which, amazingly, do as their names imply.

Though my problem continued after my clothes exited the dryer because I don't like to use irons (this was proved in my one experience with the foreign object this year when I burnt myself many times on many different parts of my body such as legs and arms). I learned that just wearing them wrinkled won't straighten them out, but putting less clothes in the dryer will. Though by the end of the year I fell in love with Downy Wrinkle Releaser, which magically gets rid of my wrinkles with just the spray of the nozzle.

Finally, my biggest trick was fitting a ton of stuff into a cubicle that could fit into my bedroom at home with room to spare. I have pictures, books, calendars, photo albums, a closet packed with clothes, medicine, a printer, a laptop, a surfboard, dirt from my state championship softball game, about six extra blankets (four were never used), soap, shampoo, conditioner, under the bed boxes filled with I don't even know what, tons and tons of dust and so much more. My finale will be trying to get that all home ... in one trip.

After having mastered the magic, my first year in the bubble proved to be an amazing experience. The people I have met truly made the entire year worthwhile especially the handful of seniors that I had the honor of knowing. It went fast and I may have walked around in wrinkles too much, forgotten my BUID when it was crucial, and fit more unnecessary stuff than possible into my dorm, but I enjoyed making the mistakes and looking back I am so happy that I won't be able to stop talking about it.

Le Pen stuns France and world in election

By Tamanna Hye
Staff Writer

France's Socialist, Communist and Green parties urged their supporters on Monday to vote for their sworn political enemy, Jacques Chirac, the current center-right president, in next month's presidential election run-off as the country reeled from the political upheaval caused by the rise of the far-right leader, Jean-Marie Le Pen.

Dominique Strauss-Kahn, a Socialist and former finance minister, explained to The New York Times that he would support Chirac in the second round because "It is the honor of our country that is at stake."

The Ministry of the Interior confirmed Sunday's first round exit polls and named the anti-immigrant exparatrooper as Chirac's challenger in the May 5 runoff showdown. Benefiting from great public discontent with the mainstream socialist and conservative parties and mounting anxiety over rising crime and immigration, Le Pen, with 16.9 percent of the vote, pushed Socialist Prime Minister Jospin, who managed only 16.1 percent of the electorate's support, into third place. This result marks the end of Jospin's political career and raises serious questions about France's international image and political future.

The far-right leader immediately provoked uproar across Europe by saying that one of his first priorities would be to withdraw France from the euro-zone if he was elected. "The first question I would raise is the recovery of French liberty," he was quoted in a Wall Street Journal article,. "I am not an enemy of Europe."

French politicians of all leanings seemed quite unable to believe that Le Pen, best known for his description of the Nazi gas chambers as a "detail of history," had beaten every candidate except Chirac. The current president won the first round with an abysmal 19.8 percent of the vote. Furthermore, analysis of the results indicated that Le Pen finished first in nine of France's 22 regions.

Tens of thousands of protesters — many of whom failed to vote — stormed through the streets of Paris and other large cities Monday night. In central Paris, police officers fired tear gas at anti-Le Pen protesters who were throwing homemade gasoline bombs.

High school students, joined by those at universities, marched out of classrooms earlier in the day in Lyon, Strasbourg, Reims, Rouen, Angers and Besançon in order to demonstrate against Le Pen, chanting slogans comparing him with Hitler and describing his National Front as fascist.

Le Pen, who advocates the reintroduction of the death penalty and government-mandated priority for French citizens in jobs, housing and social benefits, called on voters who abstained in the first round to cast their ballots in his favor in the run-off.

"The people of France have decided to use their power to shake up the current system," he said, according to The New York Times, "If you are disheartened, you have the chance to say what you think by voting for me, with your head high and hands clean."

Le Pen had proposed debates between himself and Chirac, which the President declined, concerned about creating a forum for Le Pen to spread his extremist message.

In a further snub to Le Pen, European Parliament employees heckled Le Pen so much that he canceled a meeting with journalists eager to speak to the National Front candidate for president, during a visit to Brussels. Le Pen, a member of the Parliament, was expected to elaborate upon his plans for France if elected president at the second round elections.

Monday's opinion polls forecast a landslide win for Chirac in the second round, given the outpouring of support for him as the safe alternative to a Le Pen government.

However, even if re-elected, Chirac will be severely weakened by his disastrous showing in the first round. Chirac, who refuses to run a coalition government with the far right, would again face a socialist Parliament. The past five years have led to little progress in France, where divided government has failed to address many of the ills of French society. Many analysts said another period of cohabitation between a damaged conservative president and a left-wing government could spell constitutional crisis.

Dutch government crumbles on evidence of genocide complicity

By Matthew Hinson
B&P Editor

Dutch Prime Minister Wim Kok and the entire Dutch cabinet resigned this week, citing troubled consciences as their reason for giving up power.

The Dutch were asked by the United Nations to provide protection for the safe haven town of Srebrenica, Bosnia-Herzegovenia from attacks by Serbian troops. However, only 400 lightly armed troops were sent by the Dutch to fulfill this mission, which ended when Serbian troops, under the command of General Ratko Mladic entered the town in July 1995. Some 7,000 civilians, most of them Muslims, were killed in the 10 days that Mladic stormed the town.

Mladic was later indicted, though not yet captured, by the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, set up by the United Nations to bring justice to those who committed human rights abuses in that wartorn country in the last decade.

A 7,600-page report was filed recently with the government by the Netherlands Institute for War Documentation, stating that the government, which was headed by Kok in 1995, failed to provide adequate support to its U.N. troops in Srebrenica.

The Dutch soldiers are said to have stepped aside and let the Serbs into the city after having been denied additional support from NATO nations.

This resignation is also a reprimand to the international community, which did nothing to stop the killings in Srebrenica, though nations of the world knew something was wrong at the time. NATO airpower was not used to deter the Serbs, and the Dutch, having such a small force, stepped aside when the Serbs moved in.

When asked by the Bosnian government and even the Dutch U.N. soldiers for help, nations such as the United States did nothing to stop the Serbs, despite having evidence that the massacre was going on, and the ability to bomb the Serbs at any time.

Quoted by The Washington Post, Clinton administration officials said, "We weren't analyzing these pictures in real time for atrocity; we were analyzing whether NATO pilots were vulnerable." Thus, a fear for NATO pilot casualties allowed the Serbs to continue to slaughter Muslims wholesale for more than a week.

The mission of the Dutch was merely to deter by presence, not by force, which would explain the size and armament of the contingent dispatched to Srebrenica, though it does not adequately explain why the United Nations and the Dutch government did not provide a larger force to keep the Serbs out of the safe haven.

Yet, the resignation does little to console the victims and their families.

Sabra Kolenovic, who lost 28 family members in the attacks, asked The Washington Post, "Why did they not wake up at the time to enable those civilians to get out safely? They were supposed to protect civilians and not to collaborate with Serbs."

Victims also say the Dutch acted far too slowly in coming to grips with their responsibility, the resignation having come seven years after the atrocities. Such a time span allows the incident to fade from the public consciousness, making the resignation less meaningful, as the world has moved on from the events at Srebrenica.

The dissolution of the Dutch government marks the first time in history that genocide has caused a government not directly involved in the killings to take responsibility for its own mistakes that helped to cause the death of thousands. It is an interesting precedent, showing how connected the world is becoming, where the actions of a small group thousands of miles away can dissolve a government.

Energy industry, arm-in-arm with Bush, need not fear Congressional opposition

By Gretchen Schrock
B&P Editor

Depressing and grim memories of an era of rampant environmental protection during the Clinton administration returned to the energy industry this week when the Senate voted to block drilling in the Artic National Wildlife refuge, instilling fears that the industry's profit-driven interests were momentarily forgotten and that environmentalism was curiously back in vogue among White House staff.

The once towering mammoths of the energy industry, willing to squash anything that came in the way of stock options and dividends, were now crouched in terror, worrying about who was going to protect their welfare.

Then there came a voice with a slight Texan twang, surrounded by great flashes of light, which carried a simple message, "Do not be afraid, for I bring news of great joy." What was the news? Did God send down an amazingly talented consultant to revitalize the energy sector? The answer is a resounding "no."

Instead, President George W. Bush, that oil-loving president for whom environmentalism is absolutely repugnant, is attempting to convince the energy companies that the Senate veto of oil exploration in the Artic is not an indicator of their falling importance and that they remain a vital element in the formulation of American energy policy, as evidenced by events during Bush's 15-month administration.

The oil and gas industries have won an abundance of appointments and regulatory decisions since Bush unpacked his bags in the White House. At least 30 former energy industry executives, lobbyists, and lawyers possess influential positions within the Bush administrative hierarchy, giving the interests of the energy companies virtually unlimited access to the President's ear.

B&P Commentary

"The people running the United States government are from the energy industry," explained Fredrick D. Palmer, executive vice president of external affairs for Peabody Energy, the world's largest coal company, to the New York Times.

In addition, billions of dollars in tax credits and subsidies will be headed for the energy industry coffers if the House energy bill passed last year finds compromise with the Senate bill still being debated.

If those actions are not enough to persuade the energy industry of its significance, the Interior Department's Bureau of Land Management has begun opening public lands for oil and gas exploration. The fact that four million acres were added for oil, gas, and coal mining in 2001 attests to the fact that the current administration is considering any possible advantages to the energy sector of the utmost importance .

Furthermore, the Environmental Protection Agency is considering changing water pollution rules to allow coal companies to mine more easily by removing whole mountaintops and then discarding the refuse into streams and rivers, defining it as allowable "fill."

The list of presidential favoritism continues with two executive orders, originally recommended by two influential trade groups, the American Petroleum Institute and the American Gas Association. These orders will speed up the construction of new energy projects, and the decision in March 2001 not to impose new controls on carbon dioxide emissions, which is believed to cause global warming, due to the unfounded fear of slowed economic growth.

As all of these examples suggest, the energy industry has absolutely nothing that should lead it to distrust its relationship with the Bush administration. The President with his army of advisors will continue to ensure the health and prosperity of the various energy companies and ignore the worthy cries from average citizens concerned for the condition of our environment. In a New York Times article, Scott McLellan, deputy White House press secretary, claims, "This is the first administration in decades to address the energy needs of every American in a comprehensive way with a comprehensive plan."

What about the need of every American to live in a clean and safe environment free from the dangers of pollutants caused by inefficient and wasteful industry? Does not this issue deserve a comprehensive plan under the direction of the most powerful office in the country? Future generations of Americans will cringe in horror from the overgrown energy monsters, vainly praying for a saintly voice telling them that the nightmare is over and that their well-being will indeed be protected.

AOL posts $54 billion loss for first quarter 2002, shakes stock market

By Matthew Hinson
B&P Editor

AOL/Time Warner claimed a $54 billion loss for the first quarter of 2002, the largest quarterly loss ever for an American company.

The company blamed the loss mostly on a sharp decline in online advertising. Also, AOL's faltering attempts to break into the broadband market have lost it much money in an area which it does not have a dominant position nor an effective strategy.

AOL is desperate to gain decent market share in this side of the Internet business, which will bring large amounts of revenue as each account runs about $50 per month. In addition, AOL would be able to tie in to the subscription extras such as downloadable movies and digital music. Time Warner's great holdings of music and movies were a major reason for AOL's decision to merge with that company. The loss is also blamed upon AOL's having overpaid for Time Warner, which it officially merged with this past January.

In the first quarter, 1.4 million new members joined AOL's Internet service, bringing the total number of subscribers worldwide to about 35 million accounts. Revenues from subscriptions rose to $4.7 billion, offset by the 13 percent loss of online advertising dollars, which now stand at $1.8 billion. However, the rate of new subscriptions is slowing, as some 60 percent of Americans now are connected to the Internet.

The Time Warner side of the corporation, which consists of media, movies and publishing, as well as cable television and the networks CNN and HBO, posted strong earnings increases. Cable revenues increased 19 percent, entertainment's revenue declined three percent, despite huge profits on the films "Harry Potter" and "Lord of the Rings", and publishing's revenues grew three percent. CNN posted a five percent increase in revenues for the first quarter.

A major issue facing the company is that, when independent, the two smaller corporations did much of their business through partnerships with other sizeable companies. These companies, including the German media giant Bertsellman AG, which AOL had sought help from in starting AOL Europe. Bertsellman sold their half of the money-losing venture to AOL in January.

The corporation claimed that, despite a poor first-quarter showing, it would be able to post a five to eight percent revenue growth for the year, which might reassure stockholders, who have seen the stock slide from a high of $58 in May, to less than $20 this week .

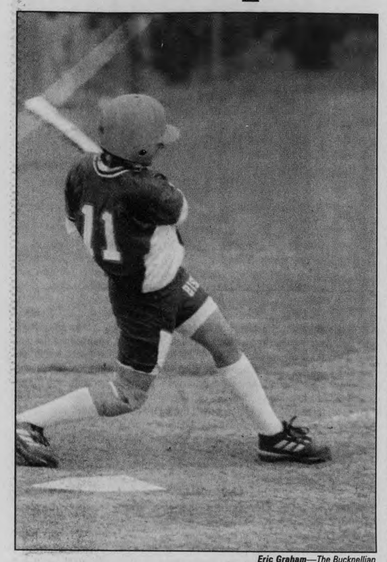
Softball squad looks to next year for redemption



Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Jenna Demetriades '02 had two hits in the 4-3 loss to Colgate.

By Dave Cohen
Staff Writer

Although still mathematically alive for a Patriot League Tournament birth, the Bucknell Softball team took two steps in the wrong direction against Colgate on Sunday, April 21. Falling to 11-27 overall and 5-11 in League, the Bison dropped a heartbreaker in the opening game of the doubleheader, 4-3, then proceeded to get shutout by the score of 6-0 in game two.

Things appeared promising in game one's initial three innings, as the Orange and Blue placed a run on the board in each inning respectively, grabbing an early 3-0 advantage. In the first inning, Jenna Demetriades '02 roped a ball down the left field line to score Kelly Dugan '02, who actually hit a single of her own earlier in the inning.

In the second inning, the Bison capitalized on a Colgate miscue by its first baseman, allowing Meredith Gill '03, who commenced the inning with a single, to score. Although the Herd loaded the bases up with two away in the inning, Raiders hurler Elena Isaac eluded the Bucknell scare by recording a strikeout to culminate the inning.

The Orange and Blue's third run of the ball-game occurred in the third inning when Gill struck again, driving in Demetriades on a single through the box. According to Lauren Titus '02, Gill's timely hit was not a common occurrence on Sunday.

"As a whole we have been hitting better," Titus said. "However, we have not been getting timely hitting. We played well on defense, but it was Colgate who came up with the timely hits."

Kelly Haskins '05 was formidable in her first three innings of work, however stumbled upon adversity in the fourth inning before getting removed from the game. She rationalized that substituting a new pitcher was an effective move because it ultimately savored her poise and provided Colgate diverse pitching speeds.

"I actually felt really good on Sunday," Haskins said. "It was a good idea to get me out when I started struggling to keep my confidence high and give them (Colgate) another look."

Although the Bison offensive run support was not quite adequate on Sunday, Haskins does not blame her teammates.

"It is tough because there is a lot of pressure to be perfect without ample run support, however, it works both ways," Haskins said. "There have been days in which I have squandered four or five runs but the bats were alive."

The visitors' Natalie Rawson sparked Raider rally with a two-run shot to left, which made it a 3-2 game. Colgate proceeded to strike even in the contest at 3-3 on a Bison wild pitch. Bucknell settled down on the hill, as it wasn't until the sixth inning that the Raiders took the lead on Emily Wright's single. Isaac eventually struck out four of the Bison's remaining seven batters, however, silencing a late Bison rally and preserving the 4-3 triumph.

Titus' play as a positive for the Bison. Not only did she smack two hits in the first contest, she also was a red hot .500 at the plate for the weekend. Titus felt obligated, in a sense, to jumpstart the Bison offense as the lead-off hitter in the lineup.

"I have been seeing the ball well," Titus said. "I have been the one to get things started because I have been hitting first [in the lineup]. I have just been trying to keep my confidence up and have fun. So far that's been working for me."

In the nightcap, Bucknell batters encountered Isaac once again, but were not able to respond to her in the game's early innings like they did in game one. Isaac tossed a complete game shutout to record her third victory of the weekend.

Colgate had three runners cross the plate in the third inning and again in the fifth. Rawson's second homer of the day highlighted the Raider fifth. Despite Titus' desperate attempts to get the team rolling, going two-for-three in the game, the Bison once again struggled immensely in collecting timely hits. Colgate's Dorothy Donaldson hit both of her doubles in the second contest, showing that production at the dish in the game's ideal predicament can create a profound effect on the contest's eventual outcome.

Water Polo team places fifth: Princeton next stop

By Katie Webber
Staff Writer

This past weekend the Bucknell women's water polo team traveled to Villanova University to compete in the CWPA Southern Division Championship. The team entered as the fifth seed, finished the weekend in fifth place and therefore received an automatic bid to Eastern Championships at Princeton this coming weekend. Friday night, the Bison encountered George Washington once again, and dropped another close game to the Colonials, 12-11. However, the remainder of the weekend turned out victories for the Orange and Blue, as on Saturday Bucknell defeated Grove City and Gannon, and on Sunday in the fifth place game, Bucknell came out on top against Villanova. The Bison went 3-1 on the weekend, and improved their overall record to 13-16.

Friday night, in a much-anticipated opening game, the Bison took on the Colonials from George Washington (GW). Earlier in the season Bucknell lost to GW twice, by a combined three goals. This game was no different, as the two teams battled for four quarters, with the Colonials coming out on top by one with a final score of 12-11.

"In many respects we outplayed GW, but they scored critical outside shots when needed and Bucknell did not put away enough player advantage opportunities," Coach John Zeigler said.

This game was one where both teams came out strong offensively, but things settled down after the first quarter and the game changed into a defensive battle for the next three quarters. Scoring for the Bison in this game were senior Co-Captain Brooke Rea with three goals, Kelly Hofstetter '04 with two goals and senior Co-Captain Adrienne Schober added a goal, as did first-year students Ashley Aiken, Meg Blitzer, Cody Keffer, Katie Hartigan and Larissa Brown. In this game, Keffer broke the past first-year scoring record of 63 points with her goal scored, and her two assists. Goalkeeper Lindsay Chesterfield '03 recorded a 10-save effort in the cage.

In the second game of the weekend against Grove City College, the Bison dominated from the first whistle, and came out on top 15-2. The Orange and Blue jumped out to a 12-2 halftime lead.

"A 12-goal first-half took care of Grove City as Bucknell used a very balanced attack and aggressive press defense to dominate the game," Zeigler said.

In this game, Blitzer led the squad with four goals, while Keffer, Katie Webber '04 and Brown all added three points. Keffer had three goals, Webber contributed one goal and two assists and Brown handed out three assists. Junior Jamie Fulop and Hofstetter both also found the back of the goal twice. Senior Meredith Stevens had a strong defensive output, with four steals and two assists. In the goal, Chesterfield made eight saves.

> "Qualifying for Easterns was definitely a team effort. Everyone came into the weekend psyched and ready to play ... We were able to maintain our level of excitement through the rest of the weekend and that definitely gave us what we needed to get the critical wins over Gannon and Villanova"
> —Lindsay Chesterfield '03

Later on Saturday night, the Bison faced Gannon for a chance to advance to the fifth place game. Bucknell came away with a 10-7 victory over the Golden Knights. Four players scored multiple goals for the Bison, led by Hofstetter with three; Rea, Hartigan and Keffer all added two and Schober added one. The Bison had a rough first quarter against a fired up Gannon team; however, in the second the Bison gained control of the game to take a 6-3 halftime lead. Bucknell held onto that lead for the remainder of the game. Chesterfield had a great game totaling 16 saves, which ties her season high.

"Balanced offensive scoring was again key as nine different Bison scored with goals or assists," Zeigler said.

Sunday afternoon for the fifth-place game, Bucknell faced the host Villanova Wildcats, and the victory earned the Bison an automatic bid to Easterns. Bucknell banked on great first and last quarters to a 10-8 victory against the Wildcats. After the first period, Bucknell jumped out to a 4-2 lead. Villanova would not quit though, and the next two quarters kept the game tight. Hofstetter was the Bison's offensive threat, scoring four goals. Keffer found the back of the goal three times in the game, as did Blitzer, Eileen Ketterer '05 and Meredith Stevens '02. Improving upon their scoring was critical for the Bison with this win. The Orange and Blue put in two penalty shots, and were six-out-of-nine on advantage plays. The goal on an advantage play by Stevens was one of the biggest of the game. In the net, Chesterfield put up another seven save performance.

Ending the weekend 3-1 and qualifying for Easterns was a great step for the Bison. "Qualifying for Easterns was definitely a team effort. Everyone came into the weekend psyched and ready to play. We were disappointed with the close loss to GW on Friday night, but we knew we gave it everything we had. We were able to maintain our level of excitement through the rest of the weekend and that definitely gave us what we needed to get the critical wins over Gannon and Villanova," Chesterfield said.

Easterns will be held April 26-28 at Princeton University.

"We must play more consistent at Easterns to bump up from our 10th-place seed but this group improves every time we touch the water and they look forward to the challenge that lies ahead. A team that was already deep and balanced is becoming even more so as we finish up, which should help us with multiple tough games the first day at Easterns," Zeigler said.

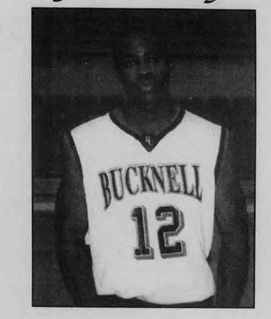
Bryan Bailey '02



By Pierre Hernando
Senior Writer

Bryan Bailey '02 first stepped onto the Bison basketball scene in the 1998-1999 school year. The 6-foot 1-inch guard has since become one of the most heralded players the University has produced. One of the most complete players in the Patriot League with the ability to shoot, drive, dish and defend, Bailey will surely will be missed out on the court.

"In terms of play, I'm most proud of my defense. If the other team can't score, they can't win. I also believe that I had a good athletic career at Bucknell. Bucknell has allowed me to obtain a great education while participating in sports. I am happy the way things turned out," Bailey said.

"Bryan is a guy that seems to surprise you every day you coach him. He has a tremendous thirst for the game. Nobody is in the gym more than Bryan. When your best player is like that it really sets a tone," Head Coach Pat Flannery said.

After graduating high school, Bailey knew that hard work and determination from within him was the only way he could play for a Division I basketball program.

"I wasn't recruited by any schools. I received an offer to play Division I football at SUNY Stony Brook, but I knew that I wanted to play basketball. I came to visit Bucknell and I enjoyed it. I walked into the coaches' office and handed them a tape of one of my high school games.

Molly Creamer '03

For those of you that have not seen the women's basketball team play yet during your time at Bucknell, readjust your schedule next winter. There are a couple of reasons to do so. One, you will be watching the defending Patriot League champions. Second, you will be watching a dynamic group of basketball players that are led by one of the best players ever in League and school history. This star player is Molly Creamer '03, starting point guard for the 2001-2002 Patriot League Champions and The Bucknellian's selection as Female Athlete of the Year.

Creamer is no stranger to those familiar with Bucknell basketball. She has been making her mark here since she first put on the uniform for the Orange and Blue. Her accomplishments and awards after three seasons could easily fill a large warehouse and then some. In her initial season, she set the record for most points by a first-year player with 475 and was the only freshman named to the Patriot League All-Tournament Team. She bettered herself the following season, becoming the first sophomore in school history to score over 1,000 points and be named Patriot League Player of the Year. She also led the League in scoring and assists.

Creamer has become more and more of a leader for the Bison during her career and experienced an even greater role this past season.

Following in the footsteps of the legendary Art Gulden, who guided Bucknell's cross country and track and field teams to 68 conference titles in 31 years, is an arduous task. However, current Head Coach Kevin Donner has taken it upon himself to ensure that the establishment of the Bucknell track and field and cross country programs as a powerhouse in the East will remain prevalent.

"I knew that Bucknell had an outstanding tradition," Donner said. "I knew that Coach Gulden was the instigator of everything here. When I stepped in I was admittedly nervous; however, the athletes have been receptive to my personality and have respected my strides to maintain tradition here. The athletes were well coached and have been taught to deal with adversity."

One of these athletes, middle distance runner LaTonya McSwain '02, explains the tactics that Donner has utilized to sustain the squad's high caliber.

"He has done a great job in working hard to ensure that we remain a championship quality team," McSwain said. "The past four years that I have been here we only lost one League meet (indoor). Just so he could fill the shoes of Coach Gulden, he recruited heavily. He also moved people from middle distances to cross country."

Acquiring the reins of a new program was nothing new to Donner, a native of Detroit, Mich., and a 1984 graduate of the University of Detroit.

A quick glance at Rehana Lanewala '05 (or Rainy, as everyone calls her) will not intimidate you, nor will it clue you in that she was one of the most successful first-year athletes at Bucknell this year. She stands only five feet one inch tall, and she seems to be laughing all the time. Nonetheless, as a member of the track and field team, the Newark, N.J. native has placed her name on four of the all-time top-10 performance lists in indoor track and on two outdoors. She was a member of the women's team that took the indoor Patriot League championship.

LaTonya McSwain '02 noticed something special in Lanewala when she joined the team this year.

"Rainy is an athlete with a lot of drive who, with such a small frame, surprises a lot of her opponents," McSwain said. "She is a confident, capable and driven athlete who loves to compete."

For Lanewala, track has been an important part of life dating back to fifth grade when her mother asked her if she wanted to give it a shot.

"When I was little, I always played soccer," Lanewala said. "In fifth grade, my mom gave me a permission slip to try track, and I said, 'Why not?' I found that I really liked it, and from then on my parents were always supportive, driving me all over to meets."

With high school personal records of 12.2 seconds (hand time), 25.2 (hand time), and 56.57 (automatic) in the 100, 200 and 400-meter dashes,

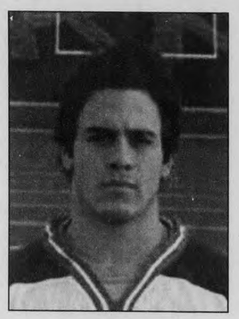
Male Rookie of the Year
Chris Cara '05



By Pat Evans
Sports Editor

Chris Cara '05 should be a lock for the Patriot League lacrosse Rookie of the Year award, making it two in a row for the Bison, whose Wes Fetchet '04 won the honor last year. In his first year, Cara has led his team in scoring, breaking the all-time University first-year scoring record with 49 points after the game against Penn State.

"He has tremendous field vision and then he has the skills to free himself up," Head Coach Sid Jamieson said. "He has things that coaches can't coach, he's very strong and he's very quick."

Cara started out his sports career as a football player. When his football coach saw how athletic he was on the field he suggested that Cara go out for the lacrosse team. Cara's father, who had played lacrosse, kept his son motivated in the sport and Cara never lost interest.

"My father didn't want to push me very hard and he didn't have to," Cara said. "I really enjoyed playing the sport."

During high school he became a standout player, but his height, only 5 feet 7 inches, was something that a lot of college coaches were concerned about during the recruiting process.

"A lot of coaches wouldn't even look at me because of my size, but Bucknell was very interested from the beginning," Cara said.

Female Coach of the Year
Kathy Fedorjaka

By Cecily Cairns
Sports Editor

Ever since Kathy Fedorjaka first took over the University's women's basketball program in 1997, her goal has been to coach the team to a Patriot League title. During the 2001-2002 season, that dream was realized, as she lead the Lady Bison to a 21-10 record and their first Patriot League Championship.

In a season full of breakthroughs for the Bison, Fedorjaka became the program's all-time wins leader when she coached the team to victory for the 78th time on February 24. She also guided the squad to a University single-season record 21 victories, the most important of which came on March 6.

Fedorjaka's number two seeded Bison upset the number one seed Holy Cross, snapping the Crusaders' 22-game home winning streak. The victory earned the Bison their first-ever bid in the NCAA tournament and provided a crowning moment for Fedorjaka.

"I think that the highlight certainly of this past season and really my time here was winning the Patriot League tournament and receiving the NCAA bid for the first time in school history," Fedorjaka said. "It was a feeling that you almost can't put into words. I was just so excited to see the look of pure joy and elation in the players' faces in the closing minutes of that game, and to experience that post-game celebration was a memory that will be etched in our minds forever."

Owls outduel Bison; another setback

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian
The Bison dropped to 5-11 in the Patriot League after a dismal weekend.

By Meghann Chipko
Staff Writer

The Bison had little luck away or at home this past week of baseball. The Temple Owls had a late offensive run that helped them put the game away on Wednesday afternoon at the Bison's home field, while Army swept the Bison for the first time since 1998 at West Point, N.Y.

"Our team knew that we needed victories to stay alive in the Patriot League race and we came up short. The team never let up, but we just couldn't get the job done," Jon Campagna '04 said.

The week started off with a loss to Temple. The Bison captured the lead in the bottom of the third off the Owl's lefty first-year starter Bryan Stamm. The Bison's Chris Mahoney '04 hit a one-out triple and went on to score off Ben Stoll '04, reaching on an error. Later, Larry Scheetz '02 hit a triple to center to send Stoll home. After the exciting inning of scoring, the Bison remained scoreless for the rest of the game.

Meanwhile, as the Bison struggled through five different pitchers, Temple went on a seven-run streak, ending the game at 8-2. Though Scheetz, Ben Krentzman '03 and Mahoney each had two hits apiece, the Owls still out-hit and outscored the Bison with 11-6 hits.

Later that on in the weekend, the Bison traveled to New York to challenge inter-conference rivals, Army.

After the weekend, the Bison dropped to 5-11 in the Patriot League and pretty much lost their chances to compete in the tournament coming up in two weekends.

"It was especially tough for the seniors knowing that their senior year will be without a chance at the Patriot League championship," Campagna said.

Though the weekend's results proved inadequate for a spot in the tournament, the team never seemed to give up against the Black Knights.

On Saturday, the Bison opened with a 7-3 loss and closed, in the nightcap, with a 5-2 loss. Army won for just the third time in their past ten games.

In the morning, Army showed a solid offensive and defensive performance by drilling 14 hits and displaying impressive pitching. By the third inning, Army had forged ahead 4-0, but in the fourth both B.J. Batterson '03 and Campagna hit their first career home runs, Campagna's an RBI hitting in Krentzman, to decrease the lead by two.

"Army's pitcher threw a perfect pitch on a 2-2 count and I just went with it to the opposite field," Campagna said.

Though the Bison had an exciting mid-game lift, it wasn't enough to put them over the top and win the game.

In the nightcap, the Bison posed a serious threat in the sixth, after Army had built a 2-0 lead, when Stoll scored off Krentzman's double, Batterson and Austin Barrett '05 reached, and Eric Fishman '05 hit the tying run.

The Bison surge was not enough to match Army after they went on to score three more and win 5-2.

The Orange and Blue looked good once again on Sunday at Doubleday Fields, but could not put the games away. The nightcap was an 11-2 loss after an exciting morning game that stretched 10 innings, leading to a disappointing 4-3 loss. The Bison were behind most of the game 3-2, but eventually tied it up in the top of the seventh when Phil Bunting sent home Batterson to send the game into extra innings. In the bottom of the tenth Army hit the game winning run to gain their win 4-3.

Though the Bison's Kevin Miller '04 was handed the loss, he pitched a steady game, allowing just two runs off five hits and five strikeouts in more than six innings. Fishman and Krentzman led the offensive with a pair of hits apiece.

"It was a tough weekend for us, very disappointing. We had a good opportunity to go and get back in the playoff picture and unfortunately we didn't make it happen; we played hard but we gave up too many runs," Head Coach Gene Depew said.

The Bison go on to challenge St. Bonaventure at home on Wednesday and inter-conference rival Lafayette in Easton, Pa., in their final two games of the season.

Men's golf take fifth place at Patriot League Championships

By Andy Tichenor
Staff Writer

Last weekend, the Bison men's golf team finished in fifth place at the Patriot League Championships at Army. Leading the squad were Scott Leeder '04 and Abbie Valentine '04 with scores of 222 strokes each for 54 holes while finishing in a tie for 11th place individually at the Patriot League Championships.

"The greens were in pretty good shape," Leeder said. "Normally, we play 6,800 yards for a course but this one was 6,100 yards, which was shorter than usual so we were shooting a lot of three woods and wedges."

Army proved to be a very strong team this past weekend as they won the tournament over second-place finisher Navy with a margin of 29 strokes. Lehigh and Colgate finished third and fourth, while American, Holy Cross and Lafayette finished sixth, seventh and eighth, respectively. Also, Nick Leibowitz '02 finished with a score of 230 for 54 holes, while Dan Gale '02 finished with a score of 234, to complete the squad's score.

"Abbie played well and he is a really consistent player who missed all Patriot League team by one stroke." Leeder said.

Charles Markey '04 and Alex Dolle '05 competed for the Bison too. The team will have new talent coming in but will lose Gale and Leibowitz to graduation and Leeder to a study-abroad program in the fall. However, Coach Jim Cotner has been working hard on recruitment so the Bison will get new talent next year too. "Missing all Patriot League team by one stroke is an inspiration to work harder for next year," Leeder said.

Softball still struggling

On another optimistic note, less experienced players like Kristen Potts '04, who ripped two hits in game two, have shown their medal as of late.

"I felt confident hitting in the two spot Sunday," Potts said. "Beating Colgate would have been big, but now that I am in a groove at the plate I am ready to be a key contributor for the remainder of the season. My defense has been solid all along, so the fact that my hitting is coming around is exciting for me."

Perhaps some of the team's youngsters, comparable to Potts, can help bolster a few upsets over Patriot League powerhouse Lehigh this weekend, and revitalize the squad's slim odds of qualifying for the League tournament. It cannot be accomplished without senior leadership picking up some of the slack, however, according to Titus.

"Going into the last weekend, we have nothing to lose," Titus said. "We need to relax and have a good time. Even if we fail to make the Patriot League tourney, it's important that we end the season on a high note. We have the talent and the leadership to break through; as a senior I need to help bring it all together."

—Lauren Titus '02

Ironically, if the team advances on to play in the League tournament, they would face Lehigh in the first round. Conceivably, defeating the Mountain Hawks this weekend could provide encouragement for a Patriot League Tournament rematch.

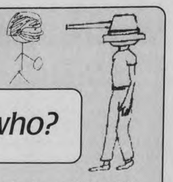
Drew who?



There comes a point in everyone's life when you have to kill a loved one just because he is the devil. Drew Bledsoe is one of these unfortunate, soulless victims. Perhaps that is a little harsh. Drew probably has one of the most respectable characters in all of football.

After all that he did for the Patriots, he was benched behind a 24-year-old fourth string quarterback who, against all odds, single-handedly saved the world from a malevolent strain of subcutaneous parasitic microorganisms using only a small paring knife, a rusted door hinge and three cubic feet of duct tape a la MacGyver, Drew simply sat with his clipboard and cheered him on like Mr. Miagi did for Ralph Macho.

Throughout the entire season, Drew was a mentor to Brady and silent with the media. He never mouthed off or questioned coach Belichek's decision. He made it clear that he wanted to start but never gave an ultimatum.

But integrity is so hard to come by in sports these days, and with Drew's new move to Buffalo, I can only cross my fingers and pray that he sets up an interview with Barbara Walters tomorrow to air out his "dirty laundry" as it were. But Drew is such a slow and plodding guy his revenge will be so slow and insignificant, no one would even notice it was happening. Just imagine:

Walters: Dwew, if you were a type of twee, how would you pwan on kiwwing new Patwiots staating quataback Tom Bwady?

Bledsoe: Well Barbara, I'd have to say that I have no idea,what you're talking about. But if I were to kill the little #@%$, I would say that the microwave oven that I bought him to celebrate his SuperBowl victory is giving off low band radiation that is affecting his heart rate and in 30-40 years he will begin to have breathing difficulties and he will be more prone to kidney cancer and heart defects.

Walters: Intewesting, intewesting.

That's Drew for ya.

So now Brady is in charge, handed the steering wheel like the good cop in a buddy movie while the bad cop climbs out the sunroof to take a few potshots into the obligatory bad-guy van. Critics are still skeptical. Is Brady proven? Can he handle the team by himself without the security of a Pro-Bowl backup? Can he withstand the grueling schedule of a team that just won the Super Bowl? Well the only thing I can say to that is no, Brady is NOT proven. But Drew Bledsoe is. Drew Bledsoe has proven that he is an unholy succubus of talent. He is the place where "good" isn't.

Earlier this week, the SuperBowl champion Patriots traded Drew Bledsoe to the Buffalo Bills. The Bills were initially disinterested because they already had enough people who sucked, but were ultimately swayed when the Pats threw in two extra cherries on top.

Like it or not New England fans, Drew Bledsoe was not the man for your job. With his desultory sideline malaise and devil-make-waste hairstyle, he couldn't inspire the team the way pretty-boy Brady could. That just wasn't his style and that's not a bad thing.

Now I'm willing to be fair, Bledsoe has more natural abilities than Brady. The fact that he is unsuccessful (and he was, no matter what you psycho-statisticians say) is more of a statement as to the changing nature of football that relies more on footwork quarterbacks like Donovan McNabb or last year's first-round draft pick Michael Vick, than sound fundamentals like Jim Kelly or Phil Simms.

Bledsoe was unsuccessful for the same reason that Dan Marino was. He was an old-school quarterback trying to play a pick-up game with 10-year-olds who just wanted to pick their noses and wedgies between plays. Now maybe that allegory was a little out of place, but I had to pick a wedgie while I was typing and it just happened ... so deal with it.

And now, Bledsoe will be the starting quarterback for the Buffalo Bills. Now this trade has to be painful for Bledsoe for just one reason. The Patriots and the Bills are in the same division (AFC East) and trading between members of one's own division is rarely done, especially not for high-name players. The reason for this is because a team has to face each member of its division twice a year. So by trading Bledsoe to the division rival Bills, they are effectively saying that Bledsoe will never again be a big enough factor for them to worry about. ZING! I haven't seen a dig like that since the Bingham Canyon Mine. Ain't that a kick in the pills.

Either way, both teams are in for a rough time because the Cincinnati Bengals are poised and ready to ... ah, who am I kidding. It's gonna be the Panthers by a landslide.

Farewell to a friend: Schmicker's last elegy

COMMENTARY

Rob Schmicker

With this being my last article for The Bucknellian, I figured that I should write something eloquent and sophisticated—but then I realized that I'm not either of those. I just love to talk sports and I love to throw my opinions around. That is what is so great about this job. So instead of talking about something thought provoking like the loss of innocence in sports, I would like to take five minutes to talk about something near and dear to me—intramural sports at Bucknell.

I began participating in intramural sports my first semester here. After being politely told that I wasn't good enough to play Division I soccer, I decided that I still needed to get on the pitch and play the sport I have loved since I was five. My team wasn't very good, but we had fun. I gained some confidence and a few new acquaintances, but it was nothing to write home about.

In search of something to quench my need for competition, I turned to basketball—a sport I had toyed with my freshmen year in high school only to realize I didn't like the politics that go along with it. I began playing basketball with four close hallmates every chance that I got. The five of us became gym rats early in our college career, taking on any competitors. It didn't matter if you were a professor, a girl, an alum or a high school student—we just wanted to run the court. We even tried our hand in some three-on-three tournaments. And even though we got crushed in our first attempts at three-on-three, I loved playing basketball. It helped break me out of the freshmen shell that I was in.

Looking back, playing basketball with my friends has been the single greatest experience I have had at Bucknell. I know, I know-what a loser, but it's the truth. Basketball was what helped me bond with my roommate, now best friend, Mike Fowler '02 freshmen year and basketball was what introduced me to great friends such as Rich Stoll '02, Eric Dorval '02, Josh Stream '02 and Chris Stebbins '02. I learned over the past four years that winning isn't everything; I realized that I just love to play the game. There is nothing better than working my butt off for every minute of the game regardless of whether we win. Just being able to gain my opponent's respect for my hard work and hustle is good enough for me. And respect is certainly all my fellow teammates have ever shown me.

You see, we now have this little intramural team called the Masons founded by my roommate and myself. We have been a team for the past three intramural seasons, and even though we come up short every year in the playoffs, I still feel that we are the best independent team out there. The Masons have changed a little over the years, but the core is still the same and the principle is still the same. We go out to win, work hard and, most importantly, have fun.

Like the real world, everyone brings something different to the table. Fowler has raw athleticism, Dorval is crafty and innovative, Stoll is like poetry in motion, and me? Well I bring heart, hustles and fundamentals. Together we form a well-oiled machine—just like in real life. The more I think about it, the more I discover that our roles on the basketball court are just like ours off the court. Fowler is incredibly gifted and smart and I have to work constantly just to keep up. Stoll is solid and Dorval is just chill.

These are my boys—the boys I have gone to war with and would continue to go to war with in the future. Through our intramural system, we have been given the pleasure to compete against Bucknell's best. While we came out on top more often than not, we too were humbled and laughed at. And for what? Because we have shirts? Because we have a Web site? Because we have an actual fan club led by the gorgeous trio of Sarah Antoncich '02, Kim Zimbal '02 and Julie Dierker '02? Come on guys, we don't take ourselves seriously like you may think—we want to have fun just like you. The fact remains that an independent team just can't compete against the houses because of the sheer numbers they have to choose from. Add in the crowd factor and it's a tough environment to play in. While the houses are incredibly tough to play against, there has been one independent team that we have had the pleasure to against for the past three years.

Those familiar with us know about our rivalry with Vedder Vertigo. Our relationship was at first full of resentment. We didn't like them and they didn't care for us much. But after two years of balling, our two teams are best of friends. We want to see them win, but not at our expense. If it is at our expense we are the first ones to give 'em a hug and offer our congratulations. After all, if they beat us, they earned it. Like us, Vertigo has changed a bit over the years, but their core is still the same. Matt Gorman '02, Tim Wetzel '03, Dave Kleinmann '02 and Don Alm '02 will always bleed Vertigo blue, and while they will never admit it, they all have a bit of Mason red running through them as well. It's tough not to like guys that you play against four times a week.

The Masons and Vertigo are in a sense, the same—we both want to compete and have fun at the same time. Even though Zach Jones '02 has nearly 70 pounds and four inches on me, I guard him like I own him. We all know that he dominates me in the paint, but that's what makes it fun. Never have I had such a good time guarding anyone. It's the same way with Gorman and Fowler—the trash talking is evident on the outside, but the respect flows on the inside. So with all due respect, I would just like to remind them that even though Vedder Vertigo is a way of life, it is still the wrong way.

As a result of our rivalry with Vertigo, I have made friends for life. And as a result of endless nights of balling, I have learned a few key lessons. First, put every ounce of energy and passion into everything you do, but don't be devastated if you don't succeed-we all can't come out on top. Secondly, make sure that you respect everyone for who they are. In life and on the court, we are all different, but we all want to have fun and we all want to be liked. Finally, just have fun and enjoy the moment.

Intramural sports have been nothing but fun and worthwhile during my time at Bucknell. For all of those who I competed against, I thank you. And for all of my basketball brothers, thank you for making my experience the best anyone could have ever asked for.

Jenna Demetriades '02

A triple is arguably one of softball's most elusive and unobtainable statistics at least until last weekend. On April 20 against a strong Colgate opponent, senior Jenna Demetriades smacked her fourth triple of the season, the 19th of her career, crowning her with the University's all-time triples lead.

Fitting as an on-the-field ceremony or special congratulations from her teammates would have been, observers did not know immediately what an accomplishment the triple was.

"I didn't know that I broke the record or was anywhere close until about an hour after the game," Demetriades said.

But when the feat was noticed, Demetriades finally received her congratulations. Afterwards, she reflected on her love of the game.

"The one thing I like most about softball is making the big hit to win a game, or a diving catch in the outfield to kill a rally by the opposing team. Hearing the crowd cheer and the high fives from your teammates is the best feeling in the world. It makes all the hard work in practice well worth it," Demetriades said.

Her season has been one full of positive moments. Successful batters speak of being "in the zone" when they arrive at the plate—a sensation that focuses oneself precisely on the pitcher. Demetriades knows the feeling.

"I believe all the hard work in practice over the past four years is the main reason as to why I have been successful at the plate. Concentration is the key to hitting and I've learned to block out all distractions while I'm hitting," Demetriades said.

Demetriades attributes her success in part to the support of her parents and teammates, who have always stood by her side.

"My parents are my leading motivator to put my best effort forward day in and day out in both practices and games. They are always there to help me through the hard times, and also celebrate the great times. My teammates are also my source of motivation. I see them going out busting their butts to be successful so they keep me on my toes. As a senior captain I expect myself to be a role model and to set the standard. If I wasn't giving 100 percent every day I would feel like I was letting the rest of the team down as well as myself," Demetriades said.

Demetriades has a future in softball and is currently weighing her options. These last few games of the season will be extra special to her.

"I just want to make my last games memorable and play as hard as i can. I have to give everything I possibly have left on the field and make sure I walk off for the last time feeling good about how I performed as a Bison," Demetriades said.

Off the diamond, Demetriades is a business administration management major. She also enjoys playing basketball, kayaking, heading to the beach and anything else that keeps her in the sunshine.

Orange batters blue 20-6 in scrimmage

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

The Bison football squad competed in its only game of the spring this past weekend.

By Cory Nadler
Senior Writer

The Bison football team finished up spring practice on Sunday with the annual spring game at Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium that the Orange team won by a score of 20-6 over the Blue squad. Every spring the Bison culminate their offseason training with an intra-squad game between the Orange and Blue teams that are chosen by the seniors.

This game is the time for the players to show the coaching staff how they have improved and will be ready for the fall. While the outcome of the spring game is not as important as the potential that the players show the coaches, it is still a competitive game. The Orange team took the lead in the first quarter when quarterback Ryan Colton '04 ran the ball in from one yard out to make the score 6-0. Todd Wenrich '03, the starting quarterback from this past season, who also played on the Orange squad, threw a 26-yard touchdown pass to Nisan Trotter '05 in the second quarter. The Orange team completed a two-point conversion to make the lead 14-0 at halftime.

The Orange squad added its third and final touchdown on the day with a 10-yard touchdown pass from Cole Ciesnolevicz '05 to Evan Crawford '04 to make the score 20-0. Ciesnolevicz completed all five of his passes on the day for 78 yards, and was the leading passer of the day. The leading rusher on the day was also on the Orange team. Raphael Darrington '05 ran for 45 yards on 16 carries.

The Blue team scored its only points in the fourth quarter on a trick play. Starting quarterback Kyle Fields '05 threw a lateral to wide out Daris Wilson '05, who then threw the ball into the hands of Tim Johnson '04 in the end zone for the score. Fields had good day through the air as well, going 9-14 in pass attempts for 133 yards. This made the final score 20-6 in favor of the Orange team.

The most important part of spring practice is to have players that may not have played too much in the regular season get used to the roles that they are going to have to play in the upcoming season.

"We had a lot of younger players get a lot better," Head Coach Tom Gadd said after the game.

With almost their entire defense returning, the Bison are very confident in their ability on that side of the ball.

"We have all of the defensive guys back, and I think they will come back ready to go," Gadd said.

"I think we will come back and be right where we left off," cornerback Jerome Acy '04 said. "We should be right back among the national leaders."

The Bison implemented a new offensive system this spring.

"The good thing about the new offense is that we all learn it together," Wenrich said.

The new offense focuses on improving the passing game for the Bison.

"We have a lot of the same routes, and a couple of more deep ones. That's what we missed last year, the deep routes," Wenrich said.

The Bison still have room for improvement though. "We need to get more consistent and make the big plays," Gadd said.

One thing that this will hinge on is the play of the young offensive line that will be starting for the Bison in the fall.

"We are good, big and talented on the offensive line, but we are also inexperienced," Gadd said. "We should be able to get used to the new offense and get better pass protection."

Women's lax suffers fourth straight loss

By Jenny Ross
Staff Writer

The past week was tough for the women's lacrosse team. They suffered their fourth straight loss within the past two weeks to LaSalle on Wednesday, April 17, 12-1. The Bison were held to their lowest output all season while the Explorers had their best offensive game this year. Despite the efforts of 15 Bucknell shots on goal and three free possession shots in the game, Melissa Montefusco '02 was the lone scorer for the Bison, netting an unassisted goal 18:18 into the first half.

They moved on to their final game of the season on Saturday where they hosted the Wildcats of Villanova in a Patriot League match. Fighting the cold and wet weather at the West Fields, the Bison hung with Villanova as they trailed by one with a score of 3-2 heading into halftime. After the break the Wildcats went on a four-goal tear with the Bison only responding once, making the score 7-3 with less than twelve minutes to play.

The Orange and Blue did not lose hope as Laurèn Nuss '04, Meredith Wright '04 and Suzanne Raffaele '03 each connected to bring the score 7-6 with 5:20 left in the game. Despite a Bison possession and a chance to tie, the Wildcats closed the game with three goals, ensuring their victory and leaving the final score 10-6.

Nicole Kallis '03, as usual, was stellar in goal for the Bison recording 14 saves, including several from point-blank range. Nuss and Raffaele lead the team offensively, each netting two goals in the contest. The Bison wrapped up the season with a 6-9 overall record.

The game was especially hard for the three seniors, Jen Gianis, Montefusco and Erin Curtis, who were honored at the start of the match. This was the last time the three would ever adorn the Orange and Blue in competition.

Yet, it's a long road down from the place where they started. Three years ago, Gianis, Montefusco and Curtis had completed their first season of Division I lacrosse. Gianis played in six games before earning a starting role on the defensive end in her sophomore year. Montefusco started in four of the 12 games she played in, accumulating four goals and five assists, before gaining the starting position and having a stellar sophomore season. Curtis played in 11 games serving as an important defensive substitute before earning a starting role as a sophomore.

Co-captain Montefusco scored her first collegiate goal on March 25, 1999 against Villanova and ironically this past Saturday with 5:20 left to play she tallied her last collegiate assist when she hit Raffaele, as she has so many times this season, against that same team. This co-captain made two school records of 26 assists in a season and 72 in a career.

Though as young first-year students, these seniors wouldn't have known the impact they would leave on their teammates. It is true that their counterparts will remember their stellar play, but these three added something a little extra to this team.

"I think that all three seniors have drastically changed the unity on the team. The relationships between team members have grown so much and made this team what it is. I completely believe that our team has more heart than any other team out there," Liz Schuster '04 said.

Opponents may see her tenacious defense, quick feet and ground ball pickups, but teammates know Curtis for her motherly nature. Actions speak louder than words with Montefusco, who is the team's "silent threat," according to teammate Mia Donahue '04. Yet off the field this assist queen is quite the entertainer and is considered the role model of hard work. Yet when it comes to dedication, we find a stream of it running in co-captain Gianis, who is seen by her teammates as a player who "would die for this team." Her play has even rubbed off onto younger teammates.

"Jen has made me a much more confident and passionate player. I am excited to carry what she has taught me on to the next season," Schuster said.

"They are dynamic, energetic, lax-loving people. I would not trade these three seniors for any other players in the world," Donahue said.

It's a shame that graduation is taking them away and into the world, but there is no doubt that these three will live on in the Bison of tomorrow right here in Lewisburg.

Track team captures quadrangular meet over Kent

This past weekend the Bison men's and women's track and field teams persevered through poor weather conditions and won the quadrangular meet over Kent State, LaSalle and Robert Morris in Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium.

Noel Powell '04 and Stephanie Bango '02 led the way for the Bison as they have all season, but this weekend was even more exceptional than usual. Powell won three individual events and one relay, winning the 100- and 200-meter dashes and placing first in the long jump. He went on to anchor the Bison's 4X100-meter relay.

"This was a very big surprise for me," Powell said. "I only expected to win the long jump going into the meet. I was most happy with my win in the 200-meter dash because it was the lowest time I had ever run and I didn't use blocks in the meet."

Bango was equally impressive, shattering her own three-week-old school record in the 800-meter run with a time of two minutes, 9.37 seconds, a full second than her previous time, which was set during better weather conditions.

"My goal is never to break the record," Bango said. "I knew there was a lot of competition going in, so I had to step it up."

Bango wasn't finished breaking records for the Bison. Later in the meet she helped Amy Calvo '03, Rehana Lenewala '05 and LeTonya McSwain '05 break the University record in the 4X400 relay with a time of 3:47.09.

"We couldn't have broken that record without the freshmen, they really stepped up," Bango said.

Kent State was the favorite going into the meet on the men's and women's sides. The women edged out Kent State out 253-236, while the men didn't even make it close, winning 208-171.5.

"We never think that another team is the favorite," Powell said. "We know that on any given day we can beat anyone."

On the women's side, six different individuals win events to go along with the record-setting 4x400 relay team. Bango's win in the 800 was part of a 1-2 finish with McSwain.

The Bison swept the two women's hurdles events. In the 400-meter hurdles, Edwina Bourn '03 was victorious, while Kiley MacDonald '05 captured the 100-meter high hurdles. In the distance events, Chris Crowe '02 won the 5,000-meter run and Kelly Raffety '05 captured the 3,000-meter steeplechase.

"We used a lot of depth, which really helped us," Bango said. "We're also nearing the end of our season; we're starting to come together really well."

For the men, Powell's wins in the 100 and 200 were only part of a big scoring day for the Bison men in the sprints. Matt Solomon '03 took second in the 100, while Ryan Newberger '05 and Solomon made it a 1-2-3 sweep in the 200. Solomon, Newberger and David Gabriel '02 preceded Powell in the 400 relay.

Also winning for the Bison men were Adam Kaufman '03 in the hammer throw and Nicholas Mousetis '04 in the 3,000-meter steeplechase.

The Bison hope to continue their winning ways as they compete in the historic Penn Relays next weekend in Philadelphia.

The Bucknell men's tennis team went 2-1 for the week and has yet to play Lehigh and Delaware in the regular season. The women's tennis team won its last match of the season at Bloomsburg with a score of 5-2 and ended with an overall record of 12-9.

On Saturday, April 20, the Bucknell men's tennis team traveled to West Point, N.Y., to take on a tough Patriot League competitor, Army, the deciding game for the extension of Bucknell's season to Patriot League championships. Despite their effort, the Bison fell to Army, 6-1. The lone winner for the Bison was Todd Jacobs '03, with scores of 6-3, 7-6 at the fifth singles slot.

On April 18, the team hosted Mount St. Mary's in a 7-0 shutout. Gerald DiChiaria '05 had a 6-0, 6-0 sweep at fourth singles in the match, his 15th singles win of the season. On Tuesday, April 16, the Bison also hosted West Chester, and came out on top with a 6-1 win. Scoring points for the Bison were Nick Denefrio '05 at the second singles slot, with scores of 6-3, 6-0, Leland Tien '05 at the third singles slot took his opponent 6-1, 7-5, at the fourth singles slot, Joe Menezes '05 took the match 6-2, 6-2, in the fifth singles slot, Jacobs won with scores of 6-1, 6-2 and at the sixth singles slot, Scott Allen '02 took the match with scores of 6-1, 6-4. In doubles action, the second slot team of Menezes and Tien won with a score of 8-5, and Allen and DiChiaria took the third slot with a score of 8-2.

The women's team traveled to Bloomsburg on Thursday, April 18 to win the match 5-2. Scoring points for the Bison were Nadezda Curcic '05 at the second singles slot with scores of 6-2, 6-0, Ashley Diers '05, with scores of 5-7, 7-5, 10-6 in the third singles slot, Tanya Sichko '05 at fifth singles with scores of 7-5, 6-4, and Samantha Berthod '04 with scores of 6-2, 6-1. The doubles team of Curcic and Diers in the second slot won with a score of 8-5, and Kristin Inglis '02 and Sichko took the third doubles slot with a score of 8-6.

"Even though we didn't make it to Championships, we did achieve one of our biggest goals of having a winning season," Head Coach Rebecca Helt said. "Last year we were 5-13. This year, we finished 12-9 with the same schedule."

respectively, Lanewala began checking out colleges with good academic and track and field reputations. However, choosing Bucknell wasn't all about the school itself. "Bucknell was a good school with friendly people and helpful professors," Lanewala said, "but I also liked how the coaches described the track program, and my uncle ran track here."

When Lanewala came into the program in the fall, she didn't really know what to expect. "The seniors really made an effort for us to feel welcome from the first day," Lanewala said. "I didn't know what it was going to be like, but we train faster and lift more than in high school. The team is also a lot closer than what I would have thought."

From the first day at practice, Head Coach Kevin Donner was impressed with what he saw.

"The electricity and attitude she brings every day to practice rubs off on everyone," Donner said. "She's very, very positive. To the coaches, it makes our job easier."

"The coaches have always said 'I think you can run this time,'" Lanewala said. "It's very helpful that the coaches have that much confidence in us."

Throughout the indoor season, Lanewala improved by leaps and bounds. In her first college 400-meter race, she ran a 1:01.19, and just three meets later she was running 57.99. By the time the Patriot League championships came around, she was ready. Lanewala ran an unprecedented seven races over the two days of competition, placing herself very high on the all-time performance lists in three of them by running a 25.72 in the 200, 57.59 in the 400 and running as part of the 4x400-meter relay team.

Donner noticed an intensity in Lanewala during the meet that he wasn't expecting. "At the conference championships, Rainy was so in tune with how the team was doing," Donner said. "Every 20 minutes she was coming up to me, asking if we were ahead or behind or our predictions. It shows that Rainy is all about the team and you have to really like that about a person."

The women's team emerged from the Patriot League meet with a championship, but Lanewala wasn't done. She was given the 400-meter leg of the distance medley relay that ran at the ECAC meet two weeks later. The team ended up destroying the previous school record by 15 seconds and qualifying provisionally for the NCAA championships.

Associate Head Coach Joe Klim knows why Lanewala is so focused.

"If Rainy is in a competitive situation when it counts, she's there," he said. "If it really comes down to it and points are on the line, expect her to run well. She hates to lose. That's for sure."

Lanewala has found a big challenge this year in being a student-athlete. Although officially undecided, she plans to pursue international relations or economics, and has a current GPA of 3.5.

"It's definitely a big difference in terms of time commitment between high school and college," Lanewala said. "You have to work hard and make decisions about how to manage your time so you can do what you want."

Lanewala has continued to imprint herself in the Bucknell track and field record books throughout the outdoor season. Her 25.76 in the 200 at The Colonial Relays placed her sixth on the all-time list outdoors, and she recently ran a leg of a 4x400 relay that took the first spot all-time with a time of 3:47.09.

Lanewala has high goals for her future at Bucknell.

"Academically, I want to possibly go to law school," she said. "On the running side, I want to be able to qualify for NCAAs by the time I graduate, either provisionally or automatically."

"There's no question that she has the ability to be the best 400- and 200-meter runner ever here," Klim said. "She has big shoes to fill, but she's got that ability."

Senior Stephanie Bango shared some of her thoughts about Lanewala and her contributions to the team.

"Obviously Rainy has been a major contributor to the success experienced by our track and field team this year," she said. "She has had a hand in numerous school records and amazingly only seems to improve with each race. Aside from the awarded points, she has been an exceptional teammate and friend whose inspiration and motivation have helped make my last year here a memorable one."

Cecily Cairns Classic

Where's the love for Matty?

Bucknell University, like most colleges, has a healthy selection of landmarks and monuments scattered in various places across its sprawling campus. We've got the allegedly "perfect" dome, the record-length freestanding staircase and of course, in the grand tradition of campus decoration, the University boasts those ubiquitous, decidedly abstract and occasionally phallic works of three-dimensional art. And then we've got those massive gates that are positioned rather oddly in the middle of nothing, right near the entrance to the campus.

While those gates might not have the allure of the "perfect" dome or the curious Freudian elements of certain campus statues, it has a significance behind it that deserves recognition. The monument, as most students know, is called the Christy Mathewson Gateway. It sits right across a field from the Christy Mathewson-Memorial Stadium, which houses a Christy Mathewson-Memorial plaque.

All of this seems to prompt the same question over and over again: "Who the heck was Christy Mathewson?" followed by several variations of that question, including, "Why is our football stadium named after some lady?" It may seem a benign inquisition to the average student, but from the perspective of a connoisseur of baseball history, to reveal such ardent disrespect for a man who revolutionized the sport of baseball is to commit something just short of blasphemy.

Courtesy Bucknellian archives

Alright, so I'm not exactly a "connoisseur" of baseball history, and not knowing who Christy Mathewson doesn't exactly denote mortal sin. But it is a sad truth that far too few people appreciate his accomplishments.

Before one can develop an understanding of his contributions to the game of baseball, it's relatively essential that he or she acknowledge the fact that Christy, indeed, was a man. Christy was short for Christopher; not Christina, not Christine, not Crystal or any other modern female moniker. And really, there's no shame in having a feminine nickname—look at Babe Ruth. "Babe" doesn't exactly scream out with masculinity. What about Sandy Koufax? Connie Mack? No one gave them any grief. Perhaps it would have cleared up some nowrecurring confusions if he had just gone by "Chris," but in the late 1800s, no one had a problem with the name "Christy."

That nonsense aside, Mathewson was to pitching what Babe Ruth was to power hitting. Although he had a relatively powerful fastball, "Matty" left his biggest mark on the game with his tremendous command, his remarkable intelligence and his daunting repertoire of pitches. He had almost a dozen different pitches at his disposal (some of which he invented himself), and he could place each and every one of them exactly where he wanted, whenever he wanted. In addition to that, he always seemed to know which pitches to use for which batters in what situation. Mathewson's brilliant mind was one of the driving forces that helped pitching become the game of wits that it is now.

In 17 seasons as a major league pitcher, most of which were spent with John McGraw's New York Giants, Mathewson won 373 games, the third highest total in modern history, and landed a .665 career winning percentage. Starting in 1903, he won at least 22 games for 12 straight seasons—he won over 30 in four of those seasons (including a National League-record 37 in 1908).

Matty was also extremely adept when it came to putting up goose-eggs—he had 80 shutouts over the course of his career. His dominance was also evident in his career earned run average, an impressively low 2.13.

In the 1905 World Series, Mathewson pitched three times in six days—three complete game shutouts. His line from that Series is nothing short of staggering: 27 innings, 14 hits, 0 earned runs, 18 strikeouts and one measly base on balls.

So why isn't he still a household name? Have we no place in our hearts for dapper control pitchers?

As if it weren't bad enough that people can't remember him for his astonishing skill, it seems that no one even harbors an appreciation for his untarnished persona. Not only did Mathewson revolutionize pitching in a mechanical way, he had a hand in bringing some degree of respectability to the ball-playing profession. While most players were brusque and uncivilized to say the least, Matty was a player that people would actual want their kids to emulate.

He was a good Christian and had a polished demeanor, or in addition to being a "college boy," which was a rarity on the ballfields at the dawn of the 20th century. Mathewson wasn't "just" a college student—while attending Bucknell, he did everything, and he did it all well. He was class president. He sang in the glee club. He played trombone in the band. He joined a fraternity. And in his spare time, he played three sports. In addition to his pitching excursions, Mathewson played basketball and was an accomplished dropkicker and fullback for the football team. His on-campus fame was based more on his football prowess than on his accomplishments on the mound—football was by far the most celebrated collegiate sport of the time—which is why the football stadium, rather than the baseball diamond, bears his name (the gates are a tribute to his post-college accomplishments, as they were donated to the University by organized baseball in 1928, three years after Mathewson's premature death).

Despite everything he contributed to the Bucknell community, Mathewson didn't actually graduate from the University. He certainly didn't lack the intelligence or the work ethic (Matty's work ethic, in all regards, was impeccable according to most who knew him); he simply had to attend to more pressing matters, like the contract offered to him by the Giants.

I think it's safe to say that Mathewson at least earned the distinction of being Bucknell's most successful dropout. Diploma or no diploma, the cleancut native of Factoryville, Pa., would eventually become one of five players inducted into the National Baseball Hall of Fame in its inaugural class. He was enshrined in 1936, along with Babe Ruth, Ty Cobb, Walter Johnson and Honus Wagner.

Not too shabby for a guy with such a feminine name.

LOUIS ARMSTRONG

WAS THE FIRST MAN TO

WALK ON THE MOON.

It's a long way from the Apollo Theatre to the Apollo program. And while his playing may have been "as lofty as a moon flight," as Time magazine once suggested, that would be as close as Louis Daniel Armstrong would ever get to taking "one small step for man"

But as the premier jazz musician of the 20th century, giant leaps were a matter of course for Satchmo. No person before or since has ever embodied — and revolutionized — jazz the way Louis Armstrong did.

Armstrong left his footprints all over the jazz world. And he usually did it in lace-up oxfords.

Take solos, for instance. It's impossible to imagine jazz without them. But they actually didn't become an established part of the jazz vocabulary until Armstrong helped popularize them. Seventy years later, his solos are still revered for their audacity and virtuosity.

In the 1950s, when his popularity became too big to be contained within our borders, he accepted an invitation from the State Department to act as an American goodwill ambassador around the world. And when he became the last jazz musician to hit #1 on the Billboard pop chart, he beat the Beatles to do it.

Instead of a giant leap, Louis Armstrong delivered one giant free-form crazy jazz groove for mankind.

Not bad for a kid whose first experience with a trumpet was as a guest in a New Orleans correction home for wayward boys. If only today's schools were as enlightened as that reformatory was.

LOUIS THE FIRST.

Ask almost any parent, and they'll say arts education is very important to their child's well-being. Virtually every study shows that moms and dads like the effects the arts have on their children. They like that dance and music and painting and drama teach kids to be more tolerant and open. They like that they allow boys and girls to express themselves creatively. And they appreciate that the arts help promote individuality, bolster self-confidence while also improving overall academic performance.

Which makes it so surprising that the arts have been allowed to virtually disappear from our schools. And our children's lives.

THIS IS WHAT HORNS ARE FOR.

A little art is not enough. If you think the hour or so of art your kids are getting each week isn't nearly their fair share, it's time to make some noise. To find out just how to get involved or for more information on the ways your child can benefit from arts education, please visit us on the web at AmericansForTheArts.org. BAILEY From page B2

When I came in as a freshman, I just worked hard and the coaches gave me an opportunity to play," Bailey said.

"The first film we saw of him in high school was okay. We weren't sure of his position but he was a good player. Then when he came to campus, the players were talking about him during the preseason. When your players talk about a freshman, you know you have a good one," Flannery said.

Bailey played in 23 games for the varsity that year and totaled a modest 41 points and 20 assists during that time. His average of 1.8 points per game was not an omen of things to come.

During his sophomore year, Bailey was tabbed as the team's starting point guard. He competed in all 28 games for the Bison while finishing second on the squad in scoring with 11.4 points per game. The sophomore led the team in scoring in seven of those contests while shooting at a high rate of 49.1 percent from the field. Bailey's high output of his second season was a 19 point performance against Princeton in which he drilled seven of nine field goal attempts. He was also sixth overall in the conference in assists with an average of 2.79 dimes per contest.

By the time his junior and senior years rolled around, Bailey had truly matured into a great leader, which undoubtedly affected the progress of his teammates.

"He has showed me that hard work pays off. He has taught me to hang tough during tough times and that better days are not far away. When Bryan is on the floor he motivates everyone to play at his level and with his intensity," Werner said. "Bryan has also made me realize that I only have one chance to play college basketball. I should get the most out of it and enjoy each day, whether it's a practice or a game."

"My role has changed a lot throughout my four seasons here. As a freshman, my primary role on offense was to set up my teammates for good shots and to pressure the other team's point guard and disrupt them with my defense. As a captain my junior and senior year, I assumed a leadership role on the team and realized that I had to do more scoring. I tried to show that to be a good leader, you don't necessarily have to be loud and vocal. I'm a pretty quiet person and prefer to lead by example," Bailey said.

Two years removed from his 1.8 points per game scoring average, Bailey impressively earned a spot on the All-Patriot League First Team. The lead guard also became a co-captain for the Orange and Blue. He started all 27 games his junior year and led the team in scoring with an average of 17.7 points. His average placed him third in the League in that category. Bailey scored 30 points during the season opener against Lock Haven to establish his season high.

Although his senior year consisted of injuries, Bailey, who was once again the team's co-captain, fought back hard to put together another stellar campaign. Bailey pushed through the rocky start to pile up a 17.4 points-per-game average. He also managed to snatch an average of 5.3 rebounds, which was one of the best figures in the country for players at or under six feet one inch.

Bailey scored his 1,000th career point on Feb. 2 at Lafayette, which made him the 28th player in the history of the University and the 37th in the Patriot League to reach the milestone. Bailey once put a string together of five consecutive games in which he tallied 20 points or more. He finished his career with 1,167 points, which placed him in the top-20 on the Bison all-time scoring list.

"I think my best game of my career was this year at Holy Cross. I believe I made my first four shots. From the beginning things were going my way. I ended up with 30 points," Bailey said.

The senior captain also was named Patriot League Player of the Week for the first time in his career after averaging 25.5 points in a one week stretch. Bailey, along with teammate Boakai Lalugba '03, was again selected to the First Team All-Patriot League team.

"He is a very special player. A guy like him doesn't come around to the Patriot League too often," teammate Brian Werner '03 said.

Although Bailey had the skills to be a great player, what set him apart was his passion for the game.

"His work ethic and desire to be the best ballplayer he can be were his greatest attributes. He (was) the hardest worker on the team. You could always find him in the gym with a ball in his hands. His improvement since high school has been unprecedented."

Bailey now leaves the college ranks behind with hopes of playing in an even more competitive league.

"I plan on continuing to play. I will be attending camps here and in Europe. I think anything is possible. It's about hard work and being committed to what you want to accomplish," Bailey said.

"Bryan is very dedicated to the game and works hard. He is a great player and hopefully he can show his skill at the next level, whether it be international basketball or the NBA," Pete Santos '02 said.

"Bryan's gotten stronger and has learned the game as a point guard. He will go to the next level if he gets a break. He can play!" Flannery said.

Bailey definitely is proud of how his career panned out. He also does not regret what he will miss, but instead stays true to what he accomplishes.

"I'm not upset that I'll miss the chance to play in the new arena. It would have been nice, but I've enjoyed playing in Davis. I just play the game because I enjoy it," Bailey said.

Prior to coaching the Orange and Blue, he successfully transformed the Saint Francis University (Pa.) program into one of the elite squads in the Northeastern Conference. Preceding his coaching stint with the Red Flash, Donner, as an assistant, coached eight All-Mid-American Conference performers and one NCAA qualifier at Central Michigan University. He also established a new varsity program at Detroit, following his graduation from the University. However, Donner was not asked to revitalize a Bison program, rather preserve its prowess as a Patriot League force to be reckoned with.

"This is the fourth school that I have coached at, but it's the first time that I have encountered a program with a foundation and its traditions set," Donner said. "In the past I had to rebuild programs, but here the program was built and I just had to direct it."

In regards to tradition, perhaps the most challenging task for Donner has been imposing his own coaching scheme upon his athletes. He was cognizant of the caution he had to take in modifying the system without changing it completely.

"I tried to maintain a lot of the traditions and history developed here, but I have had success with some of my own methods and I wanted to add these to their (the athletes) already wide curriculum," Donner said. "We (the coaching staff) came up with some good compromises."

McSwain has found the modifications effective because Donner feels it is imperative to be his own person.

"He tried to make the team his own, rather than trying to fill the shoes of Coach Gulden," McSwain said. "Although he did keep some rules to savor tradition."

Donner's extraordinary coaching aptitude can be attributed to his intimately effective relationship with his athletes, his drive to make them better and his overall competitive nature."

Distance runners Greg Costello '03 and Bryan Johnston '03 attest to this.

"He's really on the same level as us," Costello said. "He's easy to talk to and approachable. I could talk to him about anything, even things that don't pertain to running. He pushes us to become better as athletes, which is something that I cannot say about some of the coaches that I've had. A lot of coaches are laid back, but Coach Donner tries to get us worked up to beat the other teams. He is optimistic about my running and sets high goals for me. He loves the sport. He came right into the team and gets along with everyone. He is rarely in his office because he is always out stretching with us and checking up on what is going on in our lives. He is also a very competitive guy. He always is up on where we need to be in our chain to be competitive."

The quality of building personal relations with all of his athletes is displayed through Edwina Bourn '03, who runs sprints and hurdles. Although Donner's primary focus is on the distance runners, he makes it a point to know everyone.

"He is more of a distance coach, but he definitely makes it a point to know his runners," Bourn said. "I like the fact that he is personal. He made it a point to get to know me, despite the fact that his focus is on distance."

Donner comes from a diverse background of coaching in which he has both rejuvenated programs and maintained them. He has emphasized his commitment to winning at Bucknell, while improving his athletes as runners and as students. In display of his modesty, he is truly honored to be the recipient of The Bucknellian's Male Coach of the Year award.

"I am very honored and flattered," Donner said. "I owe a lot to my assistant coaches, Joe Klim, Scott Weiser, Bob Schanbacher, Sarah Vargo and Jim Knight, who have helped me with the transition. Obviously, our student athletes have also made our staff look good."

and maybe one of the best first-year athletes that the University has ever seen. The Bison are right in the race for defending their Patriot League title, tied with Hobart and Army with one regular season game left, and Cara is a huge reason why. The team suffered two key injuries early in the season with Fetchet and midfielder John Terracciano '03 going down with knee problems, and it needed the younger players to step up. Cara has done just that, averaging an astounding four points per game.

"I didn't even think I was going to get to play when I came to Bucknell," he said.

The first-year standout credits his teammates and coaches who have helped him with the adjustment from high school to the more intense college level of play.

"The coaches and players have helped me out a lot," Cara said. "A big thing that helps me is that our defense is so good, and that's who I go up against in practice. When I get into a game situation it's sometimes even easier than who I play against in practice."

Despite all of Cara's personal accolades that will undoubtedly continue throughout his career, he has only one thing on his mind that he needs to accomplish.

"I just want our team to make the tournament, and once we get there I want us to make an impact," he said.

The future of the Bison lacrosse team is bright as Fetchet and Terracciano are expected to return next year and will join Cara, who has helped fill their spots. The Bison have a young team that, with experience, will be the team to watch in the Patriot League in years to come.

"The improvement of our team has started to become evident," Jamieson said. "If our younger players keep developing like they have, we'll be very successful."

Fedorjaka's players are grateful to have a leader with such high expectations for the program.

"The way that Coach makes us practice and play really prepared us to achieve at that level, as we did this year," Monique LeBlanc '02 said. "I chose to come to Bucknell because I wanted to play the type of ball that Coach demands every day from her players. She is a go-getter, and we had the same goal of winning a Patriot League Championship."

"I still remember Coach Fed recruiting me, telling me that we were going to win a championship; it was right around the corner," Molly Creamer '03 said. "That was a dream she had, and spread to the whole team, and it was pretty great that we could do it this year."

Fedorjaka first became a part of the program in 1990 as an assistant coach, and over the ensuing three years, helped the Bison grow from a 2-24 team to an 11-17 team. Since returning to the University as the program's head coach, she has dedicated herself to building up the University's women's basketball team over the past four years. Her enthusiasm and dedication are evident in her coaching style.

"Coach Fed is very intense in her style," LeBlanc said. "When we are in a game, you always know that Coach is working just as hard on the sidelines as we are on the court."

Fedorjaka has succeeded in using that intensity to bring the program to a new level of achievement, culminating with the recent Patriot League title, an accomplishment that will contribute to future improvement for the team.

"I think that this season also is another big boost for the program," Fedorjaka said. "It will hopefully impact positively our recruiting and help us to continue to build upward. All of the players who return and experienced what we achieved now know what it takes to get to that level."

In light of all her successes as the program's head coach, Fedorjaka has a lot to be proud of. However, she recognizes the group effort that goes into building a team like the Bison.

"I definitely want to thank everyone connected with our program, either on the front lines or behind the scenes," Fedorjaka said. "First of all, [I'd like to thank] the players, managers and coaching staff for their hard work, dedication and sacrifice. I'd also like to thank our trainer John Barrett, Sports information's Kelli Sheesley, equipment room Barb Dugan, radio announcer Doug Birdsong and all of our administration for their loyal support, as well as everyone else, from our custodians to our game management team to our secretaries to our incredible fans. They all mean so much to me and are definitely valued for the role they play."

Fedorjaka and her team would like to continue to play at the level they reached this year—and perhaps even levels beyond it—in seasons to come.

"The next goal is to return to the NCAAs and be able to get a win," she said.

Considering her constantly growing list of achievements as a coach, it wouldn't be surprising if she and the Lady Bison achieve that goal next year.

"Coach knows basketball—she'll make you better," LeBlanc said. Indeed, Fedorjaka's talents as a head coach have already taken the players to a new level, and will surely continue to do so down the road.

ive in the fact that I needed to really embrace a leadership role this year. I love basketball and I love this team and it was an easy group to play with, so I just tried to use the passion we had to be an emotional leader as much as possible," Creamer said.

Creamer continued her excellent play this year, and was named League Player of the Year for the second consecutive season. Some of her numerous accomplishments this past season include winning Patriot League Player of the Week honors nine times and becoming the first player in Bucknell and Patriot League history to score over 1,500 points as a junior. She reached this milestone by scoring in double figures in every single game the Bison played this year.

Those in attendance at Davis Gym on January 16 when the Orange and Blue squared off against Army saw a game for the ages as Creamer scored a school and conference record 43 points. Her effort that night was the second best scoring performance in the country and included her setting a new school mark for three-pointers in a game with eight.

"The Army game was a great game for the team in general, I think we battled back the whole way and withstood a lot of runs. I guess that happened to also be the night that some of my shots fell, and I really was just glad I could help the team out that night by making some of those shots. The gym was electric and it was extra fun to play in Davis that night," Creamer said.

Creamer's reasons for continued success are simple and they help demonstrate one of her most admirable qualities, her modesty.

"The team each year has gotten better and better, and I think that is a tribute to the coaching staff as a whole and also to the team's chemistry continuing to get stronger. I know that my teammates are working hard in the summer and that just motivates me to work just as hard. The team has gotten better as a whole and if I have gotten a little better it's a tribute to the team. It all comes down to just putting in the time and hard work," Creamer said.

"She is an amazing worker. She is in the gym before practice and after practice every day working to improve her skills. Molly cares so much and is one of the most determined people I know," teammate Kristin Valdner '04 said.

Creamer is an extraordinary basketball player, not only because of her play on the court but also because of what she brings to the concept of being a team.

"She is a great floor general and team leader, she was the fuel for us this year—we ran on her command. Most importantly Molly is a great person, who is hard working both on and off the court. We all have looked up to her in one way or another this year and she has taught me to be a better teammate," Vicki Quimby '02 said.

"She has made me a better player without even realizing it, and she elevates her teammates to a higher level of competition just with her hard work, devotion and drive," Kate Rounsley '02 said.

"I would say my single greatest achievement this year would be helping in a little way to make fifteen different personalities mesh into one team. Just putting the emphasis on how important it was to be a team, and that helped us to win the championship I think," Creamer said.

"I have so many great memories from this season, but if I had to choose one, it would be running back on defense at the end of the Championship game and looking into my teammates eyes and knowing that we did it. Seeing the tears of my friends who had worked so hard to get to that point, and proving all the odds wrong, you can't really put that into words," Creamer said.

Creamer has played a crucial role in helping put Bucknell women's basketball on the map. She has done this through her hard work, perseverance and magnificent play. She has done all of this while at the same time being the very humble, modest individual that she is. One can find out how special she is by asking her fellow classmate on the team.

"She is such a talented athlete, but that is not what makes here so good. What makes her the player she is simply comes down to her heart. She loves the game of basketball and does anything and everything she possibly can to make her a better player," Kate Franks '05 said. "But this isn't all for personal satisfaction, it all comes down to the team with her. She does all this because she knows by making herself the best player possible, it will make the team better. I admire her devotion to the game and her love for every single one of her teammates. It is too bad that every basketball player in the country can't have a Molly Creamer as their teammate. I just consider it an honor to have her as mine."

The Living Wage: Myths & Realities

Myth 1: $6.75 an hour is a living wage in Lewisburg.
Reality: The new Bucknell minimum wage of $6.75 an hour in dining services is NOT a living wage. The $9 figure that BCEJ suggests is actually a low one. A living wage in Lewisburg that would support 1 adult and 1 child is at least $10.78 an hour. For a family of 4 (2 adults and 2 children) in Lewisburg, a living wage would be $9.93 an hour assuming that both adults were working full time. A living wage is the minimum hourly rate needed to cover necessary expenses-a sufficient income to allow a family to live independently of public assistance, food stamps, and rent and child-care subsidies, and to stay above the federal poverty line. People still need benefits beyond a $9 living wage.

Myth 2: People earning low wages at Bucknell have other sources of income, such as spouses, so it is OK to pay them less than a living wage.
Reality: Administrative, faculty, and staff wages are not raised or lowered depending on other income sources (it's illegal to do so). A wage must always cover more than the individual earner, or it would be impossible to have families. In fact, nationally, low wage earners account for more than half of their family's earnings, and over a third of low-wage workers are the sole wage earners in their families. These earnings are crucial to the survival of working families.

Myth 3: The market wage is a fair wage.
Reality: The reason we have minimum wage laws is that in a market system, employers pay as little as possible (sweatshops still exist in the US and elsewhere today).
The purpose of the original minimum wage was to allow people working full time to provide decent lives for themselves and their families. The current minimum wage of $5.15 an hour is well below the poverty threshold for any family. Even the government (both federal and state) recognizes that family incomes below at least twice the minimum wage are inadequate. Hence there are some special programs, especially for children's health coverage, for such low-income households, but an institution like Bucknell should want its employees not to have to depend on such public assistance.

Myth 4: Bucknell cannot afford a living wage.
Reality: For Bucknell to pay living wages for the 230 or so employees who currently earn under $9 per hour, it would cost about $500,000 every year. This is only 1/3 of 1% of the entire operating budget of $150,000,000. Discretionary funds within the budget, choices of how to spend funds we have, new sources (e.g., fund raising), and evidence of a decade of budget surpluses (ranging from about $500,000 to $1,400,000) make a living wage feasible.

Myth 5: Bucknell cannot pay a living wage because raises would have to be given to all other workers, and this would cost Bucknell too much money.
Reality: Additional wage needs should be addressed, but they should not be used as an excuse to avoid paying a living wage. Once a living wage is met, Bucknell workers should receive reasonable and fair increases in line with those accorded administrators and faculty. The priorities of Bucknell's expenditures and fundraising efforts should be consistent with Bucknell's Mission Statement, which calls for "practices that exemplify compassion, civility, and a sense of justice." Paying a living wage would seem a minimum expression of Bucknell's self-defined mission.

Myth 6: Adopting a living wage principle as a matter of justice would impose one group's ethical views on all the rest of us.
Reality: Bucknell University proudly declares its own ethical positions in its official principles and goals. Among these are "institutional programs and practices that exemplify compassion, civility, and a sense of justice" (Mission Statement), as well as non-discrimination policies. These fundamental positions define the institution. The living wage campaign simply seeks to include those principles in Bucknell's actual practices.

"The Rookie" is heartwarming

Disney's latest appeals to kids at heart

By Jessica Cortese
Staff Writer

It used to be the ultimate dream of boys growing up in America to be a Major League baseball player. Little Jimmy Morris wanted to play baseball more than anything, with the possible exception of pleasing his father. After growing up as an army brat and moving around so much that he never got the chance to finish a season, and his father never having come to watch him pitch, Morris finally gave up on his dream when his family moved to Big Lake, Texas, a town that doesn't even have a Little League team. But some people are born to live their dreams.

Movie Review

★★★ 3.25

Based on Morris' autobiography, The Oldest Rookie: Big-League Dreams from a Small-Town Guy, "The Rookie" is the uplifting family story of how a science teacher and baseball coach (Dennis Quaid) in a small town got a second chance to do what all the other boys wanted to do: play for the Major League. With a G rating and a refreshing lack of swear words and sex scenes, this movie is suitable for kids, but really made for those who are still kids at heart.

"The Rookie" isn't a cheesy story about how perfect life is when you are a baseball player. Morris suffered through being laughed at by the younger guys at try-outs, spending countless hours traveling by bus while he played in the Minors, and having to hear how the family he painfully missed was scraping for money and having its possessions repossessed. Although Morris made it to the Majors, he started small and only made it with the love and support of his family and the town that believed in him. This movie is about dreams, not miracles. And, although living a dream may be hard work, it is worth every second. Movies don't get much more heart-warming than this. In fact, it was so sentimental that it had the college pitcher sitting next to me in tears by the end.

Busta show has low turn-out

Despite Busta Rhymes' fame, the concert attracted few University students

By Stephanie Nickse
Staff Writer

What happened to everyone who bought tickets to see Busta Rhymes? It's always a possibility that the majority of these people were held against their will and therefore unable to attend the concert, but the likelihood of this must be considered slim.

Although Busta Rhymes will be celebrating his 30th birthday this May, he was definitely not celebrating his performance at the University on Friday night. The famous rapper from Brooklyn, N.Y. made his appearance at the Gerhard Fieldhouse on April 19.

Concert Review

Busta Rhymes was met by a majority of young teenagers who came out to support him and dance along to the music. Students from the University were few and far between. Regardless of who showed and who didn't, the total population of fans did not come close to crowding the Field House.

A handful of teenagers ran through the Fieldhouse entrance at 8:30 p.m. when doors opened, but it was not necessary to be there early in order to get close to the stage. Busta Rhymes finally came on stage around 10 p.m., with less than 400 people in the audience. His performance may have lasted an hour and a half, but it was obvious that the performer felt the lack of enthusiasm seen in the crowd. At one point in Busta Rhymes' performance, he even suggested to the crowd that they "skedaddle" when a few people opted to sit down on the floor.

However, Busta Rhymes' view of the audience may have been a little harsh. In fact, the majority of those who did stay for the duration of the concert were attentive to the performance. They danced and waved their arms to the rhythm of the music and appeared to enjoy the concert.

Regardless of the unpopular performance, Busta Rhymes has made a name for himself nationally. He dropped out of high school at the age of 17 to pursue his dream of becoming a rapper after entering a contest in the 10th grade sponsored by Chuck D. and Public Enemy. The contest proved a success in inspiring him to co-found a group called "Leaders of the New School," landing him a contract with Elektra Records.

Swearing throughout Friday's concert may be a part of Busta Rhymes' rap performance, but it is doubtful that he has earned the reputation that he has with the same vocabulary. After taking a vocal role in "The Rugrats Movie" in 1999, it is obvious that Busta Rhymes can be a diverse performer. Further evidence of his "other side" may be a new role that he will be playing as the Cowardly Lion in a future television remake of "The Wizard of Oz."

Eric Graham—The Bucknellian

Busts Rhymes' rap was on display in the Fieldhouse for few people.

Despite the University's feelings toward him, Busta Rhymes has great talent and obvious inner drive that has helped him to succeed in the entertainment industry.

Silent films delight audience

By Melinda Kummer
Staff Writer

The Campus Theatre drew a full house this past Sunday for the Silent Film Triple Feature. The special feature's main attraction was the accompaniment of the films by The Paragon Ragtime Orchestra. The program included films by Buster Keaton, Harold Lloyd and Charlie Chaplin, with the orchestra playing the entirety of the original scores.

The music was certainly the highlight of the feature. It added depth and fullness to an otherwise flat movie screen. Though Keaton's "Cops" and Lloyd's "Never Weaken" were comical, the most delightfully entertaining film was Chaplin's "The Pawnshop." Sound effects for all three films included a slide whistle, an orchestra member barking like a dog and the percussion from authentic antique drums. The impeccable timing exponentially increased the hilarity of the films. Children squealed with glee while the elderly recalled similar experiences of their youth, proving the capability of such a show to transcend generational differences.

Children squealed with glee while the elderly recalled similar experiences of their youth, proving the capability of such a show to transcend generational differences.

Orchestra conductor Rick Benjamin resides in Lewisburg. Following a family tradition, Benjamin grew up loving movie music. He decided to research scores from early films and leads the field in his remarkable finds.

"I enjoy my research very much. It's a fascinating field," he said.

Since the orchestra had made an appearance at a film festival in October, its music is known throughout the area. "I came to hear the orchestra," Hummels Wharf resident Lucille Aungst said. "I have all their CDs. I just love the music."

Experiencing a silent film in its originality is important for gaining a new perspective of the art form. Professor of English and Film Studies Eric Faden related the importance of such an experience.

"First, seeing an early film in a theater with an orchestra demonstrates that early cinema was never 'silent,'" Faden said. "Second, it shows how watching movies in their original context (in a theater, with an orchestra, at the right projection speed, with their original music scores) creates a profoundly and radically different experience for the spectator. People viewing these films at home on a VCR simply do not get it because they're not seeing the films as they were intended to be seen. It would be like listening to a Beethoven symphony over the telephone."

"Third, we are lucky we have a historical movie theatre in which to show these films. Today's multiplexes are simply not equipped to either project silent movies or to accommodate an orchestra," Faden said.

The Paragon Ragtime Orchestra was founded in 1985 and has special interest in the recreation of late 19th Century and early 20th Century theater music. Its purpose of preserving movie music delights many audiences. It has performed at such venues as the Kennedy Center and the Lincoln Center, as well as at the American Dance Festival. Its recordings can be heard at Disney World's Main Street, USA attractions The orchestra represented the United States as "Ambassador of Goodwill" at the World's Fair in 1992.

Jazz concert features Marsalis

By Julianna Pietak
Staff Writer

A world class performance by world class musicians came to our very own Weis Center last Saturday, April 20. The Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra, under the direction of the acclaimed Wynton Marsalis, performed a series of varied yet captivating jazz compositions.

For those unfamiliar with the caliber of the group and its director, the Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra is the resident Jazz orchestra at the Lincoln Center, the world's largest non-profit arts organization dedicated to jazz. As such, according to the program notes by Loren Schoenberg, it is composed of "15 of the finest jazz soloists and ensemble players today." Its responsibilities as an orchestra range from educational events to award winning radio programs to composing original works of jazz, as well as touring the world.

Concert Review

Marsalis has acquired much fame and renown of his own. He has won nine Grammy awards, the first and only Pulitzer prize of music awarded to a jazz musician and even the title of United Nations Messenger of Peace. With such accolades, the performance promised to be an exceptional one, and held to this expectation throughout.

The evening began with an original composition, "Enyakee's Decision," introduced by Marsalis. It should be noted, as well, that the term director does not imply conductor in this case, as the band played in a free and improvisatory style all night. The first piece set the tone for the concert, featuring a string of extraordinary soloists spanning the range of the orchestra instruments, including trumpet, piano and flute. Each was fascinatingly clear and rich in sound. The piece as a whole had a mellow, yet spicy and lively character.

Following this piece was "Blue Flame," introduced by Marsalis with the famous statement "the blues will never die." The whole work made use of usual blues features, integrating elements of sultry smoothness with a factor of fun.

A rhythmic, Latin style composition by Chico Afaro continued the program. It was titled "Canonbolla," and it also featured a variety of solos. In particular, the soprano and alto saxophones played off of each other in a truly amazing interlude.

The next two pieces held a special importance for the University community and the Lincoln Center Jazz Orchestra. These pieces were performed in memory of Ted Ammon, former University trustee and Chairman of the Board of Jazz at the Lincoln Center, who passed away this past fall. The first of this honorary set was a slow dirge, entrancing and soulful in quality. It followed a steady bass beat throughout, yet was mellow, rich and gospel-like, giving it an almost sleepy air. The next piece offered a contrast in its "get up and dance" feel. It was very lively and was defined by its bright, happy swing and ended the first half of the program in a way that convinced audience members of the talent of its performers.

After intermission, the orchestra returned to play its final five pieces. The first of these was Charles Mingus' "Meditation for Integration." It utilized unique harmonies and rhythms, almost to the point of dissonance. However, it still followed a smooth and steady line, both within the melody and throughout the piece, beginning muted and soft, building and then ending again on a quiet note.

"125th Street Prophet," was next on the program. Like many of the works before, it made use of an array of soloists. It was characterized by its pure and rich sound and its upbeat, soulful nature.

The wistful and enchanting "Dawn that Dream" followed, which featured the trumpet, played by Marsalis, with piano. It drew listeners into its simple melody, and its pureness left the audience with goose bumps.

John Coltrane's "Resolution," from his "Love Supreme," provided contrast as the next composition on the program. This piece, again, was large, yet not overwhelming in sound. It seemed to be a web of melodic innovation, very rhythmic and complex, yet very together at the same time.

Ending the program on a lively note was the soulful and bouncy "Second Line," from Duke Ellington's "New Orlean's Suite." It finished the planned program with a fun and upbeat character, its harmonies adding a "bittersweet" and unique quality.

The prolonged applause of the audience and a standing ovation gave listeners one more opportunity to hear Marsalis play. His encore came in the form of a breathtakingly improvised rendition of Ira Gershwin's "Embraceable You." Featuring only piano, drums, bass and the trumpet played by Marsalis, it delighted the listeners with its sweet purity of sound.

The entire concert was a musical performance of the highest caliber. However, its relaxed and comfortable atmosphere gave an added dimension of fun to the evening. The performers could be seen and heard to laugh during their pieces, chat and even shout out improvisatory phrases—all characteristic to the casual quality of jazz. The group dynamic was what made it a one-of-a-kind performance. Each piece seemed to be a conversation in perfect synchronization between all the individuals of the orchestra. Like a string of pearls, each soloist held a rich beautiful quality of his own and yet, as a group, they all seemed to have an equal value and merged together perfectly.

"We are all capable of solo work, we are all quality musicians and it's a good problem for a group to have," trumpet player Marcus Printup said, referring to the talent of the orchestra members. "Yet I think we achieve what we do through playing unselfishly, and playing as a group. Sometimes we have to tell Wynton, play a little more, people come to see you, you're the marquis name. Yet he emphasizes [the orchestra], and we all believe in creating that unselfish group dynamic as professionals. When we play up on stage we are one trumpet, we are one saxophone, we are one trombone."

Perhaps it is this professionalism, combined with genuine talent in its medium, which has not only allowed the orchestra to give such incredible performances as last weekend's, but has also allowed it to achieve as much in the world of jazz as it has.

The Rooke Chapel Choir's concert this Sunday is a preview of the music it will perform during its tour of Spain this summer.

By Michelle Dombeck
A & E Editor

The Rooke Chapel Choir, which performs in the interdenominational worship service almost every Sunday, will give a concert this Sunday, April 28, previewing the music that it will perform during its trip to Spain this summer. Under the direction of conductor William Payn, the choir will be performing a wide variety of sacred music from many different centuries and traditions.

Among the choir's favorite songs are "Come Thou Fount of Every Blessing," arranged by Mack Wilberg, "Salmo 150," by Ernani Aguiar and Brahms' "Wie Lieblich sind deine wohnungen." Laura Sassano '02 is particularly excited about Wilberg's arrangement.

"One of my favorites is 'Come Thou Fount of Every Blessing' because it is exquisite," Sassano said. "It flows beautifully and has wonderful harmonies."

Other songs include "Let All Mortal Flesh Keep Silence," arranged by Gustav Holst, "Witness," arranged by Jack Halloran and "My Soul's Been Anchored in the Lord," arranged by Moses Hogan. Amanda Robie '03, Amalia Martin '02 and Justin Blanding '03 will solo in the concert.

The choir will be touring in Spain from May 20-29. Despite the choir's busy schedule (with performances in Salamanca, Leon, Santiago and Madrid), the members will still have time to enjoy themselves.

"As we travel to each city, we will, of course, take in the sights, enjoy some walking tours and take advantage of good food and entertainment," Payn said.

The tour of Spain will be the last time the choir's seven graduating seniors will perform, and is therefore being met with some sadness.

"I am really sad to leave such a wonderful, talented group of people with whom I make such beautiful music. I have really enjoyed my four years with the chapel choir and with Dr. Payn," Sassano said.

This free concert will be held in Rooke Chapel at 7:30 p.m. and is open to the public.

Student choreographers will have a chance to showcase their work

By Andrew Clugston
Senior Writer

Performing a program that exudes creativity, virtuosity and innovation, the Bucknell Dance Company (BDC) will hold its spring semester dance performance in the Weis Center this weekend. In anticipation of what promises to be an exciting concert, the BDC performed a full rehearsal in Tustin Studio last Sunday. What ensued was a festival of artistic talent, abundant in emotion and color and integrating a wide range of dance styles. The rehearsal made the actual performances, to be held on April 26 and 27 at 8 p.m., seem very promising.

Enhanced by the lighting design of Steven Draheim and a costume design team headed by Professor of Theater Paula Davis-Larson, the performance will open with Jenny Wharton's '02 "Allure," a work which reveals the flexibility of ballet as a dance genre. Replacing traditional dance with a post-modern flair, one can bid adieu to delicate arabesques and pirouettes, and say hello to black point shoes, daring fouettes and brisk accentuated movements, set to Kosheen's resonating base rhythm.

Guest Professor of Dance Nicole Bradley-Browning '97 has choreographed "Falling Sky," a spiritual and thought provoking piece, which elicits reflection upon issues of life and death. Set to a haunting musical collaboration by the Kronos Quartet and Arvo Part, Bradley's movement and associated soundtrack merge in such a unique manner that it embraces both the beautiful and the disturbing.

In contrast, Professor of Dance Er-Dong Hu and Browning have co-created the comical "Too Too Much" (pun intended), bringing with it refreshing levity to the program. Sustained by the majestic third movement of Brahms' "Violin Concerto in D Major," elements of this piece are reminiscent of Disney's original epic "Fantasia," as company members demonstrate through delightful choreography the humorous facets of ballet.

Andre Tyson (formerly a principal dancer with Alvin Ailey American Dance Theater) brings "Running W/Scissors" to the stage—a work in which modern jazz and classical lines neatly coalesce. Contemplative, vivacious, industrial and spiritual, Tyson's choreography is a piercing reminder that to take risks and defy convention is a daring, yet often fulfilling, process.

Ryen Herrmann '02 explores the boundaries between theater and dance in "Memo: I'M CRASHING," in which dancers perform in both words and movement. What is successfully conveyed in this piece is the bittersweet experience of reality and imagination, and how one compliments the other until all that remains is chaos.

In a related vein, alumna Sarah Wagner '01 commemorates the company's graduating seniors in "At the Edge." Encouraging the expression of each senior's sentiments, Wagner skillfully harmonizes their emotions into a celebration of poignant movements.

Finely performed by its two choreographers, "Little Cabbage" has Venessa Hull '04 and Stephenie Yezek '03 demonstrating creative use of the ballet bar. Integrating just about everything except warm-up stretches, Hull and Yezek fly over, under and between the metal with ease and stylistic eloquence.

"Pienso en ti," choreographed by Stephanie Turi '02, ends the performance in a whirlwind and flash of flamenco style. Integrating bold foot work and exuberant attitudes, the work leaves the viewer with an indelible impression of the BDC's skill and versatility.

The BDC's spring semester performance is funded by the Department of Theatre and Dance, the Bucknell Student Government and a grant from the Bucknell Association for the Arts, and is suitable for all age groups. Tickets are $6 for adults and $4 for children and senior citizens, and are available at the Langone Center Box Office or at the door.

An abroad perspective: a year in Oxford

Making the decision last year to leave the University for a year abroad was a difficult decision, but after only a few weeks of arriving in Oxford, England, I knew that I had made the right one. Not only did I enjoy experiencing the British culture and the tutorial system of schooling at Oxford, but I was also able to travel throughout Europe during my breaks. The combination of seeing new places, meeting new people and experiencing a new method of teaching has left an indelible mark my life.

The head table at Thanksgiving Dinner at St. Catherine's College, Oxford, that was prepared by visiting American students.

I departed for London for the first time on Sept. 24 of last fall, but my first attempt to leave North America was unsuccessful. A few minutes after takeoff we were notified of 'engine trouble.' I, sitting on the other side of the aircraft, was unable to see the flames shooting out from the engine. While half the plane was panicking, I remained peacefully reading a book wishing that the pilot would just keep flying. I figured the three good engines left would be enough to make the journey. Not until we landed did I, and half the aircraft, realize how serious the problem was. After dumping fuel, we made an emergency landing at JFK where our plane was met on the tarmac by fire trucks and ambulances. I finally arrived in London on the morning of the Sept. 26, only one day behind schedule.

My first impressions of British culture consisted of its food not being the most palatable I have ever encountered, that it rains constantly (I was there for one of the driest falls in over 100 years) and that the language was harder than I thought it would be to understand. Sneakers were trainers, pants were trousers, a mate was your friend, a wanker was not a good thing and being pissed did not mean being upset. I learned that British sandwiches consist of two stale slices of buttered bread, one slice of cheese, one slice of meat of your choice and, if you are lucky, some sliced cucumber. It was not long before I learned to avoid them. Once I began to understand the lingo and learned what was edible, my stay became much more pleasant and less confusing for sure.

Our British schoolmates, made being away from home a great experience. They were outgoing, welcoming and anxious to talk about differences in our cultures and perceptions. Everyone was eager to learn from each other. I was able to get involved in college sports, which was a great way of meeting people. Having rowed for two years at the University, I was keen to continue rowing at Oxford, which is a great place to row because of the traditions and history of crew there. In a few weeks, in May, I will be racing in the Summer Eights event which is a bumps-style racing in which your boat has to 'bump into' the one that started ahead of your own.

Sharing our holidays and learning about British ones has also been interesting. I am looking forward to the Queen's 50th Anniversary Jubilee celebration that is this coming summer. However, Thanksgiving will remain one of my fondest memories of my year at St. Catherine's, Oxford. A group of the visiting American students decided to cook a Thanksgiving dinner to share with our British friends. Since many of our British schoolmates did not understand the holiday, we thought that by celebrating it together they would be able to get a better understanding. All of the American students made their favorite Thanksgiving dishes and invited their British friends to dine with us. The feast was incredible—every dish you can imagine accompanied by two 28-pound turkeys adorned the table. There were over 50 of us all eating together and enjoying each other's company. Everybody that came donated a few pounds to charity for a Sept. 11 Fund. Being my first Thanksgiving away from home, my dinner here with the people I had met made it unforgettable.

One of the most meaningful experiences of the year has been learning through the tutorial system—a system that is unique in the world to Oxford and Cambridge Universities. Instead of being taught in classes or by lectures, Oxford and Cambridge students are taught one-on-one by tutors, or Dons. Once a week you meet with your tutor who assigns reading and a paper topic for the next week. This method allows for the student to become much better at expressing his side of an argument and to learn how to defend his opinions.

The benefits of the tutorial method are numerous. It allows the student to determine the direction of his course, while the tutor guides the student through the material by offering insights, suggesting readings and assigning questions to be addressed. The intimate setting of the schooling creates a much more dynamic atmosphere in which I believe the student learns much more than from the traditional method of schooling. Studying under the tutorial system definitely was one of the perks of studying abroad.

Traveling during my trimester breaks was possibly the best experience of the whole year abroad. During winter break, after going home for Christmas, I traveled to Prague and Budapest with another University student and a friend from Oxford. During my second break, I backpacked around Western Europe for six weeks. The places I have seen and the cultures experienced and the friends made while traveling have made my abroad experience extraordinary. Traveling definitely awakens you to the vast differences that exist between cultures and the different world perspectives that are important to understand.

As I write this article in a hotel in Barcelona, I am preparing to return to England for my last trimester abroad. One of the most remarkable aspects about my six-week trip is the number of University friends that that I either met, or ran into throughout Europe. It was always nice to see some familiar faces during my journey. It is a testament to the type of students that attend the University—always looking for new and exciting experiences by studying abroad.

My time abroad has been one of the most important of my life. I have learned much about myself, European cultures and have experienced a different method of schooling. Along the way, I have also met and befriended many people, making my year abroad all the more enjoyable. For my last term that starts this week, I look forward to spring crew at Summer Eights, where 20,000 people turn out to watch the races, experiencing the British "summer", trying the famous British Pimms and punting on the Isis (River Thames).

University succeeds in management competition

By Meredith Atkinson
Features Editor

Under the guidance Professor of Management Charles Moran, Ed Reilly '02 and Eric Molitor '01 represented the University at the Fifth Annual Enterprise Creation Competition, more commonly known as the Business Plan Competition. The competition was held on March 28 to March 30 at Ball State University in Muncie, Ind. Only nine finalists were chosen to compete. The finalists included Carnegie Mellon, Southwest Texas State University, University of Arizona, University of Manitoba, University of Michigan, University of Oregon, University of Portland, University of Toronto and of course, Bucknell University.

Reilly will be graduating as a Management major this year and Molitor graduated from the University with a degree in chemical engineering last year.

"I think it says something good about Bucknell that an engineer and a liberal arts major can work together successfully. We learned to use each other's strengths and to tolerate our differing views of things." Reilly said.

Moran also believes that the two different educational backgrounds improved their design.

"Ed and Eric have shown extraordinary initiative in developing and presenting their business plan. This pairing of an engineering major and a management major produced a proposal that drew on the breadth of experiences they have had as Bucknell students. They represented Bucknell and themselves effectively and with distinction in the competition," Moran said.

All participants in the competition were required to create a real business plan, which was scored based on the quality of a written plan and oral presentation. The business plan that the two students submitted was forty pages long and contained seventeen references. Reilly said that they had "two tubs of research. The research on how to write a business plan, and the research for our plan itself."

It was a result of two years of hard work and dedication to the project. The competition at Ball State marked the ninth one that Reilly and Molitor have competed in, and the first one in which they made the final round.

"We've been really tenacious. Ball State was not our first business plan competition. We've had lots of judges from lots of other competitions who just tore us to shreds, but it made us better. The plan that enabled us to reach national finals had been revised dozens of times," Reilly said.

After each attempt, they carefully analyzed the comments from judges and refined their plan.

"This semester we also took advantage of alumni, and contacted several successful Bucknell alumni and asked for their feedback. We also did real market research and spoke to as many knowledgeable people as we could." Reilly said.

The judges of the competition included a successful panel of venture capitalists, entrepreneurs and other established business people.

Unlike most of the schools competing, the University does not have a formal entrepreneurship program. Reilly and Molitor were self-taught, and relied heavily upon the dedication of Moran.

"Professor Moran went above and beyond the call of duty. We would not have come as far as we have without his support. He was our advisor from the earliest days when we were just a small club with big dreams, and in late March, he watched as a panel of judges grilled us at national finals. I can't think of a better example of what a Bucknell education is supposed to be about," Reilly said.

In the early stages of the plan's development, two past graduates, Pat Creighton '03 and Lauren Mosler '03 were very helpful in developing the plan, however, were unable to compete in the event.

Last year, Bucknell Entrepreneurs (a student organization) was founded to teach students the skills that are necessary in writing a business plan and to provide students with the opportunity to compete in business plan competitions. Reilly and Molitor's success is an early indicator of the program's promise.

"I hope Bucknell will one day have some sort of an entrepreneurship program. We have so many alumni who have been successful entrepreneurs, and I believe entrepreneurship is a way of viewing the world that can change a lot of problems," Reilly said.

"The support we've received from alumni has been tremendous. Several alumni have taken time out of their busy schedules to read our plan in detail and tell us what they think. We've learned the true value of networking, and that it's valuable to ask for advice," Reilly said.

While there is still not a specific entrepreneurship program, Reilly and Molitor's success and national recognition will likely bolster the popularity of the already extremely popular management department and encourage other students to pursue similar projects.

"I would hope that other students investigate these kinds of opportunities and pursue them," Moran said.

Campus names Forrest D. Brown award winners

As the academic year winds to an end, students are busy preparing for final exams, writing papers, and saying goodbye to friends. However, some students at the University continue to find time to help others. Several of the school's most active volunteers were rewarded for their community service contributions at the Volunteer Recognition Banquet on Tuesday, April 9.

Dr. Donald W. Stechschulte Jr., medical director of the Student Health Service opened the ceremony with remarks about his experiences a volunteer, particularly emphasizing his participation in the Bucknell Brigade to Nicaragua. The Community Service Team then honored Department of Chemistry Assistant Professor Alison Draper and Professor of Management John Miller with the Forrest D. Brown Award, which is given to faculty, staff or administrators for outstanding commitment to community service and fostering an ethic of service among students.

Michelle Payne '02, administrative intern for the Community Service Program, explained that this year, the award was given to Professor of Management John Miller for his commitment to including service learning as a part of the Management 101 course for over the past 20 years. Alison Draper was also honored with the Forrest D. Brown Award for volunteering her time to test community water samples, preparing lunch for her lab students, and for being a volunteer and a staff leader on the Bucknell Brigade for three years. Draper said the Brigade has been a fun experience for her because "there are incredible students on the trip and it's a really neat opportunity to get to know people and do something really worthwhile." Draper also noted that it was great to be recognized for her community service contributions, but she said, "I do it because it's the right thing to do."

At the banquet, students receiving awards from the Community Service Team included Carrie Paxton '05, Jessica McKee '04, Sarah Tunison '03, Erin Zscolcsak '03, Aline Baly '02, Christine Glover '02 and Elizabeth Muller '02.

The dinner was wonderful because I think it's nice to be recognized for your efforts and it's good because it encourages you to go out and do it again. Community service is hard work and a time commitment so it's great to get a pat on the back for it," Baly said.

The Outstanding Volunteer of the Year award was given to and senior Sarah Rives. This award recognizes a student or students who have shown exceptional and continued interest in community service throughout the year. Generally, these students are not only involved in a great deal of community service, but they are leaders and initiators of projects. The selection committee chooses the award recipients based on the broadness and depth of their community service activities.

Payne was selected as a winner for her extensive involvement in community service. Payne not only maintains the Community Service Program office as an administrative intern, but also helps organize projects such as the Light the Night walk for lymphoma research, the Volunteer Recognition Dinner, and the school chest project, which involves gathering school supplies for war-torn countries. During the fall semester, the Community Service Program coordinates student involvement during the Lewisburg Wooly Worm Festival at Homecoming, and the New Columbia Apple Butter Festival and the Giving Tree project.

Payne says her role in community service at Bucknell has "changed my life. I've always been involved in service, but my experience as an intern with the program has definitely moved my career interests to the service sector. It's amazing to see that the tiny little things I do to make things run more smoothly can make a big difference in someone's life. It's also very heartening to know that Bucknellians are often incredibly willing to help others."

Rives received the distinction for her work as president of Habitat for Humanity. She helped to get the organization off the ground at the University over the past four years. She has been on the Brigade three times, and was a student leader on the trip twice. She has also been volunteering with the Rooke Chapel Committee for the past four years. Rives said that volunteering "has totally made my experience at Bucknell what it's been. I can't imagine being here without doing it."

An abroad perspective: a semester in London

By Julia Casteleiro
Contributing Writer

Gatwick Airport, 7:30 a.m., Sept. 2: the airport could not have been any busier. I could barely maneuver myself through the crowds, let alone my three suitcases which added up to well over 100 lbs. All I had to do was find the bus station and in little over an hour I would be at my new home.

Four hours later, as I dragged my suitcases up the tube station stairs at South Kensington Station, I was still not there. I was told to go to Manson Place, "right down the road from the tube," but as I searched and searched, I realized I was completely lost. I had been up for well over a day and as much as I was determined to make it there on my own, my body was about to stop functioning. I gave up and flagged down a cab, which drove me exactly half a block, to the little road, Manson Place, inconspicuous to anyone not from the area.

I walked into my flat and was introduced to the 11 other girls I would be living with for the semester. I decided to explore the area with a friend from school. We walked around our neighborhood exploring all the different pubs and restaurants. We settled at Zetland Arms, a pub just around the corner, on Old Brompton Road, where my friends and I in the upcoming weeks, would become after-work regulars, stopping by for a pint of Kronnenberg beer.

After a long day, I made my way back to my flat and got settled. I fell asleep as I talked with my roommates about where they were from and what their expectations of this semester were.

The program was the Boston University Internship Program and thus half the students were from Boston. Like me, they had chosen the program because they had always wanted to live in London.

I chose London because it had always been my desire to travel. Being in London presented the perfect opportunity to see everything else Europe has to offer. I planned trips to Amsterdam, Paris, Munich, Barcelona and Dublin, as well as trips around England to Cambridge and Torque. It was my plan to explore London during the week and the rest of Europe on the weekends.

One of my most memorable trips occurred sometime after Amsterdam and before Barcelona: Oktoberfest in Munich. Oktoberfest is an event that lasts for about a month and consists of 12 to 14 huge tents that fit thousands of people—each tent promoting a different kind of beer. Carnival rides, such as bumper cars and roller coasters, were intermingled between the tents.

At 11 a.m. on the first day of Oktoberfest, we walked from the train to this extraordinary scene and sat down in the first tent we found. A waitress dressed in traditional German Garb took our orders. The idea of Oktoberfest, as we soon discovered, is basically to drink, sing songs while standing on tables and talk to people from all over the world even though I did not get to see any of Munich my time at Oktoberfest was by far one of the more memorable.

Bucknellians Julia '03, Lindsay Zantop '03, Laura Maisel '03 and Kaitlin Ward '03 enjoy the festivities at Oktoberfest.

After six weeks abroad I had been to more countries than I had in my past 20 years. I loved seeing the various cities, but each time I left on a trip, I missed London more and more. It had slowly crept up on me and I realized that I had begun to call it home. I decided to dedicate the next weeks to further explore the city where I had come to study.

I went everywhere I could around London and as the end of the program was in sight, my desire to travel turned into a desire to stay in London forever. My need to stay in London was so overpowering that my weekend trip to Paris was shortened into a day trip, simply because I had no desire to be anywhere else.

It is hard to explain why London is so amazing until you actually go there and maneuver your way around the tube system for the first time—finding yourself at Portobello Road on a Saturday or Bond Street exploring the shops. There was no one day or one experience that made me think of it as one of the best cities of the world. Maybe it was the first time somebody asked me for directions and I was able to give them, or when I figured out what door to get in on the tube so I could minimize walking through the station to work. Maybe it was a dinner with friends at my favorite restaurant Wagamama's, or sitting at Zetland's having a pint laughing at nothing while listening to Robbie Williams play for the 15th time. But, most of all, it was the reality of being in a foreign place and finally not feeling foreign.

Julia and University student Lindsay Zantop '03 in front of the Eiffel Tower in Paris.

It is easy to listen to all the returning students recount their experiences and think of them as nothing special—whether it happened in a tent at Oktoberfest, or a house in Lewisburg, it would not make a difference. The point is that it did happen in a tent at Oktoberfest. I can go back to London and know how to get to Camden Market, or to South Kensington to eat at a hole-in-the-wall Indian food place, that has the best Indian food in the country. I can walk into Zetland Arms, say hello to the bartenders and not be treated like a tourist and I can finally give flawless directions to Manson Place without having to hail a cab.

Management 101 students work for a good cause and sell quality products

By Rachel Gold
Staff Writer

Anyone walking past the Bison this past week would have seen Management 101 students marketing their products. Many students know that Management company members have spent hours on end in the management labs, in management class and attended many meetings with members of their division.

Professor of Management John Miller who started the incredibly popular Management program at Bucknell University in 1976, stated the purpose of Management as: "practical theory designed to serve as a solid foundation for lifelong learning about organization and management."

In addition to learning how to successfully lead a company, Management 101 students perform service projects to raise money for the organization of their choice.

Company A, known as "A Place to Lay" created blue fleece blankets with a University inscription. Jill Smith '05 served as the vice president of service for Company A. Company A's service project provided support and renovation services for the Haven Ministry homeless shelter in Sunbury, using funds generated through the design and sale of fleece blankets.

Since Haven Ministry cannot afford the upkeep of their building, Company A decided that it would be helpful to donate their time and perform tasks such as painting rooms, staining outdoor benches and gardening. In their mission statement Company A explains: "the company feels it is a worthwhile endeavor to help those who are unable to provide adequate financial support for themselves and their families." In addition to maintaining the up-keep of the property, Company A members tutored the children and provided support and encouragement for the adults. Especially through the tutoring of children, Company A feels that they acted as role models.

Alex Bothwell '04 acted as the Vice President of Service for Company B known as Big Cat's Balls and Bats. Company B sold Bucknell University baseball shirts. For their service project they provided services and financial support for the T&D Cats of the World wildlife rescue farm in Penns Creek, and for the Union County Supplemental Food Program. Company B explains: "many of the animals in the farm had been beaten, abused and mistreated by owners."

Company B's mission was to help out in the construction of the new otter pen. They constructed a wall, put up tin siding, shoveled gravel into the dens, moved large rocks into the pen and stained the wood paneling surrounding the pen. Company B explains: "we had an absolute great time doing the work at T&D's and are excited for a follow-up visit to see the pen when the otters arrive."

Company C, known as "Check out My Glass" sold custom glassware with the Bucknell University emblem on it. Emily Smith '04 acted as Company C's vice president of service. For their service project, Company C worked with the Union County Historical Society and the Audubon Society to help with renovations to the Dale/Walker historical farmhouse and gardens, and with the Heiter Community Center to provide programs at the Dale/Walker house.

"We chose our service project because it was good way to donate our time and profits from our business project. It also benefited the historical society and the community center," Chris Duffany '04, the public relations/requisitions chair, said.

"Our experience was spectacular. All went according to plan. The kids were great and the people in association with the farmhouse were extremely accommodating," Duffany said.

Company D, known as "Dry Times" sold large Bucknell University beach towels for their business project. Kristin Abromitis '04 served as the companies vice president of service.

"Our company chose to do our service project at Danville State Mental Hospital. We chose this project because we felt like it was a service that doesn't normally get enough publicity or help. The patients there have very little contact with the outside world and we thought they would enjoy interacting with Bucknell students. Our company went on four different occasions and played Bingo, volleyball, and ping-pong. We also went in the pool and danced," Abromitis said.

"We hosted a spring social on April 13 where we had a dance and make your own ice cream sundaes. We also had activities such as face painting, making cards, playing board games, temporary tattoos and dance contests where the patients could win prizes," Abromitis said.

Company E known as "Earl's EZ T's" sold Houseparty t-shirts as their business project. Jennifer Bentzen '04 served as the company's vice president of service.

David Meilleur explained: "on March 30th Earl's EZ T's hosted a car wash to raise money for the Habitat for Humanity. The car wash itself was a great success, yielding $560 and an overwhelmingly positive community response. Informational flyers about Habitat were distributed at the event," David Meilleur '04 said.

"The majority of people who came [to the car wash] were really enthusiastic about the prospect of helping out Habitat, and were also very knowledgeable about the cause," said Terence Belfor '04, the company's advertising and public relations manager.

Belfor also mentioned that Company E plans on continuing to work with Habitat until the semester ends. "We plan to continue our efforts to increase community awareness regarding Habitat throughout the rest of the semester," he said.

For all of the five Management 101 companies project funding came from the sale of their product. Companies A, B, C, D and E made 45-minute presentations about their experiences working on their business and service projects. The companies presented their successes as well as some of their failures. They were instructed by Miller: "to present useful introductions to the course for future students and for faculty colleagues interested in the development of active, collaborative, problem-based and experiential pedagogies."

Chi Phi Hosts 19th Annual Special Olympics

Chi Phi fraternity recently hosted the 19th annual Special Olympics at the University. The brothers of Chi Phi recruited approximately 75 volunteers, along with 25 members of the fraternity to help with the event, which was held last Sunday from 9:30 a.m. to 2:30 p.m. They worked along side the Central Susquehanna Valley Special Olympics to create an event that would meet the expectations of the athletes.

Approximately 130 athletes participated, many coming from the local institutions that support people with disabilities, including the Selinsgrove Center. There were a variety of events from which the athletes could choose: a softball and tennis ball throw, basketball skills, 50-800m walks, 50-200m dashes, 10-50m assisted walks and 10-30m wheelchair "walks." The track and field events were held in the field house.

Michael McNeice '03 is Chi Phi's Special Olympics chairman. He oversaw all of the stages leading up to the event, including the event itself.

"The Special Olympics was a lot of work, but once you are there you realize that it was well worth the effort my brothers and I put in. I was willing to put in the effort because I had been a part of the event last year and experienced first hand what a fantastic feeling it is to help the athletes," McNeice said.

The children and adults who participate in Special Olympics develop and improve physical fitness and motor skills, greater self-confidence and a positive self-image. It gives them the chance to exhibit courage and enthusiasm, and discover new abilities and talents. Not only do participants get a great sense of accomplishment competing in the events, but they also enjoy spending the day with the students.

In many ways, the volunteers get as much out of the experience as the athletes. They get the satisfaction of knowing that they've helped the participants accomplish something they never thought possible.

"I too felt a great sense of accomplishment. If it were not for the hard work of all the people involved, the athletes wouldn't have such a fulfilling experience," John Purcell '03, president of Chi Phi said.

Medals were awarded for the top three athletes in each heat of each event. The heats were structured so that every athlete received at least one medal.

"The highlight of the day was seeing the athletes' excitement as they climbed onto the medals podium," Purcell said.

"They really enjoy getting rewarded for their efforts," McNeice added.

Chi Phi brother Brian Goldsmith '02 summed up the satisfaction of being a Special Olympics volunteer when he said: "It's amazing to see the abilities of these athletes. As the day progressed, one could gain a greater appreciation for the way that these athletes live."

An abroad perspective: a semester in South Africa

By Khadija Shariff
Contributing Writer

Experiencing South Africa was experiencing the diversities of beauty, hardships and struggles. Before going I became aware of the problems South Africa was facing post-apartheid, through a couple of classes that I had taken here at the University. I, idealistically expected to devote my time to volunteer and help to alleviate South Africa's social ills, while learning to be independent in Africa. South Africa ended up offering this and much more.

I am not the touristy or outdoorsy type, I didn't do many backpacking trips into the wilderness, nor do I have stories of safaris or accounts of traditional 'tribal' village life. I was for the most part in an urban setting, with young college students who were caught in a bind between their traditional and modern realities, as South Africa was rapidly moving into modernization. I learned about life in South Africa's past and present society, as well as its anticipation for the future. Even within the urban setting, I did get to enjoy a good amount of nature as Capetown is surrounded by the gorgeous landscapes of mountains, valleys and beautiful beaches. I came to discover that Capetown's natural and social existence are inextricably linked and this reality has left a profound impression on my life and my ideas.

Courtesy of Khadija Shariff

The school I attended, the University of Capetown (UCT), situated on a nature reserve on the side of one of Capetown's most attractive and centrally situated mountain. It is called Table Mountain because of its flat, plateau-like top. Table Mountain is one of 12 mountains in a range called the 12 apostles that surround Capetown on one side, while on the other side the Indian and Atlantic oceans gloriously meet at the famous and breathtaking Cape of Good Hope. So the city of Capetown sits busy and bustling amidst this wondrous natural landscape. It is South Africa's third largest city, and it is situated at the tip of the Western Cape, where its nature, politics, and society make it feel like quite a distant reality from the rest of the country.

In its own strange way, Capetown offered to me a dynamic physical and social character. I would wake up to Table Mountain taking different forms every day. Because I was there during South Africa's harshest winter in 40 years, the weather was always four-seasons in one day. As I walked or was shuttled up the mountain to class every day, it never failed to greet me with a different and equally awing attitude. Capetown's social diversity and its political complexities affected me in much this same way as they challenged me to expand my frame of thought, and more importantly to develop a political consciousness.

As most people are aware, South Africa existed under an oppressive Apartheid regime, based on segregation, discrimination and oppression for most all of the 20th Century. Until 1994, blacks and whites could not live in the same area, and the laws of separation were deeply imbedded into the many social and political institutions such as schooling, housing, the government, etc. Within South Africa's expanding tourist economy, these past struggles are shown through the famous Robben Island, where political prisoners such as Nelson Mandela were held, or in Museums such as District Six museum where evidence of forced removals and locations can be seen. But the real accounts of past struggles can be viewed in all parts of Capetown, and seen in the faces of all the people of South Africa. I experienced and saw these struggles as part of the present, and see their resolutions as crucial to the future of South Africa.

> I learned about life in South Africa's past and present society, as well as its anticipation for the future' ... I came to discover that Capetown's natural and social existence are inextricably linked and this reality has left a profound impression on my life and my ideas.

South Africa is stuck in the unfortunate circumstance of being a first and third world country all in one. A friend of mine on the program with me once told me that she once went to South Africa with her family in the late 1990s and traveled throughout the city of Capetown without having met any black Africans. It was the same awkward feeling I felt when I first arrived in South Africa. I thought I had known Africa a little bit since I lived in Tanzania for quite a while, but the Africa I had encountered my first couple of days in Capetown was not what I expected.

Khadija and a couple of friends standing in front of the Campus Bay beachfront.

I was greeted with Africans behind the counters or as waiters and waitresses serving me. Meanwhile I had the luxury of living in nice hotels and going to shop and eat in beautifully built and familiar looking malls on nice and clean streets, feeling like I had never gotten on a plane and traveled, for 24 hours, to the opposite end of the world. I had anticipated dusty roads packed full of people and going shopping for everything from food to underwear on street side markets. I soon came to realize that such a place did exist in Capetown, but I would have to get over the mountains and pull myself as far away from the beautiful ocean beaches in order for me to find it.

Where I would find myself is at the location townships or ghettos as they are now commonly referred to. It shouldn't be too difficult for someone to picture how these 'ghettoes' are situated and who lives in them. As part of the Apartheid system of separation, the mountains and the ocean were strategically used to keep the Africans separated from the whites, the Indians and the 'colored'. In this social hierarchy which found whites at the top and most privileged classes and blacks at the bottom and least privileged, one can see how the geographical structure would find all blacks in the non arable, dusty, flat land areas while the whites would reside along the beaches and the mountainside enjoying the close proximity to the city and all the richness and beauty of the land. In a matter of minutes one can jump from one existence to another. The present government has done little to try and alleviate this burden by bringing these two realities closer together. The transportation system breaks down at about 7 p.m. and without a car, it is nearly impossible to get into the city at night. This is exactly how it used to be in the past when unless one was working, pass laws were required for blacks to get in and out of the city.

The experience is initially extremely unsettling, but has an alarming and even more unsettling way of settling itself into a mode of normality. Acquiescence and a general apathy to this existence is what I observed in many South Africans, especially as the more luxurious lifestyle and unalarmingly, a more American lifestyle was sold to everyone through the television and media that existed in South Africa. Within the many shacks and 'self help', squatter camps that thousands of South Africans have illegally situated around the Capetown area, it is a common thing to find a television. In the TVs, American soap operas, shows, movies and news are aired 24/7, and once in a while a South African based program would put on their own shows which ended up mimicking the American shows. Its not that I have a problem with the American culture, its just that I find it quite odd that it would permeate to such depths leaving people to ignore more and more of their own culture and existence in order to try and live up to what they see on television. This is a reality everywhere, even in America, but in South Africa it translated into what I felt was a worsening sense of identity. As if the remnants of Apartheid weren't bad enough, now the American cultural imperialism seems to just be making this worse.

In my school I faced these same harsh realities. My dormitory was situated in lower campus, which I would call off campus at the very bottom of the mountain and into a different section of town. My program directors wanted to give us the opportunity to live with African students, and sure enough this is where most of the African students lived. Though it was not so openly declared, I observed the UCT housing to be extremely race based, if not outright racist. The area I lived in was particularly dangerous, as nearly everyone I knew had experienced some kind of theft. On top of this, the distance from the school was quite far and the living conditions were not so favorable. Meanwhile, most of the white students, but not exclusively, lived in middle campus, naturally closer to the school where the dorms were catered, newer, and well maintained. This to me seemed more than just a coincidence. Nonetheless I couldn't have asked for a better place to live.

The Forest Hills apartments were always alive and busy, occupied mainly by graduate students. I had two roommates, Gao, a South African studying accounting, and Bertha Zimbabwean, studying Law. I was also introduced to their friends who became like family to me during my time in South Africa. Our flat was always a place people would stop by for dinner, which was always cooked for everyone, no one ever only cooked for themselves. Parties, poetry sessions and clubs were popular amongst the friends I made, and even most of the UCT students. Many were also involved in the volunteering programs and heavily into the politics and society of Capetown.

Most students at UCT, black and white are highly conscious of the racial and political struggle and attempt to move past this to develop a different future for themselves. As a result I found myself amidst students who were very well aware of their social and political existence, and I found myself marching, debating, protesting and always involved in invigorating political discussions. These experiences are what helped me to develop a more conscious political identity with in South Africa and worldwide.

Being in South Africa made me feel like I was living in the 1960s and 1970s sporting a fro with my fist high up in the air, during a time when life was full of passion, protest, and purpose.

Although in this seemingly long research paper I have probably depicted a very dreary picture of South Africa, I must stress that my experience included much more fun and excitement and had I had space I would have loved to share.

I highly enjoyed my stay in Capetown and feel I am extremely lucky to have gained such an experience. I strongly urge anyone interested to go and take advantage of this wonderful opportunity which has definitely helped pave the way for my future aspirations.
